Ajax the fon of Oilens was drowned; Tewer fled into Cyprus; Diemedes to King Daunu, 30 who was Lord of the Japyges in Apulia; some of the Locrians were driven into Afrik, others into Italie, all the East part whereof was called Magna Gracia, by reason of some ny Towns which the Greeks were driven to erect upon that coast. Finally, it appeares in Homer, that the Gracian Ladies, whose husbands had bin at the war of Troy, were wont to call it. The place wherethe Greekes suffered miserie, and the unluckie Citie nor to be mentioned. And thus much for Trey, and those that warred there: the overthrowof which Citie, as hath bin faid, happened in the time of Habdon Judge of Ifrael, whom Sampson, after a variance or Inter-regnum for certaine yeares, succeeded.

Of Sampson, Eli, and Samuel.

of Sampson-

HE birth and acts of Sampson are written at large in the 13.14.15 and 16. of Judges; and therefore I shall not need to make a repetition thereof. But thefethings I gather out of that Storie, First, that the Angel of God forbad the wife of Maneah the mother of Sampfon. to drinke Wine or strong drink, or to eate any uncleane meat after the was conceived with child; because those strong liquors hinder the strength, and as it were wither and shrinke the childin the mothers wombe. Though this were even the counsell of God himselfe, and delive vered by his Angell, yet it feemeth that many women of this age have not read or at least will not believe this precept: the most part forbearing nor drinks, nor meats, how ftrong or uncleane foever, filling themselves with all forts of wines, and with artificialldrinkes far more forcible: by reason whereof, so many wretched seeble bodies are home into the world, and the races of the able and strong men in effect decayed:

Secondly, it is to be noted, that the Angelof God refuled the facrifice which Manoah would have offered him, commanding him to prefent it unto the Lord: and therefore those that professe divination by the helpe of Angels, to whom also they facrifice, may affiredly know that they are Divels who accept thereof, and not good Angels, who receive no worship that is proper to God.

Thirdly, this Sampson was twice betrayed by his wives, to wit, by their importunitie and deceitfull teares: by the first he lost but a part of his goods; by the second his life. Ouem nulla vis super are potuit, volupt as evertit: Whom no force could over-master, Volup-

Fourthly, we may note, that he did not in all deliver Ifrael from the oppression of the philistims; though in some fort he revenged, and defended them: for notwithstanding that he had flaine 30.0f them in his first attempt, burnt their Corne in harvest time, and giventhem a great overthrow instantly upon it: yet so much did Israel seare the Philifims, as they affembled 3000 menout of Juda, to befrege Samfon, in the rock or mountaine of Etam, using these words: Knowest not thou that the Philistims are rulers over vs? &. After which they bound him, and delivered him unto the Philistims, for fear of their revenge; though he was no fooner loofened, but he gave them another overthrow, and flew 1000 with the jawbone of an Asse.

Lastly, being made blinde, and a prisoner by the treason of his wife, he was content to endhis owne life, to be avenged of his enemies, when hee pulled downe the pillars of the houseat the feast whereto they sent for Sampson, to deride him; till which time he bare hisaffliction with patience : but it was truely faid of Seneca; Patientia sape la savertitur infurorem; Patience often wounded is converted into furie neither is it at any time fo much wounded by paine and loffe, as by derifion and contumelie.

of Elizand of the Arke taken; and of Dagons fall, and the sending back of the Ark.

He Storie of Eli the Priest, who succeeded Sampson, is written in the beginning of Samuel; who foretold him of the destruction of his house, for the wickednesse of his fonnes, which he suppressed not, neither did he punish them according to their deserts: whose fins were horrible, both in abusing the Sacrifice, & prophaning and i Sama to polluting the holy places: though Levi Ben Gerson, to extenuate this filthy offence of forcing the women by the fons of Eli, hath a contrary opinion. In this time therefore it pleased God to cast the Israelites under the swords of the Philistims; of whom there perished in the first encounter 4000. and in the second battell 30000. footmen; among whom the fons of Eli being flaine, their father (hearing the lamentable fuccesse) by falling from his chaire, brake his neck. He was the first that obtained the High-Priesthood of the flock of Ithamar the fon of Aaron, before whose time it continued successively in the race of Elea ar the eldest brother of Ithamar: for Aaron was the first, Elea ar the second, Phinees the son of Eleazar the third, Abisue the son of Phinees the fourth, his son Bosci the fift, 0% the fon of Bosci the fixt, and then Eli, as Josephus and Lyranus out of di-tkin.227. vers Hebrew Authors have conceived. In the race of Ithamar the Priesthood continued and a Chron. after Eli to the time of Salomon, who cast out Abiathar, and established Sadock and Achimass and their fuccessours. The Arke of God which Ifrael brought into the field, was in this battell taken by the Philistims. For as David witnesseth, God greatly abhorred Ifrael, Plates. So that he for sooke the habitation of Shilo: even the Tabernacle where hee dwelt among men, and delivered his power into captivitie, &c.

Now as it pleased God at this time, that the Arke whereby himselse was representedshould fall into the hands of the Heathen, for the offences of the Priests and people: so did he permit the Chaldrans to destroy the Temple built by Salomon; the Romans to overthrow the fecond Temple; and the Turks to overthrow the Christian Churches in Asia and Europe. And had not the Israelites put more considence in the facrament, or representation, which was the Ark, than in God himselfe, they would have observed his Lawes, and served him onely: which when soever they did, they were then victorious. For after the captivitie they had no Arke at all, not in the times of the Macchabees : and yet for their pietie it pleased God to make that familie as victorious as any that guarded themselves by the figne in stead of the substance. And that the Ark was not made to the end to be carried into the field as an enfigne, David witneffed when hee fled from Absalon. For when the Priests would have carried the Arke with him; he forbad it, and caused it to be turned into the Citie, using these words: If I shall find favour in the eyes of the Lord, he willbring me again: if not let him doe to me as scemeth good in his eyes.

The second Booke of the first part

The Trojans beleeved that while their Palladium or the image of Minerva was keptinto Trey, the Citie should never be overturned: so did the Christians in the last fatall battell against Saladine carry into the field, as they were made believe, the very Cross whereon Christdied; and yet they lost the battell, their bodies and the wood. But Chrysoftome upon Saint Matthew (if that be his worke) giveth a good judgement, speaking of thosethat wore a part of Saint Johns Gospell about their necks, for an amuletor preservative: Si tibi ca non profunt in auribus, quomodo proderunt in Collo ? If those words doe not profit men in their eares, (to wit, the hearing of the Gospell preached) how hould it profit them by hanging it about their neckes? For it was neither the wood of the Ark, nor the wood of the Crosse, but the reverence of the Father, that gave the one for a memorie of his Covenant; and the Faith in his Sonne, which shed his bloud on the other for 10 redemption, that could or can profit them and us, either in this life or after it.

The Philistims returning with the greatest victorie and glorie which ever they obtain ned, carried the Arke of God with them to AZOSNS, and fet it up in the house of Dages their Idoll: but that night the Idoll fell out of his place, from above to the ground, and lay under the Arke. The morning following they tooke it up, and fet it up, and fet its gaine in his place. And it fell the second time, and the head brake from the bodie, and the hands from the armes, shewing, that it had nor power nor understanding in the prefence of God; for the head fell off, which is the feate of reason and knowledge, and the hands (by which we execute strength) were fundred from the armes. For God and the divell inhabite not in one house, nor in one heart. And if this Idoll could not endure the 30 representation of the true God, it is not to be marvelled, that at such time as it pleased him to cover his only begotten with flesh and sent him into the world, that all the Oncles, wherein the Divell derided and betrayed mortall men, lost power, speech and opention at the instant. For when that true light which never had beginning of brightnesse, brake through the clouds of a Virgins body, shining upon the earth which had beenlong obscured by Idolatrie, all those foule and stinking vapours vanished. Plus arch rehearstin a memorable accident in that age concerning the death of the great god Pan, as he filleth him; where (as ignorant of the true cause) he searcheth his brains for many reasons of to great an alteration: yet finds he none out but frivolous. For not only this old Divelldid then die as he supposed, but all the rest, as Apollo, Jupiser, Diana, and the whole rabblebe 4 came speechlesse.

Now while the Philistims triumphed after this victorie, God strooke them with the grievous disease of the Hamorrhoides, of which they perished in great numbers. Foritis written, that the Lord destroyed them. It was therefore by generall confent ordered, that the Arke should be removed from Azetus to Gath or Geth, another of the five great Cities of the Philistims; to prove, as it seemeth, whether this disease were fallen on them by accident, or by the hand of God immediately: but when it was brought to Gath and received by them, the plague was yet more grievous and mortall. For the hand of the Lord was against this Citie with a very great destruction, and he smote the men of the Citie both small and great &c. And being not yet fatisfied, they of Gath sent the Arke to Ekrons or Accaron, a third Citie of the Philiftims . but they also felt the same smart, and cryed out, that themselves and their people should be flain thereby; For there was a destruction on and deaths broughout all the Citie. In the end, by the advice of their Priefts, the Princes of the Philisims did not onely resolve to returne the Arke, but to offer gifts unto the God of Ifrael, remembring the plague which had fallen on the Egyptians, when their hearts were hardned to hold the people of God from their inheritance, and from his fervice by ftrong hand. Wherefore confessing the power of the God of Israel to be almightie, and that their owne Idols were subject thereunto, they agreed to offer a fin offering.

using these words; So ye shall give glorie to the God of I frael, that he may take his hand from and from your gods, and from your land. For if the Arke of God were carried towards Bethshemesh. and into the territoric of Israel, then they should resolve that from God only came their late destruction. For the Philistims knew that the milch Kine which drew the Ark, could not be forced from their calves, but that they would have followed them wherefoever: much leffe when they were left to themselves, would they travel a contrary way. For in the darkest night in the world, if calves be removed from their dammes, the kine wil follow them through woods and defarts by the foot, till they finde them. But the kine travelled directly towards Beth/hemelh: and when they came into the fields thereof to wit. of one Josua of the same Citie, they stood still there, which when the Princes of the Philifting perceived, they returned to Ekron. After which, God spared not his owne people the Beth shemites, in that they prefumed to looke into the Arke. And because they knew God and his commandements, and had beene taught accordingly; he strooke them more grievously than he did the Heathen: for there perished of them fiftie thousand and seventhe From hence the Arke was carried to Kiriath-jearin, and placed in the house of Abinadab; where it is written that it remained twentie years in the charge of Eleaz ar his fon, untill David brought it to Hierusalem.

§. III. of Samuel, and of his Government.

Hefe Tragedies overpast and ended, Samuel, to whom God appeared while hee was yet a childe-became now Judge and Governour of Ifrael. He was descended of the familie of Chore or Korach. For Levi had three sonnes; Gerson, Cheath, b & Chro.6.22. and Merari: Cheath had Amram and IZ war; of Amram came Moles and Aaron; of IZ war, Chore; and of the familie of Chore, Samuel. His father Elcana a Levite, was called an Ephratean; not that the Levites had any proper inheritance, but because he was of a Mount c Which Region Ephraim, like as Jeste, Davids father, was called an Ephrataean, because borne at Ephra-on wascanted ta, or Bethleem. Samuel was no sooner borne, but that his mother, according to her former vow, dedi-da, Gen. 35. 13. cated him to God, and his fervice; to which the delivered him even from the dugge. For from the region as the first borne of all that were called Nazarites, might be redeemed til they were five which is in yeares old for five sheckles, and betweene five years and twentie, for twentie sheckles: lo Mountephraim was it not required by the Law that any of the race of the Levites should be called to whence Pial lerve about the Tabernacle, till they were five and twentie yeares old.

answer of God, thus he spake; Come and let us goe to the Seer: for hee that is now called a Prophet, was in old time called a Seer. And although it pleased God to appeare by his Angels to Moses, as before to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; yet in the time of Eli, there was no manifest vision; not that God had altogether with-drawne his grace from Ifrael but as the Chaldwan Paraphrast hath it, those revelations before Samuels time, were more clouded and obscure. The places wherein Samuel judged were Matspa or Mitspa, seated on a hill in Benjamin neere Juda: also Gilgal and Bethel, of which we have spoken else book, c.12.5.1. where.

The Philistims taking knowledge of the affembly and preparation of Warre at Mitha in the beginning of Samuels government, gathered their Armie, and marched towards to the Citie: at whose approach the Ifraelites strucken with feare, and with the memorie of their former flaughters and servitude, besought Samuel to pray to God for them; who was * then performing his facrifice when the Philistims were in view. But God being moved with Samuels prayers (as he was by those of Moses, when I frael fought again the second King the Amalekites at their first entrance into Arabia:) it pleased him with thunder and temof Rome, that when as he was peft to differfe and beat downe the Armie of the Philiftims, according to the prophecie of Hanna, Samuels Mother, The Lords adversaries shall be destroyed, and out of Heaven shall was rold him thatthe enemies be thunder spon them, &c. Josephus affirmes, that a part of the Philistims were swallowed approached, with an earthquake: and that Samuel himselfeled the Ifraelites in the prosequation of nothing difmai-ed, answered, E. their victorie. After which Samuel erected a Monument in memorie of this happy file to go autem parifico. cesse, obtained by the miraculous hand of God, which Josephus called Lapidem forten:

And the better to attend their purposes, and to withstand any of their attempts, the Ifraelites made peace with the Amerites, or Canaanites, which layor their backes, and to the North of them, that they might not be affaulted from divers parts at once; having the Philistims towards the West and Sea-coast, the Canaanitto ward the North and East, and the Idumite on the South. The estate being thus settled Samuel for the ease of the people gave audience and judgment in divers places by turnes, 39 as hath beene elfewhere faid.

CHAP. XVI. Of SAUL.

Of the deliberation to change the government into a Kingdome.

TUT when age now began to over-take Samuel, and that hee was not able to undergoe the burthen of so carefull a government, her put offfrom himfelfe the weight of the affaires on his fonnes, Jol and Abyab, who judged the people at Beersheba, a Citie, thevery utmost towards the South of Judea. And as the place wasinconvenient and farre away, fo were themselves no lesse removed from the justice and vertue of their Father: For the thirst of covetousnesse, the more it swalloweth, the more it drieth, and defireth, finding take innothing but gaine; to recover which, they fet the Law at a price, and fold Justice and Judgement to the best Chapmen. Which when the Elders of Israel observed, and faws that Samuel as a natural man (though a Prophet) could not fo well difcerne the errours of his owne, they prayed him to confent to their change of government, and to make them a King, by whom they might be judged as other Nations were; who might all leade them to the Warre, and defend them against their enemies. For after the illand lamentable successe which followed the rule of El his sons, when those of Samuel by their first blossomes promised to yeeld fruit no lessebitter, they saw no way to putthe government from out his race, whom they so much reverenced, but by the choyce of a King.

Inacause of so great consequence and alteration, Samuel sought counsaile from God: which furely he did not for the establishing of his owne Sonnes; who being as they were. God would not have approved his election. Now as it appeares by the Text, this fneech or motion displeasing him, he used his best arguments to dehort them: which when he perceived to be over-feeble, he delivered unto them from Gods revelation, the inconveniences and miseries which should befall them. And yet, all which he foreshewed was not intolerable, but such as hath beene borne, and is so still by free consent of the subjects towards their Princes. For first he makes them know, that the King will use their sonnes in his owne service to make them his Horse-men, Chariotters, and Footmen; which is not onely not grievous, but by the Vassals of all Kings, according to their birth and condition, defired: it being very agreeable to subjects of the best qualitie to command for the King in his Warres; and to till the ground no leffe proper and appertining to those that are thereto bred and brought up: fo are likewise the offices of women-servants to dresse meate, to bake bread, and the like. But whereas immediately it isthreatned, He will take your Feelds and your Vineyards, and your best Olivetrees, and nivethem to his fervants; with other oppressions: this hath given, and gives daily occasionto such as would be ruled by their own discretion, to affirme that Samuel describeth here unto them the power of a King governed by his owne affections, and not a King that feareth God. But others upon further examination confirme this Text farre otherb wife, as teaching us what Subjects ought with patience to bear at their Soveraigns hand. The former opinion is grounded first upon that place of Deuteronomie, where God fore- Deuteronomie, where God foresheweth this change of government from Judges to Kings; and after he had forbidden many things unto the Kings; as many wives, coverousnesse, and the like: he commanderithat the Kings which were to raigne over Ifrael. should write the Law of Deuteronomic, or cause it to be written: and to shew how greatly the King should honour the Law headderly. It fall be with him, and be shall reade therein all the dayes of his life; that he may learne to feare the Lord his God and to keepe all the words of this Law and the le ordinances for to doe them : that he may prolong his dayes in his Kingdome, he and his Sonnes. But to takeaway any other mans field, fay they, is contrary to the Lawes 2 3od, in the fame bookewritten. For it is faid, That which is just and right shall thou fower, that thou may t Deut. 6. hve. Now if it be not permitted to carry away grapes more than thou canft eat out of anothermans vineyard, but forbidden by God: it is much leffe lawfull to take the vineyard Deut. 23.24. it felfe from the owner, and give it to another. Neither are the words of the Text (fay they) fuch as doe warrant the Kings of Ifrael, or make it proper unto them, to take at will any thing from their vaffals. For it is not faid that it shall be lawfull for the King, or the King may doe this or that: but it is written, that the King will take your formes: and againe, This shall be the manner of the King that shall raigne over you. God thereby foreflewing what power, fevered from pictic (because it is accountable to God onely) will doeinthe future. And hereof we finde the first example in Achab, who tooke from Naboth both his Vineyard and his life, contrary to the trust which God had put in him, of governing well his people. For God commanded, That his people should be judged with Deutiles righteous judgement. Wherefore, though the King had offered unto Naboth composition, as a Vineyard of better value or the worth in money, which he refused: yet because he was failfly accurred, and unjustly condemned (though by colour of law,) how grievously Achab was punished by God, the Scriptures tell vs. Neither was it a plea fufficient for Achabagainst the all-righteous God, to say that it was done without his consent, and by the Elders of Ifrael. For God had not then left his people to the Elders, but to the King, who is called a living Law even as David testifieth of himselfe : Poswifti me in caput gentium: For this of S. Augustine is very true: Simulata innocentia, non est innocentia: simulata aquit as non est aquit as: sed duplicatur peccatum in quo est iniquit as & simulatio, Fained innocence, and fained equitie, are neither the one nor the other; but the fault or offence is there doubled, in which there is both iniquitie & dissimulation. Such in effect is their disputation,

That the state of Ifrael should receive this change of government, it was not onely fore-told by Mofes in Deuteronomie, but perceived by Jacob in this Scripture: The Sceptor shall not depart from Juda, &c. It was also promised by God to Abrabam for a bleffine For it was not onely affured that his iffues should in number equal the starres in heaven. but that Kings should proceed of him: Which state seeing it is framed from the patterned of his fole rule, who is Lord of the Universall; and the excellency thereof in respect of all other governments, hath beene by many judicious men handled and proved, I full not need to over-paint that which is garnished with better colours already, than I can

In the time of the Judges every man hath observed what civill warre Ifrael had: what outragious flaughters they committed upon each other: in what miserable servinde they lived for many yeares and when it fared best with them, they did but defend their owne Territories, or recover some parts thereof formerly lost. The Canaanites dweltin the best vallies of the Countrie. The Ammonites held much of Gilead over Fordan, the Philistims the Sea-coasts; and the Jebusites Hierusalem it selfestill Davids time : all which that King did not onely conquer and establish, but hee mastered and subjected all the neighbour Nations and Kings, and made them his tributaries and vallals. But whether it were for that the Ifraelites were moved by those reasons, which allure the most of all Nations to live under a Monarch, or whether by this meanes they fought to be clered from the fonnes of Samuel, they became deafe to all the perswasions and threats which Samuel used, infisting upon this point, that they would have a King, both to judgethen and defend them: whereunto when Samuel had warrant from God to consent, he fent every man to his owne Citie and abiding.

Of the election of Saul.

Fter that Samuel had dismissed the affembly at Mizpah, he forbare the election of a King till fuch time as hee was therein directed by God: who foretoldhim the day before, that he would present unto him a man of the Land of Benjamin, whom he commanded Samuel to annoint. So Samuel went unto Ramath Sophim, to make a feast for the entertainment of Saul (whom yet he knew not, but knew the truth of Gods promifes) and Saulalfo having wandred divers dayes to feeke his fathers Affes, at length, by the advice of his fervant, travelled towards Ramath to find a Seer or Prophet, hoping from him to be told what way to take, to finde his beafts. In which journey is pleased God (who doth many times order the greatest things by the simplest passages and persons) to elect Saul, who sought an Affe and not a kingdome: like as formerly it had pleased him to call Moses, while he fed the sheepe of Jethro; and after to make choice of David the youngest of eight sons, and by the Scriptures called a little one, who was then keeping of beafts; and changed his sheephooke into a Scepter, making him of all other the most victorious King of Juda and Ifrael. So John and James were taken from calling their nets, to become fifthers of men, and honoured with the titles of Apostles: a dignitic that died not in the grave, as all worldly Honours doe; but permanent and everlating in Gods everlafting kingdome.

When Samuel was entred into Ramath, hee prepared a banquet for the King, whom hee expected and stayed his arrivall at the gate. Not long after came Saul, whom God shewed to Samuel, and made him know that it was the fame whom hee had forerold him of, that hee should rule the people of God. Saul finding Samuel in the gate, but knowing him not, though a Prophet and Judge of Ifrael, much leffe knowing the Honour which attended him, asked Samuel in what part of the Citie the Seer dwelt; Samuel answered, that himselfe was the manhee sought, and prayed Saul to goe before him to the high place, where Samuel fetting him according to his degree, above all that were invited, conferred with him afterwards of the affaires of the kingdome, and o

After this he told him all that should happen him in the way homeward, that two men hould incounter him by Rabels Sepuichre, who should tell him that his Asses were found, and that his Fathers cares were changed from the feare of losing his beafts, to tound, and the first that he should then meet three other men in the plain of I abore then a companie of Prophets: and that he should be partaker of Gods Spirit, and prophethen and that thereby his condition and disposition should be changed from thevulgar, into that which became a King elected and favoured by God.

The Land of promife was di-wereinserted wicedby lot: God commanded lots to be cast on the two Goats, which should be facri- within the deficed, and which turned off: a figure of Christs suffering, and our deliverance, for whose Goral, which gaments the Jewes also cast lots. Cicero, Plantus, Pausanias, and others, have remembred duplicatum divers forts of lots, used by the Romanes, Grecians, and other Nations: as in the division they were plan ofgrounds or honours; and in things to be undertaken: the two first kinds were called corallover a Diviforie; the third, Divinatorie; and unto one of these three all may be reduced: all gainst the heart Divitorie; the third, Divinatorie; and introduction of the test ordered & directed by God: of she High which kinds, how foever they may feem chancefull, are yet ordered & directed by God: of she High which kinds, how foever they may feem chancefull, are yet ordered & directed by God: of she High as in the Proverbes : The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition is of the Lord. And Samuel made them knowthat he was the chosen king of Israel, wherupon all the multitude saluted him King; and prayed for him; yet some there were that envied his glorie (as in all estates there are such) who did not acknowledge him by offring him presents, as the maner was: of whom , Samte Saul, to avoyd fedition, tooke no notice.

6. III. of the establishing of Saul by his fir & victorie.

TO fooner was Saul placed in the kingdome, but that he received knowledge that Nahas King of the Ammonites prepared to beliege Jabes Gilead: which nation fince the great overthrow given them by Jephta, never durst attempt any thing upon the Israelites, till the beginning of Saul his rule. And although the Ammomits did alwayes attend upon the advantage of time, to recover those Territories which first the Americe, and then I frael disposses them of; which they made the ground of their invasion in Jephra's time, yet they never perswaded themselves of more advantage than at this present. For first, they knew that there were many of the Israelises that did not willingly submitthemselves to this new King: secondly, they were remembred that the Philiftims had not long before flathe 34000. of their men of Warre: and befides had used great care and policie that they should have no Smithes to make them swords of spears : neither was it long before, that of the Bethshemesites, and places adjoyning, there perished by the hand of God more than 50000 and therefore in these respects, even oc. casion it self invited them to inlarge their Dominions upon their borderers : Jabes Gilead being one of the neerest. Besides, it may further be conjectured, that the Ammonites were imboldened against Jabes Gilead, in respect of their weakenesse: since the Israelites de. stroyed a great part of them for not joyning with them against the Benjamites : at which time they did not only flaughter the men and male-children, but tooke from them their young women, and gave them to the Benjamites: and therefore they were not likely to have been increased to any great numbers: and if they had recovered themselves of this great calamitie, yet the Ammonite might flatter himself with the opinion, that Ifrael, ha. ving for long time been difarmed by the Philistims, was not apt to succour those whom they had so deepely wounded and destroyed. But contrariwise, when the tidings came to Saul of their danger, and that the Ammonites would give them no other conditionto ransome themselves, but by pulling out their righteies, by which they should be utterly disabled for the Warre, as elsewhere hath beene spoken: Saul, both to value himsels in his first yeares reigne, and because perchance he was descended of one of those 400. Maids taken from the Gileadites, and given to the Benjamites, gave order to affemble the forces of Ifrael, hewing a yoake of Oxen into pieces, and fending them by messengers o. verall the coasts, protesting thus: That who seever came not forth after Saul and after Saul muel, so should his oxen be served: threatning the people by their goods, and not by their lives at the first. Seven dayes had Saul to assemble an Armie, by reason that the Gilea. dites had obtained the respite of these seven dayes to give Nabas the Ammonite anan. fwer: who, could they have obtained any reasonable condition, were contented to have severed themselves from Israel, and to become Vassals and Tributaries to the Heathen In the meane while Saul affembled the forces which repaired unto him at Bezec, neer Jardan, that hee might readily passe the river; which done, he might in one day with speedie march arrive at Jabes, under the Hills of Gilead.

The Armie by Saul led, confifting of three hundred and thirtie thousand, he returned an answer to those of Jabes, that they should assure themselves of succour by thenext to day at noon. For asit feemeth, Saul marched away in the latter part of the day, & went on all night; for in the morning watch he furprized the armie of Nahas the Amminic. And to the end that he might fer on them on all fides, he divided his forces into three parts, putting them to the fword untill the heate of the day, and the wearinesse of Sauls troope inforced them to give over the pursuit. Now the Ammonites were become the more carelesse and secure, in that those of Jakes promised the next morning to render themselves and their Citie to their mercie. After this happie successe, the people weeks farre in love with their new King, that they would have flain all those I fraelites that murmured against his election, had not himselfe forbidden and resisted their resolutions. Such is the condition of worldly men, as they are violent lovers of the professors, and 4 base Vassals of the time that flourisheth; and as despightfull and cruell without cause against those whom any misadventure, or other worldly accident hath throwne down of Sauls disobedience in his proceedings in the Warres with the Philistims and Amalekites, which caused his finall rejection.

After the Armie removed, Samuel fummoned the people to meet at Gilgal, where Saul was now a third time acknowledged, and as fome Commenters affirme, anointed King: and here Samuel used an exhortation to all the Assemblie, containing precepts, and a rehearfall of his owne Justice, during the beginning of his government to that day. After Saul had now raigned one year before he was established in Gilgal, or Galgala, he strenthened himselfe with a good guard of 3000 chosen men, of which he assigned 1000 to attend on Jonathan his some at Gibeah, the Citie of his nativitie: the rest he kept about his owne person in Micmas, and in the Hill of Bethel.

Onathan with his small Armie or Regiment that attended him, taking a time of advantage, surprized a Garrison of Philistims: the same, as somethinke, which Saul past by, when he came from Rama, when he was first annointed by Samuel, which they thinke to have beene Cariath-jearim: because a place where the Philistims had a Garrison. 1. Sam. 10. is called the hill of God, which they understand of Cariathirarim: but Junius understands this Garrison to have beene at Gebah in Benjamin neere Gibha, where Jonathan abode with his thousand followers. Howsoever, by this it appeareth that the Philistims held some strong places, both in the times of Samuel, and of Saul, within the Territorie of Israel: & now being greatly inraged by this furprize, they assembled thirty thousand armed Chariots, & fixe thousand Horse, wherewith they in- 1 Sam 13.5 vaded Judea, and incamped at Machmas or Michmas, a Citie of Benjamin, in the direct way from Samaria to Hierusalem, and in the middest of the Landbetweenethe Sea and Jordan. With this sudden invasion the Israelites were strucken in so great a feare, as fome of them hid themselves in the caves of the mountaines; others fledde over Fordan into Gad and Gilead: Saul himselfe with some 2000. men of ordinarie, and many other people, staid at Galgala in Benjamin, not farre from the passage of Josus when he led Israel over Jordan. Here Saul by Samuels appointment was to attend the comming of Samuel fevendayes: but when the last day was in part spent, and that Saul perceived his forces odiminish greatly, he presumed (as some expound the place 1. Sam. 13.9.) to exercise the office which appertained not unto him, and to offer a burnt offering and a peace of fering unto God, contrary to the Ecclefiaficall Lawes of the Hebrewes, and Gods Commandements: others expound the word, obtulit, in this place, by obtulit per Sacerdotem. and so make the sinne of Saul not to have been any intrusion into the Priests office, but first a disobedience to Gods Commandement, in not staying according to the appointment, 1, Sam, 10.8. fecondly a difference or mistrust in God's helpe, and toogreat relyingupon the strength of the people, whose departing from him he could not beare patiently; and lastly, a Contempt of the holy Prophet Samuel, and of the helpe which the prayers of fo godly a man might procure him. But whatfoever was his finne, not withstanding his excuses, hee was by samuel reprehended most sharply, in termes unficting hiseflate, had not extraordinary warrant beene given to Samuel To to doe, from God himselfe; at which time also Samuel feared not to let him know, that the Kingdome should be conferred to another (a man after Gods owne heart) both from Saul and his yesters. posteritie.

After this, Samuel and Saul returned to Gibeah, where Saul, when hee had taken view of his armie, found it to confift of 600. men: for the most were fled from him and scartered, yea and among those that staid, there was not any that had either sword or speare. but Saul and his fonne Jonathan onely. For the Philiftims had not left them any Smith & Same 3 150 inall Ifrael, that made weapons; befides, they that came to Saul, came haftily, and left fuch weapons and armour as they had behind them in their garrifons for if they had had none at all, it might be much doubted how Saul should bee able the yeere before, or in fome part of this very yeare to fuccour Jabes Gilead with 300 and thirty thousand men. if there had not now beene any yron weapon to defend themselves withall, save onely in the hand of Saul & Jonathan his sonne. But how soever, all the rest of the people were formerly difarmed by the Philiftims, & all those craftesimen carried out of the land that made weapons: there being left unto the Ifraelites only files to sharpen and amend such fuffe as ferved for the Plough, & for nought else: yet that they had some kind of armes, us manifelt, or else they durst not have attempted upon the Philistims as they did. And it is not faid in the Text that there was not any fword in all I frael, but onely that there was not any found among those 600. fouldiers which stayed with Saulafter Samuels de- 1 Sam-13.21 parture: and it seemeth that when Samuel had sharpely reprehended Saul, that his owne gurds for fooke him, having but 600. remaining of his 3000. ordinarie fouldiers, & of all the rest that repaired unto him, of which many were stedde from him before Samuel

With this small troope he held himself to his owne citie of Gibeah, as a place of more frength, & better affured unto him, than Gilgal was. Neither is it obscure how it should Ome to passe that the Philistims should thus disarmethe most part of the Israelites. howfoever in the time of Samuel much had beene done against them. For the victories of Samuel were not got by sword or speare, but by thunder from Heaven: and when hele craftesimen were once rooted out of the Cities of Israel, no marvell if they could or in a short peace under Samuel be replanted againe. For this tyrannie of the Philistims to bee understood, rather of the precedent times, than under Samuel: and yet under him is to bee thought that by their crafts they proceeded in the policy, not suffering their artificers to teach the Ifraelites, and so even to the times of Saul kept them from ha ving any store of armour. The same policy did Nabuchodono for use after his Conquestin Judea: Dionysius in Sicilie; & many other Princes else-where in all ages. But these lost weapons in part the Israelites might repaire in Gelead, for over Fordan the Philistims had not invaded. The rest of their defences were such as antiquity used and their present not invaded. ceffity ministred unto them; to wit, clubs, bowes, and slings. For the Benjamites excee ded in casting stones in slings: and that these were the naturall weapons, and the first of all nations, it is manifest; and so in the first of Chronicles the 12. Chapter it is writtened those that came to succour David against Saul, while he lurked at Siklag, That they were weaponed with bowes, and could use the right and the left hand with stones; and with a sling it was that David himselfe flew the Gyant Goliah.

While the State of Ifrael flood in these hard termes, the Philistims having parted their army into three troopes, that they might spoile & destroy many parts at once; Jonathan, Arrengthened by God, and followed with his Esquire onely, scaled a mountaine, whereon a company of Philistims were lodged: the rest of their army (as may bee gathered by the successe) being incamped in the plaine adjoyning. And though hee were discovered before he came to the hill top, and in a kinde of derifion, called up by his enemies: yethe fo behaved himselfe, as with the assistance of God he slew 20. of the first Philistins that he encountred. Whereupon the next companies taking the alarme, and being ignorant, of the cause, sled away amazed altogether. In which confusion, feare, and jealouse, they flaughtered one another in stead of enemies: whereupon those Hebrewes which became of their partie, because they feared to be spoiled by them, tooke the advantage of their destruction, and slew of them in great numbers. And lastly, Saul himselfe taking knowledge of the rout and disorder, together with those Israelites that shrouded themselves in mount Ephraim, set upon them, and obtained (contrary to all hope and expediation) most happie and glorious victory over them. Heere was that prophesie in Deuteroname fulfilled by Jonathan, That one of those which feared God, should kill a thousand, and twoof them ten thousand.

This done, the small army of Israel made retrait from the pursuit. And although Saul had bound the people by an oath notto take food til the evening, yet his sonne Jonathan, being infeebled with extreme labour and emptinesse, tasted a drope of hony in his pass fage : for which Saul his father would have put him to death, had not the people delivered him from his crueltie.

The late miraculous victorie of Saul and Jonathan, seemes to have reduced unrothe Philistims remembrance their former overthrow, likewise miraculous in the daves of Samuel 3 fo that for some space of time they held themselves quiet. In the meane while Saul being now greatly encouraged, undertooke by turnes all his bordering enemies; namely, the Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, & the Arabians of Zobab, against all which he prevailed. Hethen affembled all the forces he could make, to wit, 210000, men, and receiving the commandement of God by Samuel, he invaded Amalec, wasting and destroying all that part of Arabia Petras, and the Defart belonging to the Amalekites, from Havilah towards Tigris unto Shur, which bordereth Aegypt, in which warre he tooke Agag their King prisoner. But whereas he was instructed by Samuel to follow this Nation without compassion, because they first of all attempted Israel, when they lest Aegapt in Moses time: he notwithstanding did not only spare the life of Agag, but referved the best of the beasts and spoile of the Countrie, with pretence to offer theminsacrifice to the living God. Thereforedid Samuel now a second time make him know that God would cast him from his royall estate, to which he was raised when he was of base condition, and, as the Text hath it, little in his owne eyes. And though the offence was great in Saul for not obeying the voyce of God by Samuel, had there beene no former precept to that effect: yet seeing Saulcould not bee ignorant how severely it please God to injoyne the Ifraelites to revenge themselves upon that Nation, he was in all w excusable. For God had commanded that the Israelises should put out the remembrand Deut-25, 15. of Amalec from under heaven. For the cruelty which the predecessors of this Agaguia against the Israelites, especially on those which were over-wearied, faint, sicke, and against the Israelites, people, was now to bee revenged on him, and his Nation above 400. yeeres afterward and now hee was to pay the debt of bloud, which his forefathers borrowed from the innocent: himselfe having also sinned in the same kinde, as these words of Samuel witnesse: As thy sword hath made other women childlesse, so shall thy mother be childlesse a. 1 Samis.33 mong other women; at which time Samuel himselfe (after he had been by many bootlesse intreaties perswaded to stay a while with Sanl) did cut Agag in pieces before the Lord in cilval, and soone after he departed to Ramath, and came no more to see Saul untill the day of his death.

Of the occurrents betweene the rejection of Saul and his death.

TOw while Samuel mourned for Saul, God commanded him to choose a King for Israel, among the sonnes of Ishai: which Samuel (doubting the violent hand of Saul) feared in a fort to performe, till it pleased God to direct him, how hee might avoid both the fulpition, and the danger. And if Samuel knew that it was no way derogating from the providence of God, that by his cautious care and wisedome hee fought to avoid the inconveniences or dangers of this life: then do these men mistake the nature of his divine ordinance, who neglecting the reason that God hathgiven them, do no otherwise avoid the perills and dangers thereof, than as men stupefied in the opinion of fate or destinie, neglecting either to beg counsaile at Gods hands by prayers 0 or to exercise that wisedome or foresight, wherewith God hath enriched the minde of man for his preservation. Neither did the all-powerfull God (who made and could defrom the world in an instant) disdaine here to instruct Samuel, to avoid the fury of Saul. by the accustomed cautious waies of the world.

Of the sonnes of Ishai, Samuel, by God directed, made choice of David, the youngest. having refused Eliab, the first born: who though he were a man of a comely personand great strength; yet unto such outward appearance, the Lord had no respect. For asit is written, God feeth not as man feeth, &c. but the Lord beholdeth the heart. He also refusing I Samis. theother fixe brethren, made choice of one whom his father had altogether neglected. and left in the field to attend his flocke; for of him the Lord faid to Samuel, Arife and a-30 noint him, for this is he: which done, Samuel departed and went to Ramath. Neither was it long after this that Saul began to feeke the life of David: in which bloody minde he

The Philistims having well confidered (as it feems) the increase of Saul his power through many victories by him obtained, whilft they had fitten still & forborn to give impediment to his prosperous courses, thought it good to make new tryall of their fortune, as justly fearing that the wrongs, which they had done to I frael, might be repaied withadvantage, if ever opportunity should serve their often injured neighbours against them, as lately it had done against Moab, Ammon, and the rest of their ancient enemies Now for the qualitie of their Souldiers, and all warlike provisions, the Philistims had o reason to thinke themselves equall, if not superiour to Ifrael. The successe of their former wars had for the most part been agreeable to their own wishes: as for late disasters. they might, according to humane wisedome, impute them to second causes; as to a tempeft happening by chance, and to a mistaken alarm, whereby their Armie, possessed with aneedlesse feare, had fallen to rout. Having therefore mustered their forces, and taken the field, encamping for neare to the Armie which King Sauldrew forth against them. that they could not eafily depart without the trial of a battel, each part kept their ground of advantage for a while, not joining in groffe, but maintaining fome skirmishes, as refuling both of them to passe the Valley that lay betweene their Camps. Just causes of feare they had on both fides; especially the Philistims, whose late attempts had bin confounded by the angry hand of God. Upon this occasion perhaps it was, that they sought to decide the matter by fingle combat, as willing to try in one mans person, whether any stroake from heaven were to be feared. Goliah of Gath, a strong Giant, searing neither Godnor Man, undertooke to defiethe whole Hoste of Israel, provoking them with despightfull words, to appoint a Champion that might fight with him hand to hand; offering condition, that the partie vanquished in Champion, should hold it selfe as overcome in grosse, and become vasfall unto the other. This gave occasion to young David, whom Samuel by Gods appointment had annointed, to make a famous entrance into publike notice of the people. For no man durst expose himselfe to encounter the great strength of Goliab, untill David (sent by his father of an errand to the campe) accepted the combat, and obtained the victorie, without other armes, offenfive or defensive, than a sling, wherewith he overthrew that haughty Gyant, and after with his owne fword strooke off his head. Hereupon the Philistims, who should have yeelded themselves as subjects to the Conquerour, according to the covenant on their owneside propounded, fled without stay; and were pursued and slaughtered even to their ownegates. By this victory the Philistims were not so broken, that either any of their Townes were loft, ortheir people discouraged from infesting the Territories of Israel. But David, by whom Godhad wrought this victorie, fell into the grievous indignation of his Master Saul, through the honour purchased by his well-deserving. For af- to ter fuch time as the spirit of God departed from Saul, and came upon David, hee then became a cruell Tyrant, faithlesse, and irreligious. Because the high Priest Abimilech fedde David in his necessitie with hallowed bread, and armed him with a sword of his owne conquest, taken from Goliab; Saul not only by his wicked Edomite Doeg murthered this Abimelech and 85. Priests of Nob, but also hee destroyed the Citic, and smote with the edge of the sword both man and woman, both childe and suckling, both Oxe and Affe, and sheepe. And he that had compassion on Agag the Amalekite, who was anene. E Sam. 22.18. mie to God and his people, and also spared and preserved the best of his Cattell, contrarie to the Commandement and Ordinance of God, both by Moses and Samuel, had not now any mercie in store for the innocent, for the Lords servants, the Priests of 10 Israel. Yea, hee would have flaine his owne sonne Jonathan, for pitying and pleading Davids innocencie; as also once before for tasting the hony, when his fainting for hunger made him forget his fathers unreasonable commination. The companions of cruelie are breach of faith towards men, and impiety towards God. The former hee shewedin denying David his daughter, whom he had promifed him: and againe in taking heraway from him to whom hee had given her; also in that when as David had twice spared his life in the Territory of Ziph, and Saultwice fworn to do him no hurt, and confessed his errours, yethe fought still to destroy him, by all the meanes he could. His impietienwards God he shewed, in that hee fought counsell of the Witch of Endor, which was the last preparative for his destruction. For whereas when he fought counsell from Godile to had bin alwaies victorious: from the Oracle of the Divel this successe followed, that both himselfe, and his three sons, with his nearest & faithfull servants, were all slaughteredby the Philistims: his bodie with the bodies of his sons (as a speciacle of shame and dishonour) were hung over the walles of Bethsan: and there had remained till they had found buriall in the bowels of ravenous birds, had not the gratefull Gileadites of Jabes stolke their carcasses thence, and interred them. This was the end of Saul, after he had governed Israel, together with Samuel, 40. yeares, & by himselfe after Samuel 20. years, according to Cedrenus, Theophilus and Josephus. But yet it seemeth to me, that after the death of Samuel, Saul did not rule very long: For in the beginning of the 25 chapter, it is written, that Samuel died: and in the rest of the same chapter the passages are written of David, Na- 40

bal, and Abigail, after which the death of Saul quickly enfued. An exceeding valiant man he was, and gave a faire entrance to all those victories which David afterward obtained; for he had beaten the Ammonites with their neighbouring Nations; crush the Syrians, and their adherents; broken the strength of the Amalekires; and greatly wasted the power and pride of the Philistims.

§. VI.

Of fuch as lived with Samuel and Saul; of Hellen and Hercules, and of their iffues: upon of casion of the Dores, with the Heraclida, entring Peloponnesus about this time.

TN the second yeare of Samuel, according to Eusebius, was David borne : after Codoman, later, and in the ninth yeare : after Bunting in the tenth. For David, faith hee, was thirtie yeares old when hee began to reigne: whence it followeth, that hee was borne in the tenth of the fortie yeares, which are given to Samuel and Saul. About the eleventh yeare of Samuel, Aneas Silvius the fonne of Posthumus beganne his reigne over the Latines in Alba, who governed that State one and thirtie years. There are who place before him Latinus Silvius, as brother to Posthumus, calling him the fifth from Aneas, and fourth King of Alba, whereof I will not stand to dispute. In theeleventh of Samuel, Dercilas fate in the Throne of Affyria, being the one and thirtieth King: heruled that Empire fortie yeares. In this age of Samuel the Dores obtained Pelovonnefus, and at once with the Heraclida, who then led and commanded the Nation, possess agreat part thereof 328. years before the first Olympiad, according to Diodorus and Eratofthenes. For all Greece was anciently possessed by three Tribes or Kindreds, viz. the Tonians, Dorians, and Aolians: at length it was called Hellas, and the people Hellenes of Hellen the sonne of Deucalion, Lord of the Countrie of Pthistis in Thessalie. But before the time of this Hellen, yea and long after, Greece had no name common to all the inhabitants, neither were the people called Hellenes, till fuch time as partly by trading in all parts of the Land, partly by the plantation of many Colonies, and fundry great victor ries obtained, the issues of Hellen had reduced much of the Countrie under their obedience, calling themselves generally by one name, and yet every severall Nation after some one of the posteritie of Hellen, who had raigned over it. And because this is the farthest antiquitie of Greece, it will not be amisse to recount the Pedigree of her first planters.

Japetus (as the Poets fable) was the fon of Heaven and Earth, so accounted, either because the names of his Parents had in the Greeke tongue such fignification: or perhaps for his knowledge in Aftronomie and Philosophie.

o Japetus begat Prometheus, and Ephimetheus: of whom all men have read that have read Poets. Prometheus begat Deucalion: and Epimetheus, Pyrrha; Deucalion & his wife Pyrrha reigned in I heffalie, which was then called Pyrrha (as Cretenfis Rhianus affirmeth) of Pyrthathe Queene. In Deucalions time was that great floud, of which we have spokenelsewhere Deucalion begat Hellen : whose sonnes were Xuthus, Derus, and Alus : of Dorus and Rolus, the Dores and Eolians had name. The Aoles inhabited Beotia. The Dores having first inhabited sundrie parts of The sale, did afterward seat themselves about Parmallus, and finally became Lords of the Countries about Laced amon: Xuthus the eldeft fome of Hellen, being banished by his brethren, for having diverted from them to his owncuse some part of their Fathers goods, came to Athens: where marrying the Daughter of King Eritheus, he begat on her two sonnes, Achaus and Ion. Of these two, Acheus, for a flaughter by him committed, fledde into Peloponnefus: and feating himselfe in Laconia, gave name to that region: from whence (as some write) he afterwards departed; and levying an Armie, recovered the Kingdome of his Grandfather in The false.

Ion being Generall for the Athenians when Eumolpus the Thracian invaded Attica, did obtained great victorie, and thereby fuch love and honour of the people, that they committed the ordering of their State into his hands. He divided the Citizens into Tribes. appointing every one to fome occupation, or good course of life. When the people multiplied he planted Colonies in Sycionia, then called Agialos or Agialia: In which 40 Countrie Solimus then reigning, thought it fafer to give his Daughter Helice in mariage to lon, and make him his Heire, than to contend with him. So Ion married Helice, and builta Towne called by his Wives name in Ægialia, where he and his posterity reigned long, and (though not obliterating the old name) gave to that Land denomination. But in after times the Dores affifting the Nephewes of Hercules, invaded Peloponnefus, and overcomming the Acheans, possessed Laconia, and all those parts which the Achei had formerly occupied. Hereupon the Achei driven to seeke a new seat, came unto the Iones, defiring to inhabit Agialia with them, and alledged in vaine that Ion and Achaus had beene brethren. When this request could not be obtained, they fought by force to expell the Ionians, which they performed; but they loft their King Tilamenes, the fon of Orestes in that warre.

Thus were the Iones driven out of Peloponnesus, and compelled to remove into Artica, from whence after a while they failed into Asia, and peopled the Westerne coast thereof; on which they built twelve Cities, inhabited by them, evento this day, at the least without any universall or memorable transmigration. This expedition of the Iones into Asia hath beene mentioned of all which have written of that Age, and is commonly placed 140. yeares after the warre of Troy, and 60. yeares after the descent of the Heraclida into Peloponnesus. These Heraclida were they of whom the Kings of Sparta issued; which race held that Kingdome about 700. yeares. Of their Father

Hercules many strange things are delivered unto us by the Poets, of which some are like to have beene true, others perhaps must be allegorically understood. But the most approved Writers thinke that there were many called Hercules, all whose exploits were by the Greeks ascribed to the sonne of Alemena, who is said to have performed these 12.

great labours. First, he slew the Nemaan Lyon: secondly, he slew the serpent Hydra, which had nine heads, whereof one being cut off, two grew in the place: the third was the overtaking a very fwift Hare: the fourth was the taking of a wild Bore alive, which hanted mount Erymanthus in Arcadia: the fift was the cleanfing of Augias his Oxe-stall in one day. which he performed by turning the River Alpheus into it: the fixt was the chafing awav of the Birds from the Lake Stymphalis: the feventh was the fetching a Bull from Crute. the eight was the taking of the Mares which Diomedes King of Thrace fed with humane flesh : the ninth was to fetcha Girdle of the Queen of the AmaZons : the three last were to fetch Gerions Beeves from Gades; the golden Apples of the Hesperides; and Cerbern from Hell. The Mythologicall interpretation of these I purposely omit, as both over. long to bee here set downe, and no lesse perplexed than the labours themselves. For forne by Hercules understand Fortitude, Prudence, and Constancy, interpreting the Monsters, Vices. Others make Hercules the Sunne, and his travailes to beethe twelve fignes of the Zodiac. There are others who apply his workes historically to their owne conceits; as well assured, that the exposition cannot have more unlikelihood, than the to fables: that hee tooke Elis, Pylus, O Echalia, and other Townes, being assisted by such as either admired his vertues, or were beholding unto him. Also that hee slew many Theeves and Tyrants, I take to be truely written, without addition of Poeticall vanitie. His travailes through most part of the world, are, or may sceme, borrowed from Hercules Libyeus. But fure it is that many Cities of Greece were greatly bound to him: for that hee (bending all his indeavours to the common good) delivered the Land from much oppression. But after his death, no citie of Greece (Athens excepted) requited the vertue and deferts of Hercules, with constant protection of his Children, persecuted by the King Eurystheus. This Eurystheus was Sonne of Sthenelus, and grand-childe of Perseus; hee reigned in Mycena, the mightiest City then in Greece. He it was that imposed those hard tasks upon Hercules, who was bound to obey him (s Poets report) for expiation of that Murther, which in his madness he had committed upon his own children; but as others fay, because he was his Subject and Servant: wherefore there are who commend Eurysthew for employing the strength of Herculestolo good a purpose. But it is so generally agreed by the best Writers, that Hercules was also of the stocke of Perseus, and holden in great jealousie by Eurystheus because of his vertue, which appeared more and more in the dangerous fervices, wherein heews imployed, so that he grew great in reputation and power through all Greece; and had by many Wives and Concubines above threefcore Children. Thefe Children Eury Abeus would faine have got into his power, when Hercules was dead: but they fled unto Cerx 40 King of Thracinia, and from him (for he durft not withft and Eurystheus) to Athens. The Athenians not onely gave them entertainment, but lent them aid, wherewith they encountred Eury shews. Iolaus the brothers fon of Hercules, who had assisted him in many of his travels, was captaine of the Heraclida. It is faid of him, that being dead hee obtain ned leave of Pluto to live againe till hee might revenge the injuries done by Eurysthem: whom when he had slaine in battell, hee died againe. It seemes to me, that whereas he had led Colonies into Sicily, and abode there along time forgotten: he came against into Greece to assist his cousins, and afterwards returned backe. When the Peloponnessans understood that Eurystheus was flaine, they tooke Aireus the Sonne of Pelops to their King: for he was rich, mighty, and favoured of the People. Against him the so Heraclida marched under Hyllus, the sonne of Hercules. But to avoid effusion of blood, it was agreed, that Hyllus should fight with Echenus King of the Tegease, a people of Arcadia, who affifted Atrens; with condition, that if Hyllus were victor, he should peaceably enjoy what he challenged as his right: other wife the Heraclida should not enter Pe-Loponnesus in an hundred yeares. In that combat Hyllus was slaine, and the Heraclida compelled to forbeare their Country, till the third generation: at which time they returned under Aristodemus (as the best authority doth shew, though some have said that they came under the conduct of his children) and brought with them the Dores, whom whom they planted in that countrey, as is before shewed, having expelled the Achai. over whom the issue of Pelaps had reigned after the death of Eurystheus foure generations.

5. VII. of Homer and Hesiod, and many changes in the world, that happened about this age.

Bout this time that excellent learned Poet Homer lived as many of the best Chronologers affirme. He was by race of the Maones, descended (as Functius imagineth) of Berofus his Anamaon, who gave name to that people. But this Functions Functions for imagineth Homer the Poet to have beene long after these times, rashly framing his Æra 11.00LD. according to a Archilochus in the tract, or rather fragment de temporibus; and makes se- fer our with venmore of this name to have flourished in divers Cities in Greece. Whence, perhaps, Berosus andofprang the diversitie of opinions, both of the time and of the native Citie of Homer. Act hers, first at Basiliand after cording to this Archilochus, Functius finds Homer about the time of Manasse King of Ju- with Fryer Anda, and Numa of Rome. He was called Melesigenes from the place of his birth, and at nius his Comlenoth Homer, because blinde men follow a guide, which signification among others, is mentat antinthe verbe oumper : for this Homer in his latter time was blinde. * Clemens Alexandrinus fidei. o recites many different opinions touching the question of the time when Homer lived. So placeth Homer allo Aulus Gellius, and Tatianus Alfyrius in his Oration ad gentes. Paterculus reckons in the 22. general that Homer flourished 950-yeares before the Confulship of Marcus Vinutius: which Mer-ration in the sator casteth up in the worlds yeare 3046. and after Troy taken, about 260-yeares: and 'Stomatum's. about 250. yeares before the building of Rome; making him to have flourished about b Nat. Attic. 13. thetime of Jehosaphat King of Juda. But Clemens Alexandrinus and Tatianus above na-611.8 med, mention Authors that make him much ancienter. The difference of which authors in this point is not unworthy the Readers confideration, that by this one instance hee may gheffe of the difficultie, and so pardon the errours in the computations of ancient time: feeing in fuch diverfitie of opinions a man may hardly finde out what to follow. For Crates the Grammarian (as Clemens Alexandrinus reports) gave being to Homer about 80. yeares after Troy taken, neere the time that the Heraclida returned into Peloponnelius : and * Bratostenes after Troy 100. yeares. Theopompus 500. yeares after the armie * Asboth Cle. of Greece, sailed into Phrygia for the warre of Troy. Euphorion makes him contemporarie Alexand Tai-with Gyger, who began to raigne in the 18.0 lympiad (which was 45. yeares after Rome hisopinion rewasbuilt) and Sofibius faith, that he was 90 yeares before the first Olympiad: which hee rum Philaskeekes to prove by the times of Charillus and his fonne Nicander; Philochorus placeth him 180. after Troy: Aristarchus 140. in the time of the seating of the Colonies in Ionia. comin Archilog. Apollodorus affirmes that he lived while Agefilaus governed Lacedamon, and that Lyourgus in his young yeares, about 100. years after the Ionian plantations, came to yifit him. necre 240 yeares after Troy taken. Herodotus findes Homer flourishing 622. yeares before Heringila Ho. Nerves enterprise against the Grecians: which Beroaldus accounteth at 168. yeares after the Trojan war. Eulebius feems to make him to have beene about the time of Joas King of Juda, 124. yeares before Rome built: though elsewhere in his Chronologie hee notes that some place him in the time of Samuel, and others in the end of David, and others in other ages. In his Evangelical Preparation, where out of Tatianus Affrius he citeth findry opinions touching the time when Homer lived, he reckoneth many other Greeke Writers more ancient than Homer; as Linus, Philammon, Epimenides, Phemius, Aristaus, Orpheus, Mufaus, Thamyras, Amphion, and others.

Now whether Homer or Hesiodus were the elder, it is also much disputed. Aulus Gel-Nott Autich 3. hus reports that Philochorus and Xenophanes affirme, that Homer preceded Hesiod: and continuous on the contrary, that Luc. Accius the Poet, and Ephorus the Historian, make Hesiod Nepinchron. of an elder time than Homer. Varro leaves it uncertaine which of these learned fablers call is annual. Was first borne: but he findes that they lived together some certaine yeares, where a This number in L. Mercator corinhee confirmes himselfe by an Epigram, written upon a Trevit, and lest by Hesiad in rects and reads Helicon.

Cornelius Nepos reports that they both lived 160. yeares before Rome built: while the Silvii reigned in Alba, about 2 140. yeares after the fall of Troy. b Euthymenes finds b Euthy. in Chr. them both 200. yeares after Troy taken, in the time of Acastus the sonne of Pelius, King upud Clem. Alex.

of Theffaly. For my selfe, I am not much troubled when this Poet live d; neither would I offend the Reader with these opinions, but only to shew the uncertainty and disagreement of Historians, aswell in this particular, as in all other questions and dispute of time. For, the curiofitie of this mans age is no leffe ridiculous, than the inquifition why he he. gan his Iliads with the word Menin, as perhaps containing some great mysterie. Inderision whereof Lucian faining himselfe to have beene in Hell, and to have spoken with Homer, there asked him the cause why he began his booke with that word: who answered, That he began in that fort, because it came in his head so to doe.

It seemeth that Senges, or, after Macrobius, Senemires ruled Egypt at this time : for Tanephersobris was his successour, who preceded Vaphres, father in law to Salemon.

Enfeb.& Caff.

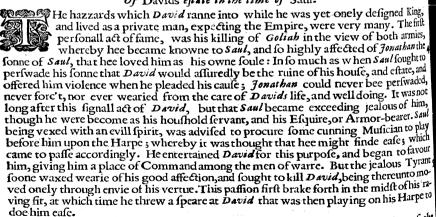

About the end of Sauls government, or in the beginning of Davids time, according to Cassiodorus, the Amazones with the Cymmerians invaded Asia, Latinus Sylvius then rulino in Italy. And besides the overthrow of that famous state of Troy (which fell 103, yeares before Davids time) there were many other changes in the middle part of the world, not onely by reason of those Northerne Nations: but there sprung up somewhat nearly together, fixe Kingdomes into greatnesse, not before erected. In Italy that of the Latinum the South part of Greece, those of Laced amon, Corinth, and the Achai. In Arabia, Snia Soba, and Damascus, the Adads made themselves Princes, of which there were ten Kines. which began and ended with the Kings of Israel in effect: and somewhat before these. the State of the Israelises having now altered the forme of government, began to flourish in under Kings, of which David, in a few yeares, became mafter of all those neighbouring nations, who by enterchange of times had subjected the Indeans, corrupted their religion, and held them under in a most abject and grievous slavery; to wit, the Edumeans, Moabites Ammonites, Midianites, Ituraans, and the rest of the Arabians, with the Philistims, Jebusites, Geshurites, Machathites; all which acknowledged David for their Soveraigne Lord, and paid him tribute.

of Davids effate in the time of Saul.

Censorinus remembreth one Asclepius a Physician, who practifed the curing of the Frenzie, by the like Musicke: and tempered thereby those diseases which grew from passion. That Pythagoras did also the like by such a kinde of harmony, Seneca in his third booke of anger witnesseth. But the madnesseof Saul came from the cause of causes and was thereby incurable, howfoever it formetimes left him, and yeelded unto that Musicke, which God had ordained to be a meane of more good to the Musician than to the King.

saul having failed in such open attempts, gave unto David the Command over 1000, fouldiers to confront the Philistims withall. For he durst not trust him as before. about his person, fearing his revenge. Now the better to cover his hatred towards him, hee promised him his daughter Merab to wife: but having married her to Adriel. he gave to David his yonger daughter Michol, but with a condition, to prefent him with an hundred foreskins of the Philistims: hoping rather (in respect of the valour of that Nation) that the Philistims would take Davids head, than hee their foreskinnes. This hopefailing, when as now Davids victories begat new feares and jealousies in Saul, hee practifed with Jonathan, and afterwards with his owne hands attempted his life, but his purposes were still frustrated. After all this he sought to murther him in his owne house. but Michol his wife delivered him. So David fought Samuel at Ramah, and being purfued by Saul, fled thence unto Nob in Benjamin, to Abimeleck, then to Achis the Philiftim, Prince 1 Sam. 19. of Guh: where to obscure himselfe, he was forc't to counterfeit both simplicitie and difraction. But being ill affured among the Philiftims, he covered himselfe in the Cave of A. I Sam. 21. dullam: and after conveying fuch of his kinsfolkes as were not fit to follow him, into Moab he hid himselfe in the defares of Ziph, Maon, and the hils of Engaddi, where hee cut off same the lapof Sauls garment, and spared his life : as he did a second time in the defart of Ziph. after his passage with Nabal and Abigail. After which hee repaired to Achis of Gash the 1. Sam. 29. fecond time, and was kindly entertained, in regard of the harred with which his mafter fangen in Plat. Saulwas knowne to profecute him.

Of Achis David Obtained * Siglag in Simeon, pretending to invade Judæa: but he bent *Itseemeth his forces another way, and strooke the Amalekites, with other enemies of Israel, letting verobrained nonelive to complaine upon him. Achis supposing that David had drawne bloud of his siglag till this owne Nation, thought himselfe affured of him : and therefore preparing to invade II- time for it is faid in the 1 of Sam. rael fummoneth David to affift him, who diffembling his intent, feemeth very willing c.27.v.6.therethereto. But the rest of the Philistim Princes knowing his valour, and doubting his dispo-fore Siglag per-tainethung the stition liked not his company, and therefore he withdrew himselfe to Siglag. At his re- King of Jula turn he found the towne burnt, his two wives, with the wives and children of his people, unto this day. taken by the Amalekites: Hereupon his followers mutined, but God gave him comfort.

and affurance to recover all againe: which he did.

This armie of the Philiftims commanded by Achis, encountred Saular Gilbon, in which he and his three fonnes were flaine. The newes, with Sauls Crowne and bracelets, were broughtto David at Siglag, in his return from being victorious over Amaleck, by a man 2 Samus. of the fame Nation, who avowed (though falfly) that himselfe at Sauls request had slaine him. David, because he had accused himselfe, made no scruple to cause him to bee slaine at the instant: and the sooner, because the probabilities gave strong evidence withall. Otherwise it followeth not that every man ought to be beleeved of himselfe to his owne Prejudice. For it is held in the law : Confessio reorum non habenda est pro explorato cri- Inf. de qualiti. mine, nil approbatio alia instruit religionem cognoscentis. The prisoners confession must not be taken for an exidence of the crime, unlesse some other proofe informe the conscience of the Judge. For a manmay confesse those things of himselfe, that the Judge by examination may know to bee impossible. But because it is otherwise determined in the title de custodia reorum l.si confessus, de in cap. de pænis l. qui sententiam, therefore doth the Glosse reconcile these two places in this sort: Si quis in judicio sponte de seipso confiteatur, o posseà maneat in confessione, id est satis. If any man in judgement doe confesse of himselfe, of his owne accord, and after doth perseverein his confession, it is enough. That David greatly bewailed Saul, it is not improbable; for death cutteth afunderall competition: and the lamentable end that befell him being a King, with whom in effect the strength of Ifraelalfo fell, could not but stirre up forrow, and move compassion in the heart of . The victorie which the Philistims had gotten, was so great, that some Townes of the Mraelites, even beyond the river of Jordan, were abandoned by the inhabitants, and left unto the enemie, who tooke possession of them without any resistance made. Whereforeit may seem strange, that a Nation so warlike and ambitious as were the Philistims, did not follow their fortune with all diligence, and seeke to make the Conquest entire.

Most

Most like it seemes, that the civill warre immediately breaking out between David and the house of Saul, wherein Juda was divided from the rest of Israel, gave them hope of an easie victory over both; and thereby caused them to attempt nothing at the present, lest by so doing they should ensore their disagreeing enemies to a necessary reconciliation; but rather to permit that the one part should consume the other, by which meanes both the victors, and the vanquished, would become a prey to the violence of such as had beaten them, when their forces were united.

6. II.

of the beginning of Davids reigne, and the warre made by Abner for Isboseth.

Fter the death of Saul, Abner, who commanded for Saul in the warre, fought to advance Isboseth (or Jebostus, according to Josephus) though he had no right to the Kingdome of Ifrael: for Mephiboseth the first son of Jonathan lived. Against this Abner and Isboseth, David made a defensive warre, till Abner past Jordan, and entred the border of Juda; at which time he fent Joab with fuch forces as he had, to refift Abner. Isboseth remaining in Gilead, and David in Hebren. The armies encountred each other neere Gibeon, where it feemeth that Abner made the offer to trie the quarrell by the hands of a few; like to that Combate betweene the Laced amonians and the Argives, no. membred by Herodotus, 300. being chosen of each Nation, of which number three per. 10 fons were onely left unflaine. The like tryall by a farre leffe number was performed by the Horatii and Curiatii, for the Romans and Latines. The same challenge Goliah the Phi. listim made, whom David flew: a custome very ancient. Edward the third offeredthe like tryall in his own person to the French King; and Francis the French King to Charles the Emperour. There were twelve chosen of each part, in this warre of David with the house of Sauls to wit, so many of Benjamin, and as many of Juda: whose force and valour was so equall, as there survived not any one to challenge the victory. But the quanell staid not here; for the Army of Juda prest Abner in groffe, and brake him. Threehim. dreth and fixty men of Abners companions were flaine, and but twenty of Juda; where of Afahel the brother of Joab was one: who when he would needs pursue Abner, and by Abners perswasions could not be moved to quit him, he was forced to turne upon him, wounded him to death with the stroake of his speare. For though Afahel were an excellent foot-man, and, as it is written in the Text, as light as a wilde Roe, and, as Josephus reporteth, contended not onely with men, but with horses; and hoped to have gotten great fame if hee could have mastered Abner (who, as Asahel perswaded himselfe, had by being overthrowne, and flying away, lost his courage) yet here it fell out true, That the race is not to the swift.

That this civill warre lasted two yeares, we finde it writtenin the second of Samuel, the second Chapter; though in the beginning of the thirdit is againe made probable, that this contention dured longer; and therefore the matter resteth still in dispute, and some of the Rabbines conceive that Isboseth had then raigned two yeares, when this was written; the Warre as yet continuing a longer time. For Abner held for the party of Isboseth after this, and till such time as there grew jealousse between him and Isboseth for Sauls Concubine: neither did the death of Isboseth instanty sollow; but how long after the murther of Abner it happened, the same doth not certainly appeare.

of the death of Abner flaineby Joah, and of Isboseth by Rechab and Baanah.

Bner, reconciled to David, was anon by Joah murdered; for Joah could notendure a companion in Davids Favour, and in the commandement of his forces; by which he was growne so powerfull, as David forbare to call him to account for thus much he confesseth of himselse; I am this day weake, and these men, the son of Zerviah, be too hard for me. In this fort David complained after Abners death; and to make it cleare that he hated this fact of Joah, hee followed him with this publike inprecation; Let the bloud fall on the head of Joah, and on all his fathers house: and let them be subject to ulcers, to the leprose, to lamenesse, to the sword, and to povertie, &c. For could any thing have withstood the ordinance of God, this murther committed by Joab might greatly have indangered Davids estate, Abner being the mouth and trust of all the rest of the Tribes, not yet reconciled. This mischance therefore David openly bewailed, fo that all Ifrael perceived him to be innocent of that fact. The place which Abner held. heing Generall of the men of warre, was of fuch importance, that the Kings themselves were faine to give them great respect, as hath beene already shewed more at large. This office Toab held in the armie of Juda, and thought himselfe worthy to hold the place enrire, if once his Lord might obtaine the whole Kingdome. For he was neere to David in tings and had beene partaker of all his adversitie; wherefore hee did not thinke it meete, that an old enemy should in reward of new benefits, be made his partner. Indeede hee was by nature so jealous of his dignity and place, that hee afterward slew Amala his owne kinfman and the Kings, upon the fame quarrell, taking it in high disdaine rosee him joyned with himselfe as captaine of the hoste of Juda; much lesse could hee brooke a superiour; and such a one as had slaine his brother, and beene beaten himselfe in battell. But how soever Joab did hate or despise Abner, David esteemed highly of him as of a Prince, and a great man in Israel, excusing the overfight by which he might feeme to have perished, by affirming that he died not like a foole, nor a man vanquished, But as 2 Sam. 2. a man falleth before wicked men, fo (faid he) diddest thou fall. And certainly it is no error Verse 34. of wit, nor want of valour and vertue in him whom a stronger hand destroyed unawares. or whom subtilty in free trust bringeth to consusion. For all under the Sunne are subject to worldly miseries and misadventures. Howsoever Isboseth meant to have dealt with Abner, yet when he heard of his death, hee despaired greatly of his estate, and with him all theel were possest with great feare: insomuch as two of Isboseths own Captaines. Rethis band Baanah, murthered Isbofeth, and prefenting his head to David, received the 2 Sam.4. famereward that the Amalekite lately did, for pretending to the have flaine Saul. Isbofeth being dead, all the Elders of Ifrael repaired to David at Hebron, where hee was he third and last time annointed by generall consent.

6. IV.

Of the flourishing time of Davids Kingdome, the taking of Jerusalem, with two overthrowes given to the Philistims, and the conduction of the Arke to the City of David.

THen David was now established in the Kingdome, his first enterprise was upon the Jebusites, who in derision of his force, & confident in the strength of the place (as is thought) manned their wals with the blinde and lame of their Citie; which David soone after entred, all their other forces not with standing. For 2 Sam- 50 having mastered the fort of Zion (which was afterward the Citie of David) hee became Lord of Hierusalem, without any great danger, expelling thence the Jebusites, who had heldit from the foundation, to the times of Moses and Josua, and after them almost 400. yeares. There are who expound this place otherwise: Except thou take away the blind & the lame, thou shalt not come in hither. For some think that it was meant by the Idols of the Jebufites: others, that it had reference to the Covenant made long before with I face, and Jacob: the one blinde by nature and age, the other made lame by wrestling with the Angel, and that therefore till those (that is, till that Covenant) be broken, David ought notto molest them. But for my selfe, I take it with Josephus, that they armed their wals with certaine impotent people at first, in scorne of Davids attempt. For they that had held their Citie about 400. yeares against all the children of Israel, Josua, the Judges, and Saul, did not doubt but to defend it also against David.

When he had now posses himselse of the very heart and Center of the Kingdome, and received congratulatory Embassadours and presents from Hiram King of Tyre: he entertained divers other concubines, and married moe wives, by whom he had ten sons in Jeruslem, and by his former wives, he had sixe in Hebron where he reigned 7, yeares.

The Philistums hearing that David was now annointed King, as well of Juda as of Israel, they thought to try him in the beginning, before he was fully warm in his seat. And being encountred by David at two severall times in the Valley of Rephaim, or of the Giants, 2 Sam. 5. they were at both times overthrowne. After which he called the place Baalpera Zim.

Then David affembled 30000.choice Ifraelites to conduct the Arke of God from the house house of Abinadab in Gibea to the Citie of David; which businesse was interrupted ho the death of uzzah the sonne of Abinadab, whom the Lord slew for presuming to touch the Arke, though it were with intent to stay it from taking harme, when it was sha ken. But after three yeers it was with great folemnity brought into the Citie with facil. fices, musicke, dances, and all fignes of joy fulnesse, in which David himselfe gladly bare a part. Hereupon Michol derided him for dancing before the Arke, & afterward told him in scorne. That he was uncovered as a foole in the eyes of the maidens his servants; namely that hee forgat his regall dignity both in apparell and behaviour; and mixed himfelfer. mong the base multitude, dancing as sooles doe in the wayes and streetes: not that shee disliked Davids behaviour (as Itake it) though she made it the colour of her derision; but in rather the aboundant griefe, which this spectacle stirred up, beholding the glory of her husband to whom she was delivered lastly by force, and remembring the miserable end of her father and brethren, out of whose ruines she conceived that the sonne of Ishai had built this his greatnesse: together with the many new wives and concubines imbraced fince his possession of Jerusalem, made her breake out in those despitefull tearmes, for which she remained barren to her death.

This done, David confulted with the Prophet Nathan for the building of the Temple or house of God: but was sorbidden it, because he was a man of warre, and had shed bloud. So greatly doth the Lord and King of all detest homicide; having threatned, not in vaine, that he would require the bloud of man, at the hand of man and beast. Thewars, which David had made were just, and the bloud therein shed was of the enemies of God, and his Church: yet for this cause it was not permitted that his hands should lay the foundation of that holy Temple. Hereby it appeares how greatly those Princes deceive themselves, who thinke by bloud-shed & terrour of their warres, to make themselves in greatness like to the Almghty, which is a damnable pride; not caring to interest his mercy & goodnesse, or seeke the blessednesse promised by our Saviour unto the peace-makers.

Now although it was not pleafing to the Lord to accept a Temple of Davids fourding, yet was his religious intent so well accepted, that hereupon he received both a confirmation of the Kingdome to him and his heires, and that happie promise of the ever-30 lasting Throne, that should be established in his seede.

b. V. The overthrow of the Philistims and Moabites.

Some after this David overthrew the Philistims, which made them altogether powerlesse, and unable to make any invasion upon Israel in haste. For it is written, Accepts franum Amgaris è manu Philistheorum; which place our English Geneva converts in these words, And David tooke the bridle of bandage out of the hand of the Philistims. The Latine of Janius giveth another and a better sense; for by that bridle of Amgar was meant the strong Citie of Gath, or Gath, and so the Geneva hathit inthe marginall note. This Citie of Gath was the same which was afterward Dio-Casara, set on the frontier of Palestina at the entrance into Judea and Ephraim. From thence they made their incursions, and thereinto their retrait in all their invassions; which being taken by David and demolished, there was lest no such frontier towne of equal functions. In the Philistims on that part. The hill whereon Gath stood, the Hebrews call Amma, whereof & of the word Gar is made Amgar, of which Plinie in his sirst book, and chap. 13. This exposition is made plaine and constrained in the first of Chros. the 18.

There was no nation bordering the Jewes that so greatly afflicted them as the Philiflims did, who before the time of Saul, (to the end they might not sharpen any weapon so against them) did not leave one Smith in all their Cities and Villages of that kinde, but inforc'd them to come downe into their territorie, for all yron worke whatsoever they needed; so as the Ifraelites till this time of David were seldome free from paying tribute to the Philistims.

After this he gave them foure other overthrowes: but the war of the Moabites and Arabians came betweene. In the first of which he was indangered by Ishbi-benob, the head of whose speare weighed 300. shekles of brasse, which make nine pound three quarters of our poizes: at which time Abishai succoured David & slew the Philistim, whereupon he the Counfellors and Captaines of David (left the light of Ifrael might by his loffe be quenched) vowed that he should not thenceforth hazzard himselfe in any battaile. The 2 Samaliant fecond and third incounter and overthrow of the Philistims was at Gob, a place neere Gesa, and the last at Gath or Geth. And being now better affured of the Philistims by the taking of Geth, he invaded Moah, from whom notwithstanding in his adversitie hee sought succour, and left his parents with him in trust. But whether it were the same King or no, it is not knowne.

The Rabbines faine that Moab flew those kinsfolkes of David, which lived under his protection in Sauls time; but questionlesse David well knew how that Nation had bin alwayes enemies to Israel, and tooke all the occasions to vexe them that were offered. It And he also remembred that in the 23. of Dew. God commanded Israel not to seek the peace or prosperity of the Moabites; which David well observed, for he destroyed two parts of the people, leaving a third to till the ground. This victory obtained, hee led his army by the border of Ammon towards Syria Zobah, the region of AdadeZer the son of Ribib King thereof. The place is set down in the description of the holy Land: to which Ireservethe Reader.

6. VI.

The warre which David made upon the Syrians.

Tiswritten in the Text: David smote also Hadadezer, &c. as hee went to recover his border at the river Euphrates. Now whether the words (as hee went to recover his border) bee referred to David or Hadadezer, it is not agreed upon. Junius thinkes that the article (hee) hath relation to David, who finding Tohu oppress by Hadadzer, overthrew the one, and succoured the other. But the ancient and most received opinion, that this recovery hath reference to the Syrian, is more probable. For if David had intended any such enterprize towards Euphrates, he was infarred better case to have proceeded after his victory than before: seeing that (Adadezer being taken) hee had now left no enemie on his back, either to pursue him, to take victuals and supplies from him, or to stop the passages of the mountaines upon him at his returne.

Againe, seeing David was either to passe through a part of Arabia the desart, or by the plaines of Palmyrena, his army consisting of sootmen, for the most, if not all: He had now both horse and chariots good store to carry his provisions through those uncultived places, by which hee was to have marched before hee could have reached Emphrates or any part thereof. But wee finde that David returned to Jerusalem, after hehad twice overthrowne the Syrian army, not bending his course towards the river Emphrates, but seeking to establish his purchases already made. Whereby it may appeare, that it was the Syrian, and not King David, that was going to inlarge his border, as afore is said.

The King of Syria, Damascena, & of Damascus, whereof that region is so called, heaung that AdadeZer was overthrown by the Ifraelites, fearing his own estate, & the losse of hisown country which adjoined to Syria Zoba of HadadeZer, fent for an Army of Amintes or Syrians to his fuccour: but these, as it appeareth, came too late for AdadeZer, and too foone for themselves: for there perished of those supplies 22000. This King of Damascus, Fosephus (out of Nicholaus an ancient Historian) calleth Adad, who was also of the same name and family as all those other Adads were: which now began to grow up in greatnesse, and so continued for ten descents, till they were extinguished by the Aslyrans, as is shewed heretofore. David having now reduced Damascus under his obedience, left a garrison therein, as he did in Edom : having also sackt the adjoyning Cities of Betah, & Berathi, belonging to Adadezer, of which cities Prolomie calleth Betah, Tauba: and Berathi he nameth Barathena. Tohu or Thoi, whose country of Hamath joyned to Adadager (as in the description of the holy Land the Reader may perceive) fent his fon 70-2 Sam & 74m to congratulate this successe of David: partly because he had war with AdadeZer, &c. Partly because he feared David now victorious. He also presented David with vessels of gold, filver, and braffe; all which, together with the golden shields of the Aramites, and the best of all the spoiles of other Nations, David dedicated unto God at his returne. Junius translated the words (Clypeos aureos) by umbones, as if all the parts of the targete were not of gold, but the boffes only. The Septuagint call them bracelets: Aquila, golden chains. But because Roboam made shields of brasse in place of these of Adadezer, at such time as Shicab the Egyptian fackt the Temple of Jerusalem, it may be gathered thereby that those of AdadeZer were golden shields.

This done, David sent Embassadours to Hanum King of the Ammonites, to congratulate his establishment in his fathers Kingdome: for David, in the time of his affliction under Saul, had beene relieved by Nuhash, the father of Hanum, But this Ammonite being ill advised, and over-jealous of his estate, used Davids mes. fengers fo barbaroufly, and contemptuoufly (by curtailing their beardes, and their garments) as hee thereby drew a warre upon himselfe, which neither his owne strength, nor all the aydes purchased, could put off or sustaine. For notwithstanding that hee had waged three and thirtie thousand Souldiers of the Amalekites, and their confederates; to wit, of the vasfalls of AdadeZer twentie thousand, and of Mas. Maachab the chab and Ishtob thirteene thousand (for which hee disbursed a thousand talents North part of Glaces) were all these great Armies together with the Greath of the Armonius North part of of filver) yet all these great Armies, together with the strength of the Ammonites, Traconitis remembered in were by Joab and his brother Abishai easily broken and put to ruine : and that without Deut.3.14. Deut.3.14 any great losse or slaughter at that time. And it is written, that when the Aramites acountry neere fled, the Ammonites also retraited into their Cities, the one holding themselves to Gad under the within the walles, the other in their defarts adjoyning, till Joab was returned to Jerockes of Arnon. rufalem. HadadeZer hearing that Josb had dismissed his Armie, assembled his forces againg, and fent all the Companies that hee could levie out of Mejopotamia; who under the command of Shobach passed Euphrates, and incamped at Helam, on the South side Helam or the. David hearing of this new preparation, affembled all the ablest men of Illong calleth 4- rael, and marched towards the Syrian Armie in Palmyrena, not yet entred into Arabia; to wir, at Helam, a place no lesse distant from Damascus, towards the Nontheast, than Jerusalem was towards the Southwest. Now David (speaking humanely) might with the more confidence goe on towards Euphrates (which was the far-tothest-off journey that ever hee had) because hee was now Lord of Damascus, which "See c.18. S.2. lay in the midway. Hee also possest himselfe of * Thadmor or Palmyrena, which Salomon afterward strongly fortified; and this Citie was but one dayes journey from Helam, and the river Euphrates. So had hee two fafe retraites, the one to Thadmor, and the next from thence to Damascus. In this encounter betweene David and the Syrians, they loft 40000. horsemen, and 700. chariots, together with Shohuh Generall of their armie. The Chronicles call these 40000. Souldiers footmen, and fo Junius converts it, and so is it very probable. For the Armie of Israel consisting of footmen, could hardly have flaughtered 40000 horsemen, except they quitted their horse and fought on soore. So are the chariors taken in this battell, numbred at 7000. in the first of Chronicles the ninth; in which number, as I conceive, all the Souldiers that ferved in them, with the conductors, are included: fo as there dyed of the Syrians in this warre against David, before hee forc'd them to tribute, 100000 footmen, besides all their horsemen and waggoners, and besides all those that Joab slew, when they fled at the first encounter, together with the Ammonites, before Rabbis. Notwithstanding all which, the Adads in following ages gathered strength againe, and afflicted the Kings of Juda often: but the Kings of Israel they impoverished even with last end of that State.

David having now beaten the Arabians and Mesopotamians, from the partie and confederacy of Ammon: He fent out Joab the Lievtenant of his Armies to forrage andde stroy their territorie, & to be siege Rabbah, atterward Philadelphia, which after a while the Ifraelites mattered and possess. The Kings Crowne which weighed a talent of gold, garnished with precious stones, David set on his owne head, and carried away with him the rest of the riches and spoile of the Citie. And though David staved at Jerusalem following the war of writh his wife, till fuch time as the Citie was brought to extremity and ready to be entred : yet Joab in honour of David forbare the last affault, & entrante thereof, till his masters arrivall. To the people heused extreme rigour (if wee may to call it being exercised against heathen Idolaters,) for some of them hee tare with har

of Davids troubles in his reigne, and of his forces.

. Ut as victory begetteth securitie, and our present wordly felicity a forgetfulnesse of our former miseries, and many times of God himselfe the giver of all goodnesse: so did these changes, in the fortune and state of this good King, change also the zealous care which formerly hee had to please God in the precise observation of his Lawes and Commandements. For having now no dangerous apnarent enemie (against whom hee was wont to aske counsaile from the Lord) hee began to bee advised by his owne humane affections and vaine defires. For hee was not onely fatisfied to take uriahs wife from him, and to use her by stealth; but hee imbrodered his adultery with uriahs flaughter, giving order to his trustie fervant Joab to 2 Sam 11.16 marshall him in the front or point of those Israelites, which gave an affault upon the fiburbs of Rabba, when there was not as yet any possibility of prevailing. And that which could no leffe displease God than the rest, hee was content that many others of his best servants and fouldiers should perish together with uriah, hoping thereby to cover his particular ill intent against him. After which hee began by degrees to fall from the highest of happinesse, and his dayes then to come were filled with joyes and wors interchangeable, his troden-downe forrowes began againe to fpring, and those perils which he had pulled up by the rootes (as hee hoped) gave him an after-harvest of many cares and discontentments. And if it had pleased GOD to take the witnesse of Davids own mouth against him, as David himself did against the Amalekite, which pretended to have flain Saul, hee had then appeared as worthy of reprehension as the other was of the death hee fuffered. For when Nathan the Prophet propounded unto him his owne errour in the person of another, to wit, of him that tooke the poore mans sheepe that had none elfe, the bereaver being Lord of many: Hee then vowed it to the living Lord, that fuch a one should die the death. And hereof, although it pleased God to pardon David for his life, which remission the Prophet Nathan pronounced: yet hee deliveredhim Gods justice together with his mercy in the tenour following; Now there- 2 Sam. 12.9.10 forethe food shall never depart from thy house, &c. because thou hast taken his wife to be the wife, & half flaine Uriah with the fword of the children of Ammon. Soone after this, David loft the childe of adulteric which be begot on Bersheba. Secondly, his own some Amnon, being in love with his halfe fifter Thamar, by the advice of his coufin-german the some of Shimeah Davids brother, possest her by force: which when he had performed, he thrust her from him in a carelesse and despitefull manner. Two yeares after which foule and incessious act, Absalom caused him to be murthered, at the feast of his sheepeshearing: not perchance in revenge of Thamars ravishment alone; but having it in his heart to usurpe the Kingdome, in which, because hee could not in any fort bee assured of Amnon, he thought his affaires greatly advanced by his destruction. So the one brother having ravished his owne fifter, and then despised her; the other after a long dissembled malice first made his owne brother drunken, and then slaughtered him, which done, he fled away, and lived under the fafeguard of Talmai King of Geffur, necre Da- 2 Samas mascus, who was his grandsather by the mother, but a heathen King. Thirdly, when Absalom by the invention of Joab (but chiefly because of the great affection of David lowards his fonne) was brought againe, first to the Kings favour, and then to his prelence; he began instantly to practise against David his father, seeking by the pretence of 2 Sam. 142 common justice, and by lowly and familiar manner to all men, and by detracting from his fathers equitie, to win unto himselfe a popular reputation. Here began the great affiction, threatned by the Lord as a punishment of Davids sinne.

The company which Absalow gathered at the first were but 200 men : which he car- 25am.s. ied with him from Jerusalem to Hebron, pretending, though impiously, the perforhance of a vow to God. There when Achtrophel repaired unto him, & many troupes of people from all places, he proclaimed himself King, & was by the people (whose hears) God had turned from their lawfull Prince) accepted so readily, that David doubting to be set upon on the suddaine, durst not trust himselfe in his owne Citie of Jerusalem, nor in any other walled towne for feare of surprise: but incamped in the fields and defare with some 600. of his guard, and few else. The Priests hee left in Jerusalem with the Arke of God, from whom hee defired to bee advertised of those things that chanced to whom he directed Hulhai his trustie friend, & fervant, praying him to make himselfe in all his outward actions and counfells of Absaloms party and confederacy, thereby the better to discover noto him the purposes of Achitophel, a revolting Counsailor, whose practices he greatly doubted. And now when treason was in fashion, Ziba also sought betray his master Mephiboseth the sonne of Jonathan: And Shimes of the house of Saul (the fire of whose harred Davids prosperity had smothered, but his adversity illightned) holding himselfe upon the advantage of a mountaine side, cast stones at David, and most despightfully cursed him to his face : but David attending no private revenges, forbad "Abifhai to pursue him for the present, yet left him among others in the roll of his re. venge, to his sonne Salomon. Absalom being now possest of Jerusalem, was advised by Achitophel to use his fathers concubines in some such plublique place, as all Israel might affure themselves, that hee was irreconcilable to his father : whereof being perswaded they would then resolvedly adhere to Absalom and his cause, without feare of being given up upon a reconciliation betweene them. This falvage and impious (though craft ty counfaile) Achitophel indeede urged for his owne respect, as fearing that this rebellion might take end to his destruction; who most of all other inflamed Abjalom against his father. And now was it fulfilled that Nathan had directly foretold David: I willraife up evill against thee out of thine owne house, and will take thy wives before thine eyes, and give them unto thy neighbour, and hee shall lye with thy wives in the sight of the Sunne for 2 Sam. c. 12. thou diddelt it secretly, but I will doe this thing before all I stael, and before the Sunne. He also gave advice to Absalom, that himselfe with an armie of 12000 men might beeim ployed at the instant for the surprizing of David; which had willingly beene imbraced; by Absalom, had not Hushai Davids Faithfull servant given counter-advice, and swaved it: perswading Absalom that it was fitter and more safe for him with all the strengthos Israel to pursue his father, than by such a troope, which Davids valour and those of his attendans might either indanger or refift. This delay in Absalom, and advantage of time gained by David, was indeede, after God, the loffe of the one, and delivery of the other. Whereupon Achitophel rightly fearing (by the occasion fore-shewed) the success which followed, disposed of his owne estate, and then for sooke both the party and the care of Absalom, and of his ownelife. David being advertised of this enterprize against him, marched away all night, and past Jordan, possessing himself of Mahanaim in the Tribe of Gad: the same whereins boseth himself in the war against David after Sauls death seated himself. To which place there repaired unto him Shobi the fonne of Nahash the Ammonite, whom David loved, a the same which Fosephus calleth Shiphar. And though it beegreatly disputed, what this Shobi was , yet the most generall and propable opinion makes him a second brother 10 Hanum, whom David for his fathers sake established in the Kingdome, after Hanum overthrow: in thankfulnesse whereof hee relieved David in this his extremity. There came also to Davids affistance Machir of Lodabar, Guardian in former times to Mephi boseth, and among others Bar llai the Gileadite, who willingly fed David and all his

In the meane time both the King and Absalom prepared to fight; Absalom made Antifa Commander of the armie of Ifrael, the same place which Joab held with David; an office next the King himselfe, like unto that of the Majors of the Palace anciently in France. David, perswaded by his company, stayed in Mahanaim, & disposed the forces he had to Joab, Abishai, and Ittai, giving them charge in the hearing of all that iffued out of the port of Mahanaim, that they should spare the life of Absalom. But Joab, besides that hee was very cruell by nature, remembred that Absalom had lately disposed of his government to Amafa, and therfore the victory being obtained and newes brought him that Absalom hung by the haire of his head on a tree, when hee could not perswade the messenger to returne and kill him, hee himselfe with his owne servants dispatcht him

Itappeared also by the sequell that Joab affected Adonijah whom he afterward acknowledged, David yet living; and fearing the disposition of Absalom, he imbraced the prefent advantage offered.

Hereof, together with newes of the victorie, when knowledge was brought to David: hee mourned and forrowed, not only as a man that had loft a fonne, but as one that had out-lived all his worldly joyes, and feene every delight of life interred. For hee so hid himselfe from his people, as those which hoped for honour and reward after so great a victorie, covered themselves also in the citie, as if they had committed the greatest offences, and had rather deserved death than recompence. Whereupon Joab presenting himselfe before David, perswaded him to dissemble his sorrow for the present, and to thew himselfe to the armie. For first, he told him that he had discountenanced his faithfill fervants, who had that day preferved his life; inferring that nothing could bee more dangerous to a King, than not onely not to acknowledge fo great a love and conflancie in his people, who being but few in number, did yet resolvedly expose themfelves to great perils for his fake: but on the contrarie, grieve and lament at their good finceeffe. For, no doubt, they might all have bought their peace of Absalom at an easie rate. Secondly, he urged that it was generally believed, that he loved his enemies & hatedhis friends; and that hee witneffed by this his mourning, that he had not any respect of his Princes, and others his faithfull fervants, but would more have joved if they had all perished, and Absalom lived, than in the victory by their faithfulnesse and approved

Lastly, he used this prevalent argument, That if the King came not out and shewed himselfe publickly to his men of warre, that they would all that very night abandon him, and returne : concluding with this fearefull threatning, And that will bee worfe unto 2 Sam 15 thuthan all the evill that fell on thee from thy youth hitberto. By these over-bold and arrogant speeches (though perchance uttered with a good intent) Joab raised David from his bed of forrow, and brought him to the gates of the citie among the people, whom he affired of his love and affection, especially Amasa, who commanded the armie of Absalom, to whom he promised the office of Lievtenantship; the same which Absalom o had given him, and which Joab now enjoyed. For David doubted, that if Amafa were notfaisfied, he might draw from him a great part of the strength of Israel, now under his commandement.

This done, the King marched towards Jordan homeward, where in his paffage hee 2 Sam 19.25. pardoned Shimei, who had lately reviled him to his face: but this remission was but extemall, as appeared afterward. Hee also accepted of Mephibosheth his excuse, whom Ziba had falfly accused and betrayed.

appointed his sonne Chimbam to attend the King.

At Gilgal on this fide Jordan, all the Tribes affembled, and after some contention which of them ought to have most interest in David, the Armie brake, and David returnedto Jerusalem. But Sheba the son of Bichri, a Benjamite, of the faction of the house of Saul, finding some discontent among the Ifraelites, withdrew them from David, as from a stranger in whom they had no interest, and it seemeth that many of the people of the out Tribes, and in effect of all but Juda, bare still a good affection to the issues of their first King. David imployed his reconciled Captaine Amasa, to give him contentment, and to witnesse his trust, as also because hee conceived that Amasa had interest inthose revolts of Israel more than Joab had. Hee received commandement from David to affemble the Armie within three dayes, which hee foreflowed: but being onward on his way, Abishai, Joabs brother, was sent after him, with Davids guard and best Souldiers, whom also Joab accompanied: and overtaking Amasa neere Gibeon, Pretending to imbrace him, gave him a wound, whereof hee fell dead, being no leffe jealous of Amasa than he was of Abner, whom he murdered in the same manner, and Out of the same impatient ambition. This done, hee pursued Sheba; and finding him inclosed in Abel, assaulted the citie with that furie, that the citizens by the perswasions : Sam 20.10. of a wife woman there inhabiting, cut off Sheba his head, and flung it to Joab over the walls: which done, he retraited his Armie to Jerusalem, and commanded, as before, all 2 Sam 20.22. the Host of Ifrael.

The next act of David, was the delivery of Sauls fons or kinsmen to the Gibeonites, whom those citizens hung up in revenge of their fathers crueltie. David had knowledge from the Oracle of God, that a famin which had continued on the land three yeers came by reason of Saul and his house, to wit, for the slaughter of the Gibeonites: and therefore hee willingly yeelded to give them this satisfaction, both because he had wartnerfrom God himselfe, as also, if wee may judge humanely, to rid himselfe of Sauls line, by whom he and his might, as well in the present as in the suture, bee greatly molestically himselfe and indangered; only he spared Mephibosheth the some of Jonathan, both for the love he bare to his father, and for his oath and you to God.

Now whereas it is written in the Text, The Ring took the two somes of Rispah, whom she to bare unto Saul, and the five somes of Micholthe daughter of Saul, whom she bare to Adriel, and delivered them to the Gibtonites: Junius calls this Michol the fifter of her that was and delivered them to the Gibtonites: Junius calls this Michol here named, had Adriel Davids wise, shee whom Saul married to Phaltiel: but Michol here named, had Adriel to her husband; the same which is named Merab in the first of Samuel the eighteenth, who was first promised to David when hee slew Goliah in the valley of Raphain: and because it is written that Michol loved David, which perchance Merab did not, whether David had any humane respect in the delivery of her children, it is onely knowned.

Now where the Geneva nameth Michol for Merab the wife of Adriel: the better translation were out of the Hebrew word here used, having an eclipsis or defect, and signal nifieth, as I am informed, one of the same kinred, as in the 19. verse of the same one and twentieth chapter it is said of Goliah; whose speare was weighte as a Weavers beam, when as by the same eclipsis it must bee understood by the brother of Goliah; Goliah himselfe being formerly staine.

As by the death of Saulschildren God secured the house of David, leaving no head unto rebellion: fo did hee strenghthen both the King and Nation against forreine enmies by the valour of many brave Commanders, the like of whom, for number & qualitie, that people of Ifrael is not knowne to have had at any time before or after. Think Captaines of thousands there were, all men of marke, and great reputation in warre Overthese were fixe Coronels, whose valour was so extraordinarie, that it might be well 33 held as miraculous. These Coronels had some difference of place and honour, which feemeth to have beene given upon meere consideration of their vertue. For Abishaithe brother of Joab, who in the warre against the Ammonites & Aramites was Lievtennt, and commanded halfethe armie, could not attaine to the honour of the first ranke, but was faine to rest contented with being principall of the three Coronels of the second order, notwithstanding his neernesse of bloud unto the King, the sourishing estate of his owne house, and his well approved services. All these Coronels and Captaines, with the Companies belonging to them, may feeme to have beene fuch as were continually retained, or at the least kept in readines for any occasion, considering that the numbers which were mustered and drawne out, if need required, into the field, very farreexcededthirtie thousand, year or thirty times as many. They were most of them such as had followed the King in Sauls time, and been hardred with his advertities. Others there were very many, and principall men in their feverall Tribes, that repaired into him after the death of Saul; but these Captaines and Coronels, (who with Joab, that was General of all the Kings forces, make up the number of 37.) were the special men of warre, and reckoned as Davids Worthies. The long reigne of David, as it is knowned to have confumed many of these excellent men of watre, so may it probably be ghessed to have wasted the most of those whose deaths we finde no-where mentioned. For the formes of Zervia, who had beene too hard for David, were worne away, and only Joah left in the beginning of Salomon, who wanted his brother Abishairo stand by his side! in his last extremity.

By the actions forepassed in the time of David, it is gathered, that hee had reigned how 33 years or thereabours, when the posterity of Saul was rooted our, so that he enjoyed about seven yeares of centire quiet and securitie, wherein it pleased God to remove all impediments that might have troubled the succession of Salomon in his fathers through this time also David having established all things in Juda and Israel, and the bottlers thereof, he againe displeased God by numbring the people, as in often action of his power: in which hee employed Joab, with other Captaines of his Armie, who after nine moneths and twentie dayes travell, returned with the account & register of all the people, able and fit to be are Armes, and they amounted to the number of thirteen hun-2 Sam. 24. dred thousand, be fides Levi and Benjamin, whereof in Juda and the cities thereof five third.

For this, when by the Prophet Gad he was offered from God the choice of three punishments, whereof he might submit himselfe to which he pleased; to wit, seven yeeres submit three moneths warre, wherein he should be unprosperous in all attempts, and be chased by his enemies; or a generall pestilence to last three daies: David made choice to bow himself under the hand of God only, and lest himselfe subject to that cruell disease, which hath no compassion or respect of persons, of which there perished 70. thousand. And hereby hee hath taught all that live, that it is better to fall into the hands of God than of men; whereof he given this divine reason, For his mercies are great.

6. VII. of the last acts of David; Adonijahs faction; the revenge upon Joah and Shimei.

Aftly, when he grew weake and feeble, and past the acts and knowledge of women, hee was yet advised to lie in the armes of a young and well complexioned maiden, to keepe him warme. In this his weake estate of bodie, when hee was oinamanner bed-rid, Adonijah his eldeft fonne (Ammon and Abfalom being now dead) having drawn unto his partie that invincible, renowned and feared Joab, with Abiathar the Priest, began manifestly to prepare for his establishment in the Kingdome after his father. For being the eldest now living of Davids sonnes, and a man of goodly persomge, Salomon yet young, and borne of a mother formerly attainted with adulterie, for whichher name was omitted by S. Matthew (as Beda, Hugo, Thomas, and others suppole) hee prefumed to carrie the matter without reliffance. Hereof when David had knowledge by Berfabe the mother of Salomon, who did put him in minde of his faithfull promise, that Salomon her son should reigne after him (Nathan the Prophet affirming the fame thing unto the King, and feconding her report of Adonijah his prefumption) the King calling unto him Zadoc the Priest, Nathan the Prophet, and Benajah the Captaine of his guard, gave charge and commission to anoint Salomon, and to set him on the Mule whereon himselfe used to ride in his greatest state: which done, Salomon, attended, and strongly guarded by the ordinarie and choice men of warre, the Cherethires and Pelethites, shewed himselfe to the people. These tidings being reported to Adonijah, he prefently abandoned his affiftants, and for the fafety of his life, he held by the horns of the Altar, whom for the present Salomon pardoned. After this, David had remaining two especiall cares, whereof hee was desirous to discharge his thoughts; the 1 Reg. 3; one concerning the peace of the land, which might bee disturbed by some rebellion against Salomon; the other concerning the building of the Temple, which he fought by o all meanes to advance, and make the businesse publick. To bring these intentions to good effect, he summoned a Parliament, consisting of all the Princes of Tsrael, the Princes of the leverall Tribes, all the Captaines and Officers, with all the mightie, and men of 1 chr. 28, 13, power; who did repaire unto Jerufalem.

In this affembly the King stood up, and signified his purpose of building the Temple, shewing how the Lord had approved the motion. Herein he took occasion to lay open his owne title to the Crowne; shewing that the Kingdome was by Gods ordinance due to the Tribe of Juda (as Jacob in his blessing prophetically bequeathed it) and that God himselfe was pleased to make choyce of him among all his fathers sonnes. In the same the said that God himselfe had appointed Salomon by name to bee his successful whereupon hee earnestly charged both the people and his sonne to conforme themselves unto all that God had commanded, and particularly to goe forward in this worke of the Lords house, which Salomon was chosen to build. Then produced he is the patterne of the worke, according to the forme which God himselfe had appointed; and to laying open his owne preparations, hee exhorted all others to a voluntarie constitution.

The Kings proposition was so well approved by the Princes and people, that whereas hee himselfe had given three thousand talents of gold, and seven thousand of silver, they added unto it seven thousand of gold, & ten thousand of silver, besides brasse, iron, time Salomon was againe anointed King, and received fealtie of all the Princes & people of the Land, & of all the Princes his brethren, the foanes of King David. Salamon being thus chablished King, his Father David finding himselfe even in the hands of death, first exhorted his sonne to exercise the same courage and strength of minde, which him. felfe had done in all his attempts: and to the end that a happy end might follow the beginning of all his enterprizes, hee uttered these mighty words, Take heed to the charge of the Lord thy God, to walke in his wayes, and keepe his farutes, and his commandements, and bis judgements, and his testimonies, as it is written in the Law of Moses, or to the per- lo formance of which, GoD fastened the succession, and prosperity of his issues. nesse being so well dispatched, a solemne feast with great facrifice was made, at which

1 King, 1,10.

Secondly, hee advised him concerning 30ab, who out of doubt had ferved Davidfrom the first assault of Jerufalem to the last of his warres, with incomparable valour and fide. litie, faving that he fastened himselfe to Adonijah (his master yet living) & thereby vexed him in his feeble age. But as God hath never left cruelty unrevenged, so was it his will that Joab should drinke of the same cup, whereof he hath enforced other men to taste,& fuffer the fame violence which himselfe had unjustly strooken others withall, Quigladio percutit gladio peribit: for he had bereaved Abner & Amasa of their lives, having against to the one the pretence onely of his brothers flaughter, whom Abner had flaine in the time of warre, and could not avoid him against the other but a meere jealousie of his growing great in the favour of David. And though Josh affured himfelfe that Abner & Amala being dead, there was none left either to equall him or supplant him, yet God (deriding the policies of wicked men) raised up Benhajah the sonne of Jehojadah, to pull him from the Sanctuary, and to cut him in peeces. For David giveth this cause to Salomen against Joab, that he flwe the Captaines of the hofte of Ifrael, and shedbloud of battellinperce, and to this apparent & just cause, it is not improbable but that David remembred theil affection of Jeab towards Salomon, which Joab made manifest by the untimely settingup of Adonijah, David yet living. Some other offence Joab had committed against David 19 which in these words he put his some Salomon in minde; Thou knowest also what Joabite Conne of Serviah didto me, &c. Now whether this were meant by the killing of Abfalom, contrary to the King's defire, or by the proud words used to him when hee mournedin Mahanaim for Absalim; or whether it were the publishing of Davids letter unto himfor the killing of Uriah, thereby to difgrace Salomon as descended of such a mother, the Scriptures are silent. True it is, that those great men of warre doe oftentimes behave themselves exceeding insolently towards their Princes, both in respect of their service done, as also because they flatter themselves with an opinion, that either their masters cannot missethem, or that they dare not offend them. But this kinde of pride hath overthrowne many a worthy man otherwise deserving great honour and respect.

He also gave order to Salomon to rid himself of Shimei, who not long before had call stones at David, and curfed him to his face. And albeit by reason of his oath and promise David spared Shimei all the time himselfe lived, yet being dust and in the grave, he flew him by the hand of Salomon his sonne. Hence it seemeth that King Henry theseventh of England had his patterne, when he gave order to Henry the Eight to execute Pool as sonne as himselfe was buried, having made promise to the King of Spaine when he delivered Pool unto him, that while hee lived hee would never put him to death, not fuffer violent hands to bee laid upon him.

And yet did not the execution of Joab yeeld unto Salomon any fuch great profit or alfurance as he hoped for. For he found a young Adad of Idumaa, and Refin of Damalous to vexe him: who, as the Scriptures witnesse, were emboldened to enterprize upon Selomon, hearing that David flept with his fathers, and that Josb the Captaine of the Hoft was dead. Now when David had reigned in all fortie yeares, to wit, in Hebron 7. yeers, and in Jerusalem three and thirty, he died.

For his person, he was of small stature, but exceeding strong. For his internal gifts and graces, hee so farre exceeded all other men, as putting his humane frailtie apart, hee was faid by God himselfe to bee a man according to his owne heart. The Plalmos which hee wrote witnesse his pietie and his excellent learning: of whom Hierometo PANLIAM raulinus: David Simonides noster, Pindarus, & Alcæus, Flaccus, quoque Catullus, & Serenus, Christum lyra personat, & in dechachordo Psalterio abinferis suscitat resurventeme David (faith he) our Simonides, Pindarus, Alcæus, Horace, Catullus and Screnus, bee playeth Christ on his harpe, and one a ten stringed Pfalter bee raiseth him up rising from the dead, And being both a King and a Prophet, he foretelleth Christ more lightsomly and lively than all the rest.

The booke of the Pfalmes, faith Glycas, was divided, ordered and diffinguished by Exchias: but whether all the Pfalmes were written by David, it is diverfly disputed. For Athanasius, Cyprian, Lyranus, and others conceive divers Authors answering the titles Athanin sinos. of the feverall Pfalmes, as Mofes, Salomon, and the rest hereafter named; and that only Hierepistas 73. Pfalmes were composed by David himselfe, namely, those which are intituled ipsius Lyran. in exp. navid. For the 50. and the 72. with the ten that follow, are bestowed on Asaph the son of Barachia, eleven other on the fonnes of Korath; and eleven are ascribed to Moses, to wit, the 89 and the ten following, and fothey are intituled in the old Hebrew Copies. though the vulgar and Septuagint (three excepted) stile them otherwise. The supposed nine Authors of these Pfalms which David wrote not, Sixe. Senensis nameth as followeth; Salomon, Moses, (whom Aben Ezra, contrary to Hierome, maketh one of Davids fingers) Afaph, Ethan-EZiachi, Eman-EZiaira, Iditham, and the three fonnes of Chore. But Billand Liv. S. Chrisoftome makes David the fole Author of all the Pfalmes, & fo doth S. Angustine, fol. 10. 0 11. reasoning in this manner: Although (faith hee) some there are that ascribe those Pfalms Aug de Civil, Del onely to David, which are over-written ipfius David, and the rest intituled ipsi David, to others, this opinion (faith he) Voce Evangelica Salvatoris ipfius refut atur, ubi ait quod ipfe Davidin pirttu Christum dixerit effe suum Dominum, quoniam Psalmus 109. sic incipit, Dixit Dominus Domino mee, Sede a dextris meis, &c. The voyce of the Gospell refutes this opinion, where it faith, that David himselfe in the spirit called Christ his Lord's becausette 109. Pfalme begins thus: The Lord faid unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand, Laftly, his testimonies are used both by Christ and the Apostles, and hee was as a patterne to all the Kings and Princes that succeeded him.

His Story and all his particular actions, were written by the Prophets, Samuel, Naother and Gad, as it is in the first of Chron. 29. verf. 19. For the severall parts of the books of Samuel which intreat chiefly of David, were as it feemes, written by these three holy men.

Constantine Manasses hath an opinion, that the Trojans during the time of the siege caption 7. foughtfor fuccour from David, and that hee stayed neuter in that warre. But it feemeth In his Annales that Manafles did miscast the time twixt David & the Trojan warre. For it is generally of Greeke into received that Troy fell between the times of Abdon and Samfon Judges of Ifrael, about Latin by Frames the worlds veere 2848. and David died in the veere 2991.

6. IX. of the treasures of David and Salomon.

Is treasures were exceeding great. For it is written in the 22. of the first of Chro- Verlit nicles , that he left Salomon for the building of the Temple a hundred thousand talents of gold; and a thousand thousand talents of filver, and of braffe and yron paffing all weight, which is more than any King in the world possest besides himselfe, and his fonne to whom hee left it. For it amounteth to three thousand three hundred thirty &three carrioad, & a third of a carrioad of filver, allowing two thousand weight offilver or fixe thousand pound sterling to every cartload, besides threescore and seventeene millions of French Crownes, or of our money twenty three millions and a thoufand pound: a matter, but for the testimony of the Scriptures, exceeding all beleefe. For that any riches were left him, it doth not appeare, feeing that the Judges had not any treasure, nor any soveraign power to make levies: but when they went to the wars they were followed by furh voluntaries as the feverall tribes by turns gave them: feeing alfo that Saul who was of a meane parentage, & perpetually vexed and invaded by the Philiftims, could not in all likelihood gather great riches (if any at all) his Territories being exceeding narrow, and thereof the better part possess by his enemies.

Therfore it were not amisse to consider how David within the space of not very ma ly yeeres, might amasse up such mighty treasures. For though parsimony be it selfe a great revenue, yet needs there must have been some other great meanes. It seemes that he made the uttermost profit of all that he had, that was profitable. Eusebim in his 9. booke and last chapter de Praparatione Evangelica, citethen words of Eupolemus, who reporteth that David, among other preparations for the Temple, built a Navie in Mela. nis (or, as Villalpandus corrects it, Achanis) a citie of Arabia, and from thence fent mento digge for gold in the Iland Urphe, which Ortelius thinks was Ophir, though Eupolema in this place of Eusebius (erring perhaps in this circumstance) faith that this llandisin the red Sea: from whence, saith this Eupolemus, they brought gold into Jury . Pinedal. 4. de Rebus Salomonis,c. 1. thinkes that David did this way alfoenrich himfelie, and citeth this testimonie of Eupolen us: & yet certainly David had many other wayes to gather riches. Much land doubtleffe he gained by conquest from the Canaanites & Philistims, besides those fruit full vallies neere Jordan in Trachonitis and Basan, and the best of Syria, and other countries bordering the Ifraelites. These demaines belike hee kept in his own hands, and with his infinite number of captives, which he took in his warres, which were not able to redeeme themselves, husbanded those grounds for his greatest advantage. For it is written, 1. Chro. 17. that Jehonathan was over his treatures in the fieldin the villages, in the cities, in the townes, that EZri was over the labourers that tilled his ground; Simei over the vineyards, and Sabdi over the store of the wine; Baal Hanan over the olive trees, and Joash over the store of the oyle : also that hee had heards-men that had charge over his cattell, both in the high lands and in the plaines, over his Sheepe, Camels and Asses. And this custome of enriching themselves by husbanderic and cat. tell, the ancient Kings every where held, both before and after Davids time. For wee reade of Pl. araoh, that hee spake to Joseph to appoint some of his brethrenor of their servants, to be rulers over his cattell. Wee reade of uzzia, that hee loved husbandine, had much cattell, and plough-men, and dreffers of Vines: likewife wee reade it in all Greeke Poets, that the wealth of the ancient Kings did specially consist in their Hers and Flocks; whereof it were needleffe to cite Augus and Admerus, or any other fores amples, the rule holding true in all. Now concerning David it is not unlikely, buttur, those captives which were not imployed in husbandrie, were many of them used by him in all forts of gainfull professions, as the ancient Romanes in like manner used that

To these profits (besides the tributes and impositions, which doubtlesse were gree, and besides the innumerable presents which yearly were brought him, or extraordinrily sent him, by Tohu and others) wee may adde the great spoiles which hee found in the Cities and Countries which hee conquered: also the head money which was gathered per legem capitationis ; By the law of capitation, or head money, every man ichor poore paying halfe a fickle of the Sanctuary, which is about as much as fouretene pence, and fo in all it amounted to a wondrous fumme in that Kingdome: whereinon thousand thousand five hundred and seventie thousand fighting men were numbredby Joab. Now although this law of capitation bee thought by some verie learned, not to have beene perpetuall (which opinion of theirs neverthelesse they confesse is against the Hebrew expositions) yet David upon this occasion is not unlikely to have put ith practife. And by these meanes might hee bee able to leave those huge treasures tosale mon. Yet it may seeme that this great masse of gold and filver left by David, theless part was his owne in private; and fo will it appeare the leffe wonderfull that heeleft fo much. Of his owneliberalitie we finde, that hee gave to the building of the Temple three thousand talents of gold, and seven thousand talents of silver : a great summe, but holding a very small proportion to the other. Wherefore we are to consider, that the treasures of the Sanctuarie it selfe were exceeding great, as needs they must have been, having received continuall encrease, without any losse or diminution ever fince the time of Mofes and Josuah. The revenues of the Sanctuarie (besides all manner of tithes and oblations, which defrayed the daily expences, and maintained the Priests and Levits) were partly raised out of the head money before mentioned; partly out of the spoils gotten in warre. For all the bootie was divided into two parts, whereof the Souldier bad one, and the people which remained at home, had the other halfe; whereby all the countries received benefit of the victory was for about the people which remained at home, had the other halfe; whereby all the countries received benefit of the victory was for about the people which remained at home, had the other halfe; whereby all the countries received benefit of the victory. countrey received benefit of the victory, yet so, that the Souldiers had a farre gree ter proportion than the rest, as being fewer, and therefore receiving more for every fingle share.

Gen. 47. 2. Chron. 26.

: Chron. 21.

Out of this purchase was deducted the Lords tribute, which was one in fiftie, of that which the people received, and one in five hundred, of that which was given to the Souldiers; namely, one hundred and one thousand part of the whole bootie. So in the fooile of Midian, thirty two thousand woman being taken, the armie had fixteene thousand of them for flaves, and the Congregation had other fixteene thousand; but Num 31. 49 out of the fixteene thousand given to the Armie, were exempted two and thirty for the Lordstribute. Out of the peoples number were taken three hundred and twenty. By this meanes, the leffer that the Armie was which had exposed it selfe to danger, the greater profit had every Souldier; but when it confifted of many hands, they who remaining at home were faine to undergoe more than ordinarie travaile in domesticall affaires, did receive by fo much the greater portion. But the Lords tribute was alwayes certaine, vea many times it was increased, either by some especiall commandement, as when all the gold, and filver, and other metralls tound in Fericho, were confecrated unto God; or by 10.6.19. thankefulneffe of the Rulers and People, as when after the victorie obtained against the Midianites without the loffe of one man , all Jewells, Bracelets, Earerings, and the like, Num 31-509 were offered up, as voluntarie presents.

Now howfoever the Israelites were many times oppressed, & troden down by other Nations, yet were not these treasures robbed or spoiled; for the enemies never gat possession of the Tabernacle that was in Shilo. Wherefore it cannot otherwise bee, than that the wealth of the Sanctuarie must have bin exceeding great; as containing above one hundreth part of all the money and other goods found by the Ifraelites in the whole Land of Canaan; and of all that was purchased by so many victories, as they obtained a- 1 Chronic. 26. gainst the bordering Nations. For that this treasurie was not defrauded of the due por- v.27. & 28. tion, it is evident; feeing that before the time of David and his Lievtenant Joab, it is recorrect that Saul and Abner, and before them Samuel, had used to dedicate of the spoiles obtained in war, to maintaine the house of the Lord: the like whereof may be well prefumed of the former Judges and Captaines of other Ages. Certaine it is, that the Conquelt of David brought into the Land far greater abundance of riches, than any former victories had purchased, those of Josua perhaps excepted: but these vast summes of an numbered thousand Talents of filver, may feeme rather to have bin made up, by the addition of his winnings and liberalitie, to the treasures laid up in many former Ages, than to have beene the meere fruits of his owne industrie. Nowconcerning the riches of Salomon, it is more manifest how he gathered them; for A Talenr of received of yearely revenues with his tributes 666. Talents of gold, befides the Cu-flomes of Spices. He had also fix rich Returnes from the East India, which greatly in- 1 King 10.14. treased his store. For his ships performed that voyage every three yeeres, and he began that trade in the two and twentieth yeere of his reigne, and ruled fortie yeeres. Befides this, all Judge and I frael were now mastered to his hands, all the Arabians his borderers, hesyriam of Zobah, of Damascena, of Palmyrena, of Ituræa; all of Idumæa, Moab, and 1 King. c.9. Ammon, paid him tribute; as likewise did the Hittites, who with the Perizzites, Hevites, v. 20. & 10. ebusites, and other races of the Canaanites, were not as yet extinguished, though v. 29.

iubjected. Into this flourishing estate was the Kingdome of Israel reduced by David, who after 1 Chro. 29. 28, o yeers reigne, and 70 yeers of life, dyed in a good age, full of dayes, riches, & honour, ndwas buried in the Citie of David. It is written by Josephus that there was hid in Da-Id Tombea maryailous quantitie of treasures, insomuch as Hyrcanus (who first of the 10sp, Antib 7. hafmanai, or race of Maccabees, called himselfe King) one thousand and three hundred ters after, drew thence three thousand Talents, to rid himself of Antiochus then besieing Jerusalem, & afterward Herod opening another Cell, had also an exceeding masse of old and filver therein. And it was an ancient custome to burie treasure with the dead. othe Peruvians and other Americans did the like, which being discovered by the Spaands, they inriched themselves by nothing so much in their first Conquest. That Samm did burie so much treasure in his fathers grave, it would hardly be beleeved, in reand of the great exactions with which hee was faine to burthen the people, not withanding all the riches which hee got otherwise, or which were left unto him: were it or withall confidered that his want of mony grew from fuch magnificent imployents. Particularly of the Sepulchre of David the Scriptures have no mention, but lely the Sepulchres of the Kings of Juda, as of an honourable place of buriall. Yet the Monuments THAP.17.5.8.

6. X.
Of the Philistims, whom David absolutely mastered: and of sundry other contemporaria

F the Philistims, whose pride David was the first that absolutely mastered in this conclusion of Davids time somewhat heere may bee spoken.

They descended of Cassoim, who, according to Isidor and Josephus, was one of the sonnes of Misraim, and was surnamed Philistim, as Esau was surnamed Edom, and Faceb I frael. There were of them five Cities or pettie principalities, namely, A columnia Aldod, Gaza or Aczaph, Ascalon, Geth or Gath, and Accaron. It feemeth that Casion was the first founder of this nation, because of his kindred on either hand, the Cana. nites and the Egyptians.

Gen. 20.

The first King of these Philistims, which the Scriptures have named, was that Ahi. melech which loved Sara, Abrabams wife.

The second Abimelech lived at once with Isaac, to whom Isaac repaired in the time of famine, Abimelech then residing at Gerar in the border of Idum &a; which Abimelech far cied Isaac his wife, as his father haddone Sara.

After Abimelech the second, the Philistims Kings are not remembred in the Scripture till Davids time: perhaps the government was turned into Arifocraticall. For they are afterwards named Princes of the Philistims, howfoever Achis be named King of Gath. the fame to whom David fled, and who againe gave him Siklag to inhabit in Saulting.

After him we reade of another Achis who lived with Salomon, to whom Shimei ma velled to fetch backe his fugitive fervant, what time the feeking of his fervant wastle losse of his life. Ferenie the Prophet speaketh of the Kings of Palastin or Phillim, Amos nameth the King of Ascalon: Zacharias, a King of Gaza. The rest of the warresof the Philistims are remembred in the Catalogue of the Judges, of Saul and David, and therefore I shall not need to collect the particulars in this place.

There lived at once with David, the third of the Silvii King of Alba, called Latinu Silving, who is faid to have ruled that part of Italy fiftie yeers. And about his fourteenth veere Codrus the last King of the Athenians died, to whom succeeded the first Prince of those, who being called after Medon, Medontida, without regall name governed Alhan during their life.

The reasons which moved the Athenians to change their government, were not drawn from any inconvenience found in the rule of foveraignty, but in honor of Codrus only. For when the Gracians of Doris, a region between Phocis, & the mountainofort, fought counsaile from the Oracle, for their successe in the warres against the Athenian, it was answered, that then undoubtedly they should prevaile and become Lords of that State, when they could obtain any victorie against the Nation, and yet preserve the Athenian King living. Codrus by some intelligence being informed of this answer, with drew himselfe from his owne forces, and putting on the habit of a common souldier, entred the Campe of the Dorians, and killing the first hee encountred, was himlest Forthwith cut in pieces

Eupales the 31. King of Affiria, which others account but the 30. began to ruleihat Empire, about the 13. yeere of David, and held it 38. yeeres.

Neere the fame time began Ixion the fecond King of the Heraclida, the fonne of En rifthenes in Corinth; and Agis the second of the Heraclida in Lacedamon: in honour of which Agis, his fuccessours were called Agide, for many yeeres after. Hee restored the Laconians to their former libertie : hee overcame the Citizens of Helos in Laconia, who had refused to pay him tribute: hee condemned them and theirs to perpetual slavene whereof it came, that all the Messenians, whom at length they brought into the like bondage, were after called Helots.

In like fort from the Sclavi came the world Slave. For when that Nation iffuing out Sarmatia, now called Russia, had seized upon the country of Illyria, & made it their own by conquest, their victory pleased them so highly, that therupon they called themselve by a new name, Slavos, which is in their language glorions. But in after times (that warmer Climate having thawed their northerne hardiness, and not ripened their wits) when they were trodden down, and made fervants with their neighbours; the Italians which kent many of them in bondage, began to call all their bondmen slaves, using the word as a name of reproach: in which sense it is now current through many countries.

Other Chronologers make this Agis, the third King of Sparta, and somewhat later, ahout the 23 yeare of David, and Tay, that Achefratus was the fourth King of this race. the same whom Eusebius calls Labores, and sets him in the thirteenth yeare of Salomon. Eusebinchro, Inthe tenth yeare of Acheftraine, Androclus the third some of Codrus, affisted by the Imes, built Ephefus in Caria, who after the adjoyning of the Ile of Sames to his territorie. was flaine by the Carians, whose countrie he usurped. He was buried (faith Pausanias) The East gate o inone of the gates of Ephelus called Magnetes, his armed Statua being fet over him. Stra. of Ephelus to breports that after Androelus had subdued the Ionians (the next province to Ephesis on ward Magnessa the lea coast of Alia the lesse) he inlarged his Dominions upon the Boles, which joyneth Mander. to Jonia: and that his posteritie governed the Cities of Ephesus and Erythra by the name of Ballide in Strato his own time. Of the expedition of the Iones how they came hither arilles soles. out of Pelapannestis, I have * spoken already upon occasion of the return of the Heraclidento Peleponnefus, wherein, with the Dores, they expelled the Achai, and inhabited See Ch. in this ther places in that land : though this of the Iones succeeded that of the Heraclida 100. medium.

The Citie of Ephisis became exceeding famous: first, for the Temple of Dianathere-Plinteres inbuilt, which had in length 425-foot, and 220. in breadth, sustained with 127. pillars & 17.0.37. of marble, of 70. foot high: whereof 27. were most curiously graven, and all the rest of chovcemarble polishe, the workebeing first set out by Cresiphon of Gnossos. Secondly. it became renowned by being one of the first that received the Christian faith, of which Timilitie was Bishop to whom, and to the Ephesians, Saint Paul wrote his Epistles so inrinled. The other Citie possess by Androclus in Alolis, was also universally spoken of by reasonof sibylla, furnamed Erythrea: who lived 740. yeares before Christ was born. S. Angustine avoweth that a Roman Proconful shewed him in an ancient Greeke copie certaine verses of this Prophetesse: which began (as S. Augustine changed them into Latine in these words: Jesus Christus Dei Filius, Salvator , Jesus Christ Son of God, the Savieur.

About the time that Josb befieged Rabba in Moab, Vaphres began to govern in Egypt. the fame that was father in law to Salomon, whose Epistles to Salomon, and his to Vaphres. are remembred by Eusebius out of Polemon. In the 21. of David, was the Citie of Magnessain Asia the lesse founded, the same which is seated upon the river Maander, where Scipio gave the great overthrow to Antiochus. In this territorie are the best horses of the leffer Afia bred, whereof Lucan:

Et Magnetis equis, Miny agens cognita remis.

About the fame time Cuma in Campania was built by the inhabitants of Chalcis in Eu- Serv. in Acreid. bas, according to Servius, with whom Strabo joyneth the Cumaans of Rolis, faying, 3-Strabol.s. that to the one of these people the government was given, with condition that the other should give name to the citie. Of this Cuma was Ephorus the famous scholler of Isocrates. Exception and Cassiodor finde the building of Carebage at this time, to wit, in the 21.

yeare of David, but much mistaken. For the father of Dido was Metinos the son of Badezor, brother to Jezabel, who married Achab King of Ifrael; and between the death of David, and the first of Achab, there were wasted about 95 years.

In this time also Meastus lived, the second of the Athenian Princes after Codrus, of Eustin Cho. which there were thirteen in descent before the State changed into a Magistracie of ten Hend in vis. years. Some writers make it probable, that the Æolians, led by Graus, the grand nephew 1.14. of Orefles, possest the Citie and Iland of Thebes about this time. In the 32. yeare of Da. And Ser com. vid, Hiram began to reigne in Tyre, according to Josephus, who faith that in his twelfth yeare Salomon began the worke of the Temple. But it is a familiar errour in Josephus, to mifreckon times, which in this point he doth fo strangely, as if hee knew not how at all to cast any accompt. For it is manifest, that Hiram sent messengers, and Cedars unto David, soone after his taking of Jerusalem, which was in the very beginning of Davids reigne over Israel, when as yethee had reigned onely seven yeares in Hebron over the house of Juda. Wherefore it must needs be that Hiram had reigned above 30. 2 Sams.

yeares before Salomon; unlesse more credit should bee given to those Tyrian records which are cited by Josephus, than to the plaine words of Scripture contradicting them. For, that it was the same Hiram which lived both with David and with Salemon, the Scriptures make it plainely manifest.

CHAP. XVIII. OF SALOMON.

Of the establishing of Salomon : of birthright, and the cause of Adonijah's death, and of Sa. lomons wisedome.

ALOMON, who was brought up under the Prophet Nathanbe. gan to reigne over Juda and Ifrael, in the yeare of the World 2991. He was called Salemen by the appoyntment of God: hee was allo He was called Salomon by the appoyntment of the Lordloved called Jediddia, or Theophilus by Nathan, because the Lordloved him.

Hiram King of Tyre, after Salamons anounting, dispatched Embaffadors toward him, congratulating his establishment: a custome between Princes very ancient. Whence we reade that David did in like fort falutells.

num King of the Ammonites, after his obraining the Kingdome.

The beginning of Salomon was in blood, though his reigne were peaceable. For foom after Davids death, he caused his brother Adonijah to be flaine by Benarah the some of Jehojada, taking occasion from Adonijah his desiring by Berfheba, that the young made Abilbag (which lay in Davids bosome in his latter dayes, to keep him warme) might be given to him. Whatfoever hee pretended, it was enough that Adonijah was his elder brother, and fought the Kingdome contrary to the will of David, whom Godenclind towards Salomon. And yet it is faid that a word is enough to the wife, and he that feesbut the claw may know whether it be a Lion or no : fo it may feeme that to the quick-fighted wisedome of Salomon, this motion of Adonijabs, was a demonstration of a new trefon. For they which had bin Concubines to a King, might not after be touched butby a King: whence Achitophel wished Absalom to take his fathers Concubines as a part of the Royaltie. And David after that wrong, determining to touch them no more, didnot give them to any other, but thur them up, and they remained widowed until their death-And this it feernes was the depth of Isbofheths quarrell against Abner, for having hishthers Concubine. And some fignification of this custome may seeme too in the words of God by Nathan to David; I have given thee thy Masters house, and thy Masters wives, to And in the words of Saul upbraiding Jenathan, that he had chosen David to the shame of the nakednesse of his Mother. Hereupon perhaps was some reference to this purpose of Adonijah, to marrie with her that was alwaies present with David in his latter daies, and who belike knew all that was past, for the conveying of the Kingdome to Salmin. There may be divers further occasions; as either that he would learn such things by her as might be for the advantage of his ambition, or that he would perswade her to sorge fome strange tale about Davids last Testament, or any thing else that might prejudicethe title of Salomon.

greed both with the law of Nations, & with the customes of the Jewes : yet the kings of Deuter, 24, 15, the Jewes were fo absolute, as they did therin, & in all elfe, what they pleased. Some ex-Pilium exole as amples alfothey had (though not of Kings) which taught them to use this paternall au nogito, dando a portionen during thority in transferring the birthright to a younger fonne: namely of Jacobs disheriting nam upfus of jus Ruben, and giving the birthright (which was twice as much as any portion of theorimogenium. ther brethren) to Joseph: of whom he made two tribes. And that it was generally ac-

As for the right of an elder brother which Adonijah pretended, though generally ita knowledged that this power was in David, it appeareth by the words of Berfahe & Na. than to David, and of Jonathan to Adonijah. For, as for popular election, that it was necessary to confirme, or that the refusall of the people had authority to frustrate the elder brothers right to the Kingdome, it now here appeares in the stories of the Jewes. It is faid indeed that the people made Saul King at Galgal: that is, they acknowledged x Samarias and established him. For that he was King long before, no man can doubt. In like manner elsewhere the phrase of chusing or making their King, is to be expounded: as where in the prohibition, that they should not make themselves a King, it is said, Thou shalt make Dent. 17.304 him King whom the Lord Shall chafe.

But to proceed with the acts of Salomon: at the same time that hee put Adonijah to death, he rid himselfe also of Joab, and three years after of shimei, as David had advised him: he displaced also the Priest Abiathar, who tooke part with Adonijah against him: but in respect of his office, and that he followed David in all his afflictions, and because 1 King 24 he had borne the Arke of God before his Father, he spared his life. And thus being established in his Kingdome, he tooke the daughter of Vaphres King of Egypt to Wife: for To Eulebius out of Eupolemus cals him. He offered a thousand facrifices at Gibcon, where God appearing unto him in a dreame, bade him aske what he would at his hands · Salonon choo (eth Wisedome, which pleased God. And God said unto him, Because thou hast asked this thing, and hast not asked for thy self long life, neither hast thou asked riches for thy selfe, nor half asked the life of thine enemies, behold, I have done according to thy words: by which weemay informe our felves, what defires are most pleasing to God, and what not. For the covering after long life in respect of our selves, cannot but proceede of selfe-love, which is the root of all impiety: the defire of private riches is an affection of coverousneffe, which God abhorreth; to affect revenge, is as much as to take the fword out of Gods hand, and to distrust his justice. And in that it pleased God to make Salomon know that it liked him, that he had not asked the life of his enemies, it could not but put him in minde of his brothers flaughter, for which he had not any warrant either from David or from the Law of God; but because Salomon defired wisedome onely, which taught himboth to obey God, and to rule men, it pleafed God to give him withall that which hedefired not. And I have also given thee (faith God) that which thou hast not asked both riches and honour. This gift of wisedome our Commentators stretch to almost allkindes ofleaming: but that it comprehended the knowledge of the nature of plants and lio ving creatures, the Scripture testifieth; though no doubt the chiefe excellencie of salo- 1 King 4:33. wing trained, was in the knowledge of governing his Kingdome: whence, as it were a King 3.9. for an example of his wisedome, the Scripture telleth how soone he judged the controversie between the two harlots.

> 6: II. Of Salomons building and glorie.

TEe then entred into league with Hiram King of Tyre, from whom he had much of his materials for the Kings parace and the Temple of whereof he had received a double charge, one from his father David, and another than the called Salomon his sonne, and of his materials for the Kings palace and the Temple of God: for the building ther from God. For like as it is written of David, that He called Salomon his sonne, and 1 Chr. 22.6. charged him to build a house for the Lord God of Israel: so doth Toftatus give the force of a 1 Chron. divine precept to these words, Behold, 4 son is born unto thee for. He shall build an bouse for my Name.

He began the worke of the Temple in the beginning of the fourth yeare of his reigne, *King & at which time also he prepared his fleete at Fsiongaber to trade for gold in the East Indies, that nothing might be wanting to supply the charge of so great a worke. For, that the Temple was in building while his fleets were passing to and fro, it is manifest. For the pillars of the Temple were made of the Almaggim trees brought from Ophir. Of thismost glorious building, of all the particulars (whereof the forme and example was I Chr. 28.29, given by God himfelf)many learned men have written; as Salmeron, Montanus, Ribera, Barradas, Azorius, Villalpandus, Pineda, and others, to whom I refer the Reader.

For the cutting and squaring of the Cedars which served that building, Salomon employed 30. thousand Carpenters, 10. thousand every month by course: he also used 80. thousand Masons in the mountain, and 70 thousand labourers that bare burdens, which tisconceived, he felected out of the Profelites, befides three thousand three hundred t King ? malters of his worke; so as he paid and imployed in all, one hundred eighty three thouland and three hundred men; in which number the Sidonians, which were farre more skilfull skilfull in hewing timber than the Ifraclites, may (as I thinke) be included. For Hiram caused his servants to bring downethe Cedars and Firres from Libanon to thesea, and thence sent them in raffes to Joppe, or the next port to Jerusalem. For in the second of Chronicles the second Chapter, it is plaine, that all but the thirtie thousand Carpenters, and the over-feers, were strangers, and as it seemeth the vassals of Hiram, and of Vaphres King of Egypt. In recompence of all this timber and stone, Salomon gave Hiram twenty thousand measures of wheate, and twenty measures of pure oyle yearely. Enseine out of Eupolemus in the ninth booke of his preparation, the last Chapter, hath lest us a Copie of Salomons Letterto Suron (which was the same as Huram and Hiram) King of Tyre in these words:

R Ex Salomon Suroni, Tyri, Sydonis, atque Phænecia regi, Amico paterno falutem. Scial li me à Deo magno David patris mei regnum accepisse, cumque mihi pater pracepit tem. plum Deo qui terram creavit, condere ut etiam ad te feriberem pracepit: Scribo igitur, de peto ate ut artifices at que fabros ad edificandum Templum Dei mittere velis.

King Salomon to King Suron, of Tyre, Sydon, & Phanicia King, and my fathers friend, fendeth greeting. You may understand that I have received of the great God of my father David, the Kingdome: and when my father commanded mee to build a Temple to Godwhich created heaven and earth, hee commanded also that I should write to you: I write therefore to 16 you, and befeech you that you would bee pleased to send mee Artificers and Carpenters to build the Temple of God.

Towhich the King Swes made this answer.

Uron of Tyre, Sydon and Phænicia King, to King Salomon creeting: When I readyour Dletters I gave Godthankes who hath installed you in your fathers kingdome. Andbicanse you write that Carpenters and Workmen may bee fent to build Gods Temple, I have fent you fourescore thousand men, and a Master builder a Tyrian, borne of a Tewish woman, a man admirable in building. Youwill becarefull that all necessaries be provided for them, and when Josanil 8,c.2. the Temple of God is built that they come home tous.

The Copies of these letters were extant in Josephus time, as himselfe affirmeth, and to be feene (faith he) Tam in no ftris quam in Tyriorum annalibus, as well in our owne as in the Tyrian annals. But he delivereth them somewhat in different termes, as the Readermay finde in his Antiquities. But were this intercourse betweene Salomon and Hirameither 40 by message or by writing, it is somewhat otherwise delivered in the Scriptures, thanei-1 King, s. from ther Eupolemus or Josephus set it downe, but so, that in substance there is little difference the 1.v. to the 9. betweene the one and the other.

The like letter in effect Salomon is faid to have written to Vaphres King of Egypt, and was answered as from Hiram.

But whereas some Commentersupon Salomon, find that Hiram King of Tyre, and The phres King of Egypt, gave Salomon the title of Rex magnus, and cite Eupolemon in Eugebius, I do not finde any fuch addition of magnus in Eulebius, in the last chapter of that ninth book ; neither is it in Josephus in the eighth book and second chapter of the Jewes Antiquities: it being a vaine title used by some of the Assyrian and Persian Kings, and used so likewise by the Parthians, and many other after them, insomuch as in later times it grew common, and was usurped by meane persons in respect of the great Hermes the first, which was honoured by that name for his noble qualities, as much or more than for his

After the finishing and dedication of the Temple and house of the Lord, Salomon fortified Jerusalem with a treble wall, and repaired Hazor which had beene the ancient Metropolis of the Canaanites, before Jofna's time: fo did he Gaza of the Philiftims: he built Berothon, Gerar, & the Millo or munition of Jerufalem. For Pharach as it feemeth infavour of Salomon) came up into the edge of Ephraim, and took Gerar, which place the Canaanites yet held, and put them to the fword, and burnt their Citie. The place and Territory he gave Salomons wife for a dowrie. And it is probable, that because Salomon then busied in his magnificent buildings, and could not attend the war, that he enwas the the rested his father in law to rid him of these neighbours, which Pharaoh performed. But hethereby taught the Egyptians to visit those parts againe before they were sent for: and in his fon Rehoboams time Shefback this mans fuccessor did fack Jerusalem it selfe.

Salomon also built Megiddo in Manasse, on this side Jordan, and Balah in Dan: also Thadmor, which may be either Ptolomies Thamoron in the defart of Juda, or (as Fosephus Foses and care thinks) Palmira in the defart of Syria; which Palmyra; because instood on the utmost horder of Salomons dominion to the northeast of Libanus, and was of Davids conquest when he wan Damascus ; it may feem that Salomon therfore bestowed thereon the most coff, and fortified it with the best Art that that age had. Josephus calsthis place Thadamoraby which name (faith he) given by Salomon, the Syrians as yet call it. Hierom in his hooke of Hebrew places, cals it Thermeth. In after times, when it was rebuilt by Adrianthe Emperour, it was honoured with his name, and called Adrianopolis. In respect of this great charge of building, Salomon raised tribute through all his Dominions. befides an hundred and twenty talents of gold received from Hirams fervants; Salomen offered Hiram twenty townes in or neare the upper Galilee, but because they stood in an unfruitfull and marish ground, Hiram refused them, and therefore was the territory cal-

These townes, as it is supposed, lay in Galilee of the Gentiles, Non quod Gentes ibi ha bitarent: sed qui a sub distinue regis Gentilis erat. Not that it was possess by the Gentiles (sairly Nauchrus) but because it was under the rule of a King that was a Gentile. Howsoever it were it is true that Salomon in the 21. yeare fortified those places which Hiram refused. Further he made a journey into Syria Zobah; and established his tributes; the first & last warre (if in that expedition he were driven to fight) that he made in person in all his life. He then visited the border of all his dominions, passing from Thadmor to the North of Palmyrena, and so to the Defarts of Idumæa, from whence he visited Eziongaber and Floth the uttermost place of the South of all his Territories, bordering to the red sea: which Cities I have described in the Story of Moles.

of Salomons fending to Ophir, and of some seeming contradictions about Sasomons riches and of Pineda's conceit of two strange passages about Affricke.

TEre Salomon prepared his Fleet of ships for India, with whom Hiram joyned in that voyage, and furnished him with Mariners and Pilots, the Tyrians being of all other the most expert sea-men. From this part of Arabia which at this time belonged to Edom, and was conquered by David, did the Fleet passe to the East India, which was not farre off, namely, to Ophir, one of the Islands of the Molucca's, a place exceeding rich in gold: witnesse the Spaniards, who notwithstanding all the abundance which they gather in Peru, doe yet plant in those Islands of the East at Manilia, and recover a great quantity from thence, and with leffe labour than they do in any one part of Peru, or new Spaine.

The returne which was made by these Ships amounted to source hundred and twenty talents, but in the second of Chronicles the eighth, it is written 450 talents: whereof 30. talents went in expence for the charge of the Fleet, and wages of men; and 420. talents, which makes five and twenty hundred and twenty thousand Crownes, came cleere. And thus must those two places bee reconciled. As for the place 1. Reg. 10. 14. which speaketh of fixe hundred fixty and fixe talents of gold; that fumme, as I take it, is of other receipts of Salomons which were yearely, and which came to him befides those profits from Ophir.

My opinion of the land of Ophir, that it is not Peru in America (as divers have thought) but a Countrey in the East Indies; with some reason why at those times they could not make more speedy returne to Jerusalem from the East Indies, than in three C.S. 5.9.10. 3 Years; and that Tharfis in Scripture is divers times taken for the Ocean, hath been alreaSalomonis c. G. dy declared in the first booke.

426 Only it remainerh that I should speake somewhat of Pineda his strange conceits, who being a Spaniard of Bætica, would faine have Gades or Calis-malis, in old times called Tartessus, which is the Southwest corner of that Province, to bee the Tharss from whence Salemen fetcht his gold; for no other reason, as it seemes, but for love of his own countrey, and because of some affinity of sound betweene Tharfis and Tarteflus. For whereas it may feeme strange that it should be three years ere they that took ship in the red fea, should return from the East Indies to Jerusalem, this hath been in part answered already. And further the intelligent may conceive of fundry lets, in the digging and re fining of the metall, and in their other trafficke, and in their land-carriages between Je. rufalem and the red sea, and perhaps also elsewhere: so that wee have no need to make Salomons men to goe many thousand miles out of their way to Gades, round about all Affrick, that so they might be long a comming home.

For the direct way to Gades (which if Salomon and the Ifraelites knew not, the Tyrians which went with them, could not have been ignorant of) was along the Mediterran fea, and to (befides many wonderfull inconveniences, and terrible navigation in rounding Affrica) they should have escaped the troublesomeland-carriage betweene Jensalem and the red sea, through dry, desart, and the theevish Countryes: and within 30 mileof Jerusalemat Joppe, or some other haven in Salomons own Country, have laden and un-laden their ships.

But this direct course they could not hold (faith Pineda) because the huge Island of At. lantis, in largenesse greater than all Affrick and Asia, being swallowed up in the Atlantick Ocean, hindred Salomons thips from patting through the straits of Gibraltarsforthis hee alledgeth Plato in Timeo. But that this calamity happened about Salomons time, orthat thereby the Straits of Gades were filled with mud, and made unpaffable, thatthere could be no comming to Gades by the Mediterran sea: or that this indraught wherethe fea runneth most violently, and most easily scoureth his channell, should be filled with mud, and not also the great Ocean in like manner, where this huge Hand is supposed to have food: or that Salomons ships being inthe red sea. should negle the golden Mins of the East Indies (which were infinitely better and nearer to the red sea, than any in Spain) to feeke gold at Cadyz by the way of compassing Affrica; it is most ridiculous to imagine. For the Spaniard him selfe that hath also the rich Peru in the West, sortised in the East Indies, and inhabites some part thereof, as in Manilia, finding in those parism leffe quantity of gold (the finall territory which hee there possessed than

The fame Pinede hath another strange passage round about all Affrica, which elswhere in Peru. he dreames of: supposing whereas Jonas failing to Tharsisthe Citie of Cicilia, wascast out in the Mediterran sea, and taken up there by a Whale, that this Whale in three days herooke a flip fivimming above twelve thousand English miles along the Mediterran seas, and so through the straights of Gades, and along all the huge seas round about Affrica, castup Jonas upon the shore of the Red Sea, that so he might have perhaps some fixemiles the shorter (though much the worse) way to Ninive. This conceit he grounds onely upon the ambiguity of the word suph, which oftentimes is an Epitheton of the Red fealassi we should call it mare algosum, the sea full of weeds for the red sea. But in Jonas c.2. 5. it's generally taken in the proper fignification for weeds, and not as Pineda would have it, who in this place against his owne rule which elsewhere he giveth us) supposed strange miracles without any need. For this long voyage of the Whale, finished in three dates, is a greater miracle, than the very prefervation of Janus in the belly of the Whale: and therefore feeing there is no necessity of this miracle, we fend it back unto him, keeping his owne rule, which in this place hee forgets; Meracula non fune multiplicanda. Andagaine, Non funs miracula gratis danda, nec pro arbitrio nova fingenda; Miracles are not us be multiplied without necessitie nor delivered without cause, nor fained at pleasure. Therefore we leave this man in his dreames, which (were hee not otherwise very learned and judicious) might be thought unworthy the mentioning. But to proceed with our florit of Salomon.

The Queene of Saba's comming from farre to Salemon, (as it seemes, from Arabia foelix, & not, as fome think, from Ethiopia) and her rich prefents, and Salamons reciprocall magnificence, and his resolving of her difficult questions; those are set downess large in the Text. But herein Josephus is greatly mistaken, who calls this Queen of Sale

Nicaules, the successor (faith hee out of Herodotus) of those thirty and eight Egyptian 70/411.8.13 Kings which succeeded Meneus the founder of Memphis; adding, that after this Egyptish, and the father in law of Salomon, the name of Pharaoh was left off in Egypt. For as it is elfewhere proved that the Queene was of Arabia, not of Egypt and Ethiopia; fo 2 Kinge 22. were there other Pharaobs after the father in law of Salomon. Yea, above three hundred 2 Chro .25. veates after Salomon, Pharaoh Necho flew Josias King of Juda.

It is also written of Salomon, that he kept in garrisons fourteene thousand Chariots. and twelve thousand horsemen; that hee spent in Court every day thirty measures of fine flower, threefcore measures of wheate, one hundred sheepe, besides stags and fallow deare, bugles and fowle; foure thousand stalles of horses he had for his chariots and otherules, and for the twelve thousand horsemen of his guard. For, the ten thousand falles in the first of Kings the fourth, are to bee taken but for so many horses, whence in 1 King 431. the second of Chronicles the ninth, it is written but foure thousand stals or teemes, and in every teeme ten horles, as Junius and the Geneva understand it. He was said to be wifer than any man, yea than were Ethan the Ezrahite, than Heman, Chaleal, or than Darda; to which Junius addeth a fift, to wit, Ezrack. For the Geneva maketh Ethan an Ezrahite by Nation. Josephus writes them, Athan, Aman, Chalceus and Donan the sonnes of Hemon. Hee spake three thousand Proverbes, and his songs were one thousand and five, whereof either the most part perished in the Captivity of Babylon, or else because many acts of Salamons were written and kept among the publike Records of Civill causes, and not Ecclesiasticall, therefore they were not thought necessary to bee inserted into Gods Booke.

Of the fall of Salomon, and how long he lived.

Towashe had plenty of all other things, so had hee no scarcity of women. For besides his seven hundred Wives, hee kept three hundred Concubines, and (forgetting that God had commanded that none of his people should accompany the daughters of Idolaters) he tooke Wives out of Egypt, Edom, Moab, Ammon, Zidon and Heth: and when hee fell a doting, his Wives turned his heart after other gods, as Afteroth of the Zidonians, Milcom or Molech of the Ammonites, and Chemoth of Moab.

These things God punished by Adad of Idumaa, Rezin of Damascus, and by Feroboam his owne fervant, and one of the masters of his workes, who by the ordinance of God tare from his fonne Roboam, ten of the twelve parts of all the territory he had. finners, useth the fins of others, which he himselfe wrought nor.

In the reigne of Salomon (as in times of long peace) were few memorable actions by him performed, excepting his buildings with other workes of magnificence, and that great Indian voyage already mentioned. Fortie yeeres he raigned; how many he lived, it is not written, and must therefore be found only by conjecture. The most likely way to gheffe at the truth in this case is, by considering the actions of David before and after, the Salomons birth, whereby we may belt make est mation of the yeers which they confabt med, and consequently learne the true, or most likely yeere of his nativity. Seaven yeeres David reigned in Hebron: in his eighth yeere he tooke Jerusalem, and warred with the Philliftims, who also troubled him in the yeere following. The bringing home 2 King 7.0.2. of the Arke seemes to have been in the tenth yeere of David, and his intention to build the Temple in the yeere ensuing , at which time hee had sufficient leisure, living in rest. After this he had warres with the Philistims, Moabites, Aramites and Edomites, which must needs have held him five yeeres, considering that the Aramites of Damasco raised warreagainst him, after such time as hee had beaten HadadeZar; and that in every of usame 11.0.2. these warres, he had the entire victorie. Neither is it likely, that these services occupied any longer time, because in those dayes and places there were no wintering campes in the but at convenient seasons of the yeare Kings went forth to warre, dispatching all with violence, rather than with temporizing; as maintaining their armies, partly upon the spoyle of the enemies countrey, partly upon the private provision which every soulder made for himselfe. The 17-yeare of David, in which he tooke Mephibosheth the son 6-18.

of Jonathan into his Court, appeareth to have passed away in quiet; and the yeare sollowing to have begun the warre with Ammon; but somewhat late in the end of Summer perhaps, it came to tryall of a battell (for Joab after the victorie, returned immediately to Jerusalem) the causes and preparations for that warre, taking up all the Summer. Davids personall expedition against the Aramites, wherein he brought all the timer. Davids personall expedition against the Aramites, wherein he brought all the timer. Davids personall expedition against the Aramites, wherein he brought all the timer. Davids personal expedition against the Aramites, wherein he brought all the timer. Davids personal expedition against the Aramites, wherein he butaries of Acadezer under his owne allegeance, appeares manifestly to have beene the butaries of Acadezer under his owne allegeance of succour from the Ammonites; all Syria, Moab and Idumæa being now at his owne devotion. By this reckoning it all Syria, Moab and Idumæa being now at his owne devotion. By this reckoning it must have been the 20. yeare of Davids reigne, and about the fiftieth of his life, in which he sent forth Joab to besiege Rabba, and finished the warre of Ammon: wherein also he fell out the matter of Uriabs wise. So one halfe of Davids reigne was very prospessed of the matter of Uriabs wise. So one halfe of Davids reigne was very prospessed in the other halfe hee felt great forrow, by the expectation, execution, and lad rous: in the other halfe hee felt great forrow, by the expectation, execution, and lad rous: in the other halfe hee felt great forrow, by the expectation, execution, and lad rous: in the other halfe hee felt great forrow, by the expectation, execution, and lad rous: in the other halfe hee felt great forrow, by the expectation, execution, and lad rous: in the other halfe hee felt great forrow, by the expectation of the halfe hee felt great for own by the expectation of the halfe hee felt great for own by the expectation.

Now very manifest it is, that in the yeare after the death of that child which was being gotten in adultery, Salemon was borne, who must needes therefore have beene nineteene years old or thereabout when he began to reign at the decease of his father, as being beyons old or thereabout when he began to reigned in all forty.

This account hath also good coherence with the following times of David, as may be collected out of ensuing Actions: for two years passed ere Absolute she his brother Am. 30 three yeares ere his father pardoned him, and two years more ere he came into the Kings presence. After this he prepared horses and men, and laid the foundation of his rebellion, which seemes to have been one years work. So the rebellion it selfe, with all that happened thereupon, as the Commotion made by Sheba, the death of Amasa and the rest, may well seeme to have been in the 30. year of Davids reigne.

Whether the three yeares of famine should be reckoned apart from the last years of war with the Philistims, or confounded with them, it were more hard than needfull conjecture. Plaine enough it is, that in the ten remaining years of David there was une sufficient, and to spare, both for the three yeares of famine, for foure yeares of warn, and for numbring the people, with the petitlence ensuing; as also for his ownells in significant, and disposing of the Kingdome. Yet indeed it seemes that the warre with the Philistims was but one yeares worke, and ended in three or foure fights, of which the two or three former were at Gob or Nob neare unto Gezer, and the last at Gath. This warre the Philistims undertooke, as it seemeth, upon considence gathered out of the mults in Israel, and perhaps emboldened by Davids old age: for he fainted now in the battell, and was afterwards hindered by his men from exposing himselfe unto dager any more. So David had sixe or seven yeares of rest, in which time it is likely that many of his great men of Warre dyed (being of his owne age) whereby the stiming spirit of Adonijab found little succour in the broken party of Joab the some of

At this time it might both truly be said by David to Salomon, Thou art a wise man; and 1 Kin.2.9.83.7. by Salomon to God, I am but a yound childe: for nineteene years of age might well agree with either of these two speeches. Deverthelesse there are some that gather out of Salomons professing himselfe achild, that he was but eleven yeares old when he began to reigne. Of these Rebbi Salmen feems the first Author, whom other of great learning and judgement have hereinfollowed: grounding themselves perhaps upon that which is said of Absolous rebellion, that it was after forty yeares, which they understood as yeares of Davids reigne. But whereas Rehoboam the fonne of Salomon was 41- yeares old when he began to reigne, it would follow hereby that his father had begotten him, being himselfe but achildeofs nine or ten yeares old; the difference betweenetheir ages, being no greater, if Salomon (who reigned 40 yeares) were but eleven yeares old when his reigne began. To avoyd this inconvenience, Josephus allowes 80 yeares of reigne to Solomon; a report sodilagreeing with the Scriptures, that it needes no confutation. Some indeed have in favour of this opinion, conftrued the words of Josephus, as if they included all the years of Salomons life. But by fuch reckoning he should have beene 40. yeares old at his Fathers death 5 and consequently should have beene borne long before his Father had worne Jerusalem; which is a manifest untruth. Wherefore the 40. years of Salomons writings.

remembred in Absolons rebellion, may either seeme to have reference to the space betweene Davids first anoynument, and the trouble which God brought upon him for his wickednesse, or perhaps be read (according to Fosephus, 7 heodoret, and the Latine translation) foure yeares; which passed between the returne of Absolon to Jerusalem, and his breaking out.

Here remaine of Salomons workes, the Proverbs, the Preacher, and the fone of Salomon. In the first hee teacheth good life, and correcteth manners; in the fecond, the vanity of humane nature; in the third, he fingeth as it were the Epithalamion of Christ and his Church. For the Book intituled, The wifedome of Saloman, (which some give unto Salomon, and some make the elder Philo the Author therof) Hierome and many others of the best learned make us thinke it was not Salomon that wroteit. Of Salomons Bookes of Invocations, and Inchantments to cure diseases, and expell of salomons hath written at large, though (as I conceive) rather out of his owner invention, or from fome uncertaine report, than truly.

Healfo speaketh of one Elia Zarus, who by the reote in Salomons ring disposses divers persons of evill spirits in the presence of Vespasian, and many others, which I will not stand to examine.

Certainely fo strange an example of humane frailtie hath never been read of as this King: who having received wifedome from God himfelfe, in honour of whom, and for his onely fervice, he built the first and most glorious Temple of the world: he that was made King of Ifrael and Judæa, not by the law of Nature, but by the love of God, and became the wifest, richest, and happiest of all Kings, did in the end, by the perswafion ofafew weake and wretched Idolatrous Women, forget and for fake the Lord of all the world, and the giver of all goodnesse, of which hee was more liberall to this King. than to any that ever the world had. Of whom Syracides writeth in this manner: Salomon reigned in a peaceable time, & was glorious for God made all quiet round about that he might build a house to his Name, and prepare the Sanctuary for ever; How wise wast thou in the jouth, and wast filled with understanding, as with a floud? Thy minde covered the whole tarth, and bath filled it with grave and darke sentences. Thy name went abroad in the Iles. and for thy peace thou wast beloved, &c. but thus hee concludeth: Thou didst bow thy bynesto Women, and wast overcome by thy body; thou didst staine thine honour, and half defiled thy posteritie, and hast brought wrath upon thy children, and felt sorrow for the folly, cap. 27.

Of the great acts and vertues of King Sefostris I have spoken already in the story of the Egyptian Princes: onely in this hee was reproved, that hee caused foure of his captive Egyptian Princes: onely in this hee was disposed to be seene, and to ride in triumph: Kings to draw his Caroch, when he was disposed to be seene, and to ride in triumph: one of which source, saith Eutropius, at such time as Sefostris was carried out to take the airce, cast his head continually backe upon the two soremost wheeles next him; which sefostris perceiving, asked him what he found worthy the admiration in that motion: to whom the captive King answered, that in those he beheld the instability of all worldly things; for that both the lowest part of the wheele was suddenly carryed about, and became the highest, and the upmost part was as suddenly turned downward, and under became the highest, and the upmost part was as fuddenly turned downward, and under other from the like servitude in the future. Of this Sesostris, and that hee could not be taken for Sesac, I have spoken at large in that part of the Egyptian Kings preceding.

of Rehoboam his beginnings: the defection of the ten Tribes, and Jeroboams Idolatrie.

Eboboam the Sonne of Salomon by Nahama an Ammonitess, now for ty yeares old, succeeded his Father Salomon, and was annointed a Sichem, where the ten Tribes of Israel were assembled: who attended a while the returne of Jeroboam as yet in Egypt, since he sledthisher to fearing Salomon. After his arrivall the people presented a Petition to Rehoboam, to be eased of those great Tributes laid on them by his father. Sic enim sirmius ei fore Imperium, si amari mallet quam metui; so should his Empire (faith Josephus) bee more assured, if hee desired rather to bee beloved than feared: whereof hee tooke three dayes to deliberate before his answer; of whom therefore it could not be said as of David, that hee was wiser than all his Teachers. For as of himselfe he knew not how to resolve, so had hee not the judgement to discensed counsels; which is the very test of wisedome in Princes, and in all men else. But not withstanding that hee had consulted with those grave and advised men, that served his Father, who perswaded him by all meanes to satisfie the multitude: hee was transported by his familiars and savourities, not onely to continue on the backes of his subject those burdens which greatly crusht them; but (vaunting fally of greatnesse exceeding his Fathers) he threatned in sharpe, or rather in terrible termes, to lay yet heavier, and more unsupportable loades on them. But as it appeared in the successe, those younger advisors greatly mistooke the nature of severity, which without the temper of clemency is no other than cruelty it selfe: they also were ignorant that it ought to bee used for the helpe, and not for the harme of subjects. For what is the strength of a King lest by his people: and what cords or fetters have ever lasted long, but those which have been rwifted and forged by love onely . His witleffe parafites could well judge of the Kings diffoolition: and being well learned therein, though ignorant in all things elfe; it fufficed and enabled them sufficiently for the places they held. But this answer of Rehoboamdid not a little advance Jeroboams defignes. For being fore-told by the Prophet A. chiah of his future advancement, these the Kings threats (changing the peoples love into furie) confirmed and gave courage to his hopes. For he was no fooner arrived, than elected King of Israel: the people cryed out, What portion have we in David? wee haveno inheritance in the Sonne of ishai. Now though themselves, even all the Tribes 2 Sam. 5.10 of Iffael, had consented to Davids anointing at Hebron the second time, acknowledgeing that they were his bones and his flesh: yet now after the manner of rebels, they forgatboth the bands of nature, and their dutie to God; and, as all alienate refolved hearts doe, they ferved themselves for the present, with impudent excuses. And now over-late. and after time, Rehoboam fent Adoram, one of the Taxers of the people, a man most hatefull to all his Subjects, to pacifie them: whom they instantly beare to death with Hones. Whereupon the King affrighted, got him from Sichem with all speede, and re- 1 King, 12.22. covered Jerusalem, where preparing to invade Israel, with an hundred and fourescore thouland chosen men, Shimei in the person of God commanding to the contrary, all was flayed for the present. In the meane time Jeroboam the new King fortified Sechem onthis fide, and Penuel on the other fide of Jordan; and fearing that the Union and exoercise of one Religion would also joyne the peoples hearts againe to the House of David, and having in all likelihood also promised the Egyptians to follow their Idolatry, heesetup two Calves of gold for the children of Israel to worship, impiously perswadine them that those were the Gods, or at least by these hee represented those Gods which delivered them out of Egypt: and refuling the service of the Levites, hee made Priefls fit for fuch gods. It must needes bee that by banishing the Levites which served Davidand Salomon through all Ifrael, Jeroboam greatly enriched himselfe: as taking into hishands all those Cities which were given them by Moles and Josua, for as it is written. The Levites left their suburbs, and their possession, and came to Juda, &c. This irreligious policie of Jeroboam (which was the foundation of an Idolatry that never could be rootedout untill Ifrael for it was rooted out of the Land) was by prophecy and miracles impuened sufficiently when it first began; but the affections maintaining it, were fo frong, that neither Prophecie nor Miracle could make them yeeld. Jeropoum could not 1 Kin, 13.4. bemoved now by the Authority of Ahia, who from the Lord had first promised unto him the Kingdome; nor by the withering of his owne hand as hee stretched it over the Altar, which also clave asunder according to the figne, which the man of God had given him by the commandement of God, who againe recovered and cured him of Verles. that defect; vet he continued as obstinate an Idolater as before, for he held it the safest Verse 6. course in policie to proceed as he had begun. This impious invention of Feroboam, who forfooke God, and the Religion of his forefathers, by God and his Ministers taught them, was by a moderne Historian compared with the policies of late Ages; observing well the practice of his Nation, being an Italian borne. Sie qui hodie (faith hee) politici vocantur & propria commoda prasentesq; utilitates sibitanquamultimum finem constituunt causam quam vocant status in capite omnium ponunt:pro ipsa tuenda, promovenda, conservanda,amplianda, nibil non faciendum putant. If they meane to oppresse their neighbour, to overturne all lanes of justice and honestie, if Religion it selfe must goe to wracke, yea if all rights of God andman must be violated, they will try all courses, be it right, bee it wrong, they will doe any thing; let all zoe to roine, what care they, so long as they may have what they would; as who hould say, there were no God that would offer to meddle in such matters, or had power to cor-

first it had done to bring in this vile Idolatry of the ten Tribes. Upon this ground And. Zin the Priest of Bethel counselled the Prophet Amos not to prophecie at Bethel; For (faith hee) it is the Kings Court. Upon this ground even Jehu that had massacred the Priests of Baal, in zeale for the Lord, yet would not in any wife depart from that poli. tique sinne of Jeroboam the sonne of Nebat, which made Israel to sinne. It was reason of state that perswaded the last famous French King Henry the fourth to change his Religi. on, yet the Protestants whom he forsooke, obeyed him, but some of the Papists whom hee followed, murdered him. So strongly doth the painted vizzor of wise proceeding delude even those that know the foule face of impietie lurking under it: and behold the wretched ends that have ever followed it; whereof Jehn and all the Kings of Ifraelhad and were themselves very great examples.

of Rehoboam his impietie; for which he was punished by Sefac: of his end and Contemporaries.

Hile Jeroboam was occupied in ferting up his new Religion, Rehaboamon the other fide, having now little hope to recover the Provinces lost, strengthened the principall places remaining with all endeavour; for he formed and victualled fifteene Cities of Juda and Benjamin: not that he feared Jeroboam alone, it but the Egyptians, to whom Jereboam had not only fastned himselfe, but with all invited them to invade Judæa: laying perchance before them the uncountable riches of David and Salomon, which might now be easily had, seeing ten of the twelve Tribes were Rvolted, and become enemies to the Judzans. So as by those two waies (of late yearsoften trodden) to wir, change of Religion, and invitation of forraigne force, Jeroboamhoped to settle himselfe in the seate of strael, whom yet the powerfull God for his life. larry in few yeares after rooted out, with all his. And therefore in the fifth yeare of his reigne, Sefac or Shifhac before spoken of, being now King of Egypt, and with whom, as well Adad of Idum 22, as Jerobeam, were familiar, and his instruments; entred Jugaa with twelve thousand Chariots, and threeson thousand Hotse, besides foot men, which Josephus numbers at foure hundred thousand This Armie was compounded of foure Nations: Egyptians, Lubæans, Succeans, and Cusites. The Lubæans were Lybæans, the next bordering Region to Egypt, on the wellfide. The Cufires were of Petræa, and of the defart Arabia, which afterward followed Zerah against Asa King of Juda. The Succeans according to Junion, were of Succoth, which fignifieth Tents: he doth suppose that they were the Troglodia, mentioned often in Plane, Prolomie, and other Authors. The Troglodites inhabited not fund from the bankes of the red Sea, in 22 degrees from the line Northward, about fixe hundred english miles from the best and Maritimate part of Egypt: and therefore I doeng thinke that the Succims or Succei were those Trogloditæ, but rather those Arabians which Prolomie cals Arabes Ægypiii, or Ichthyophagi, which poffesse that part of Egypt between the mountaines called Alabastrini, and the red Sea, far nearer Egypt, and realist to be levied than those removed Savages of the Trogloditæ.

With this great and powerfull Army, Sefac invaded Judæa, and (befides many other strong Cities) wan Jerusalem it selfe; of which, and of the Temple, and Kings house, he took the spoyle, carrying away (besides other treasures) the golden shields which men had made, in imitation of those which David recovered from Adadezer, in the Syrian war:these Rehobeam supplyed with Targets of braffe, which were fit enough to guard a King of his quality: whom Syracides calleth, The foolishnesse of the people.

From this time forward the Kings of Egypt claimed the foveraignty of Judges, and heldthe Jewes as their Tributaries: Sefac, as it seemes, rendring up to Rehoboam his plant ces on that condition. So much may be gathered out of the Word of God, where premi fing the deliverance of Juda after their humiliation, he doth not with standing leave the under the yoke of Egypt, in these words: Neveribelesse they (to wit, the Judzans) beth his servants, that is the servants of Sesac.

After this overthrow and dishonour, Rehoboam reigned twelve yeeres, and his losses received by selae , notwithstanding , he continued the watre against Jeroboam all his life time. After his death Jeroboam governed Ifrael foure yeeres.

Rehoboam lived 5 8. yeers, and reigned 17. his story was written at large by Shemeialo and Hidden the Prophets, but the same perished with that of Nathan, and the rest.

With Rehoboam, Archippus, & Tersippus, the third and fourth Archontes or Governors for lifeafter Codrus, governed in Athens. Abdastrartus, or Abstrartus, in Tvre. Doriabouthe fift of the Heraclidae in Sparta, according to Eusebius (others make him the Euseb. Chronic fix and Priminas the fourth in Corinth. Over the Latines reigned Sylvius Alba, Sylvius Ary, the fourth and fift of the Sylvii.

About the 12.0f Rehoboam, Abdastrartus King of Tyre was murthered by his Nurses forts, or foster-brethren, the elder of which usurped the Kingdome twelve yeeres. Towards his latter times Periciades, or Pyrethiades, began to govern Affyria, the 34. King thereof: and not long after Aftartus, the son of Baleastartus, recovered the Kingdome of Tyre from the Usurpers.

6. III.

of the great battaile betweene Jeroboam and Abia, with a Corollarie of the examples of Gods judgements.

Bijabthe some of Rehoboam, inherited his Fathers Kingdome, and his vices. He raifed an Armie of foure hundred thousand, with which hee invaded Jeroboam, who encountred him with a double number of eight hundred housand: Both Amies joyned neere to the Mount Ephraim, where Jeroboam was utterly overthrowne. and the strength of Israel broken: for there fell of that side five hundred thousand; the greatest overthrow that ever was given or received of those Nations. Abijah being now mafter of the field, recovered Bethel, Jeshanah, and Ephron. Soon after which discomfiure, Jeroboam died: who reigned in all 22. yeers. Abijab, the better to strengthen himfelfe, entred into league with Hefion, the third of the Adads of Syria; as may bee ga- a Chron 16.22. theredout of the 2. of Chren. he raigned but three yeeres, and then died : the particulars of his acts were written by Iddo the Prophet, as some part of his Fathers were.

Herewee fee how it pleased God to punish the sinnes of Salomon in his son Rehoboam: first, by an Idolator and Traitor: and then by the successor of that Egyptian, whose daughter Salomon had maried, therby the better to affure his estate, which while he ferved God, was by God affured against all and the greatest neighbouring Kings; and when he for fooke him, it was torne a funder by his meanest Vassals. Not that the Father wanted strength to defend him from the Egyptian Sefac; For the son Abijah was able to levie foure hundred thou fand men, and with the fame number he overthrew eight hundred thousand Israelites, and slew of them five hundred thousand; God giving spirit, courage, and invention, when, and where it pleafeth him. And as in those times the cases were exprest, why it pleased God to punish both Kings and their People: the fame being both before, and at the instant delivered by Prophets; so the same just God, who liveth and governeth all things for ever, doth in these our times give victory, courage, and discourage, raise, and throw downe Kings, Estates, Cities, and Nations, for the same offences which were committed of old, and are committed in the present: for which reason, in these and other the afflictions of Israel, alwayes the causes are set downe, that they might be as prefidents to fucceeding ages. They were punished with famine in Davids time for three yeeres, For Saul and by bloudy bouse, egc. And David 2 Sam 21, 1. towards his latter end suffered all forts of afflictions, and forrowes in effect, for uriah. Salomon had ten Tribes of twelve torne from his son for his Idolatrie. Rehoboam was spoiled of his riches and honour by sefac of Egypt, because the people of Juda mades images, high places, and groves, &c. and because they suffered Sodomites in the Land. Jeroboam was punished in himselfe and his posterity, for the golden Calves that hee erected. Joram had all his fonnes flaine by the Philiftims, and his very bowels torne out of his body by an excoriating flixe, for murthering his brethren. Ahab and Jezebel were flaine, the bloud of the one, the body of the other caten with dogges. for the false accusing and killing of Naboth. So also hath God punished the same and the like finnes in all after-times, and in these our dayes by the same famine, plagues, warre, losse, vexation, death, sicknesse, and calamities; howsoever the wife men of the world raife these effects no higher than to second causes, and such other accidents. which, as being next their eyes and eares, feeme to them to worke every alteration than happeneth.

6. I V. of Asa and his Contemporaries.

Abijah succeeded Asa, who enjoyed peace for his first ten yeeres, in which time hee established the Church of God, breaking downe the altars dedicated to strange gods, with their images, cutting downether groves, and taking away their high places. He also spared not his owne mother, who was an Idolatres 2 Chro 15.16 but deposing her from her regency, brake her Idoll, stampt it, and burnt it. Hee also fortified many Cities, and other places, providing (as provident Kings do) for the tronbles of war in the leasure of peace. For not long after hee was invaded by Zerab, who then commanded all the Arabians bordering Judæa, and with fuch a multitude entred the territorie of Asa, as (for any thing that I have read) were never assembled of that Chron 14.9. Nation, either before or fince. For it is written, that there came against the Judains. Zerab of Æthiopia, with an hoste of ten hundred thousand, and three hundred Chart. ots, which Asa encountred with an Armie of five hundred and sourcescore thousand levied out of those two Tribes of Juda and Benjamin, which obeyed him, and with which hee overthrew this fearefull multitude, and had the spoile both of their Cities and Campes.

2 Chron. 14.

That this Zerah was not an Æthiopian, I have * proved already, and were it butthe books, 4.4. length betweene Æthiopia and Judæa, and the strong flourishing Regions of Egypt in item, 68. $.10. terjacent (who would not fuffer a million of strangers to pass through them) it were file ficient to make it appeare how foolish the opinion is, that these invaders were Æthionans. But in that the Scriptures acknowledge that Gerar was belonging to Zerah, andthe cities thereabouts were spoiled by the Judæans, in following their victory, as places be longing to Zerab, and that all men know that Gerar standeth upon the torrent of Beson which David past over when he surprized the Amalekites or Arabians; this provether ficiently, that Zerah was leader of the Arabians, & that Gerar was a frontier township ding on the uttermost South-border of all Judæa, from all parts of Æthiopia sixehundred miles. Also the spoiles which As tooke, as the cattell, camels, and sheepe, whereof he facrificed five thousand, shew them to be Arabians adjoyning, and not far off and not unknown Æthiopians. And if it bee objected that these desart countries canhardly yeeld a million of men fit for the wars, I answer, that it is as like that Arabia Petranand the Defart, which compasse two parts of the holy Land, should yeeld ten hundred thou-Sand as that two Tribes of the twelve, should arme five hundred & fourescore thousand. Besides, it answereth to the promise of Godto Abraham, that these Nations shouldesceede in number; for God spake it of Ismael, that hee would make him fruitfull, and multiply him exceedingly, that hee should beget twelve Princes, &c.

Baalha a King of Israel began to reigne in the third of Asa, and fearing the greatness of Afa after his great victory, entertained Benhadad King of Syria, of the race of Adadely, z Chro. 16. v.t. to joyne with him against Asa; and to the end to block him up, he fortified Rama, which lieth in the way from Jerusalem towards Samaria.

This warre began according to the letter of the Scriptures in the 26. veere of Afahis reigne: but because in the first of Kings the 16. it is said that Baasha died in the 26. yeeres of Afa: therefore could not Baasha begin this war in the 35 of Afa his reign, but in the 35. veer of the division of Juda & Israel; for so many yeers it was from the first of Rehibiam, who reigned 17. yeers, to the 16. of Asa. It may seeme strange, that Asa being able to bring into the field an Army of five hundred & fourescore thousand good Souldiers, did not eafily drive away Baasha, and defeat him of his purposes, the victories of Abia against Jeroboam, and of Afa himselse against Zerah, being yet freshin minde, which might well have emboldened the men of Juda, and asmuch disheartened the enemies Questionlesse there were some important Circumstances, omitted in the Text, which caused Asa to fight at this time with money. It may be that the imployment of so many hundred thousands of hands, in the late service against Zerah, had caused many mens private businesses to lye undispatched, whereby the people being now intentive to the culoure of their lands & other trades, might be unwilling to ftir against the Israelites, choofing rather to winke at apparent inconvenience, which the building of Rama would hring upon them in after-times. Such backwardnesse of the people might have deterred Ala from adventuring himself with the least part of his forces, & committing the success into the hands of God. Howfoever it were, he took the treasures remaining in the temple, with which he waged Benhadad the Syrian against Baa/ha, whose employments Benhadad readily accepted, and brake off confederacy with Baalha. For the Israelites were hisborderers and next neighbours, whom neither himselfe (after his invasion) nor his fincessfors after him ever gave over, till they had made themselves masters of that Kingdome. So Benhadad being now entred into Nepthalim, without refistance, hee spoyled 2 Chron. 16. 47 divers principall Cities thereof, & inforced Baasha to quit Rama, & to leave the same to As with all the materials which hee had brought thither, to fortifie the same: which King 15 done, Benhadad, who loved neither party, being loden with the spoiles of Israel, and the reasures of Juda, returned to Damascus. After this, when Hanani the Prophet reprehended Afa, in that he now relyed on the strength of Syria, and did not rest himselfe on the favour and affiftance of God, he not only caused Hanani to be imprisoned, but he began toburden and oppresse his people, and was therefore strooken with the grievous paines ofthe gout in his feet, wherewith after he had been two yeeres continually tormented, 2 Chron 16, hegaveup the ghost when he had reigned 41. yeeres.

There lived with Afa, Agefilam the fixt of the Heraclida, & Bacis the fift King of the famerace in Corinth, of whom his fucceffors were afterward called Bacidæ: Aftartus, & Astarimus were Kings in Tyre. Astarimus took revenge on his brother Phelletes, for the Euges. in the case murther of Ithobalus Priest of the goodeste Astarta, whom Salomon in dotage worshipped. Mys and Capys ruled the Latines: Pirithiades & Ophrateus the Affvrians: Tersippus and Phorbas the Athenians : Chemmis reigned in Egypt; who dying in the 36. yeere of A/a, left Cheops his successour, that reigned fifty fixe yeeres, even to the 16. of of the great alteration falling out in the ten Tribes during the reigne of Afa.

TN the reigne of Asa the Kingdome of Israel felt great and violent commotions which might have reduced the ten Tribes unto their former allegeance to the house of David, if the wisedome of God had not otherwise determined. The wickednesse of Jeroboam had, in his latter dayes, the sentence of heavie vengeance laid uponit, by the mouth of Ahia, the same Prophet which had foretold the division of Ha rael, for the finne of Salomon, and his reigne over the ten Tribes. One fon Jerobo-4m hadamong others, in whom onely God found so much piety, as (though it sufficed not to with-holde his wrath from that Family) it procured unto him a peaceable ends an honourable testimony of the peoples love, by their generall mourning and lamentationathis death, and (wherein he was most happy) the favourable approbation of God himselfe.

After the losse of this good son, the ungodly father was soon taken away: a misetable creature, so conscious of his vile unthanke sulnesse to God, that he durst not sufferhis owne name to bee used in consulting with an holy Prophet, affured of the ruine hanging over him and his, yea of Gods extreme harred; yet forbearing to destroy those acturfed Idols that wrought his confusion. So loath he was to forfake his worldly wifedome, when the world was ready to forfake him, and all belonging to him, his hatefull memory excepted.

Nadab the fon of Jeroboam, reigned in the second and third yeeres of Asa, which are teckoned as two yeeres, though indeed his fathers last yeere of two and twenty did run along (how farre is uncertaine) with the second of Asa, whose third yeere was the first of Baasha, so that perhaps this Nadab enjoyed not his Kingdome one whole yeere. Hee King 15.25. ddnot alter his fathers courses, neither did God alter his sentence. It seemes that hee little feared the judgements denounced against his fathers house for as a Prince that was secure of his owne estate, he armed all Israel against the Philistims, & besieged one was secure or mis owne citate, it arms and the people were offended with his ill of their Townes. There (whether it were so, that the people were offended with his ill or their 1 ownes. There (whether a west of the five hundred thousand under Jers. fuccesse, and recalled to mind their grievous losse of five hundred thousand under Jers. nuccene, and recance to mind the family to the Nation; or whether by some particular indiscretion, he exasperated them) saine he was by Baasha, whom the Army did willingly ancretion, ne exampliated them. Ela was as much an Idolater as his father: and withall a riotous person. Heesenan one compleat. Army against Gibbethon, the same town of the Philistims, before with Nadab the son of Jerobeam perished; but he sate at home the whilest, feasting & drinking with his Mi. nions, whereby hee gave such advantage against himselfe, as was not neglected. Zimi, an ambitious man, remaining with the King at Tirza, finding his Master so dissolute, and his behaviour so contemptible, conceived hope of the like fortune as Baasha hadfound, by doing as Baasha had done. Wherefore he did set upon Ela in his drunkennesse, and flew him. Prefently upon which fact, hee stiled himselfe King of Israel: and beganing reigne with massacring all the house of Baasha; extending his cruelty not onely to his children, and kinsfolke, but unto all his friends in Tirza. These newes were quickly blowne to the Campe at Gibbethon, where they were not welcommed according Zimri his expectation. For the Souldiers in stead of proclaiming him King, proclaiming med him Traitor : and being led by Omri, whom they faluted King, they (quittingthe fiege of Gibbethon) presented themselves before Tirza; which in short space they may feeme to have forced. Zimri wanting strength to defend the City, not courage tokens himselfe from falling alive into his enemies hands, did set fire on the Palace, consuming it and himselfetogether to ashes. Seven dayes he is said to have reigned: accounting to is most likely) to the time that Omri was proclaimed in the Campe. For Zimri was allo an idolater, Walking in the way of Jeroboam; & therfore is likely to have had more ime wherein to declare himselfe, than the reigne of seven dayes, and those consumed purly in murthering the friends of Baasha, partly in seeking to have defended his ownlike 1 King. 16.19. After the death of Ela, there arose another King to oppose the faction of Omri; where by it may seeme, that Zimri had made his party strong, as being able to set upance head, who doubtleffe would never have appeared, if there had not beene ready to is hand, some strength, not unlikely to resist and vanquish the Army, which maintained Omri. How long this Tibni, the new Competitor of Omri, held out, I doe not finds onely it appeares that his fide was decayed, and so he died, leaving no other Successia than his concurrent.

5. VI.

A conjecture of the causes hindering the re-union of Israel with Juda, which might have beene effected by these troubles.

Nie manthat shall consider the state of Israel in those times, may justly words how it came to passe, that either the whole Nation, wearied with the calamitis A salready suffered under these unfortunate Princes, and with the present civil warres, did not returne to their ancient Kings, and re-unite themselves with the might of yeelding, or burning numeric, the other to languilla way, and so honourable. To say the recurring the had yet committed any offence, as appeares by his confictor have recourse unto a remedy, so sure, so ready, and so honourable. To say the recurring out of Egypt, like one that was known to have endpred wrong, having to offered any.

the cause of all things) unlesse it could be proved, that he had forbidden Asa to deale in that businesse, as he forbad Rehoboam to force the rebellious people to obedience. That the restraint laid by God upon Rehoboam, did only binde his hands from attempting the suppression of that present insurrection, it appeares by the Warre continued betweene Ifrael and Juda, so many years following: wherein Abia so farre prevailed, that he wan agreat bataile, and recovered fome Townes belonging to the other Tribes, which hee annexed to his own Dominion. Wherefore we may boldly look into the fecond causes. moving the People and Leaders of the ten Tribes, to suffer any thing under new upflants, rather than to cast their eyes upon that Royall house of David, from which the fuccession of five Kings in lineal defeent, had taken away all imputation, that might formerly have beene laid upon the meane beginnings thereof. To thinke that omre had prevented his Competitors in making peace with Ash, were a conjecture more bold than probable. For omri was not onely an Idolater, but did worfe than all that were be- 1. King, 16.25; forehim; which as it might ferve alone to prove, that Afa, being a godly King, would not adhere to him, so the course which he prosessed to take at the very first, of revenging the massacre committed upon the family and friends of Bassha, (Afa his mortall enemy) gives manifest reason, why Zimri, who had wrought that great execution, should more juffly than he have expected the friendship of Juda in that quarrel. Wherfore, in fearching out the reason of this backwardnes in the ten Tribes (which was such that they may feemeto have never thought upon the matter) to fubmit themselves to their true Princes; it were not amiss to examine the causes, moving the people to revenge the death of Ela anidle drunkard, rather than of Nadab the for of Jeroboam, who followed the wars in person, as a man of spirit & courage. Surely it is apparent, that the very first defection of the ren Tribes, was (if we look upon humane reason) occasioned by desire of breaking that heavie yoke of bondage where with Salomon had galled their neckes. Their defire wasto have a King that should not oppresse them; not to have no King at all. And therforewhen the arrogant follie of Reheboam had caused them to renounce him, they did immediatlychoofe Jeroboam in his fread, as a man likely to afford that liberty unto thems for which he had contended in their behalfe. Neither were they (as it feemes) herein altogether deceived. For his affectation of popularity appears in his building of decayed Towers, and in the institution of his new devised idolatry; where he told the people, that it was too much for them, to travaile fo far as to Jerusalem. But whether it were so that his moderation, being voluntary, began to cease, towards the latter end of his reign, and in the reigne of his fon, when long time of possession had confirmed his title, which at the first was onely good by courtesse of the people: or whether the people (as often happens in fuch cases) were more offended by some prerogatives of a King, that hee still realned in his owne hands, than pleased with his remission of other burdens: it is cleerly apparent, that the whole army of all Ifrael joyned with Baasha, taking in good part the death of Nadab, and eradication of Jeroboams house.

Now the reign of Baaha himfelf, was (for ought that remaineth in writing of it) every way unfortunate; his labour and cost at Rama was cast away; the other side of his Kingdom harried by the Syrians; neither did he win that one town of Gibbethon from the Philistims, but left that businesse to his son, who likewise appeares an unprofitable luggard. Wherefore it must needs bee, that the favour of the people toward the house of Baasha grew from his good forme of Civill government, which happely he reduced Damore temperate method than Jeroboam ever meant to doe. And furely he that shalf ake pains to look into those examples, which are extant of the different courses, held by he Kings of Ifrael and Juda, in administration of justice, will finde it most probable, that ponthis ground it was that the ten Tribes continued to averfe from the line of David; stothinke all adversity more tolerable, than the weighty Scepter of that house. For hedeath of Josb and Shimes was indeede by them deferved; yet in that they suffered it thour forme of judgement, they fuffered like unto men innocent. The death of A-

on his brethren, & upon fundry of his greatest men; as also Joash did so put to death Za. 2 Chron, 24.21, chariah the fon of Jehojada, who had made him King, even in the court of the house of the Lord: and Manasses did shed innocent blond exceeding much, till hee replenished ferufalem from corner to corner : and this was imputed to him as another fault; befides his 2 King-21. 16.

sinne, wherewith he made Juda to sinne. Contrariwise, among the Kingsof Israel we finde no monument of fuch arbitrary proceeding, unlesse perhaps the words of Jehoram the Tonne of Abab (which were but words) may be taken for an instance, when he said, God doe so mee, and more also, if the head of Elisha the sonne of Shaphat shall stand on him this day: whereby it is not plaine whether hee meant to kill him without more adoe, orto have him condemned as a false Prophet, that had made them hold out against the Aramites, till they were faine to eate their owne children; which he thought a fufficientar. gument to prove, that it was not Gods purpose to deliver them. The death of Nabuh Theweth rather the liberty which the Ifrael ites enjoyed, than any peremptory execution of the Kings will. For Naboth did not feare to frand upon his owne right, though 1. hab were even ficke for anger; neither was hee for that cause put to death, as uponcommandement, but made away by conspiracie, the matter being handled after a judiciall forme, which might give fatisfaction to the people, ignorant of the device, though to God it could not.

The murther of the Prophet is continually ascribed to Jezabel, an impudent woman, 10 and not unto the King her husband. Neither is it certaine, that there was no Law made whereby their lives were taken from them; but certaine it is, that the people being idolaters, were both pleased with their death, & laboured in the execution. So that thedoings of the Kings of Juda (fuch as are registred) prove them to use a more absolute maner of command, than the Kings of the ten Tribes. Neither doe their sufferings witnessethe contrary. For of those which reigned over Juda, from the division of the Kingdome, to the captivity of the ten Tribes, three were flaine by the people, and two weredenieds buriall amongst their ancestors. Yea, the death of Ahazia and his brethren, slaineby it bu, with the destruction of all that Royall seed of Athalia, did not (for ought that we can 3 read) stirre up in the people any such thirst of revenge, as might by the suddennesseand uniformity testifiethe affection to bee generall, and proceeding from a loving remembrance of their Princes: unlesse we should thinke that the death of Athalia, after seven yeeres reigne, were occasioned rather by the memory of her ill purchasing, than by the present sense of her tyrannical abusing the government, whereon she had seised, Onthe other fide, fuch of the Kings of Ifrael as perished by treason (which were seven of the twenty) were all flaine by conspiracie of the great men, who aspired by treason whe Crowne: the people being so far from embruing their hands in the bloud of their Soveraignes, that (after Nadab) they did never forbeare to revenge the death of their Kings, when it lay in their power; nor approve the good successe of treason, unless feare compelled them. So that the death of two Kings, being throughly revenged upon the other two, namely the death of Ela and Zacharia, upon Zimri and Shallum, who traite roully got and uturped, for a little while, their places; onely three of the seven remaine, whose ends how the people tooke, it may be doubtfull. Though indeede it is precisely faid of the flaughter, committed on Ababs children by Jehu, that the people durftnot 2 King .10.4. fight with him that did it , because they were exceedingly affraid: and the same scare might be in them at the death of Peka, whose history (as others of that time) is cursorily passed over. The like may be pronounced, and more absolutely, of the Kings of Eng. land, that never any of them perished by fury of the people, but by treason of such as did fucceed them; neither was there any motive urging fo forcibly the death of King Edward and King Richard when they were in prison, as feare lest the people should stime in their quarrell. And certainly (howfoever all that the Law cals treason, bee interpreted, as tending finally to the Kings destruction) in those treasonable insurrections of the yulgar, which have here most prevailed, the fury of the multitude hath quench

ed it selfe with the bloud of some great Officers; no such rebellions; howsoe

ver wicked and barbarous otherwise, thirsting after the ruine of their natural So veraigne, but rather forbearing the advantages gotten upon his Royall perfon which if any man impute unto groffe ignorance, another may more charitably, and thinke, more truely, ascribe to a reverent affection. Wherefore that fable of Briares, who, being loofened by Pallas, did with his 100. hands give affiftance to Jupiter, when all the rest of the gods conspired against him, is very fitly expounded by Sir Francis Racon, as fignifying that Monarches need not to feare any curbing of their abfolutenes by mighty subjects, as long as by wisedome they keep the hearts of the people, who will bee fure to come in on their fide. Though indeed the Storie might very well have home the fame interpretation, as it is rehearfed by Homer, who tells us that Pallus was one of the conspiracie, and that Thetis alone did marre all their practice, by loosening Briareus. For a good forme of government sufficeth by it selfe to retaine the people, not onely without affiftance of a laborious Wit, but even against all devices of the greatest and threwdest Politicians: every Sheriffe and Constable, being sooner able to arme the multitude, in the Kings behalfe, than any over-weening Rebell, how mighty foever, can against him.

This declaration of the peoples love, being seldome found in Juda, makes it very likely, that the rule it selfe of government there was such, as neither gave occasion of contentment unto the subjects, nor of confidence in their good affection to the Kings. Upon which reasons it may feem that the multitude was kept usually disarmed. For otherwife it would have been ealmost impossible, that Athalia the sister of Ahab, a stranger to the Royall bloud of Juda, should by the onely authority of a Queene-mother have de-Aroyed all the feed of David, and usurped the Kingdome very neere 7. veeres, without finding any resistance. Yea when Jehojada the high Priest had agreed with the Captains and principall men of the Land to fet up Joash their lawfull King, whereunto the whole nation were generally well affected; hee was faine to give to these Captaines and their men, the speares and the shields that were King Davids, & were in the house of the Lord. But we need not enter into fuch particulars. Questionlesse, the Tribes which thought obedience to their Princes to be a part of their duty toward God, would endure much more with patience, than they which had Kings of their owne choice or admission, holding the Crowne by a more uncertaine tenure.

And this, in my opinion, was the reason, why the ten Tribes did never seeke to returne totheir ancient Lords: but after the destruction of their fixe first Kings, which died in the reigne of Afa, admitted a seventh of a new family, rather than they would consubect themselves with those of Juda and Benjamin, under a more honourable, but more heavie yoke.

So Asa having seen the death of 7. Kings of Israel, died himselfe after one and fortie yeeres reigne, leaving Jehosaphat his sonne to deale with Ahab the sonne of omri, who was the eighth King over the ten Tribes.

§. VII. of Jehosaphat and his contemporaries.

to Teholaphat, who succeeded Asa, was a Prince religious and happy; hee destroyed all the Groves, Altars, and high places dedicated to idolatry, and fent teachers to all places and people wanting instruction; he recovered the tribute due unto him by the Arabians and Philittims: from the one he had filver, from the other sheepe & goates to the number of fifteene thousand & foure hundred. The numbers of men of war were more than admirable; for it is written that Adnah had the command of three hundred thousand, Jehohanam of two hundred and fourescore thousand, and Amasia of two hun- 2 Chron- 17. dred thousand; also that he had, besides these in Benjamin, of those that bare shields, which we call Targetiers, and of Archers under Eliada, two hundred thousand, & under the commandement of Jehozabad a hundred and fourescore thousand: which numbred together make eleven hundred and fixty thousand, all which are faid to have waited upon the King befides his garrifons.

That Juda & Benjamin, a territory not much exceeding the Countie of Kent, should multer eleven hundred and fixtie thousand fighting men, it is very strange, and the number farre greater than it was found upon any other view. Joab in Davids time found five hundred thousand: Rehoboam found but an hundred and fourescore thousand: Abia 2 Sam 14. toure hundred and eight thousand: As five hundred and fourescore thousand: Amazia inrolled all that could beare armes, & they amounted to three hundred thousand. Surely, whereas it is written that when news was brought to Jehofaphae that Moab & Ammon were entred his territory to the West of Jordan, and that their numbers were many, he feared (to wit) the multitude; it is not likely that he would have feared even the army of Xerxes, if he could have brought into the field 11. hundred and 60. thousand fighting men, leaving all his strong Cities manned. I am therefore of opinion (referring my selfe to better judgement) that these numbers specified in the second of Chronicles the 17-distributed to severall Leaders, were not all at one time, but that the 300-thousand under Adnab, and the 200 and fourescore thousand under Jehohanam, were afterward commanded and mustered by Amasiah, Eliada, and Jehosabad: for the grosse and totallismon in that place fet downe, as it was under the other Kings formerly named. Againe, as the aides which Jeholaphat brought to Ahab did not shew that he was a Prince of extraordi nary power, so the Moabites & Ammonites which he feared, could never make the one halfe of those numbers, which he that commanded least among Jehosaphats Leaders had

This mighty Prince, notwithstanding his greatnesse, yet he joyned in friendship with Abab King of Ifrael, who had married that wicked woman Jezabel. Him Jehofaphas vifi. ted at Samaria, and caused his son Joran to marry Athalia, this Achabs daughter.

Ahab perswaded Jehosaphas to affist him in the Warre against the Syrians, who held the City of Ramoth Gilead from him, & called together foure hundred of his Prophers or Baalites, to foretell the fuccesse : who promised him victory. But Jehosaphas beleeved # nothing at all in those diviners, but resolved first of all to conferre with some one Prophet of the Lord God of Israel. Hereupon Ached made answer that he had one called Michaiah, but he hated that Prophet, because he alwayes foretold of evill, and never of any good towards him. Yet Michaiah was fent for to the King; but by the way the melfenger prayed him to consent with the rest of the Prophets, and to promise victory unto them as they did. But Michaiab spake the truth, and repeated his vision to both the Kings, which was, that God asked who shall perswade Ahab, that hee may goe up and falls Ramoth Gilead? to whom a spirit that stood before the Lord answered, that hee would enter into his Prophets, & be in them a false spirit to delude. For as it is said by Christ. Non enim vos est is qui loquimini, sed spiritus patris vestre loquitur in vobis : It is not you that speake, but the Spirit of your Father speakes in you: so in a contrary kinde did the devillinthe Prophets of Baal, or Satan, incourage Achab to his destruction. Andas. Martyr upon this place well observeth, these evill spirits are ministers of Gods vengeance, & are used as the hangmen and tormentors, which Princes sometime imploy. For as it pleaseth God by his good Angels, to save & deliver from destruction, of which the Scriptures have many examples: so on the contrary, it is by the evill that hee punisheth and destroyeth; both which are said to performe the will of their Creator, licet noncedem animo. Ecclesiasticus remembreth a second fort of malignant natures, but they are every-where visible. There are spirits, faith he, created for vengeance, which in their rigour lay on fure itroakes. In the time of destruction they shew forth their power, and po accomplish the wrath of him that made them.

Now Michaias having by this his revelation greatly displeased the King, & the Prophets, whose spirit he discovered, was stroken by Zidkiah one of Baals Prophets, and by Achab himselfe committed to prilon: where hee appointed him to bee referved and fid with bread of affliction till he returned in peace. But Michaiah, not fearing to reply, and fwered, If thou returne in peace, the Lord hath not spoken by mee. Nevertheleffe Achib went on in that warre, and was wounded to death. Jehosaphat returned to Jerusalem, where he was reprehended by Jehn the Prophet for affifting an idolatrous Prince, and

2 Chron'18. one that hated God.

After this the Aramites or Damascens, joyned with the Moabites, Ammonites & Idar mæans to invade Judæa: who passe Jordan & encamp at Engaddis& when Jehosaphat gathered his army, the prophet Jaha Ziel foretold him of the victory, which should be obtain ned without any bloud-fried of his part: & fo when Jehosaphat approached, this affembly of Nations, the Ammonites & Moabites, disagreeing with the Idum wans, & quarrelling for fome causes among themselves, those of Ammon & Moab set upon the Idum zars, & brake them utterly: which done, they also invaded each other; in which broile Jehoseph arriving, took the spoile of them all without any loss of his part, as it was foretolde pro-mifed by God. Notwithstanding this victory, Jehosaphat, forgetting that he was formerly reprehended for affifting an Idolatrous King, did notwithstanding joyin with Ochazithe fon of Achab, in preparing a Fleet to fend to Ophir, hoping of the like returne which Salomon had: but as Eleizer the Propher foretold him, his ships perished, & were broken in the port of Ezion Gaber, and so that enterprize was overthrowne. Vet he taketh part with Jehoram the brother of OchoZiao, against the Moabites, with which Kings of Juda & Ifrael the Edomites joyne their forces, not forgetting it feemes. that the Moabites, affifted by the Ammonites, had not long before destroyed their army. The Moabites, Subjects to David & Salomon, for faking the Kings of Juda, gave themfelves for vasfals to Jeroboam, & so they continued to his successors till the death of Achab: but Jehosaphat, notwithstanding the Idolatry of his Colleague, yet as it seemeth he was drawne into this war, both to bee avenged of the Moabites for their defection from Inda to Ifrael, as also because they had lately joined themselves with the Syrians against Josephat, & thirdly, to punish their double rebellion who first for fook Juda, & now Israel Both Kings resolved to passe by the way of Idumæa, thereby the better to assure that Nation; for we find that both Moab, Ammon & Edom were all in the field together at Enoaddi against Jehosaphat. But whether they had then declared themselves against Jeholaphat, it is not certaine; for in the 2. of Chron. 11. verf. 8. it is written, that in the time of Jehoram the fon of Jehosaphat, Edom rebelled: and therefore it seemeth to mee that the Edomites, when they were flain by Moab & Ammon, not finding themselves satisfaction fiedin fuch conditions as they required, offered to turne from them, & to joyne themfelves with the army of Juda. For, that they were numbred among the enemies of Jeho-Caphat, it is plaine in the 2. of Chron. the 20. and as plain c. 21. v. 8. that they were not declared, nor had made them a King, till Jehofaphats death. Now in the passage of these Kinestowards Moab, whether it were by the extraordinary heat of the yeer, or whether the ldum wans having a purpose to rebell, missed the army of Juda & Israel, with intenc to infeeble them for want of water; true it is, that they suffered the same, if not a greater thirl than the armies of Crassus & M. Antonius did in their Parthian expeditions; and hadinall likelihood utterly perished, had not Elisha taught them to cut trenches wherinto the water fprang, by which not onely Jehofaphat and his army, but Jehoram King of Israel an Idolater was relieved: the great mercy & godnes of God having ever been prone to fave the evill for the good, whereas he never destroyed the good for the evill.

The miserable iffue of this warre, and how Moab burnt his son, or the son of the King z king 3 of Edom, for facrifice, on the rampire of his owne City, I have already written in the life of Feberam among the Kings of Ifrael. Jehofaphat reigned 25. yeers and died; he was 2 Chron. 201 butted in the valley of Jehosaphat, and a part of the Pyramis set over his grave is yet to be seen , saith Brochard. His acts are written at large by Jehu the son of Hanani.

There lived with Jehosaphat, Ophratenes in Astyria, Capetus & Tiberinus Kings of the Albans in Italy; of the latter the river Tiber (formerly Albula) tooke name.

In Jehosaphats time also ruled Mecades or Mexades in Athens: Agelas or Agesilaus in Counth; and Archilaus of the same race, of the Heraclidæ the seventh in Lacedæmon. Badeforus ruled the Tyrians; Achab, Ochazias and Jehoram the Ifraelites.

Of Jehoram the sonne of Jehosaphat, and Ahazia.

$. I. That Jehoram was made King sundry times.

EHORAM the fon of Jehosaphat King of Juda began to reigne at thirty two yeers of age, & lived untill he was forty yeers old, being eight yeers a King: but of these eight yeers, which Jehoram is said to have reigned, foure are to be reckoned in the life of his father, who going to the Syrian warre with Ahab, left this Jehoram King in his stead, as Ahab did his son Ahazia. This appeares by the feverall beginnings, which are given in Scripture to the two Jeho- King 21.751 being (as we finde elsewhere) the eighteenth yeer of Jehosaphat himselfe, who went with the Israelites against Moab. Hereby it appeares that the full power and execution of the royall office was retained still by Jehosaphat, who governed absolutely by himselfe, not z King. 8.16.

communicating the rule with his fon. But in the fifth yeare of Jehoram King of Ifrael. which was the two and twentieth of Jehofaphat, the old King tooke unto him, as partner in the Government, this his eldest son, who was at that time 32. yeeres old, his Father being 57. Now for a finuch as Jeholaphat reigned 25. yeeres, it is evident that his fonne 2 King, 22.42. did not reigne alone till the eighth of Joram King of Ifrael. The like regard is to behad.

in accounting the times of other Kings of Juda & Ifrael, who did not alwayes reign pre. cifely folong as the bare letter of the text may feem at first to affirme : but their yeeres were fometimes compleat, fometimes onely current, fometimes confounded with the veeres of their fuccessors or foregoers, & must therefore be found by comparing their times with the yeeres of those others, with whom they did begin and end.

It were perhaps a thing leffe needfull than curious, to enquire into the reasons movine Jehosaphas either to assume unto him his son as partner in the Kingdome, whilest hee was able himselfe to command both in peace and in warre, the like having neverbeene done by any of his progenitors, or having once (in the 17.0f his reign) vouchfafed unto him that honour, to refume it unto himselfe, or at least wise to deferre the confirmation of it, untill foure or five yeers were passed. Yet forasmuch as to enter into the examination of these passages, may be a meane to find some light, whereby we may more clarly discover the causes of much extraordinary businesse ensuing, I hold it not amisle to make fuch conjecture, as the circumftances of the Story briefly handled in the Scriptures may feeme to approve.

We are therefore to confider, that this King Jehofaphat was the first of Rehoboams illu that ever entred into any streight league with the Kings of the ten Tribes. All that reigned in Juda before him, had with much labour and long war, tired themselves in vain, making finall profit of the greatest advantages that could be wished. Wherefore 3th state of the greatest advantages that could be wished. phat thought it the wifest way, to make a league offensive and defensive between lind and Juda, whereby each might enjoy their owne in quiet.

This confederacy made by a religious King, with one that did hatethe Lord, could not long prosper, as not issuing from the true root and fount aine of all wisedome: yet as a piece of found policy, doubtleffe it wanted not faire pretences of much common good that by likely to arise, with mutuall fortification of both those Kingdoms, against the uncucumcifed nations their ancient enemies. This apparent benefit, being so inestimable jewell, that it might not easily be lost, but continue as hereditary from father to son, it was thought a very good course to have it confirmed by some sure bond of affinity, and thereupon was Athalia the daughter of Omri, & fifter of Ahab King of Ifrael, givening marriage to Jeberam, who was fon and heire apparent to the King of Juda. This Lady was of a masculine spirit, and had learned so much of Queen Jezabel her brothers wife, that she durst undertake, & could throughly performe a great deale more in Jerusalem, than the other knew how to compasse in Samaria. Shee was indeed a fire-brand ordained by God to confume a great part of the noblest houses in Juda, and perhaps of those men or their children, whose worldly wisedome, regardlesse of Gods pleasure, had

The first fruits of this great league, was the Syrian war at Ramoth Gilead, wherein Juda & Israel did adventure equally, but the profit of the victory should have redounded wholly to Ahab: as godly Princes very feldome thrive by matching with Idolaters, but s rather serve the turnes of those false friends, who being ill affected to God himselfe, cannot be well affected to his servants. Before their setting forth, Abab designed, as King his fon AbaZiah; not fo much perhaps in regard of the uncertaine events of war (for none of his predecessors had ever done the like upon the like occasions) nor as fearing the threatnings of the Prophet Michaia (for he despised them) as inviting Jehosaph probable conjectures of the motives inducing the old King Jehosophat to change his purpose often, in making his sonne Jehoram King.

Any arguments do very strongly prove Jehoram to have been wholly over-ru-Many arguments of the specially for his forfaking the religion of his godly led by his wife; especially for his forfaking the religion of his godly and following the abominable superstitions of the house of Achab. led by his wife; especially for his forfaking the religion of his godly Ancestors.

That she was a woman of intolerable pride, and abhorring to live a private life, the whole course of her actions witnesseth at large. Much vaine matter she was able to produce, whereby to make her husband thinke that his brethren and kindred were but meane and unworthy persons in comparison of him, and of his children, which were begotten upon the daughter and fifter of two great Kings, not upon base women & meere fubjects. The Court of Abab, and his famous victories obtained against the Syrian Benhadad, were matter fusficient to make an insolent man think highly of himselfe, as being allied so honourably; who could otherwise have found in his heart well enough, to defoiseall his brethren, as being the eldest, and heire apparent to the Crown, whereof already he had, in a manner, the possession.

How foone his vices brake out, or how long hee diffembled them and his idolatrous religion, it cannot certainly be knowne. Like enough it is, that some smoke, out of the hidden fire, did very foone make his fathers eyes to water; who thereupon caused the young man to know himselfe better, by making him fall backe into ranke among his vounger brethren. And furely the doings of Jehofaphat about the fame time, arene no small distemper of the whole country, through the misgovernment of his ungodly fon-For the good King was fain to make his progresse round about the Land; reclaiming the people unto the fervice of God, and appointing Judges throughout all the strong Cittes of a Chro. to wife Judacitie by Citie. This had beene a needleffe labour, if the religion taught and from ly 5.800 maintained by Asa, and by himselfe, had not suffered alteration, & the course of Justice bemperverted, by the power of fuch as had borne authority. But the necessitie that then was of reformation, appears by the charge which the King did give to the Judges andby his commission given to one of the Priests in spiritual causes, & to the Steward of his house in temporall matters, to be generall over-seers.

This was not till after the death of Ahazia the fon of Ahab; but how long after it is uncertain. For Jehoram the brother of AhaZia began his raigne(as hath been already noted) in the eighteenth of Jehosaphat, which was then accounted the second of Jehoram. Jehosaphus sonne, though afterward this Jehoram of Juda had another first and second yeere, even in his fathers time, before he raigned alone, as the best Chronologers and Expositors of the holy Text agree. So he continued in private estate, untill the two and twentieth of his fathers reigne, at which time, though the occasions inducing his restitution to former dignity are not set downe, yet we may not thinke, that motives thereto, appearing substantiall, were wanting. Jehoram of Israel held the same correspondency with Jehosaphat that his father had done; & made use of it. He drew the Judaan into the war of Moab, at which time it might well bees that the young Prince of Juda was again ordained King by his father, as in the Syrian expedition he had beene. Or if wee ought tather to think, that the preparations for the enterprize against Moab did not occupy so much time, as from the eighteenth of Jehosaphat, in which yeere that Nation rebelled against Israel, unto his two and twentieth; yet the daily negotiations betweene the two Angs of Juda and Ifrael, and the affinity betweene them contracted in the person of Jehoram, might offer some good occasions thereunto. Neither is it certain how the behaviour of the younger fons, in their elder brothers difgrace, might cause their Father to Pur him in possession for scare of tumult after his death; or the deep dissimulation of Jehoram himselfe might win the good opinion both of his Father and Brethren; it being athing usuall in mischievous fell natures, to be as abject & servile in time of adversity, as infolent and bloudy upon advantage. This is manifest, that being repossessed of his formerestate, he demeaned himselse in such wise toward his brethren, as caused their father. to enable them, not onely with store of filver and gold, and of precious things, (which kind 1 Chron. 21.3). of liberality other Kings doubtlesse had used unto their younger sons) but with the culody of firong Cities in Juda, to affure them, if it might have been, by unwonted means, gainst unwonted perils.

The doings of Jehoram when he raigned alone; and the rebellion of Edom and Libna.

Ut all this providence availed nothing; for an higher providence had otherwife determined of the sequell. When once the good old man, their Father, was Dead, the yonger sonnes of Jehosaphat found strong Cities, a weake defence, a gainst the power of him unto whom the Citizens were obedient. If they came in upon the fummons of a King their brother, then had he them without any more adoo; if they Rood upon their guard, then were they Traitors, and fo unable to hold out against him. who besides his owne power, was able to bring the forces of the Israeliush Kingdome against them; so that the apparent likelihood of their finall overthrow, sufficed to make all forfake them in the very beginning. Howfoever it was, they were all taken & flaine and with them for company many great men of the Land, fuch belike, as either had taken their part, when the Tyrant fought their lives, or had been appointed Rulers of the Country, when Jeheram was deposed from his Government; in which Office they. without forbearing to doe justice, could hardly avoide the doing of many things demgatory to their yong Master; which if hee would now call treason, faying that heewas then King, who durft fay the contrary

After this Jehoram took upon him, as being now Lord alone, to make innovations in Religion, wherein hee was not contented, as other Idolatrous Princes, to give way and fafe conduct unto Superfition and Idolatry, nor to provoke and encourage the people to that finne, whereto it is wonderfull that they were fo much addicted, having fuch knowledge of God, and of his detesting that above all other sinnes; but heusedcompulsion, and was (if not the very first) the first that is registred, to have set up Inclusion,

Whilest he was thus bussed at home in doing what he listed the Edomiteshis Tribus taries rebelled against him abroad; & having hitherto, fince Davids time, beene governed by a Vice-Roy, did now make unto themselves a King. Against these Jeboram in perfon made an expedition, taking along with him his Princes, and all his Chariors; with which he obtained victory in the field, compelling the rebels to flie into their places of advantage, whereof he forced no one, but went away contented with the honour that he had gotten in beating and killing some of those whom he should have subdued, and kept his servants. Now began the prophecy of Ifaac to take effect, wherein heforetold, that Efau in processe of time should breake the yoke of Jacob. For after this the Edomites could never bee reclaimed by any of the Kings of Juda, but held their owne fo well, that when, after many civill and for raine wars, the Jewes by fundry Nationshad beene brought low; Antipater the Edomite, with Herod his fon, and others of that race following them, became Lords of the Jewes, in the decrepit age of Israel, and reigned is Kings, even in Jerusalem it selfe.

The freedome of the Edomites, though purchased somewhat dearly, encouraged Libna, a great city within Juda, which in the time of Josua had a peculiar King, to rebell against Jehoram, and set it selfe at liberty. Libna stood in the confines of Benjamin &of Dan, farre from the affiftance of any bordering enemies to Juda, and therefore so unlike ly it was to have maintained it selfe in liberty, that it may seem strange how it coulds. scape from utter destruction, or at the least from some terrible vengeance, most likely to have beene taken, by their powerfull, cruell, and throughly incenfed Lord. The Israelite held fuch good intelligence at that time with Juda, that he would not have accepted the Towne, had it offered it felfe unto him: neither doe we reade that it fought how to cast it selfe into a new subjection, but continued a free estate. The rebellion of it against * Chron.23.10. Jehoram , Was, Because he had for saken the Lord 3od of his Fathers; which I take to have not only been the first & remote cause, but even the next and immediate reason, moving the inhabitants to doe as they did: for it was a Town of the Levites; who must needsbe driven into great extremities, when a religion, contrary to Gods Law, had not only fome allowance to countenance it by the King, but compulfive authority to force unto it all that were unwilling. As for the use of the Temple at Jerusalem (which, being devoutmen, they might feare to lose by this rebellion) it was never denied to those of the renrevolted Tribes by any of the Religious Kings, who rather invited the Ifraelites this ther, and gave them kinde entertainement : under Idolaters they must have bin without ir whether they lived free or in subjection. Yet it seemes that private reasons were not wanting, which might move them rather to doe than fuffer that which was unwarrantable. For in the generall visitation before remembred, wherein Jehosaphat reformed his kingdome, the good old King appointing new Governours, and giving them especiall charge to doe justice without respect of persons, used these words; The Levites shalbe officers before you; Be of good courage, and doest, and the Lord shall be with the good. By these phrases, it seemes, than he encouraged them against the more powerfull, than just proceedings of his fon; whom if the Levites did (according to the trust reposed in them) neglectin discharging their duties, likely it is that he meant to be even with them, and make them now to feele, as many Princes of the land had done, his heavie indignation. How it happened that Libra was not hereupon destroyed, yea, that it was not (for ought that we can read) fo much as befreged or molested, may justly seeme very strange. And themore strange it is in regard of the mightie Armies which Jehosaphat was able to raise. heing sufficient to have over-whelmed any one Towne, and buried it under the earth, which they might well in one moneth have cast into it with shovels, by ordinarie approaches.

But it feemes that of those great numbers which his Father could have levied, there werenot many whom Jeroboam could well trust; and therefore perhaps he thought it an essier losse, to let one Town goe, than to put weapons into their hands, who were more likely to follow the example of Libna, than to punish it. So desperate is the condition of Tyrants, who thinking it a greater happinesse to be feared, than to be loved are fainthemselves to stand in seare of those, by whom they might have bin dreadfull unto others.

of the miseries falling upon Jehoram, and of his death.

Hele afflictions not fufficing to make any impression of Gods displeasure in the mind of the wicked Prince; a Prophecie in writing was delivered to him, which threatned both his people, his children, his wives, & his own bodie. Hereby likewife it appears that he was a cruell perfecutor of Gods fervants; in as much as the Prophersdurft not reprove him to his face, as they had done many of his predeceffors, both good and evill kings; but were fain to denounce Gods Judgments against him by letters. keeping themselves close and far from him. This Epistle is faid to have bin sent unto him from Elias the Prophet. But Elias was translated, and EliZeus prophecied in his stead be- 2 Chro. 27. 12. forethistime, even in the dayes of Jehofaphat. Wherefore it may be that Elias left this 2Kin. 1. & 3011. prophecie in writing behind him or that (as some conjecture) the errour of one letter in writing, was the occasion that we reade Elias for Elizeus. Indeed any thing may rather bebeleeved than the Tradition held by some of the Jewish Rabbins, that Elico from heavendid fend this Epiftle; a tale formewhat like to the fable of our Ladies letters, devised by Erasmus, or of the Verse that was sent from heaven to S. Giles.

But who foever was the Author of this threatning Epistle, the accomplishment of the Prophecie was as terrible as the fentence. For the Philitims and Arabians brake into Tudes, and tooke the Kings house, wherein they found all, or many of his children, and wives, all which they flew, or carried away, with great part of his goods. These Philifins had not prefumed fince the time of David, to make any offensive warre till now; for they were by him almost consumed, and had lost the best of their Townes, mainraiangthemselves in the rest of their small Territories, by defensive armes, to which they were constrained at Gibberhon by the Israelites. The Arabians were likely to have bin then, as they are now, anaked people, all horsemen, and ill appointed; their Countrie afording no other furniture, than fuch as might make them fitter to rob and spoyle inthe open fields, than to offend strong Cities, such as were thicke set in Juda. True it is that in ages long after following, they conquered all the South parts of the world then knowne, in avery thort space of time, destroying some, and building other some very stately Cities. But it must be considered, that this was when they had learned of the Romanes.

446 Remanes the Art of Warre; and that the provisions which they found, together with the Arts which they learned, in one subdued Province, did make them able and skilful in pursuing their conquest, and going on into Regions far removed from them. At the day having lost in effect all that they had gotten, such of them as live in Arabia it selfe are good horsemen, but ill appointed; very dangerous passengers, but unable to deale with good Souldiers, as riding starke naked, and rather trusting in the swiftnesse of their horses, than in any other means of resistance, where they are well opposed. And such or little better, may they seeme to have bin, that spoyled Judea in the time of Jehoram, For their Countrie was alwaies barren and defart, wanting manual Arts whereby to supply the naturals with furniture: neither are these bands named as chiefe in that action, but in ratheradherents of the Philifims. Out of this we may infer, that one halfe, yea, or one quarter of the numbers found in the least muster of Juda and Benjamin under Jehosahat (wherin were involled three hundred and eightie thousand fighting men) had bin enough to have driven away far greater forces than these enemies are likely to have brought into the field, had not the people bin unable to deal with them, for lack of weapons, which were now kept from them by their Princes jealousie, as in Sauls time by the policieof the Philiftims. It may feeme that the house of the King which these invaders tooke, was not his P. lace in Terusalem, but rather some other house of his abroad in the Countrie, where his wives and children at that time lay for their recreation: because we readenot that they to did sacke the Citie, or spoyle the Temple, which would have invited them as a more commodious bootie, had they got possession thereof. Yet perhaps they took Jerusalim it felfe by furprize, the people being difarmed, and the Kings guard too weake to kene them out; yer had not the courage to hold it, because it was so large and populous: and therefore having done what spoyle they could, with-drew themselves with such purchase as they were able safely to conveigh away. The flaughter committed by Jehn on the two and fortie brethren of AhaZia, or (as they are called elsewhere) so many of his brothers sons, and the cruell massacre wherein all the Royall feed perished (only Joss excepted) under the tyrannie of Athalia, following within two yeares after this invasion of the Philistims and Arabians, make it seeme to probable, that the sonnes of Jehoram were not all slaine at once, but that rather the fifth murther beganne in his owne time, and was feconded by many other heavie blows, wherewith his house was inceffantly striken, untillit was in a manner quite hewed downe.

After the secal amities, the hand of God was extended against the bodie of this wicked King, fmiring him with a grievous disease in his bowels, which left him not will his guts fell out, and his wretched foule departed from his miserable carkasse. The people of the Land, as they had small cause of comfort in his life, so had they northe good manners to pretend forrow for his death; wherefore hee was denied a place of buriall among his Ancestors the Kings of Juda, though his owne some succeeded him to in the Kingdome, who was guided by the same spirits that had beene his Fathers evil Angels. Athalia had other matters to trouble her head, than the pompous enterring of a dead husband. She was thinking how to provide for the future, to maintaine her ownegreameste, to retaine her favourites in their authoritie, and to place about her Sonne fuch Counsellors of the house of Ahab, as were fittest for her turne. Wherefore the thought it unfeafonable to make much a-doe about a thing of nothing, and offend the peoples eyes, with a stately funerall of a man by them detested: but rather chose to let the blame of things passed be layd upon the dead, than to procure an ill opinion of her selfe and hers, which it now did concerne her to avoyd. Such is the qualitie of wicked Instigators, having made greedie use of bad imployments, to charge, not only s with his own vices, but with their faults also, the man whose evill inclinations their sinster counsells have made worse, when once he is gone, and can profit them no longer. The death of Jehoram fell out indeed in a busic time; when his friend and cousin the Ifrat; lite, who had the same name, was entangled in a difficult warre against the Aramite; and therefore could have had no better leafure to help Athalia, in fetting of things according to her owne minde, than he had (perhaps through the same hinderance) to helpe her husband, when he was diffressed by the Philistims. Yea rather he needed and craved the affiftance of the men of Juda, for the taking in of Ramoth Gilead, where they had not feed fo well the last time, that they should willingly run thit her againe, unlesse they were very fairely intreated.

The acts of this wicked man I have thought good to handle the more particularly (nurfuing the examination of all occurrences, as farre as the circumstances remembred in holy Scripture would guide me by their directions) to the end that it might more plainly appear, how the corrupted affections of men, impugning the revealed will of God. ac. complify nevertheleffe his hidden purpose, and without miraculous meanes, confound themselves in the seeming-wise devices of their owne folly; as likewise to the end that all men might learne to fubmit their judgements to the ordinance of God, rather than to think that they may fafely dispense with his commandements, and follow the prudent conceits which worldly wisdome dictateth unto them. For in fuch kind of unhappie subrilies, it is manifest that Athalia was able to furnish both her Husband and her Son; but theiffue of them partly hath appeared already, and partly will appear, in that which immediately followeth.

Of the raigne of Ahazia, and his bufineffe with the King of Ifrael.

chazias, or Ahazia, the fonne of Jehoram and Athalia, began his raign over Juda in the twelfth yeare of Jehoram the son of Ahab King of I frael, and raigned but one year. Touching his age, it is a point of much more difficultie than importrance to know it: yet hath it bred much disputation, whereof I see no more probable conclusion than that of Torniellus, alledging the Edition of the Septuagint at Rome, Anno Domini 1588, which faith that he was twenty years old in the beginning of his kingdom; and the Annotations thereupon, which cite other Copies, that doe give him two yeares more. Like enough he is to have been young: for he was governed by his Mother, and her Ministers, who gave him counsell, by which he perished. In matter of Religion hee altered none of his fathers courses. In matter of State he likewise upheld the league made with the house of Abab. He was much busied in doing little, and that with ill successe. Heaccompanied his Coufin the Ifraelite against Ramoth Gilead, which they wan but not without blowes: for the Aramites fought fo well, that the King of Ifrael was fain to adventure his own person, which scaped not unwounded.

The Towne being won, was manned ftrongly, in expectation of fome attempt likely to be made by Hazael King of Aram: which done, Jehoram King of Ifrael with-drew himself to the Citie of Jezrael, where with more quiet he might attend the curing of his wounds; and Ahazia returned to Jerusalem. It seems that he was but newly come home (for he raigned in all scantly one yeare, whereof the former expedition, with the preparations for it, had taken up a great part,) when he did make a new journey, as it were for good maners sake, to visit the King of Ifrael, who lay fore of his wounds. Belike Athalia was brewing formenew plots, which his presence would have hindered, and therefore fought every occasion to thrust him abroads for otherwise it was but a vain piece of work to to leave his kingdome, having no other businesse than by way of complement to goe seeone whom he had seen yesterday. Certaine it is, that the Lord had resolved at this time to put in execution that heavie judgement, which he had laid by the mouth of Eli-"the Prophetupon the house of Ahab. And hereupon at this time had he disposed not only the concurrence of all other things, which in mans eyes might feeme to have bin acedentall; but the very thoughts and affections of fuch persons, as intended nothing leffe than the fulfilling of his high pleasure. Of these Athalia doubtlesse was one; whose mischievous purposes it will shortly be needfull, for explanation of some difficulties arifing that we diligently confider and examine:

How Ahazia perished with the house of Ahab: and how that Familie was destroyed by Jehu.

He whole Armie of Ifrael, with all the principall Captaines, lying in Ramoth Gilead, a Disciple of Elizeus the Prophet came in among the Captaines that were fitting together; who calling out among them Jehn, a principall man, took him apart, and anointed him King over Ifrael, rehearing unto him the Prophecie of Eli. against the house of Abab, and letting him understand that it was the pleasure of God to make him executioner of that fentence. The fashion of the Messenger was such as bred in the Captains a defire to know the errand, which Jehu thought meet to let them know, as doubting whether they had over-heard all the talke or no. When he had acquainted them with the whole matter, they made no delay, but forth-with proclaimed hinking. For the Prophecie of Elias was well knowne among them, neither durst any one oppose him selfe against him, that was by God ordained to performe it.

Jehu, who had upon the fudden this great honour throwne upon him, was not flow to put himself in possession of it, but used the first heat of their affections, who joyned with him, in fetting on foot the businesse which neerely concerned him, and was not to being fore-flowed, being no more his owne than Gods. The first care taken was that no news of the revolt might be carried to Jezreel, wher. by the King might have had warning either to fight or flee: this being foreseen, hemached fwiftly away, to take the Court while it was yet fecure. King Jehoram was now fo well recovered of his wounds, that he could endure to ride abroad, for which canting feemes that there was much feafting, and joy made, especially by Queene JeZabel, who kepther state so wel, that the brethren of Ahazia comming thither at this time, did make it as well their errand to falute the Queen, as to visit the King.

Certaine it is, that fince the rebellion of Meab against Ifrael, the house of Ahab ill never fo much flourish as at this time. Seventy Princes of the bloud Royall thereware that lived in Samaria; Jehoramthe sonne of Queene JeZabel had won Ramoth Giled, which his Father had attempted in vaine, with loffe of his life; and he wonne it by will ant fight, wherein he received wounds, of which the danger was now past, but the nour likely to continue. The amitie was so great between Ifrael and Juda, that it might fuffice to daunt all their common enemies, leaving no hope of successe to any rebellions enterprizer: fo that now the Prophecie of Elias might be forgotten, or no otherwisemembred, than as an unlikely tale by them that beheld the majestical I face of the Com, wherein fo great a friend as the King of Juda was entertained, and fortie Princes of his bloud expected.

Inthe middest of this securitie, whilest these great Estates were (perhaps) either on a fulting about profequation of their intents, first against the Aramites, and then against Moab, Edom, and other rebels and enemies: or elfe were triumphing in joy of that which was already archieved, and the Queene-Mother dreffing her selfe in the bravest manner to come down amongst them; tidings were brought in, that the watchman had from Tower discovered a companie comming. These newes were not very troublesome: in the Armie that lay in Ramoth Gilead, to be readic against all attempts of the Aramitt, was likely enough to be discharged upon some notice taken that the enemie would no, or could not stirre. Onely the King sent out an Horse-man to know what the matter was, and to bring him word. The messenger comming to Jebu, and asking whetheral were well, was retained by him, who intended to give the King as little warning might bee. The seeming negligence of this fellow in not returning with an answer might argue the matter to be of small importance : yet the King to be satisfied, sentout another that should bring him word how all went; and hee was likewise detained by Jehu. These dumbe shewes bred some suspition in Jehoram, whom the watchmancer tified of all that happened. And now the companie drew fo neere, that they might though not perfectly, be differned, and notice taken of Jehn himselfe by the furious manner of his marching. Wherefore the King that was loth to discover any weakness caused his Chariot to be made readie, and issued forth with AhaZia King of Juda inhis companie, whose presence added majestie to his train, when strength to resist, or expedition to flee, had bin more needfull. This could not be done fo haffily, but that Jehu was come even to the towns end, & there they met each other in the field of Naboth. Jehoram began to falute Jehu with termes of peace, but receiving a bitter answer, his heart failed him fo that crying out apon the treason to his fellow king, he turned away to have fled. But Ithu foone overtook him with an arrow, wherewith he strook him dead, and threw his carkaffe into that field, which, purchased with the bloud of the right full owner, was tobe watered with the bloud of the unjust possessor. Neither did Ahazia escape so wel. but that he was arrested by a wound, which held him till death did seize upon him.

The Kings Palace was joyning to the wall, by the gate of the Citie, where Jexabel might foone be advertised of this calamitie, if she did not with her own eyes behold it. Now it was high time for her to call to God for mercie, whose judgement, pronounced against her long before, had overtaken her, when she least expected it. But she, full of indienation and proud thoughts, made her selfe readie in all halte, and painted her face, hoping with her statelie and imperious looks to daunt the Traitor, or at least to utter forme Apophthegme, that should expresse her brave spirit, and brand him with such a reproach as might make him odious for ever. Little did she thinke upon the hungry dogs that were ordained to devour her, whose paunches the flibium, with which she befineared her cies. would more offend, than the scolding language wherewith the armed her tongue, could trouble the eares of him that had her in his power. As Jebu drew neere, the opened her window, & looking out upon him, began to put him in mind of Zimri, that had not long emoved the fruits of his treason, and murther of the King his Master. This was in meere humane valuation stourly spoken, but was indeed a part of miserable folly; as are all things how foever landable, if they have an ill relation to God the Lord of all. Her owne Eunuches that stood by and heard her, were not affected so much as with any compassion ofhersorune; much lesse was her enemie daunted with her proud spirit. When Jebs fawthat she did use the little remainder of her life in seeking to vexe him, he made her presently to understand her own estate, by deeds & not by words. He only called to her fervants to know which of them would be on his fide, and foon found them readie to offertheir service before the very face of their proud Ladie. Hereupon he commanded them to cast her down head-long: which immediately they performed, without all regard of her greatnesse and estate, wherein she had a few houres before shined so glorioully in the eyes of men; of menthat confidered not the judgements of God that had been denounced against her.

So perished this accursed woman by the rude hands of her ownservants, at the commandement of her greatest enemie, that was yesterday her subject, but now her Lord: & the perished miserably, struggling in vaine with base groomes, who contumeliously did hale and thrust her, whilest her insulting enemie sate on Horse-back, adding indignitie to her griefe by scornefull beholding the shamefull manner of her fall, and trampling her bodie under foot. Her dead carkaffe that was left without the walls, was devoured by dogs, and her very memorie was odious. Thus the vengeance of God rewarded her Ido-larrie, murther, and oppression, with slow, but sure paiment, and full interest.

Abaziaking of Juda fleeing a-pace from Jehu, was over-taken by the way where hee lurked; and receiving his deadly wound in the kingdome of Samaria, was suffered to get himgone (which he did in all haste) and seek his buriall in his own kingdome: and this fwour he obtained for his grand-fathers fake, not for his fathers nor his own. He died at Megiddo, and was thence carried to Jerusalem, where he was enterred with his Anceflors, having raigned about one yeare.

CHAP. XXI.

Of Athalia, and whose son he was that succeeded her.

6. I.

Of Athalia's usurping the Kingdome, and what pretences she might forge.

2 Chro.22.9

Fter the death of AhaZia, it is fayd that his house was not able to retain 10 the Kingdome: which Note, and the proceedings of Athalia upon the death of her fon, have given occasion to divers opinions concerning the Pedigree of Joas, who reigned shortly after. For Athalia being thus dispoyled of her son, under whose name she had ruled at her pleasure, did forth-with lay hold upon all the Princes of the bloud and flew them, that fo she might occupie the Royall Throne her felf.

and reigne as Queen, rather than live a Subject. She had before-hand put into greatplace, and made Counsellors unto her son, such as were fittest for her purpose, and readie at all times to execute her will: that she kept a strong guard about her, it is very likely; and as 20 likely it is that the great execution done by Jeheram, upon the Princes, and many of the Nobilitie, had made the people tame, and fearfull to stir, what soever they saw or heard,

Yet ambition, how violent soever it be, is seldome or never so shamelesse as to refise the commoditie of goodly pretences offering themselves; but rather scrapes togetherall that will any way serve to colour her proceedings. Wherefore it were not absurd for us to think, that Athalia, when the faw the Princes of the Royal bloud, all of them in amaner, flain by her husband, and afterwards his own children destroyed by the Philistim, began even then to play her owne game, reducing by artificiall practice, intofaire likelihoods, those possibilities wherewith her husbands bad fortune had presented her. Not without great shew of reason, either by her owne mouth, or by some trustie creatures a hers, might she give him to understand, how needful it were to take the best order while as yet he might, for feare of the worst that might happen. If the issue of David, which now remained only in his Familie, should by any accident faile(as woful experience had already shewed what might after come to passe) the people of Juda were not unlikely to choose a King of some new stocke, a popular seditious man peradventure, onethat to countenance his owne unworthineffe, would not care what afperfions he layd upon that Royall house, which was fallen downe. And who could affure him, that some ambitious spirit, fore-seeing what might be gottenthereby, did not already contrive the destruction of him, and all his seed . Wherefore it were the wisest way to designe by his authoritie not only his fuccessour, but also the reversioner, and so to provide, that the Crowne might never be subject to any risling, but remaine in the disposition of them that loved him best, if the worst that might be feared comming to passe, his owne poste ritie could not retaine it.

Such perswasions being urged, and carnessly followed, by the importunate sollicitation of her that governed his affections, were able to make the jealous Tyrant think, that the onely way to frustrate all devices of such as gaped after a change, was to makeher Heire the last and youngest of his house, whom it most concerned, as being the Queen-

Mother, to uphold the first and eldest.

If Athalia took no fuch course as this in her husbands time, yet might she do it in her fonnes. For AhaZia (befides that he was wholly ruled by his mother) was not likely 1019 take much care for the securitie of his halfe-brethren, or their children; as accounting his Fathers other wives, in respect of his owne-born-Mother, little better than Condi bines, and their children basely begotten. But if this mischievous woman forgat herselse fo far in her wicked policie, that she lost all opportunitie which the weakenesse of her husband and fonne did afford, of procuring unto her selfe some seeming Title; ye could shee afterwards faine some such matter, as boldly she might: being sure that none would aske to see her evidence, for seare of being sent to learne the certainte of her fonne or husband in another World. But I rather thinke that shee tooke order for her affaires before-hand. For though she had no reason to suspect or seare the sudden death of her sonne, yet it was the witest way to provide betimes against all that might happen, whileft her husbands iffue by other women was young and unable to refift. We plainely finde that the Brethren or Nephewes of AhaZia, to the numbet of two and forre, were sent to the Court of Israel, only to falute the children of the King, and the chiltre, we the Queen. The flender occasion of which long journy, considered together with drenor the qualitie of these persons (being in effect all the stock of Jehoram that could be grown the quality (trength) makes it very suspicious, that their entertainement in Jezahels house to any ments have beene more formall, but little differing in substance, from that which would be the hand of Jehu. He that looks into the courses held both before and after they found at the hand of Jehu. He that looks into the courses held both before and after by these two Queenes, will finde cause enough to think no lesse. Of such as have aspired unto Lordships not belonging to them, and thrust out the right Heires by pretence of Testaments, that had no other validitie than the fword of such as claimed by them could give, Histories of late, yea of many Ages, afford plentifull examples: and the rule of salemon istruc: Is there any thing wherefore may (ay, Behold, this is new? It hath bin already in Ecclesia. the old time that was before us. That a King might shed his brothers bloud, was proved by Salomonupon Adonia; that he might alien the Crown from his naturall Heires, David had given proofe; but these had good ground of their doings. They which follow examples that please them, will neglect the reasons of those examples, if they please them not, andrest contented with the practice, as more willing by shewing what they may dosthan acknowledging why Salomon flew his brother that had begun one rebellion and was entring into another. Jehoram fem all his brethren, which were better than he: David pur- 2 Chroz 1.13. chafed the kingdome, and might the more freely dispose of it, yet he disposed of it as the Lordappointed: if Jehoram, who had loft much and gotten nothing, thought that hee might alien the remainder at his pleasure; or if AhaZia fought to cut off the succession of hisbrethren, or of their iffue seither of these was to be answered with the words which Jehojada the Priest used afterwards, in declaring the title of Joash: Behold, the Kings fon mult rivere as the Lord hath faid of the fons of David. Wherefore though I holdit very probable, that Athalia did pretend fome title, what foever it might be, to the Crowne of Juda; yet it is most certain that she had thereunto no right at all, but only got it by treacherie, murder, and open violence; and so she held it fixe whole years, and a part of the seventh, ingood feeming fecuritie.

How Jehu fpent his time in Ifrael, so that he could not molest Athalia.

Nall this time Jehu did never goe about to disturbe her; which in reason he was likely to defire, being an enemie to her whole House. But he was occupied at the Inft in establishing himselfe, rooting out the posteritie of Ahab, and reforming fomewhat in Religion: afterwards inwarres against the Aramites, wherein he was so far overcharged, that hardly he could retaine his own, much leffe attempt upon others. Of the line of Ahab there were seventie living in Samaria, out of which number Jehn by letter advised the Citizens to set up some one as King, and to prepare themselves to fight in his defence. Hereby might they gather how confident he was; which they well understood to proceede from greater power about him, than they could gather to result him. Wherefore they tooke example by the two Kings whom he had flain, and being txceedingly affraid of him, they offered him their fervice; wherein they so readily hewedthemselves obedient, that in lesse than one dayes warning, they fent him the heads of all those Princes, as they were injoyned by a second letter from him. After this he surprized all the Priests of Baal by a subtiltie, faining a great sacrifice to their god, by which meanes he drew them altogether into one Temple, where hee flew them: and in the fame zeale to God utterly demolished all the monuments of that im-

Concerning the Idolatrie devised by Jeroboam, no king of Israel had ever greater reafon than Jehn to destroy it. For he needed not to feare lest the people should be allured unto the house of David; it was (in appearance) quite rooted up, and the Crown of Juda in the possession of a cruell Tyrannesse: he had received his kingdom by the unexpected grace of God; and further in regard of his zeale expressed in destroying Baal out of the rael, he was promifed, notwithstanding his following the sin of Jeroboam, that the kines dome should remaine in his Familie to the fourth Generation. But all this would not ferve the would needs helpe to piece out Gods providence with his owne circumfpedia on : doing therein like a foolish greedie gamester, who by stealing a needlesse Card to 26 fure himselfe of winning a stake, forfeits his whole test. He had questionlesse displaced many, by that which he did against Baal; and many more he should offend by taking from them the use of a superstition, so long practised as was that Idolatrie of Jeroboan Yetall these, how many soever they were, had never once thought upon making him King, if God, whom (to retaine them) he now for fooke, had not given him the Crown when more difficulties appeared in the way of getting it, than could at any time after he found in the meanes of holding it.

This ingratitude of 7ehu drew terrible vengeance of God upon I frael, whereof Hazul king of Damascus was the executioner. The crueltie of this barbarous Princewelling finde in the Prophecie of Elizews, who fore-told it, faying: Their strong Cities shall then fet on fire; and their young men shalt thou slay with the sword, and shalt dash their Infants a gainst the stones, and rend in pieces their women with childe. So did not onely the wirked nesse of Abab cause the ruine of his whole house, but the obstinate Idolatrie of the prople bring a lamentable miserie upon all the Land. For the furie of HaZaels victorie was not quenched with the destruction of a few towns, nor wearied with one invasions but he a smote them in all the coast of Ifrael, and wasted all the Countrie beyond the River of fordan. Notwithstanding all these calamities, it seems that the people repented not oftheir Idolatrie; (For in those dayes the Lord began to loath Ifrael,) but rather it is likely, that they bemoaned the noble house of Ahab, under which they had beaten those enemies to whom they were now a prey, and had bravely fought for the conquest of Syria, where they had enlarged their border, by winning Ramoth Gilead, and compelled Benhadedin restore the Cities which his Father had won whereas now they were fain to make would shifts, living under a Lord that had better fortune & courage in murdering his master that had put him in trust, than in defending his people from their cruel enemies. Thus it commonly falls out, that they who can find all maner of difficulties in ferving him, to whom 3 nothing is difficult, are, in stead of the ease and pleasure to themselves propounded by contrary courses, overwhelmed with the troubles which they fought to avoid; and there in by God, whom they first forsook, forsaken, and left unto the wretched labours of their own blind wisdome, wherein they had reposed all their confidence.

of Athaliahs Government.

Hefe calamities falling upon Ifrael, kept Athalia fafe on that fide, giving herlei a fure to looke to things at home: as having little to doe abroad, unlesse it were fo that she held some correspondencie with Hazael, pretending therein to insttate her husbands grandfather King Afa, who had done the like. And fome probabilist that she did so, may be gathered out of that which is recorded of her doings. For we finde, that this wicked Athalia and her children brake up the house of God, and all thingsthat were dedicate for the house of the Lord did they bestow upon Baalim. Such a facriledge, though it proceeded from a defire to fer out her owne Idolatrie, with fuch pompe as might make it the more glorious in the peoples eyes, was not likely to want some faire pretext of necessitie of the State so requiring: in which case others before her had made bold with that holy place, and her next successour was faine to doe the like, being therunto forced by Hazael, who perhaps was delighted with the tafte of that which was formerly thence extracted for his fake.

Under this impious government of Athalia, the devotion of the Priests and Levins was very notable, and ferved (no doubt) very much to retaine the people in the religion taught by God himselfe, howsoever the Queenes proceedings advanced the contrarie. For the povertie of that facred Tribe of Levi must needs have beene exceeding great at this time, all their lands and possessions in the ten Tribes being utterly lost, the oblations and other perquifites, by which they lived being now very few and fmall; and the fore laidup in better times under godly Kings, being all taken away by shame full robberie. Yet they up-held in all this miserie the service of God, and the daily sacrifice, keeping daily their courses, and performing obedience to the high Priest, no lesse than inthose dayes wherein their entertainment was farre better.

§. I V. Of the preservation of Joas.

Thijada then occupied the high Priesthood, an honourable, wife, and religious mani-Tohis carefulnesse it may be ascribed, that the state of the Church was in some steriso der fort up-held in those unhappy times. His wife was Jehoshabeth, who was daughter oking Jehoram, and fifter to AhaZia, a godly Ladie and vertuous, whose pietie makes it feene that Athalia was not her mother, though her accesse to the Court argue the contrarie: but her discreet carriage might more easily procure her welcome to her own Fathers house, than the education under such a Mother could have permitted her to be such asshe was. By her care Joash the young Prince that raigned soone after, was conveighedout of the nurserie, when Athalia destroyed all the Kings children, and was carried secredy into the Temple, where as fecretly he was brought up. How it came to paffe that this young childe was not hunted out, when his bodie was miffing; nor any great reckoning (for ought that we finde) made of his escape, I will not stand to examine: for it was notgood in policie, that the people should heare say, that one of the children had avovdedthat cruell blow; it might have made them hearken after innovations, and so be the lesse conformable to the present government. So Joss was delivered out of that slaughtr., he and his nurse being gone no man could tell whither, and might bee thought peradvenureto be cast away, as having no other guard than a poor woman that gave himsuck; who foolifhly doubting that she her selfe should have bin sain, was fled away with him into some desolate place, where it was like enough that she and he should perish. In such cases flatterers, or men desirous of reward, easily coin such tales, and rather swearethem to be true in their own knowledge, than they will lose the thankes due to their joy full ti-

Whose some Joas was, whether Joas may be thought likely to have been the son of Ahazia.

TOw concerning this Joafh, whose some he was, it is a thing of much difficultie to affirme, and hath caused much controversie among writers. The places of Scripture, which call him the forme of Ahazia, seeme plaine enough. How any 2 Kin 17.23 figure of the Hebrew language might give title of Sonne unto him, in regard that hee & 2 Chr. 22.15 was his Successiour, I neither by my selfe can finde, nor can by any helpe of Authors learne how to answer the difficulties appearing in the contrary opinions of them; that thinke him to have beene, or not, the natural sonne of Ahazia. For whereas it is said, that the house of Ahazia was not able to retaine the Kingdome; some doe inferre that this 2 Chron 22.9 Joalh was not properly called his fon, but was the next of his kindred, and therefore succeeded him, as a some in the inheritance of his father. And hereunto the murder committed by Athalia, doth very well agree. For shee perceiving that the Kingdome was to fall into their hands, in whom the had no interest, might easily finde cause to feare, that the tyrannie exercised by her husband at her instigation upon so many noble Houses, would now bee revenged upon her selfe. The ruine of her Idolatrous Religion might in this case terrefie both her and her Minions; the sentence of the Law rewarding that offence with death; and the Tragedie of Jezabel teaching her what might happen to another Queene. All this had little concerned her, if her owne grand-child had beene heireto the Crowne; for she that had power enough to make her selfe Queene, could with more ease, and lesseenvie, have taken upon her the office of a Protector, by which authoritie she might have done her pleasure, and been the more both obeyed by others, and fecure of her owne estate, as not wanting an heir. Wherefore it was not needful, that she should be so unnatural, as to destroy the child of her own son, of whose life she might have made greater use than she could of his death: whereas indeed, the love of Grandmothers to their Nephewes, is little lesse than the Mothers to their children.

This argument is very strong. For it may seeme incredible, that all naturall affection should be cast a-side, when as neither necessitie urgeth, nor any commoditie therby gotten requireth it, yea when all humane policie doth teach one the same, which nature without reason would have perswaded.

†. I I.

That Joas did not descend from Nathan.

Ut (as it is more easie to find a difficultie in that which is related, than to shew how it might have otherwise bin) the pedigree of this Joalh is, by them which thinke him not the fon of Abazia, set down in such fort that it may very justly be suffer Cted. They fay, that he descended from Nathan the son of David, and not from Salimin. to which purposethey bring a Historic(I know not whence) of two families of the race of David, faying, that the line of Salomon held the kingdom with this condition, that if at any time it failed, the familie of Nathan should succeed it. Concerning this Nathanthe, fon of David, there are that would have him to be Nathan the Prophet, who asthey think, was by David adopted. And of this opinion was Origen, as also S. Augustine form. time was, but afterward he revoked it, as was meet; for this Nathan is reckoned among the fons of David, by Bathfua the daughter of Ammes, and therefore could not be the Prophet. Gregory NazianZen (as I find him cited by Peter Martyr) & after him Erafinus, and Faber Stapulenfis, have likewise held the same of Joash, deriving him from Nathan, But Nathan and those other brethren of Salomen by the same Mother, are thought, upon good likelihoods, to have bin the children of Wriathe Hittite: and fo are they accounted by fundrie of the Fathers, and by Lyra, and Abulenfis, who follow the Hebrew Exposion of that place in the first of Chronicles. The words of Salomon calling himselfetheonly 20 begotten of his mother, doe approve this exposition: for we reade of no more than two fons which Baihfua or Bathfheba did beare unto David, whereof the one begotten in a dulterie, died an Infant, and Salomon onely of her children by the King did live. Sother the rest must needs have bin the children of Uria, and are thought to have bin Devidionly by adoption. Wherefore if Joas had not bin the fon of Ahazia, then must that pedgree have bin falfe, wherein S. Matthew deriveth him lineally from Salomon; yea, then had not our bleffed saviour iffued from the loins of David, according to the flesh, but had only bin of his line by courtefie of the Nation, and form of law, as any other mighthave bin. As for the authoritie of Philo, which hath drawn many late writers into the opinion that Joah was not of the posteritie of Salomon, it is enough to say, that this was Fritt a Annius his Philo: for no other edition of Philo hath any fuch matter; but Annius can make Authors to speake what he lift.

t. III.

That Joas may probably be thought to have beene the son of Jehoram.

In so doubtfull a case, if it seems lawfull to hold an opinion that no man hath yet thought upon, me thinks it were not amisse to lay open at once, and peruse together two places of Scripture, whereof the one telling the wickedness of Jehoram the son of Jehosaphat King of Juda, for which he and his children perished, rehearseth it as one of Gods mercies towards the house of David, that according to his promise hee would give him a light and to his thildren for ever: the other doth say, that for the offences of the same Jehoram, there was not a some less thim, save Jehoahas the youngest of his somether am upon all his brethren, and of the Philissims and Arabians upon the children of Jehoram, one of the seed of David escaped; why may it not be thought that hee was said to have escaped, in whom the line of David was preserved; for had all therace of Salton man.

nan beene rooted up in these wofull Tragedies, and the progenie of Nathan succeeded inplace thereof; like enough it is that some remembrance more particular would have beene extant, of an event fo memorable. That the race of Nathan was not extinguished. it is indeed apparent by the Genealogie of our Lord, as it is recounted by S. Luke: but the preservation of the house of David, mentioned in the books of Kings and Chronicles, was performed in the perfon of Jehoahas, in whom the Royall branch of Salomon, the naturall, and not only legall iffue remaining of David, was kept alive. Wherefore it may be thought that this Joalh, who followed Athalia in the Kingdome, was the youngest son of Jubram, whose life Athalia, as a stepdame, was not likely to pursue. For it were not eafly understood, why the preservation of Davids line, by Gods especial mercie, in regard of his promise made, should pertaine rather to that time, when besides Ahazia himselfe, there were two and fortie of his brethren, or (as in another place they are Kin 1913, called) fonnes of his breth ren remaining alive, which afterwards were all flain by Jehu. than have reference to the lamentable deftruction and little leffe than extirpation of that 2 Chro.22.8. progenie, wherein one only did escape. Certainely that inhumane murther which 7ehoram committed upon his brethren, if it were (as appeareth in the Historic) revenged uponhis owne children; then was not this vengeance of God accomplished by the Philifins and Arabians, but being only begun by them, was afterwards profecuted by 7ehu. and finally tooke effect by the hands of that fame wicked woman, at whose instigation hehad committed fuch barbarous outrage. And from this execution of Gods heavie judgement laid upon Jeboram and all his children, onely Jehoabas his youngest sonne 2 Chro24-14wisexempted; whom therefore if I should affirm to be the same with Jour, which is calledthe fon of Abazia, I should not want good probabilitie. Some further appearance ofnecessitie there is, which doth argue that it could no otherwise have beene. For it wastheyoungest fonne of Jehoram in whom the race was preserved; which could not inany likelihood be Abazia, feeing that he was twentie yeares old at the least (as is already noted) when he began to raigne, and confequently, was borne in the eighteenth or twentieth yeare of his Fathers age. Now I know not whether of the two is more unlikely, either that Jehoram should have begotten many children before he was eighteenyears old, or that having (as he had) many wives and children, he should upon the hidden at his eighteenth year, become unfruitfull, and beget no more in twenty years following: each of which must have bintrue, if this were true that Abazia was the same Jehoaha? which was his youngest some. But this inconvenience is taken away, and those other doubts arising from the caulelesse crueltie of Athaha, in seeking the life of Four are easily cleered, if Four and Jehoahus were one. Neither doth his age with stand this opinion. For he was feven years old when he began to raigne; which if we understand 2 Chro, 22.20 of years complean, he might have bin a a year old at the death of Jehoram, being begoeten somewhat after the beginning of his sicknesse. Neither is it more absurd to say that he was the natural I fon of Teboram, though called the fon of Abazia, than it were to fav. asgreat Authors have done, this difficultie notwithstanding, that he was of the posteritie of Nathan. One thing indeed I know not how to answer; which, had it concurred with the reft, might have ferved as the foundation of this opinion. The name of Jehoahas, that foundeth much more neere to Joss, than to Abaziah, in an English yeare, doth in the Hebrew (as I am informed by some, skilfull in that language) through the diversitie of certaineletters, differ much from that which it most resembleth in our Western manner of witing, and little from the other. Now, although it be so that AhaZia himselfe be also called Azaria, & must have had three names, if he were the same with Jehoahas, in which 2 Chro. 22.50 maner Joan might also have had severall names; yet, because I find no other warrant here-Ofthanabare possibilitie, I will not presume to build an opinion upon the weak foundation of mine own conjecture, but leave all to the confideration of fuch as have more abilitieto judge, and leifure to confider of this point.

uponwhat reasons Athalia might seeke to destroy Joas, if he were her own grandshilde.

Ftherefore we shall follow that which is commonly received, and interpret the text according to the letter, it may be said, that Athalia was not only blinded by the passions of ambition and zeale to her idolatrous worship of Baalim, but pursued the accomplishment of some unnaturall desires, in seeking the destruction of her grand-child, and the rest of the bloud Royall. For whether it were so that Athalia (as proud and cruel women are not alwayes chaft) had imitated the libertie of Jezabel her fifter in law, whose whoredomes were upbraided by Jehu to her fon; or whether she had children by some former husband, before she was married unto Jehoram (which is not unlikely, in regardor her age, who was daughter of Omri, and fifter to Ahab) certain it is that the had fons of her own, and those old enough to be employed, as they were, in robbing of the Temple. So it is not greatly to be wondred at, that to fettle the crown upon her own children the did feek to cut off, by wicked policie, all other claimes. As for Jow, if the were his grand-mother, yet she might mistrust the interest which his mother would have inhim. lest when he came to years, it might draw him from her devotion. And hereof (besides that women doe commonly better love their daughters husbands, than their fons wives there is some appearance in the raign of her son; for she made him spendall his time in idle journeyes, to no other apparent end, than that she might rule at home; and he living abroad be estranged from his wife, and entertaine some new funcies, wherein Jezahlhad cunning enough to be his Tutoresse. But when the fword of Jehu had rudely cut in funder all these fine devices, then was Athalia fain to goe roundly to worke, and doe as she did whereby the thought to make all fure. Otherwife, if (as I could rather thinke) the were onely stepdame to Joas, we need not seek into the reasons moving her to take away his life; her own hatred was cause enough to dispatch him among the first.

A digression, wherein is maintained the libertie of using conjecture in Historia.

Hus much concerning the person of Joss, from whom, as from a new root, the tree of David was propagated into many branches. In handling of which matter, the more I consider the nature of this Historie, and the diversitie between the and others, the leffe me thinkes I need to suspect mine own presumption, as deserving a blame, for curiofitie in matter of doubt, or boldnesse in libertie of conjecture. For all Histories doe give us information of humane counsels and events, as farre forth asth knowledge and faith of the writers can afford; but of Gods will, by which all thingar ordered, they speake onely at randome, and many times falsly. This we often find in profane writers, who ascribe the ill successe of great undertakings, to the neglect of some pious Rites, whereof indeed God abhorred the performance as vehemently, athey thought him to be highly offended with the omission. Hereat we may the lesse worlden, if we consider the answer made by the Jewes in Egypt unto Jeremie the Prophet reprehending their Idolarrie. For howfoever the written Law of God was known unto the people, and his punishments laid upon them for contempt therof, were very terrible, and even then but newly executed; yet were they so obstinately bent unto their wills, that they would not by any means be drawn to acknowledge the true cause of their afficient on. But they told the Prophet roundly, that they would worship the Queene of Heeth, as they and their fathers, their Kings and their Princes had used to doe: For then (and they) had we plentie of victuals, and were well, and felt no evill: addding that all mant of miseries were befalne them, fince they left off that service of the Queene of Heaven. So blinde is the wisedome of man, in looking into the counsell of God, which to finde on, there is no better nor other guide than his own written will not perverted by vaine al-

But this Historic of the Kings of Ifrael and Juda hath herein a fingular prerogatives bove all that have beene written by the most sufficient of meerely humane Authors: 8 setteth downe expressly the true, and first causes of all that happened; not in imputing the death of Abab to his over-forwardnesse in battell; the ruine of his Familie, to the securitie of Jehoram in Jezreel; nor the victories of Hazael, to the great commotion raised in Israel, by the comming of Jehu; but referring all unto the will of God, Imean to his revealed will: from which that his hidden purpofes doe not varie, this Storie, many great examples, gives most notable proofe. True it is, that the concurrence fecond causes with their effects, is in these bookes nothing largely described; nor haps exactly in any of those Histories that are in these points most copious. For it was well noted by that worthy Gentlemen, Sir Philip Sidnie, that Historians doe borrow sphi sid in ha of Poets, not onely much of their ornament, but some what of their substance. Inform 1- Apol. for Poets, y rions are often false, records not alwaies true, and notorious actions commonly insufficient to discover the passions which doe set them first on foot. Wherfore they are faine (Ispeake of the best, & in that which is allowed; for to take out of Livie every one circumstance of Claudius his journey against Asdrubal in Italy, fitting all to another busineffe, or any practice of that kinde, is neither Historicall, nor Poeticall) to search into the particular humour of Princes, and of those which have governed their affections, or o the instruments by which they wrought; from whence they do collect the most likely motives or impediments of every businesse; and so figuring as necre to the life as they can imagine, the matter in hand, they judiciously consider the defects in counsaile, or obliquity in proceeding.

Yet all this, for the most part, is not enough to give assurance, how soever it may ove fatisfaction. For the heart of man is unfearcheable : and Princes, howfoever their intents bee seldome hidden from some of those many eyes which prie both into them. and into fuch as live about them; yet fometimes either by their owne close temper, or by some subtill mists, they conceale the truth from all reports. Yea, many times the affections themselves lye dead, and buried in oblivion, when the preparations which they begat, are converted to another use. The industrie of an Historian. having fo many things to weariest, may well be excused, when finding apparent cause enough of things done, it forbeareth to make further search; though it often fall out, where fundry occasions worke to the fame end, that one small matter in a weake minde is more effectuall, than many that seeme farre greater. So comes it manvimes to passe, that great fires, which consume whole houses or townes, begin with a few strawes, that lare wasted or not seene; when the slame is discovered, having fastened upon some wood-pile, that catchethall about it. Questionlesse it is, that the warre commenced by Darius, and purfued by Xerxes against the Greekes, proceeded from defire of the Perfians to inlarge their Empire: how foever the enterprize of the Athenians upon Sardes, was noised abroad as the ground of that quarrell; yet Herodotus telleth us, that the wanton defire of Queen Atoffa, to have the Grecian dames her bondwoman , did first move Darius to prepare for this warre before hee had recei- Herolius is ved any injury, & when he did not yet fo much defire to get more, as to enjoy what was already gotten.

I will not here stand to argue wher her Herodotus be more justly reprehended by some, or defended by others, for alledging the vain appetite, and secret speech of the Queen inbed with her husband, as the cause of those great evils following; this I may boldly affirme, (having, I thinke, in every estate some sufficient witnesse) that matters of much consequence, founded in all seeming upon substantiall reasons, have issued indeed from fuch pettie trifles, as no Historian would either thinke upon, or could well fearch

Therefore it was a good answer that Sixtus Quintus the Pope made to a certaine Frier, comming to visit him in his Popedome, as having long before in his meaner estate, beene his familiar friend. This poore Frier being emboldened by the Pope to use his old liberty of speech, adventured to tell him, that he very much wondred how it was possible for his Holinesse, whom he rather tooke for a direct honest man, than any cunning Politician, to attaine unto the Papacy; in compassing of which, all the subtilty (faid he) of the most crafty braines, finde worke enough: & therefore the more I thinke upon the Art of the Conclave, & your unaptnesse thereto, the more I needs must wonder. Pope Sixtus to satisfie the plaine dealing Frier, dealt with him againe as plainly, saying, Hadst thou lived abroad as I have done, and seen by what follie this world is governed, thou wouldest wonder at nothing.

Surely, if this bee referred unto those exorbitant engines, by which the course of affaires is moved, the Pope said true. For the wisest of men are not without their vanities, which requiring and finding mutuall toleration, worke more closely, and earnessly, than right reason either needes or can. But if wee lift up our thoughts to that supreme Governour, of whose Empire all that is true, which by the Poet was said of Jupiter.

Who rules the duller earth, the winde-fwolne streames, The civill Cities and th' infernall realmes, Who th' host of heaven, and the mortaliband, Alone doth governe by his just command.

Then shall wee finde the quite contrary. In him there is no uncertainty nor change hee foreseeth all things, and all things disposeth to his owne honour; He neither deciweth nor can bee deceived, but continuing one and the same for ever, doth constantly governe all creatures by that Law, which he hath prescribed, and will never alter. The vanities of men beguile their vaine contrivers, and the prosperity of the wicked, is the way leading to their destruction : yearthis broad and headlong passage to hell, is not for delightfull as it seemes at the first entrance, but hath growing in it, besides the poylons which infect the foule, many cruell thorns deeply wounding the body; all which, if any few escape, they have onely this miserable advantage of others, that their descent was the more fwift & expedite. But the service of God is the path guiding us to perfect hap to pines, & hath in it a true, though not compleat felicity, yeelding fuch abundance of joy to the conscience, as doth easily countervaile all afflictions what soever; though indeede those brambles that sometimes teare the skin of such as walke in this blessed way, doe commonly lay hold upon them at fuch time as they fit down to take their ease, & make them wish themselves at their journies end, in the presence of their Lord whom they faithfully serve, in whose presence is the fulnesse of joy, and as whose right hand are pluster

Wherefore it being the end and scope of all History, to teach by example of times past, such wisedome as may guide our defires and actions, we should not marvaile though the Chronicles of the Kings of Juda and Ifrael, being written by men inspired withthe Spirit of God, instructus chiefly, in that which is most requisite for us to know; as the meanes to attaine unto true felicity, both here, and hereafter, propounding examples which illustrate this infallible rule, The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wifedome. Had the expedition of Xerxes (as it was foretold by Daniel) beene written by some Prophit after the captivity: wee may well beleeve that the counsaile of God therein, & the extcutioners of his righteous will, should have occupied either the whole or the principal roome in that narration. Yet had not the purpose of Darius, the desire of his Wife, &the businesse at Sardes, with other occurrents, beene the lesse true, though they might have been omitted, as the leffe materiall: but these things it had been lawfull for any manto gather out of prophane Histories, or out of circumstances otherwise appearing, wherein to he should not have done injury to the Sacred Writings, as long as he had forbomtode. rogate from the first causes, by ascribing to the second more than was due.

Such, or little different, is the bufineffe that I have now in hand: wherein I cannot be leeve that any man of judgement will taxe me, as either fabulous or prefumptuous. For he doth not faine, that rehearseth probabilities as bare conjectures; neither doth hedeprave the Text, that seeketh to illustrate and make good in humane reason, those things which authority alone, without further circumstance, ought to have confirmed in every mans beliefe. And this may suffice in defence of the liberty which I have used in conjectures, and may hereafter use when occasion shall require, as neither unlawfull, nor

Hen Athalia had now fixe yeeres and longer worne the Crowne of Juda and had found neither any forreine enemy, nor domesticall adversarieto disturbe her possession, suddenly the period of her glory, & reward of her wickednesse meeting together, tooke her away without any warning, by a violent and hamefull death. For the growth of the young Prince began to bee fuch, as permitted him no longer to be concealed, and it had beene very unfitting that his education should hesimple, to make him seeme the childe of some poore man (as for his safety it was requilite,) when his capacity required to have beene indued with the stomacke and qualiries meete for a King. All this Jehojada the Priest considered, and withall, the great increase of impiety, which taking deepe roote in the Court, was likely to spread it selfe over all the Country, if care were not used to weede it up very speedily. Wherefore he affociated unto himselfe five of the Captaines, in whose fidelity hee had best affurances and having taken an oath of them, and shewed them the Kings sonne, he made a Covenativith them, to advance him to the Kingdome. These drew in others of the princinall men, to countenance the action, procuring at the first onely that they should repaire 10 Jerusalem, where they were further acquainted with the whole matter. There needed not many perswassions to win them to the businesse: the promise of the Lord unto the house of David, was enough to affure them, that the action was both lawfull, and likely to fucceed as they defired.

But in compassing their intent, some difficulties appeared: For it was not to be hoped. that with open force they should bring their purpose to good issue; neither were the Captains, & other affociats of Jehojada able by close working, to draw together so many trulty and ferviceable hands as would fuffice to manage the bufine se. To helpe in this cale the Prieft gave order to fuch of the Levires, as had finished their courses in waiting on the Divine fervice at the Temple, and were now relieved by others that succeeded in their turnes, that they should not depart untill they knew his further pleasure. So by admitting the new commers, and not discharging the old, he had, without any noise, made upfish a number, as would be able to deale with the Queenes ordinary Guard: and that was enough, for if the Tyrannesse did not prevaile against them at the first brunt, the fayour of the People was like to shew it selfe on their side, who made head against her. The Levites were placed in the inner Court of the Temple, about the person of the King, who as yet was kept close; the followers of the Captaines, and other adherents, where bestowed in the utter Courts: As for weapons, the Temple it selfe had store enough; King David had left an Armory to the place, which was now imployed in de-

CHAP. 21. S. 7.

All things being in a readinesse, and the day come, where in this high defigne was to be put in execution. Jehojada delivered unto the Captaines, Armour for them and their adherents, appointed a guard unto the Kings person, produced him openly, and gave untohim the Crowne; ufing all ceremonies accustomed in such solemnities, with great applause of the people. Of these doings, the Queene was the last that heard any word. Which is not fo strange as it may seeme: for infolent natures, by dealing outragiously with fuch as bring them ill tidings, doe commonly lose the benefit of hearing what isto befeared, whilest yet it may be prevented, and have no information of danger, till their owne eyes, amazed with the suddennesse, behold it in the shape of inevitable mis-

All Jerufalem was full of the rumour, and entertained it with very good liking. Some carried home the newes others ran forth to fee, and the common joy was fo great, that without apprehension of perill, under the windowes of the Court, were the people running and praifing the King. Athalia hearing and be holding the extraordinary concourie, 2 Chro. 23. 12. &noise of folkes in the streetes, making towards the Temple, with much unusuall pasfion in their lookes, did prefently conceive, that fomewhat worthy of her care was hap-Pened; though, what it might be, she did not apprehend. How soever it were, shee meant to use her owne wisedome in looking into the matter, and ordering all as the occafion might happen to require. It may bee, that the thought it fome especiall solemnitiensed in the Divine service, which caused this much adoe; and hereof the unaccustomed number of Levites, and of other devout men, about the towne, might give some prefumption.

Many things argue that she little thought upon her owne Tragedy salthough Josephus Would make it seeme otherwise. For we finde in the Text, She came to the people into 2 Chron.23.11. the house of the Lord (which was neere to her Palace) and that when she looked and faw 1 King. Land by him, and the Trumpetters proclaiming him, sheerent her clothes, and cryed Treason. Treason. Hereby it appeares that she was quietly going, without any miltrust or feare, to take her place; which when the found occupied by another, then the began to afflict her felfe, as one cast away, and cried out in vaine upon the Treason, whereby the faw that the must perish. But that she came with a guard of armed mento the Tem. ple, (as Tolephon reporteth) and that her company being beaten backe, shee entred alone and commanded the people to kill the young Tyrant, I finde no where in Scripture, nei ther doe I hold it credible. For had she truely known how things went, she would sure. ly have gathered her friends about her, and used those forces in defence of her Crown by which she gat it, and hitherto had held it. Certainely, if it were granted, that she like a new Semiramis, did march in the head of her troupe, yet it had been meere madneffein her, to enter the place alone, when her affiftants were kept out; but if shee, perceiving that neither her authority, nor their owne weapous, could prevaile to let-in her guard, would neverthelesse take upon her to command the death of the new King, calling a childe of seven yeeres old a Conspirator, and bidding them to kill him, whom she saw to bee armed in his defence, may we not thinke that she was mad in the most extreme degree ? Certaine it is that the counfaile of God would have taken effect, in her definction, had she used the most likely meanes to disappoint it : yet wee neede not so cut her throate with any morall impossibilities. It is enough to say, that the godly zealess Jehvjada found more easie success, through her indiscretion, than otherwise could have in beene expected; fo that at his appointment, shee was without more adoe, carried out of the Temple and flaine, yea fo, that no bloud, fave her owne, was shed in that quarrell. her small train that she brought along with her, not daring to stand in her defence.

6. VIII.

The death of Athalia, with a comparison of her and Jezabel.

Offlike it is, that Athalia had many times, with great indignation, bewailed the rashnesse of her Nephew Jehoram the Israelite, who did foolishly cast himselfe to into the very throate of danger, gaping upon him, onely through his eager defire of quickly knowing what the matter meant: vet shee her selfe, by the likebait, was taken in the like trap, and having lived fuch a life as Jezabel had done, was rewarded with a furable death. These two Queenes were in many points much alike, each of them was Daughter, Wife, and Mother to a King; each of them ruled her husband; was an Idolatresse and a Murdresse. The onely difference appearing in their conditions, is, that Jezabel is more noted as incontinent of body, Athalia as ambitious: 50 that each of them furviving her husband about eight yeeres, did spend their timeinsatisfying her owne affections; the one using tyrannie, as the exercise of her haughty minde; the other painting her face, for the ornament of her unchaste body. In the 40 manner of their death little difference there was, or in those things which may seeme in this world to pertaine unto the dead when they are gone. Each of them was taken on the fuddaine by Conspirators, and each of them exclaiming upon the Treason, received sentence from the mouth of one that had lived under her subjection; in execution whereof, Jezabel was trampled under the feet of her enemies horses; Athalia lain at her owne horse-gate; the death of Athalia having (though not much) the more lesfure to vexe her proud heart; that of Jezabel the more indignitie, and shame of bodies Touching their buriall, Jezabel was devoured by Dogges, as the Lord had thearned by the Prophet Elias; what became of Athalia wee doe not finde. Like enough it is, that she was buried, as having not persecuted and slaine the Lords Prophets, but suffer 50 red the Priests to exercise their function; yet of her buriall there is no monument, for fhe was a Church-robber. The fervice of Baal erected by thefe two Queenes, was destroyed as soone as they were gone, and their Chaplaines, the Priests of that Religion, flaine. Herein also it came to passe, alike, as touching them both when they were dead 3 the Kings who slew them, were afterwards afficied, both of them by the same hand of Hazael the Syrian; in which point Athalia had the greater honour, if the Syrian (who seemes to have beene her good friend) pretended her revenge, as any part of his quarrell to Juda. Concerning children, all belonging to Jezabel perished in few dayes after her: whether Athalia left any behinde her, it is uncertaine; the had fons living after she was Queene, of whom, or of any other, that they were slaine with her,

This is a matter not unworthy of confideration, in regard of much that may depend aponit. For if the children of Athalia had beene in Jerusalem when their Mother fell, their death would furely have followed hers as neerely, and beeneregifted, as well as the death of Mattan the Priest of Baal. That Law by which God forbad that the children Deut. 24.16 thould die for the fathers, could not have faved the fe ungracious Imps, whom the clause following would have cut off, which commands, that every man should die for his owne finne. Seeing therefore that they had beene professors and advancers of that vile and Idolatrous worship of Baal, yea had robbed the Temple of the Lord, and enriched the house of Baal with the spoile of it; likely it is, that they should not have escaped with life, if Jehojada the Priest could have gotten them into his hands. As there was lawfull cause enough requiring their death, so the security of the King and his friends, that is, of all the Land, craved as much, and that very earnestly. For these had beene effeemed as heires of their mothers Crowne, & being reckoned as her affiftants in that particular businesse of robbing the Temple, may be thought to have carried a great fway in other matters, as Princes, and fellowes with their Mother in the Kingdome. Therefore it is evident, that either they were now dead, or (perhaps following Hazael ninhiswarres against Jehu) absent from Jerusalem; whereby Jehojada might, with the more confidence, adventure to take Armes against their Mother, that was desolate.

CHAP. XXII.

of Joas his doings, whilest Jehojada the Priest lived!

Y the death of Athalia, the whole countrie of Juda was filled with great joy and quietneffe, wherein Joss, a childe of seven yeeres old or there-about, began his reigne, which continued almost fortie yeeres. During his minority, he lived under the protection of that honourable man Jekojada the Priest, who did as faithfully governe the Kingdome, as he had before carefully preferved the Kings life, & restored him unrothe Throne of his ancestors. When he came to mans estate, he tooke by appointment of Jehojada two wives, & be-gar Sonnes and Daughters, repairing the family of David which was almost worne out-The first Act that hee tooke in hand, when hee began to rule without a Protector, was the reparation of the Temple. It was a needfull piece of worke, in regard of the decay wherein that holy place was fallen, through the wirkednesse of ungodly Tyrans; and requisite it was that hee should up-hold the Temple, whom the Temple had up-held. This businesse the followed with so earnest a zeale, that not only the Levites were more flacke than he, but even Jehoj ada was faine to be quickened by his admonition. Money was gathered for the charges of the worke; partly out of the taxe imposed by Moses, 2Chro. 24.141 partly out of the liberality of the people: who gave so freely, that the Temple, besides all reparations, was enriched with vessels of gold and silver, and with all other Utenfiles. The facrifices likewise were offered, as under godly Kings they had beene, and the lervice of God was magnificently celebrated.

§. I I. The death of Jehojada, and Apostasie of Joas.

Ut this endured no longer than the life of Jehojada the Priest: who having lived an hundred and thirty yeeres, dyed before his Countrie could have spared him. He was buried among the Kings of Juda, as he well deferved, having preferred the race of them, & reftored the true Religion, which the late Princes of that house, by attempting to eradicate, failed but a little, of rooting up themselves, and all their issue, say Yetthis honourable Funerall feems to have bin given to him, at the motion of the people ; it being faid, They buried bim in the Citie of David. As for the King himfelfe, who didoweto him no leffe than his Crowne and life, he is not likely to have been Author ofit, seeing that hee was as easily comforted after his death, as if he had thereby been discharged of some heavie debr. For after the death of Jehojada, when the Princes of Juda began to flatter their King, he soone forgat, not only the benefits received by this worthy man his old Council lour, but also the good precepts which he had received from him, yea & God himlele, the Authour of all goodnesse. These Princes drew him to the worship of Idols, where with Jehoram and Athalia had so infected the Country, in fifteene or fixteene yeeres, that thirty yeeres, or there-about, of the reigne of Jow, wherein the true Religion was exercifed, were not able to cleere it from that mischiefe. The King himselfe, when once he was entred into these courses, ran on head-long, as one that thought it a tokenothis liberty, to despise the service of God; and a manifest proofe of his being now King indeed, that he regarded no longer the fowre admonitions of devout Priefts. Hereby it appeares, that his former zeale was only counterfeited, wherein like an Actor uponthe flage, he had striven to expresse much more lively affection, than they could shew, that were indeede religious.

6. III.

The causes and times of the Syrians invading Juda in the dayes of Joas.

Ut God, from whom hee was broken loose, gave him over into the hands of men, that would not easily bee shaken off. Hazael King of Aram, having taken Gath, a Towne of the Philistims, addressed himselfe towards Jerusalem, whi ther the little distance of way, and great hope of a rich booty, did invite him. He had an Army heartned by many victories, to hope for more; and for ground of the war (if his ambition cared for pretences) it was enough that the Kings of Juda had alled the Ifraelites, in their enterprises upon Aram, at Ramoth Gilead. Yet Ithinke hee il not want some further instigation. For if the Kingdome of Juda had molested the Armites, in the time of his predecessour, this was throughly recompensed, by forbearing, to fuccour Ifrael, & leaving the ten Tribes in their extreme mifery, to the fury of Hazul himselfe. Neither is it likely, that Hazael should have gone about to awake a sleeping Dogge, and stirre up against himselse a powerfull enemy, before he had affured the conquest of Israel, that lay between Jerusalem and his owne Kingdome, if some opportu nity had not performed fuch eafie and good fuccesse, as might rather advance, thanany way disturbe his future proceedings against the ten Tribes. Wherefore I holdit probeble, that the sonnes of Athalia, mentioned before, were with him in this action, promissing (as men expelled their Countries usually doe) to draw many partakers of their owne to his fide; and not to remaine, as Jose did, a neutrall in the warre between him and Ifrael, but to joyne all their forces with his, as they had cause, for the rooting out of Jehu his posterity, who , like a bloudy Traitor, had utterly destroyed all the kindred of the Queenes, their mother, even the whole house of Alab, to which hee was a subject. If this were so, Hazael had the more apparent reason w invade the Kingdome of Juda. Howfoever it were, we finde it plainely, that Jose was affraid of him, and therefore sooke all the hallowed things, and all the gold that was found in the treasures of the house of the Lord, or in his owne house, with which present het redeemed his peace: the Syrian (questionlesse) thinking it a better bargaine, to get fo much readily paid into his hand for nothing, than to hazzard the affurance of this for the possibility of not much more. So HaZael departed with a richbootie of unhappy treasure, which belonging to the living God, remained a small while in the possession of this mighty, yet corruptible man, but fent him quickely to the grave. For in the thirtie seventh yeere of Joas, which was the fifteenth of Jehoahaz, hee made this purchase; but in the fame or very next yeere he died, leaving all that hee had unto his Sonne Benhadad, with whom these treasures prospered no otherwise, than ill-gotten goods are

This enterprise of Hazaels, is, by some, confounded with that warre of the Aramites upon Juda, mentioned in the second booke of Chronicles. But the reasons alledged by them that hold the contrary opinion, doe forcibly prove, that it was not all one warre. For the former was compounded without bloud-shed or fight; in the latter, Tous trved the fortune of a battaile, wherin being put to the worst, he lost all his Princes, and hardly escaped with life: In the one, Hazael himselfe was present; in the other, hee was not named: but contrariwise, the King of Aram then reigning (who may seem to have then heenthe Sonne of Hazael) is faid to have beene at Damascus. The first Armie came to conquer, and was fo great, that it terrefied the King of Juda; The second was a small com- 2 Chron, 24.24, pany of men, which did animate Joss (invaine; for God was against him) to deale with them, as having a very great Armie.

Now, concerning the time of this former invalion, I cannot perceive that God forfookehim, till he had first forsaken God. There are indeed some, very learned, who thinke that this expedition of Hazael was in the time of Jehojada the Priest, because that florie is joyned unto the restauration of the Temple. This had beene probable, if the death of Jehojada had beene afterwards mentioned in that place of the second booke of Rings, or if the Apostasie of 7000, or any other matter implying so much, had followed in the relation. For it is not indeed to be doubted, that the Lord of all may difpose of all things, according to his own will & pleasure; neither was he more unjust in the afflictionsof Job that righteous man, or the death of Josias that godly King, than in the plagues which he laid upon Pharach, or his judgements upon the house of Ahab. But it appeares plainly, that the rich furniture of the Temple, and the magnificent fervice of God therewithall, which are joyned together, were used in the house of the Lord continually, all the 2 Chro. 24-14; dayes of Jebojada; soone after whose death, if not immediately upon it, that is (as some very learnedly collect) in the fixe, or thirty feventh yeere of this 3045 his reign, the King fallingaway from the God of his Fathers, became a foule Idolater. And indeed we commonly observe that the crosses which it hath pleased God sometimes to lay upon his fervants without any cause notorious in the eyes of men, have alwayes tended unto the bettering of their good. In which respect, even the sufferings of the bleffed Martys (the death of his Saints being precious in the fight of the Lord) are to Plality. 17. their great advantage. But with evilland rebellious men, God keepetha more even and frict account; permitting usually their faults to get the start of their punishment, & either delaying his vengeance (as with the Amorites) till their wickednesse be full: or not working their amendment by his correction, but fuffering them to run on in their wicked courses, to their greater misery. So hath he dealt with many; and so it appeares that hee dealt with Joas. For this unhappy man did not onely continue an obstinate Idolater, but grew to forgetfull of God and all goodnesse, as if hee had stroven to exceed the wickednelle of all that went before him, and to leave such a villainous patterne unto others, as tew or none of the most barbarous Tyrants should endure to imitate.

6. IV-

How Zacharia was murthered by Joas.

Undry Prophets having laboured in vaine to reclaime the people from their fuperstition, Zacharia the sonne of Jehojada the Priest, was stirred up at length by the Spirit of God, to admonish them of their wickednesse, and make them understand the punishment due unto it, whereof they stood in danger. This Zacharia was a man so much honoured, and sonne to a man so exceedingly beloved in his life time, and reverenced, that if foas had reputed him (as Abab did Elias) his open enemie, yet ought heincommon honesty, to have cloaked his ill affection, and have used at least some part of the respect that was due to such a person: On the other side, the singular affection which he and his father had borne unto the King, and the unrecountable benefits, which they had done unto him, from his first infancie, were such, as should have placed Za. charta in the most hearty and affured love of foas, yea though hee had bin otherwise a man of very small marke, and not very good condition. The truth is, that the message of a Prophet sent from God, should be heard with reverence, how simple soever heap peares that brings it. But this King Joss, having already fcorned the admonitions and protestations of such Prophets as first were sent, did now deale with Zacharia, like asthe wicked husbandmen in that parable of our Saviour, dealt with the heire of the Vineyard who faid, This is the heire, come let us kill him, that the inheritance may be ours. By killing to Zacharia he thought to become an absolute Commander, supposing belike that he was no free Prince, as long as one durst tell him the plain truth, how great soever that many deservings were, that did so, yea though Gods commandement required it. So they confpired against this holy Prophet, and stoned him to death at the Kings appointment: but whether by any forme of open Law, as was practifed upon Nabeth; or whether fur. prifing him by any close treachery; I doe neither reade, nor can conjecture. Thedenity of his person, considered together with their treacherous conspiracie, makes it pio. bable, that they durst not call him into publique judgement, though that the manner of his death, being such as was commonly, and by order of Law, inflicted upon malefactors, may argue the contrary. Most likely it is, that the Kings commandement, by which to hee suffered, tooke place in stead of Law: which exercise of meere power (as hath been already noted) was nothing strange amongst the Kings of Juda.

§. V.

How Joas was shamefully beaten by the Amorites, and of his death.

His odious murther, committed by an unthankefull frakeupon the man in whole bosome he had been fostered, as of it selfe alone it sufficed to make the wretched Tyrant hatefull to men of his own time, and his memory detefted in all ages, to a had it the well-described curse of the blessed Martyr, to accompany it unto the Throne of God, and to call for vengeance from thence; which fell downe swiftly, and heavily upon the head of that ungratefull monster. It was the last yeere of his reigne; thend of his time comming then upon him, when he thought himselfe beginning to live how he listed without controllement. When that yeer was expired, the Aramites cameinto the Country rather as may feem to get pillage, than to performe any great action; for 2 Chron.24.24. they came with a small company of men: but God had intended to do more by them, than they themselves did hope for.

That Joas naturally was a coward, his bloudy malice against his best friend, is, in my judgement, proofe fufficient: though otherwise his base composition with Hazael, when he hee might have leavied (as his fon after him did muster) three hundred thousandchofen men for the warre, doth wellenough shew his temper. Yet now he would needs be valiant, and make his people know, how frout of disposition their King was, when hee might have his owne will. But his timorous heart was not well cloaked. For to encounter with a few bands of Rovers, hee tooke a very great Army, fo that wife men might well perceive, that he knew what he did, making frew as if he would fight for his Countrie, and expose himselfe to danger of warre, when as indeed all was meere oftentation, and no perill to be feared; hee going forth fo strongly appointed, against so weak enemies. Thus might wife men thinke, and laugh at him in fecret; confidering what adot he made above that, which in all apparent reason was (as they say) a thing of nothing of

But God, before whom the wisedome of this world is foolishnesse, did laugh not only at this vaine-glorious King, but at them that thought their King secure, by reasonof the multitude that he drew along with him.

When the Aramites & King Joas mer, whether it were by fome folly of the Leaders, or by some amazement happening among the souldiers, or by whatsoever means it pleafed God to worke, fo it was, that that great Army of Juda received a notable over-throw, and all the Princes were destroyed: the Princes of Juda, at whose perswasion the King had become a Rebell to the King of Kings. As for Joas himselfe(as Abulensis and others expound the story) he was forely beaten and hurt by them, being (as they thinke) taken and shamefully tormented, to wring out of him an excessive ransome.

And furely, all circumstances doe greatly strengthen this conjecture. For the Text (in the old translation) faith, they exercised upon Joss ignominious judgements; & that denatting from him, they dismissed him in great languor. All which argues, that they had himintheir hands, and handled him ill-tayouredly. Now at that time Joas the fonne of Atheaha reigned over Israel, and Benhadad the son of Hazael over the Syrians in Damafais; the one a valiant under-taking Prince, raifed up by God to restore the State of his miferable Country; the other inferiour every way to his father; of whose purchases hee loft agreat part, for want of skill to keepe it. The difference in condition found herweene these two Princes, promising no other event than such as afterward followed, might have given to the King of Juda good cause to be bold, and plucke up his spirits; which HaZael had beaten downe, if God had not beene against him. But his fearefull heart being likely to quake upon any apprehension of danger, was able to put the Svrian King in hope, that by terrefying him with some shew of warre at his doores, it were easie to make him crave any tolerable conditions of peace. The unexpected good succeffehereof, already related, & the (perhaps as unexpected) ill fuccesse, which the Aramires found in their following warres against the King of Israel, sheweth plainely the weakenesse of all earthly might, resisting the power of the Almighty. For by his Ordinance, both the Kingdome of Juda, after more than forty yeeres time of gathering frength, was unable to drive out a small companie of Enemies; and the Kingdome of Ifael having to been trodden downe by Hazael, that onely fifty Horfemen, tenne Chariots, and tenne thousand Footmen were left; prevailed against his Sonne, & recovered all from the victorious Aramites. But examples hereof are every-where found, & therefore I will not infift upon this; though indeed wee should not, if we be Gods children, thinkeit more tedious to heare long & frequent reports of our heavenly Fathers honourthan of the noble acts performed by our fore-fathers upon earth.

When the Aramites had what they lifted, & faw that they were not able, being fo few. to take any possession of the Country, they departed out of Juda loaden with spoile. which they fent to Damascus, themselves belike falling upon the ten Tribes, where it is to be thought that they fped not halfe fo well. The King of Juda being in ill case, was killed on his bed when he came home, by the fons of an Ammoniteffe, & of a Moabiteffe. whom some (because onely their Mothers names, being strangers, are expressed) thinke to have beene bondmen. Whether it were contempt of his fortune, or feare, lest (as Tyrantsuse) hee should revenge his disaster upon them, imputing it to their fault, or whatloever else it were that animated them to murder their King; the Scripture telsus plainly, that, For the blond of the children of Jehojada, this befell him. And the same ap- 2 Chro. 24.25. pears to have beene used as the pretence of their conspiracy, in excuse of the fact when it was done. For AmaZia, the sonne and successor of Joas, durst not punish them, till his Kingdome was established: but contrariwise, his body was judged unworthy of buriall in the Sepulchres of the Kings: whereby it appeares, that the death of Zacharia caused the treason, wrought against the King, to finde more approbation, than was requisite, among the people, though afterwards it was recompensed by his fonne, upon the Trai-

Of the Princes living in the time of Joas: of the time when Carthage was built; and of Dido.

Here lived with Joas, Mexades & Diognetus in Athens: Eudemus and Aristomedes in Corinth: about which time Agrippa Sylvius, and after him Sylvius Alladius, were Kings of the Albans in Italy. OcraZapes, commonly called Anacyndaraxes, the thirty seventh King succeeding unto Ophratanes, began his reigne over the Affyrians, about the eighteenth yeere of Jose, which lasted forty two yeeres. In the fixteenth of Joas, Cephrenes, the fourth from Sefac, fucceeded unto Cheops in the Kingdome of Egypt, and held it fifty yeeres.

In this time of Joss, was likewise the reigne of Pigmalion in Tyre, and the foundation

App. forty and three yeeres and eight moneths from the building of Salomors Temple, inthe twelfth yeer of Hyram King of Tyre, to the founding of Carthage by Dido, in the fevent of Pigmalion. The particulars of this accompt (which is not rare in Jojep w) are very perplexed, and ferve not very well to make cleer the totall fumme. But whether it were fo that Tolephus did omit, or else that he did mis-write some number of the yeers, which he reckoneth in Fractions, as they were divided among the Kings of Tyre, from Hyani, to Pigmalion; we may well enough beleeve, that the Tyrian writers, out of whosebooks hee gives us the whole fumme, had good meanes to know the truth, and could rightly reckon the difference of time, betweene two works no longer following one the other than the memory of three or foure generations might eafily reach. This hundred form and foure yeeres current, after the building of Salomons Temple, being the eleventh veere of Jou, was a hundred forty and three yeeres before the birth of Rome; and after the destruction of Troy, two hundred eighty and nine : a time so long after the death of Acres, that wee might truely conclude all to be fabulous which Virgil hath written of Dido as Aufonius noteth, who doth honour her Statua with this Epigram:

But flying proud Iarbas villanie, Not mov'd by furious love or jealousie; I did with weapon chaste, to save my fame, Make way for death untimely ere it came. This was my end; but first I built a Towne, Reveng'd by husbands death, liv'd with renowne. Why did'ft thou stirre up Virgil, envious Muse. Falfely my name and honour to abuse ? Readers believe Historians; not those Which to the world foves thefes and vice expose. Poets are lyars, and for verses sake Will make the gods of humane crimes partake.

From the time of Dido unto the first Punick warre, that Carthage grew & flourished in wealth and conquests, we finde in many Histories: but in particular we finde little of the Carthaginian affaires before that war, excepting those few things that are recorded of their attempts of the Isle of Sicil. We will therefore deferre the relation of matters concerning that mighty Citie, untill such time as they shall encounter with the State of Rome, by which it was finally destroyed; and prosecute in the mean while the History that is now in hand.

The beginning of Amazia his reigne: Of Joas King of Ifrael, and Elishathe Prophet.

Mazias, the fon of Joash, being twenty five yeeres old when his Father died, tooke possession of the Kingdome of Juda, wherein he laboured so to demeane himselse, as his new beginning reigne might bee least offensive. The Law of Moss hee professed to observe; which howsoever it had beene secretly despised since the time of Jehoram, by many great persons of the land, yet had it by provision of good Princes, yea and of bad ones (in their best times) imitating the good, but especially by thecare of holy Priests, taken such deepe roote in the peoples hearts, that no King might hope to be very plaufible, who did not conform himselfe unto it. And at that prefentume, the flaughter, which the Aramites had made of all the Princes, who had withdrawnethelate King from the service of God, being seconded by the death of the King himselfe, even whilest that execrable murther, committed by the King upon Zecharia, wasvetfiesh in memory, did serve as a notable example of Gods justice against Idolaters, both to animate the better fort of the people in holding the Religion of their fathersand to discourage Amazia from following the way, which led to such an evillend. Hee therefore, having learned of his father the art of diffimulation, did not onely forbeare to punish the Traitors that had flain King Joss, but gave way to the time, and suffered the dead body to be interred, as that of Jeheram formerly had been, in the City of David, yet not among the Sepulchres of the Kings of Juda. Nevertheleffe, after this, when (belike) the noise of the people having wearied it selfe into silence, it was found that the Conspirators (howsoever their deed done, was applauded as the handie worke of God) had neither any mighty partakers in their fact, nor strong maintainers of their persons, but rested secure, as having done well, seeing it was not ill taken: the King, who perceived his government well established, called them into question, at such a time, as the heate of mens affections being well allayed, it was easie to distinguish between their treasons and Gods judgements, which, by their treasons, had taken plausible effect. So they were put to death without any tumult, and their children (as the Law did require) were suffered to live: which could not but give contentment to the people, seeing that their King did the office of a just Prince, rather than of a revenging sonne. This being done, and his owne life better secured, by such exemplary justice, against the like attemps; Amazia carried himselfe outwardly as a Prince well affected to Religion, & so continued in rest, about twelve or thirteen yeeres.

As Amazia gathered strength in Juda by the commodity of a long peace, so Joss the liaelite grew as fast in power, by following the warre hotly against the Aramites. He was a valiant and fortunate Prince, yet an Idolater, as his Predecessors had beene, worhipping the Calves of Teroboam. For this sinne had God so plagued the house of Jeha, that the ten Tribes wanted little of being utterly confumed, by HaZael and Benhadad, in the time of Jehu and his sonne Jehoshaz. But as Gods benefits to Jehu, sufficed not to With-draw him from this politique Idolatry; so were the miseries, rewarding that implety, unable to reclaim Jehosha? from the fame impious course: yet the mercy of God beholding the trouble of Israel, did condescend unto the prayers of this ungodly Prince, even then when hee and his miserable subjects, were obstinate in following their owne abominable waies. Therefore in temporall matters the ten Tribes recovered apace; but the favour of God, which had beene infinitely more worth, I doe not and not believe that they fought: that they had it not, I finde in the words of the Prophet, faying plainely to Amazia, The Lord is not with Ifrael, neither with all the 2 Chro. 25.76

Whether it were fo, that the great Prophet Elisha, who lived in those times, did for. tell the prosperity of the Israelites under the reigne of Jose; or whether Jeboahaz, wea ried and broken with long adversity, thought it the wifest way, to discharge himself in part of the heavie cares attending those unhappy Syrian Warres, by laying thebut King. 13. 10. then upon his hopefull fonne; wee finde that in the thirtie seventh yeere of Joas, King of Juda, Joas the sonne of Jehoahaz began to reigne over Israel in Samaria; which was a the 15. yeere of his fathers reigne, and fome two or three yeeres before his death.

The second Booke of the first part

It appeares that this young Prince, even from the beginning of his Rule, did fowd husband that poore stock that he received from his Father, of ten Chariots, fifty Holfe men, and ten thousand Foot, that hee might seeme likely to prove a thriver. Among other circumstances, the words which he speake to Elishathe Prophet, argue notific For Jose visiting the Prophet, who lay sicke, spake unto him thus; o my father, my father, the Chariot of Ifrael, and the hor femen of the fame : by which maner of speech heedidace knowledge, that the prayers of this holy man had flood his Kingdom in more flead, than all the Horses and Chariots could doe.

This Prophet who fucceeded unto Elias, about the first yeere of Joram the some of Abab King of Ifrael, died (as some have probably collected) about the third or south yeer of this Joas, the Nephew of Jehr. To shew how the spirit of Elias was doubled or did rest upon him, it exceedeth my faculty. This is recorded of him, that heedid me onely raife a dead childe unto life, as Elias had done, but when hee himfelfe was dead in pleased God that his dead bones should restore life unto a carcass, which touched them in the grave. In fine, hee bestowed as a legacie, three victories upon King Joss, who thereby did fet Israel in a faire way of recovering all that the Aramites had usured, and weakning the Kings of Damasco in such fort, that they were never after temble to Samaria.

§. VIII.

of Amazia his warre against Edom; His Apostasie; and overthrow by Joas.

THe happy successe which Joas had found in his war against the Aramites, was fuch as might kindle in AmaZia a defire of undertaking some expedition, wherein himselse might purchase the like honour. His Kingdome could fimile three hundred thousand serviceable men for the Wars; and his treasures were sufficient for the payment of these, and the hire of many more. Cause of war hee had very just against the Edomites, who having rebelled in the time of his grand-father Jehoram, had about fifty yeeres beene unreclaimed, partly by reason of the troubles happenigin Juda, partly through the floth and timerousnesse of his father Joas. Yet, forasmuchs the men of Juda had in many yeeres beene without all exercise of Warre (excepting that unhappy fight wherein they were beaten by a few bands of the Aramites) heeheld it a point of wisedome to increase his forces, with souldiers waged out of Israel, whence he hired for an hundred talents of filver, an hundred thousand valiant men, as the Scopture telleth us, though Josephus diminish the number, saying that they were but twenty

This great Army, which with so much cost Amazia had hired out of Ifrael, hewas faine to dismisse before hee had imployed it, being threatned by a Prophet withilling ceffe, if he strengthened himselfe with the helpe of those men, whom God (thoughin mercy hee gave them victory against the cruell Aramites) did not love, because they were Idolaters. The Israelites therfore departed in great anger, taking in ill part this difmission, as an high disgrace; which to revenge, they fell upon a piece of Juda in their returne, and shewed their malice in the flaughter of three thousand men, and some spoile, which they carried away. But AmaZia with his owne forces, knowing that God would bee affiftant to their journey, entred courageously into the Edomities Countrie, over whom obtaining victory, he flew ten thousand, and tooke other ten thousand prisoners, all which hee threw from an high rocke; holding them, it seemes, rather as Traytors, than as just enemies. This victory did not seeme to reduce Edom under the subjection of the Crowne of Juda; which might bee the cause of that severity, which was used to the prisoners; the Edomites that had escaped, refusing to buy the lives of their friends and kinfmen at fo deare a rate, as the losse of their owne libertie. Some townes in mount

Seir, Amazia took, as appeares by his carrying away the Idols thence; but it is like they were the places most indefensible in that he left no garrisons there, whereby he might another year the better have purfued the conquest of the whole countrey. Howsoever invere, he got both honour by the journey, and gains enough, had he not lost himselfe.

Among other spoyles of the Edomites, were carryed away their gods; which being vanquished and taken prisoners, did deserve well to be led in triumph. But they contrarivalle. Iknow not by what strange witchcraft, so besotted this unworthie King AmaZia, that hift them up to be his gods, and worthipped them, and burned incense unto them.

2 Chro.25.14.

Forthis when he was rebuked by a Prophet sent from God, he gave a churlish and threatning answer; asking the Prophet, Who made him a Counseller, and bidding him holdhis peace for feare of the worft. If either the costly stuffe, whereof these Idols were made, or the curious workemanship and beautie, with which they were adorned by Arrificers, had ravished the kings fancie; methinkes, he should have rather turned them mmatter of profit, or kept them as house-hold ornaments and things of pleasure, than thereby have suffered himselfe to be blinded, with such unreasonable devotion towards them. If the superstitious account wherein the Edomites had held them, were able to worke much upon his imagination; much more should the bad service which they had done to their old Clients, have moved him thereupon to laugh, both at the Edomites. and them. Wherefore it feemes to me, that the fame affections carried him from God. unto the service of Idols, which afterwards moved him to talke so roughly to the Prophetreprehending him. He had alreadie obeyed the warning of God by a Prophet, and fentaway such auxiliarie forces as he had gathered out of Ifrael; which done, it is fayd, that he was encouraged, and led forth his people, thinking belike, that God would now ra- 2 Chro. 25. 25. theraffift him by miracle, than let him faile of obtaining all his hearts defire. But with betterreason he should have limited his desires by the will of God, whose pleasure it was that Elau having broken the yoake of Jacob from his neck, according as Ilaac had foretold, should no more become his servant. If therefore Amazia did hope to re-conquerall the Countrey of Edom, he failed of his expectation; yet fo, that he brought homeboth profit and honour, which might have well contented him.

Butthere is a foolish and a wretched pride, wherewith menbeing transported, can ill endure to ascribe unto God the honour of those actions, in which it hath pleased him to use their owne industrie, courage, or fore-fight. Therefore it is commonly seene, that they, who entring into battell, are carefull to pray for aide from heaven, with due acknowledgement of his power, who is the giver of victorie; when the field is won, doe vaunt of their owneexploits: one telling how he got such a ground of advantage; another, how he gave checke to fuch a battalion; athird, how he feized on the enemics Canon; every one striving to magnifie himselfe, whilest all forget God, as one that had not been present in the action. To ascribe to fortune the effects of another mans vertue, is Iconfesse, an argument of malice. Yet this is true, that as he which finderh better sucteffe, than he did, or in reason might expect, is deepely bound to acknowledge God the Author of his happinesse; so he whose meere wisdome and labour hath brought things, to a prosperous issue, is doubly bound to shew himselfe thankefull, both for the victorie, and for those vertues by which the victorie was gotten. And indeed so far from weakenesse is the nature of such thankes giving, that it may well be called the height of magnamimities no vertue being so truely heroicall, as that by which the spirit of man advanceth itselfe with confidence of acceptation, unto the love of God. In which sense it is a brave speech that Evander in Virgil useth to Enew, none but a Christian being capable of the admonition:

Aude hoftes contemnere opes & te quoque dignum

Finge Deo.

With this Philosophie AmaZia (as appears by his carriage) troubled not his head: he had fliewed himsefe a better man of war than any King of Juda, since the time of Jehosaphat, and could be well contented, that his people should think him little inferior to David: of which honour he saw no reason why the Prophets should rob him, who had made him losean hundred talents, and done him no pleasure; he having prevailed by plaine force and good conduct, without any miracle at all. That he was diftempered with fuch vaine thoughts as these (besides the witnesse of his impietie following) Josephus doth Josephus doth testifie z Aaa testifie; faying, That he despised God, and that being pust up with his good successe, of which neverthelesse he would not acknowledge God to be the Author, he commanded For King of Israelto become his subject, and to let the tenne Tribes acknowledge him their Soveraigne, as they had done his Ancestours King David and Salomon. Some think that his quarrell to Joss was rather grounded upon the injurie done to him by the Ifraelites, whom he difmiffed in the journey against Mount Seir. And likely it is, the the fense of a late wrong had more power to stirre him up, than the remembrance of a old title, forgotten long fince, and by himselfe neglected thirteene or founteen yeares. Neverthelesse it might so be, that when he was thus provoked, he thought not enough to requite new wrongs, but would also call old matters into question; the so the Kings of Israel might, at the least, learne to keepe their subjects from offending Juda, for feare of endangering their owne Crownes. Had Amazia defired onely R. compence for the injurie done to him, it is not improbable that hee should haveled fome reasonable answer from Joss, who was not desirous to fight with him. Buttles fwer which Jour returned, likening himselfe to a Cedar, and Amazia in respect of him to no better than a thiftle, shewes that the challenge was made in insolent termes, perhaps with such proud comparison of Nobilitie, as might be made (according) that which Josephus hath written) between a King of ancient race, and one of lessenous

Sephocles in A jace

It is by Sophocles reported of Ajax, that when going to the warre of Troy, his faller tie than vertue. did bid him to be valiant, and get victorie by Gods affistance, he made answer, The Gods affistance a coward could get victorie, but he would get it alone without helpe: after which proud speech, though he did many valiant acts, he had finalling and finally, killing himselfe in a madnesse, whereinto hee fell upon disgrace mind was hardly allowed the honour of buriall. That Amazia did utter such words, lin not finde: but having once entertained the thoughts, which are parents of such work he was rewarded with successe according. The very first counsell wherein this war was concluded, serves to prove that he was a wife Prince indeed at Jerusalem, anny his Parasites, but a foole when he had to deale with his equals abroad. For it wast all one, to fight with the Edomites, a weake people, trusting more in the site of the Countrey, than the valour of their Souldiers; and to encounter with Jous, who im fo poore beginnings had raised himselfe to such strength, that he was able to lend is friend a hundred thousandmen, and had all his Nation exercised, and trained was long victorious warre. But as Amazia discovered much want of judgement, in unduaking such a match; so in prosecuting the businesse, when it was set on foot, hebeind himselfe as a man of little experience, who having once onely tryed his fortune, at found it to be good, thought that in Warre there was nothing else to doe, that in a defiance, fight, and winne. Joss on the contrarie fide, having beene accustomin deale with a stronger enemie than the King of Juda, used that celeritie, which peralter ture had often flood him in good flead against the Aramite. He did not sit waiting the enemies brake in and wasted his Countrey, but presented himselse with an Amie Juda, readieto bid battell to Amazia, and fave him the labour of along journey. The could not but greatly discourage those of Juda; who (besides the impression of a which an invation beates into people, not inured in the like) having devoured into greedie hopes, the spoyle of Israel, fully perswading themselves to get as much, as easie rate as in the journey of Edom; were so farre disappointed of their expediment that well they might suspect all new assurance of good lucke, when the old had thus be guiled them. All this notwithstanding, their King that had stomacke enough to challed the patrimonie of Salomen, thought like another David to winne it by the swon The iffue of which foole-hardineffe might eafily have beene foreseene in humans of fon; comparing together, either the two Kings, or the qualitie of their Armies, or first and ominous beginning of the Warre. But meere humane wisedome, howlord it might foresee much, could not have prognosticated all the mischiefe that fellupan mazia. For as soone as the two Armies came in fight, God, whose helpe this wrend man had so despised, did (as Josephus reports it) strike such terrour and amazement the men of Juda, that without one blow given, they fled all away, leaving their King shift for himselfe; which he did so ill, that his enemie had soone caught him, and me him change his glorious humour into most abject basenesse. That the Armie w fed fultained any other losse than of honour, I neither finde in the Scriptures nor in 70hour; it being likely that the soone beginning of their flight, which made it the more hamefull, made it also the more safe. But of the mischiefe that followed this overthow, rwas Gods will that Amazia himselfe should sustaine the whole disgrace. For Toas caraied him directly to Jerusalem, where he bade him procure that the gates might be opened to let him in and his Army; threatning him otherwise with present death. So much hanged was the miferable captive, with these dreadfull words, that he durst do no other hanperswade the Citizens, to yeeld themselves to the mercie of the Conquerour. The Towne, which afterwards being in weaker state held out two yeares against Nebuchad. ellar, was utterly dismaid, when the King that should have given his life to save it used all his force of command and intreaty to betray it. So the gates of Jerusalem were opered to Jeas, with which honour (greater than any King of Ifrael had ever obtained) hee muld not rest contented, but the more to despise Amazia and his people, he caused 400. abits of the wall to be throwne downe, and entred the citie in his Chariot through that breach, carrying the King before him as intriumph. This done, he fackt the Temple, and the Kings Palace, and to taking hostages of Amazia, he dismissed the poor creature that wasglad of his life, and returned to Samaria.

discourse of the reasons hindring Joas from uniting Judato the Crown of Israel, when hee hidron Jerusalem, and held Amazia prisoner. The end of Joas his reigne.

TEmay justly marvell how it came to passe, that Joss, being thus in posselfion of Jerusalem, having the King in his hands, his enemies forces broken. and his own entire, could be so content to depart quietly with a little spoil, henke might have feized upon the whole Kingdome. The reigne of Athalia had gien himcause to hope that the issue of David might be dispossessed of that crowne; his vnnobility, being the son & grand-child of Kings, together with the famous acts that thad done, were enough to make the people of Juda think highly of him; who might to have preferred his forme of governement before that of their own Kings, especially fuch a time, when a long succession of wicked Princes had smothered the thanks which eredue to the memory of a few good ones. The commodity that would have enfued bonthe union of all the twelve Tribes under one Prince, is fo apparent, that I need not infiftonit. That any meffage from God forbade the Israelite (as afterwards in the Grie which Peka the fon of Romelia got upon Aba?) to turne his prefent advantage the bestuse, wee doe not reade. All this makes it the more difficult to resolve the leftion, why a Prince fo well exercifed as Jeas had beene in recovering his owne, and ining from his enemy, should for sake the possession of Jerusalem, and wilfully negthe possibilities, or rather cast away the full assurance of so faire a conquest, as the ingdome of Juda.

But concerning that point, which of all others had been most materiall. I meane the fire of the vanquished people to accept the Israelite for their King, it is plainely seen, tt entring Jerusalem in triumphant manner, Joss was unable to concoct his owne protritie. For the opening of the gates had beene enough to have let him not onely into Citie, but into the Royall Throne, and the peoples hearts, whom by faire intreatie pecially having fure meanes of compulfion) hee might have made his owne, when y law themselves betrayed, and basely given away by him whose they had beene ore. The faire marke which this opportunitie presented, hee did not aime at, bele his ambition was otherwise, and more meanely busied, in levelling at the glory triumphat entry through a breach. Yet this errour might afterwards have beene refled well enough, if entring as an enemie, and shewing what hee could doe, by riding his anger upon the Walles, he had within the Citie done offices of a friend, and outed to shew good will to the inhabitants. But when his pride had done, his coveis leftle beganne, and sought to please it selfe with that which is commonly most reatothe spoyler, yet should be most forborne. The Treasure wherewith Sesac Hazael, the Philistims, men ignorant of the true God and his Religion, had quenched their edy thirst, ought not to have tempted the appetite of Jeas, who though an Idolater,

Thus following that course, which the most vertuous King of our (taxing it with the same phrase) hath wisely avoyded; by stealing a few Apples, he lost the inheritance of the whole Orchard. The people deteited him, and after the refpin of a few dayes, might, by comparing themselves one to one, perceive his Souldiersto. be no better than men of their owne mould, and inferiour in number to the inhabitants of fogreat a Citie. It is not so easse to hold by force a mightie town entered by capinlation, as to enter the gates opened by unadvised feare. For when the Citizens,, nother ing difarmed, recover their spirits, and begin to understand their first errour; they will thinke upon every advantage, of place, of provisions, of multitude, yea of women are med with tile-stones; and rather choose by desperate resolution, to correct the wills growne out of their former cowardife, than fuffer those mischieses to poyson the bodie, which in fuch halfe-conquests, are easily tasted in the mouth. A more lively example hereof cannot be defired, than the Citie of Florence, which through the weakenessed Peter de Medices, governing therein as a Prince, was reduced into fuch hard teames. that it opened the gates unto the French King Charles the eighth, who not planely professing himselfe either friend or foe to the State, entred the Towne, with his Armie, in triumphant maner, himfelfe and his horfe armed, with his lance upon his high Many infolencies were therein committed by the French, and much argument of quarrell ministred betweene them and the Townes-men: fo farre forth that the Florintines, to preserve their libertie, were drivento prepare for fight. To conclude the matter, Charles propounds intolerable conditions, demanding huge summesofred money, and the absolute Seigniorie of the State, as conquered by him, who entited the Citiein Armes. But Peter Caponi, a principall Citizen, catching these Articles from the Kings Secretarie, and tearing them before his face, bad him found his Trumper, and they would ring their Bels: which peremptorie words made the Frenchbahinke themselves, and come readily to this agreement, that for fortie thousand pounds, and not halfe of that money to be paid in hand, Charle: should not onely depart inpeace, butrestore whatsoever he had of their Dominion, and continue their assured friend. So dangerous a matter did it seeme for that brave Armie, which in few moneths after wannethe Kingdome of Naples, to fight in the streets, against the armed multimule of that populous Citie. It is true, that Charles had other businesse (and so perhaps had Joss, as shall anon be shewed) that called him away: but it was the apprehension of imminent danger that made him come to reason. In such cases the firing of houses, usually drawes every Citizento fave his owne, leaving victorie to the Souldier: yet where the people are prepared and resolved, women can quench, as fast as the ename, having other things to looke unto, can fet on fire. And indeede that Commanderis more given to anger than regardfull of profit, who upon the uncertaine hope of deftroying a Towne, for sakes the affurance of a good composition. Diversitie of circumstance may alter the case: it is enough to say, that it might be in Jerusalem, as we know it was in

How strongly soever Jose might hold himselfe within Jerusalem, he could not easily depart from thence, with his bootie safe, if the armie of Juda, which had bin more terrefied than weakned in the late encounter, should re-enforce it selfe, and give hima checke upon the way. Wherefore it was wifely done of him, to take hoftages for his better fecuritic, his Armie being upon returne, and better loaden than when it came forth; for which causes it was the more unapt to fight.

Besides these impediments, within the Citie and without, serving to coole the ambition of Joss, and keepe it down from aspiring to the Crown of Juda; it appeares that fomewhat was newly fallen out, which had reference to the anger of Elisha the Prophet, who, when this Jour had smitten the ground with his arrowes thrice told him that he should no oftner smite the Aramites. The three victories which Israel had against Aram, are by some, and with great probabilitie, referred unto the fifth, sixth, and seventh yeares of Joas: after which time, if any losses ensuing had blemished the former good fuccesse, ill might the King of Israel have likened himselfe to a stately Cedar, and worse could be have either lent the Judaan one hundred thou fand men, or meet him in battell. who was able to bring into the field three hundred thou fand of his owne. Seeing therefore it is made plaine by the words of Elisha, that after three victories Joash should finde fomechange of fortune, and fuffer loffe; we must needs conclude, That the Aramite prevailed upon him this yeare, it being the last of his Raigne. That this was so, and that the Sprians, taking advantage of Joas his absence, gave such a blow to Ifrael, as the King at his return was not able to remedie, but rather fell himselfe into new misfortunes, which increased the calamitie; we may evidently perceive in that which is spoken of Ferobeam his son. For it is faid, That the Lord saw the exceeding bitter afflictions of Israel, and that having not decreed to put out the name of Ifrael from under the Heaven, he preserved them be the hand of Jeroboam the sonne of Joas. This is enough to prove, that the victorious Raione of Joss was couclided with a fad catastrophe; the riches of the Temple hastning his miserie and death, as they had done with Sesac, Athalia, and Hazael, and as afterwards they wrought with Antiochus, Crassus, and other facrilegious Potentates.

Thus either through indignation conceived against him, by the people of Jerusalem, and courage which they tooke to fet upon him within the Walls; or through prepararion of the Armie that lay abroad in the Countrey, to bid him battell in open field, and recover by a new charge the honour which was loft at the former encounter; or through themileries daily brought upon his owne Countrey, by the Syrian in his absence (if not byall of these) Joss was driven to lay aside all thought of winning the kingdome of 74de and taking hostages for his quiet passage, made all haste home wards, where he found alad wel-come, and being utterly for faken of his wonted prosperitie, for fook also his lifeinfew moneths after, leaving his kingdome to Jeroboam the second, his fortunate and valiant fon-

§. X.
The end of Amazia his Raigne and Life.

Ny man is able to ghesse how AmaZia looked, when the enemie had left him. A Hee that had vaunted so much of his owne great prowesse and skill in Armes, threatning to worke wonders, and set up a new the glorious Empire of David, was now uncased of his Lyons hide, and appeared nothing so terrible a beast as he had beene painted. Much argument of scoffing at him he had ministred unto such, as held him indiflike; which at this time, doubtleffe, were very many: for the shame that falls upon an infolent man, feldome failes of meeting with aboundance of reproach. As for Amalia (befides that the multitude are alwayes prone to lay the blame upon their Governours, even of those calamities which happen by their owne default) there was no thildein all Jerusalem, but knew him to be the root of all this mischiefe. He had not only challenged a good man of War, being him selfe a Dastard; but when he was beaten andtaken by him, had basely pleaded for the common enemie, to have him let into the Che, that with his owne eyes he might fee what spoyle there was, and not make a bad bargaine by heare-fav. The father of this AmaZia was a beastly man; yet when the Aramites tooke him and tormented him, he did not offer to buy his own life at so dear a rate, as the Citie and Temple of Jerusalem. Had he offered, should they have made his promise good? furely the hafte which they had made in condescending to this hard match, was veryunfortunate: for by keeping out the I fraelise (which was eafie enough) any little while they should foon have bin rid of him, seeing that the Aramites would have made him run home, with greater speed than he came forth. Then also, when having trusted up his bagto perfwade him to heave his load behind; had not their good king delivered up hostages, to secure his return, as loath to defraud him of the recompence due to his paines taken.

Such exprobrations could not but vexe the heart of this unhappie King: it had beene well for him, if they had made him acknowledge his fault unto God, that had punished him by all this dishonour. But we finde no mention of his amendment. Rather it appeares, that he continued an Idolater to the very last. For it is said of him, that after is turning away from the Lord, they wrought treason against him in Jerusalem: a manifest 2 Chro.25:27. MAP.22. S.II.

474 proofethat he was not reclaimed unto his lives end. And certainely, they which tell proofethat he was not recaults passed, shall sooner be thought to upbraid him with a man in his adversity of his faults passed, shall sooner be thought to upbraid him with a manning adverting of the transfer of the priest his fortune, than to seeke his reformation. Wherefore it is no marvell, that Priests nis fortune, than to leafe welcome to him, than ever they had been. On the other fide, and Prophets were leffe welcome to him, than ever they had been. flatterers, and such as were desirous to put a heart into him, whereof themselves might alwaies be masters, wanted not plausible matter to revive him. For he was not the first, nor second of the Kings of Juda, that had beene overcome in battell. David himselse had abandoned the Citie, leaving it before the enemy was in fight, unto Absalom his rebellious Sonne. Many besides him had received losses, wherein the Temple bare a part. If Joas might so easily have beene kept out; why did their Ance. Rorslet Sefacin: Afa was reputed a vertuous Prince, yet with his owne hands her emptied the Temple, and was not blamed, but held excusable by necessity of the State. Belike these traducers would commend no Actions but of dead Princes: if so, he shouldrather live to punish them, than die to please them. Though wherein had hee given them any cause of displeasure? It was he indeede that commanded to set open the gates to Joas; but it was the people that did it. Good fervants oughtnotto have obeyed their Masters Commandements to his disadvantage, when they sawhim not master of his owne Person. As his captivity did acquite him from blame, of all things that he did or suffered in that condition; so was that misfortune it selfe, in time estimation, as highly to his honour, as deeply to his losse. For had he beene ashally, to flye as others were, hee might have escaped as well as others did. But seeking to teach the base multitude courage by his Royall example, he was shamefully betrayed by those in whom he trusted. Unworthy creatures, that could readily obey him, when speaking another mans words, being prisoner, he commanded them to yeeld; having neglected his charge, when leading them in the field, he bade them stand to it and fight like men. The best was, that they must needs acknowledge his mischance, as the occison whereby many thousand lives were faved; the enemy having wisely preferredile furprise of a Lion that was Captaine, before the chase and slaughter of an Army of Sugs

These or the like words comforting Amazia, were able to perswade him, thatiwas; even so indeed. And such excuses might have served well enough to please the people, if the King had first studied how to please God. But hee that was unwilling to alcube unto God the good successe fore-told by a Prophet; could easily finde how to impute this late difafter unto fortune, and the fault of others. Now concerning forture, it seemes that he meant to keepe himselfe safe from her by sitting still; for in ssitent years following (folong he out-lived his honour)we find not that he stirred. As for his fubjects, though nothing henceforth bee recorded of his government, yet we may fee by his end, that the middle time was ill spent among them, increasing their hatred to his owneruine. He that suspecteth his owne worth or other mens opinions, thinking the leffe regard is had of his person than he beleeveth to be due to his place, will commonly spend all the force of his authoritie in purchasing the name of a severe man-For the affected sowrenesse of a vaine fellow, doth many times resemble the gravity of onethatiswise: and the feare wherein they live, which are subject unto oppression, carryes a shew of reverence to him that does the wrong; at least it serves to dazle the eyes of underlings, keeping them from prying into the weakenesse of such as havejurisdiction over them. Thus the time, wherein, by well using it, men might attain tobe fuch as they ought, they do usually mis-spend, in seeking to appeare such as they are not This is a vain & deceivable course; procuring, in stead of the respect that was hoped for, more indignation than was feared. Which is a thing of dangerous confequence; especially when an unable spirit, being over-perted with so high authority, istoo passionate in the execution of such an office, as cannot be checked but by violence. If ther fore Ama-Zia thought by extreme rigour to hold up his reputation, what did he else than strive to make the people think he hated them, when of themselves they were apt enough to be leeve that he did not love them: the best was, that he had, by revenging his fathers death, provided well enough for his owne fecurity: but who should take vengeance (or upon whom?) of fuch a murther, wherein every one had a part : Surely God himselfe, who had not given comandement or leave unto the people, to take his office out of his had, in shedding the bloud of his Annointed. Yet as Amazia carelesse of God, was carried headlong by his owne affections; so his subjects, following the same ill example, withoutrequiring what belonged unto their duties, rose up against him, with such headlong furie, that being unable to defend himselfe in Jerusalem, he was driven to forsake the Cirie, and flie to Lachis, for fafeguard of his life. But so extreme was the hatred conceived nt, and fo generall, that neither his absence could allay the rage of it in the Capiall Citie, nor his presence in the Countrie abroad procure friends to defend his life. Ouetionlesse he chose the Town of Lachis for his refuge, as a place of all other best affected rohim, yet found he there none other favour, than that the people did not kil him with their own hands; for when the Conspirators (who troubled not themselves about raifine an Armie for the matter) fent pursuers after, he was abandoned to death. Lachis was the utmost Citie of his Dominion Westward, standing somewhat without the border of Juda; so that he might have made an easie escape (if he durst adventure) into the Terriforie of the Philistims, or the Kingdome of Israel. Therefore it may seem that he was derained there, where certaine it is that he found no kind of favour: for had not the people of this Town added their own treason to the generall infurrection; the murderers could notatio good leafure as they did, have carried away his bodie to Jerusalem, where they gave him buriall with his fathers.

of the Interregnum, or vacancie, that was in the Kingdome of Juda, after the death of Amazia.

Thath alreadie bin shewed, that the Reignes of the Kings of Juda and Israel were sometimes to be measured by compleat years, otherwhiles, by years current: and that the time of one King is now and then confounded with the last years of his fathers Raign, or the foremost of his sons. But we are now arrived at a meere vacation, wherein the Crown of Juda lay voyd eleven whole yeares: a thing not plainly set down in Scriptures, nor yet remembred by Josephus, and therefore hard to be believed, were it not proved by necessary consequence.

Twice we find it written, that AmaZia, King of Juda, lived after the death of Joas King 2 Chro. 25.2. of If self fifteene yeares; whereupon it followes, that the death of AmaZia, was about the end of fifteene yeares compleat, which Jeroboam the second (who in the fifteenth year of 2 Kin. 14.17. Amazia was made King over I frael) had raigned in Samaria. But the succession of UZZia, who is also called AZaria, unto his father in the Kingdome of Juda, was eleven years later than the sixteenth of Jeroboam: for it is expressed, that Azaria began to reign in the second with the first of two and fiftie that he raigned. So the Interregrum of eleven years cannot be divided, without some hard means used, of interpreting the Text otherwise than the letter sounds.

Yet some conjectures there are made, which tend to keepe all even, without acknowledging any voyd time. For it is thought that in the place last of all cited, by theseven and twentieth yeare of Jeroboam, we should perhaps understand the seven and twentieth yeare of his life; or else (because the like words are no where else interpretedinthe like sense) that Azaria was eleven yeares under age, that is, five years old, when his father died, and so his fixteenth yeare might concurre with the seven and twentieth of Jeroboam; or that the Text it selfe might have suffered some wrong, by milwriting twentie seven for seventeen yeares; and so, by making the seventeenth yare of Jereboam to be newly begun, all may be falved. These are the conjectures of that worthy man Gerard Mercator: concerning the first of which, it may suffice, that the Author himself doth easily let it passe, as improbable; the last is followed by none that Iknow, neither is it fit, that upon every doubt, we should call the text in question; which could not be satisfied in all copies, if perhaps it were in one: as for the second, it may beheld with some qualification, that Azaria began his Raign being five yeares old; but thenmust we adde those eleven yeares which passed in his minoritie, to the two and fiftie that followed his fixteenth yeare, which is all one, in a maner, with allowing an Inter-of Princes Contemporarie with Amazia, and more particularly of Sardanapalus.

THe Princes living with AmaZia, and in the eleven years that followed his death, were Jous and Jeroboum in Ifrael, Cephrenes and Mycerimus in Egypt, Sylvind ladius, and Sylvius Aventinus in Alba; Agamemnon in Corinth; Diognesuith reaus, and Ariphron in Athens; in Lacedæmon Thelectus, in whose time the Spans wan from the Achaians, Geranthæ, Amyclæ, and some other Townes.

But more notable than all these, was Assyrian Sardanapalus, who in the one and mit tieth year of Amazia, succeeding his father o crazapes or Anacyndaraxes, reigned months ty yeares, and was flaine the last of the eleven voyd yeares which fore-went the the of AZaria. In him ended (as most agree) the line of Ninus, which had held that Empit one thousand two hundred and forty years. A most luxurious and efferminate Palial he was, passing away his time among strumpets, whom he imitated both in appareland

In these voluptuous courses he lived an unhappy life, knowing himselse to be for the that he durst not let any man have a fight of him; yet seene he was at length, and the fight of him was fo odious, that it procured his ruine. For Arbaces, who governed the dia under him, finding meanes to behold the person of his King, was so incensed that beaftly spectacle, of a man disguised in womans attire, and striving to counterless harlot, that he thought it a great shame to live under the command of so unworthy creature. Purposing therefore to free himselfe and others from so base subjection, was much encouraged by the prediction of Belefis or Belofus a Chaldaran, who told plainly, that the Kingdome of Sardanapalus should fall into his hands. Arbaces pleased with the prophecie, did promise unto Belosses himselfe the government of Ban lon; and fo concluding how to handle the businesse, one of them stirred up the Men and allured the Persians into the quarrel, the other perswaded the Babylonians and he biaris to venture themselves in the same cause. These foure Nations armed forty that fandmen against Sardanapalus, who in this danger was not wanting to himselfe, but thering fuch forces as he could out of other Nations, encountred the rebels, as one would by deeds refute the tales that they had told of him. Neither did his carried the beginning of that warre, answer to the manner of his retirednesse. For in the hattels he carried away the better, driving Arbaces and his followers into such fearfull reimes, that had not Belofus promifed them constantly some unexpected succours, they would forthwith have broken up their Camp. About the fame time, an Armie out of Ractrid was comming to affift the King; but Arbaces encountring it upon the way, perfunded fo strongly by promise of liberty, that those forces joyned themselves with his The fudden departure of the enemy feeming to be a flight, caused Sardanapalus to feast his Armie, triumphing before victory. But the Rebels being strengthened with this new finally, came upon him by night, and forced his Camp, which through over-great fecurity was unprepared for reliftance.

This overthrow did so weaken the Kings heart, that leaving his wives brother Salamems to keep the field, he withdrew himselfe into the Citie of Ninive; which, till new avdes that he fent for should come, he thought easily to defend; it having beene prophecied, that Ninive should never be taken, till the River were enemy to the Towne. Of the greatnesse and strength of Ninive, enough hath beene spoken in our discourse of Ninus. It was fo well victualled, that Arbaces (having in two battels overthrowne the Kings Armie, and flaine Salamenus) was faine tolye two whole yeares before it. in hopeto winne it by famine; whereof yet he faw no appearance. It feemes that he wanted Engines and skill to force those walles, which were an hundred foot high, and thickeenough for three Chariots in front to paffe upon the rampire. But that which hee could not doe in two yeares, the River of Tigris did in the third: for being high swolne with raines, it not onely drowned a part of the Citie through which it ranne, but here downe twenty furlongs of the wall, and made a faire breach for Arbaces to Sardanapalus, either terrefied with the accomplishment of the old Oracle, or seeing nomeanes of refutance left, shutting up himselfe into his Palace, with his wives, eunuches, and all his treasures, did set the house on fire, wherewith he and they were together confumed. Strabo speakes of a monument of his, that was in Anchiale a Citie of Clicia, whereon was found an inscription, shewing that he built that Citie and Thar- Strable, fusupon one day : but the addition hereto, bidding men eate and drinke and make merry, encouraged others with verses well knowne, to a voluptuous life, by his owne example testified that his nature was more prone to sensualitie, than to any vertue beseeming a Prince.

There are some that faintly report otherwise of his end; saying that Arbaces, when he first found him among his Concubines, was so enraged, that suddenly he slew him with adagger. But the more generall consent of writers agrees with this relation of Diedorus Died. Sic. 1.2. 2.70 Siculus, who citeth Ctesias a Greeke Writer, that lived in the Court of Persia, where the truth might best be known.

Concerning the Princes which reigned in Assyria; from the time of Semiramis, unto Sardanapalus, though I beleeve that they were sometimes (yet not, as Orosius hath it, inresantly) bussed in offensive or else desensive arms; yet for the most part of them I doe petter trust Diodorus Siculus, who saith that their names were overpassed by Ctesias, be-Diod.1.2.66. fallethey did nothing worthy of memorie. The prosperitie of Uzzia, and of Jeroboam the second, who raigned with him in I frail. of in the Anarchie that was in the ten Tribes after the death of Jeroboam. Of Zacharia, Sal. lum, Menahem and Pekahia.

ZZia, who is also called AhaZia, the son of Jotham, was made king of Ja. da, when he was fixteene yeares old, in the seven and twentieth year of Jeroboam the son of Jose king of Israel. Hee served the God of his subtraction David, and had therefore good fuccesse in all his enterprises. He built. loth, a Towne that stood neere to the Red Sea, and restored it to Juda He overcame the Philifims, of whose Townes he difmantled some, and built others in simdrie parts of their Territories. Also he got the masterie over some parts of Arabia, and brought the Ammonites to pay him tribute. Such were the fruits of his prosperous wars, wherein (as Josephus rehearseth his acts) he began with the Philistims, and then proceeded unto the Arabians and Ammonites. His Armie confifted of three hundred and leven thousand men of war, over which were appointed two thousand and fixe hundred Captains. For all this multitude the king prepared shields, and speares, and helmets, and other Arms requifite; following therein happely a courfe quite opposite unto that which some of his late predeceffours had held, who thought it better policie to use the service of the Nobilitie, than of the multitude; carrying forth to warre the Princes and all the Chi

As the victories of uzzia were farre more important, than the atchievments of all that a had reigned in Juda, fince the time of David; fo were his riches and magnificent works, quall, if not superiour to any of theirs that had bin kings between him and Salomon, For, besides that great conquests are won to repay the charges of Warre with triple interest, he had the skill touse, as well as the happinesse to get. He turned his lands to the bestus, keeping Ploughmen and Dreffers of Vines, in grounds convenient for fuch husbandrie. Inother places he had Cattell feeding; whereof he might well keepe great store, having won so much from the Ammonites and Arabians, that had aboundance of wasteground serving for pasturage. For defence of his Cattelland Heardsmen, he built Towers in the wildernesse. He also digged many Cisterns or Ponds. Josephus calls them water-courfes; but in such drie grounds, it was enough that he found water, by digging in the most se likely places. If by these Towers he so commanded the water, that none could without his consent, releeve themselves the rewith; question lesse he tooke the onely course, by which he might fecurely hold the Lordship over all the wilderness; it being hardly passes fable, by reason of the extreme drought, when the few Springs therein found, are left free to the use of Travellers.

Besides all this cost, and the building both of Eloth by the Red Sea, and of sundrice Townes among the Philistims; he repaired the wall of Jerusalem, which Jou had broken downe, and fortified it with Towers, whereof some were an hundred and fiftie Cubits high. The state of Israel did never so sourish, as at this time, since the division of the twelve Tribes into two kingdomes. For as 2774 prevailed in the South, fo (if not more) 32robeam the son of Joan, King of the ten Tribes, enlarged his border on the North, where obtaining many victories against the Syrians, he wanthe Royall Citie of Damascus, and 2 Kin. 14.25.28. he wan Hamath, with all the countrie thereabout from the entring of Hamath, unto the Sea of the Wilderneffe, that is, (as the most expound it) unto the vast desarts of Arabia, the end whereof was undiscovered. So the bounds of Israel in those parts, were in time of this Jeroboam, the fame (or not much narrower) which they had bin in the raigne of David.

But it was not for the piety of Jeroboam, that he thrived fo well, for he was an Idolater: was only the compassion which the Lord had on Israel, seeing the exceeding bitter affiction whereinto the Aramites had brought his people, which caused him to alter the fuccession of warre, and to throw the victorious Aramites under the feet of those whom they had fo cruelly oppressed. The line of Jehn to which God had promised the Kingdome of Israel unto the fourth generation, was now not far from the end; and now againe regression it was invited unto repentance by new benefits, as it had been at the beginning. But the fin of Jeroboam the fon of Nebat was held fo precious, that neither the kingdome it felfe giwnohim by God, was able to draw Jehu from that politike Idolatry; northemisery filing upon him and his posterity, to bring them to a better course of Religion, nor yet. arthe last, this great prosperity of Jeroboam the son of Joas, to make him render the homurthat was due to the onely giver of victory. Wherefore the promife of God made unto Jehu, that his fons, unto the fourth generation, should fit on the throne of Israel, was not enlarged; but being almost expired gave warning of the approaching end, by an accidentifostrange, that we who find no particulars recorded, can hardly ghesse at the occafions) foregoing the last accomplishment.

When Jeroboam the sonne of Joas, after a victorious reigne of one and forty yeares, hadended his life; it seemes in all reason that Zacharia his sonne should forth with have hen admitted to reigne in his stead; the Nobility of that race having gotten such a lufreby the immediate fuccefsion of foure Kings, that any Competitor, had the Crowne naffed by election, must needes have appeared base; and the vertue of the last King having beene so great, as might well serve to lay the foundation of a new house, much more to establish the already confirmed right of a family so rooted in possession. All this notwithstanding, two or three and twenty yeares did passe before Zacharia the sonne of Jeroboam was, by uniforme confent, received as King. The true original causes hereof were to be found at Dan and Bethel, where the golden Calves did stand: yet second inframents of this diffurbance are likely not to have beene wanting, upon which the wildome of man was ready to cast an eye. Probable it is, that the Captaines of the army (who afterwards flew one another so fast, that in sourceen years there reigned five kings) did now by head-strong violence, rend the kingdome afunder, holding each what hee could, and either despissing or hating some qualities in Zacharia; untill, after many years, wearied with diffention, and the principall of them perhaps, being taken out of the way by death, for want of any other eminent man, they confented to yeeld all quietly to the fon of Jeroboam. That this Anarchy lasted almost three and twenty years, we find by the difference of time between the fifteenth years of UZZIA, which was the last of Jeroboam his one and fortieth (his feven and twentieth concurring with the first of uzzia) and the eight and thirtieth of the same 22714, in the last fixe moneths whereof Zacharia reigned in Samaria. There are some indeed that by supposing Jeroboam to have reigned with his father eleven years, do cut off the interregrum in Juda (before mentioned) & by the same reasonabridge this Anarchie that was before the reigne of Zacharia in Israel. Yet they leaveittwelve years long: which is time sufficient to prove that the kingdome of the ten Tribes was no lesse distempered than as is already noted. But I choose rather to follow themore common opinion, as concurring more exactly with the times of other Princes reigning abroad in the World, than this doubtfull conjecture, that gives to Jeroboam two and fifty years, by adding three quarters of his fathers reigne unto his owne; which was it selfe indeed folong, that he may well seeme to have begun it very young: for I do not think that God bleffed this Idolater both with a longer reign, and with a longer life than hedid his fervant David.

Thus much being spoken of the time wherein the Throne of Israel was voyde, beforethe reigne of Zacharia; little may suffice to be said of his reigne it selfe, which lasted but a little while. Sixe moneths only was he King; in which time he declared himselfe aworshipper of the golden Calves; which was enough to justifie the judgment of God, Whereby he was flain. He was the last of Jehu's house, being (inclusively) the first of that line; which may have been some cause of the troubles impeaching his orderly succession the prophecie having determined that race in the fourth generation. But (besides that Gods promise was extended unto the utmost) there was no warrant given to Sallum or to any other, for the death of Zacharia, as had been given to Jehu for the flaughter of Jehoram, and for the eradication of Ahabs house.

Zacharia having bin fixe moneths a King, was then flaine by Sallum, who raigned as ter him, the space of a moneth in Samaria. What this Sallum was, I doe not finde; fare onely that he was a Traytour, and the some of one Jabesh, whereby his father gotton honour. It seemes that he was one of those, who in time of faction had laboured for himselse; and now when all other Competitors were sitten downe, thought easily to prevaile against that King, in whose person the race of Jehn was to faile. Manifestin that Sallum had a strong partie: for Tipbfah or Thapfa, and the coast thereof even from Tir ab, where Menahem his enemie and supplanter then lay, refused to admit, as Kinein his stead, the man that murdered him. Yet at the end of one moneth, Salum received the reward of his treason, and was slaine by Menahem who reigned in his place.

Menahem the son of Gadi, raigned after Sallum ten yeares. In opposition to Sallum his hatred was deadly, and inhumane: for he not onely destroyed Tiphsah, and all that were therein, or thereabouts, but he ript up all their women with child, because they did not open their gates and let him in. Had this crueltie been used in revenge of Zacharia death, it is like that he would have been as earnest, in procuring unto him his Fathere Crown when it was first due. But in performing that office, there was used such lone de. liberation, that we may plainly discover Ambition, Disdaine, and other private passion.

to have bin the causes of this beaftly outrage.

In the time of Menahem, and (as it feemes) in the beginning of his Reigne, Pul, Kin of Affiria, came against the Land of Ifrael; whom this new King appeared, with athorfand talents of filver, levied upon all the fubstantiall men in his Countrey. Withthis money the Israelite purchased, not onely the peace of his Kingdome, but his owneellablishment therein : some factious man (belike) having either invited ful thither, or lifte came uncalled) fought to use his helpe, in deposing this ill beloved King. Of this Pekabia the story is short: for he reigned onely two years; at the endwherof, he was flaine by Peka the sonne of Remalia, whose treason was rewarded with the Crowne of Ifrael, as, in time comming, another mans Treason against himselfeshilbe. There needes no more to be faid of Menahem and his sonne, save that they wereboth of them Idolaters; and the sonne (as we finde in Josephus) like to his father in cruelty. Concerning Pul the Affyrian King, who first opened unto those Northern Nationstheway into Palæstina; it wil shortly follow in order of the Story, to deliver our opinion whether he were that Belofus (called also Belefes, and by some Phul Belochus) who joyned with drs baces the Median, against Sardanapalus, or whether he were some other man. Attheprefentit is more fit that wee relate the end of 277ia's life, who out-lived the happinelle wherein we left him.

Fortis faid of uzzia, That he fought God in the dayes of Zecharia (which under flood the visions)

God) and when as he fought the Lord, God made him prosper.

But, when he was strong, his heart was lifted up to his destruction : for he transfelda. gainst the Lord his God, and went into the I emple of the Lord to burne incense upon the Al sar of incense. Thus he thought to enlarge his owne authority, by medling in the Priells office, whose power had in every extremity been so helpfull to the Kings of Juda, that meere gratitude and civill policy should have held backe uzzia from incroaching thereupon; yea, though the Law of God had beene filent in this case, and not forbidding it. Howfoever, the King forgot his duty, the Priests remembred theirs, and God forgataot to assist them. Azara the high Priest interrupted the Kings purpose, and gave him tout derstand how little to his honour it would prove, that he tooke upon him the office of the fonnes of Aaron. There were with AZaria fourescore other Priests, valiant men, but heir valour was shewed onely in affishing the high Priest, when (according to his dutie) he reprehended the Kings presumption. This was enough, the rest God himselfe performed. We find in fofephus, that the King had apparelled himselse in Priestly habit, and forant go.xxx thathe threatned Azarias and his Companions, to punish them with death unless they would be quiet. Fosephus indeed inlargeth the Storie, by inserting a great Earth-quake, which did teare downe halfe an Hill, that rowled four furlongs, till it refted against another Hill, stopping up the high-wayes, and spoyling the Kings Garden in the passage. With this Earth-quake, he faith, that the roofe of the Temple did cleave, and that a Sunbeam did light upon the Kings face, which was presently infected with leprofie. All this may have been true; and some there are who thinke that this Earth-quake is the same. which is mentioned by the Prophet Amos; wherin they do much mif-reckon the times. For the Earth-quake spoken of by Amos, was in the dayes of Jeroboam King of Israel, who dyed seven and thirtie years before uzzia; so that Jotham the son of uzzia, which supplied his Fathers place in government of the Land, should, by this accompt, have bin then unborne: for he was but five and twentie years old, when he began to reign as king. Therefore, thus far only we have affurance, that while Uzzia was wroth with the Priefts, 2 Chr. 26.200 the lamoste rose up in his forehead, before the Priests. Hereupon he was caused, in all haste, to depart the place, and to live in a house by himselfe until he dyed; the rule over the Kings house, and over all the Land, being committed to Jotham, his Son and Successor. Julian tooke not upon himselfe the stile of a King, till his Father was dead; whom they buried in the same field wherin his Ancestors lay interred yet in a Monument apart from the rest, because he was a Leper.

Offherrophets which lived in the time of Uzzia; and of Princes theuruling in Egypt, and in some other Countries.

TN the time of Mizia were the first of the lesser Prophets, Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadisand Jonas. It is not indeed fet downe, when Joel or Obadia did prophecie: butifthe Prophets, whose times are not expressed, ought to be ranged (according to Saint Hieromes rule) with the next before them; then must these two be judged contemporarie with Hosea and Amos, who lived under King UZZia. To enquire which of the lefive was the most ancient, it may perhaps be thought, at least, a superfluous labour; yet if the age wherein Homer lived, hath so painefully beene sought, without reprehension, how can he be taxed, which offers to search out the antiquitie of these holy Prophets? It seemes to me, that the first of these, inorder of time, was the Prophet Jona; who foretold the great victories of Jeroboam King of Ifrael; and therefore is like 2 Chro. 6.14. to have prophecied in the dayes of Jose, whilest the affliction of Israel was exceeding bit - v.25.26. our, the Text it felfe intimating no leffe: by which confequence he was elder than the other Prophets, whose workes are now extant. But his prophecies that concerned the Kingdome of Ifrael are now lost. That which remaineth of him, seemes, not without reason unto some very learned, to have belonged unto the time of Sardanapalus, in wholedayes Nineve was first of all destroyed. This Prophet rather taught Christ by his lifferings, than by his writings now extant: in all the rest are found expresse promises of the Meffias.

In the reigne of uzzia likewise it was, that Esay, the first of the source great Prophets, began to see his visions. This difference of great and lesser Prophets, is taken from the Volumes which they have left written (as S. Augastine gives reason of the distinction) be- Augastivit. o cause the greater have written larger Bookes. The Prophet Esy was great indeed, not Denlas ang. only in regard of his much writing, or of his Nobilitie, (for their opinion is rejected, who thinkhim to have bin the son of Amos the Prophet) and the high account wherein he liwed; but for the excellencie both of his stile and argument, wherein he so plainly foreteleth the Birth, Miracles, Passion, & whole Historie of our Saviour, with the calling of the Gentiles, that he might as well be called an Evangelist, as a Prophet; having written in fuch wife, That (as Hierome faith) one would thinke he did not foretell of things to come, lugar liquing. but compile an Historie of matters alreadic past.

After the death of Bocchoris, Affebis followed in the Kingdome of Egypt: unto him fucceeded Anglis; and these two occupied that Crowne fixe yeares. Then Sabacus, and Ethiopian, became King of Egypt, and held it fiftie yeares, whereof the ten first rame along with the last of UZZia his Raigne and Life. Of these and other Egyptian Kings more shall be spoken, when their affaires shall come to be intermedled with the business

6. I V. Of the Affyrian Kings, descending from Phul: and whether Phul and Belosus were one per. songer heads of sundrie Families, that reigned apart in Nineve and Babylon.

Y that which hath formerly beene shewed of Sardanapalus his death, it is apparent rent, that the chiefe therein was Arbaces the Median; to whom the rest of the Confederates did not onely submit themselves in that Warre, but were contented afterwards to be judged by him; receiving by his authoritie fentence of death, or pardon of their forfeited lives. The first example of this his power, was shown eupon bla fus the Babylonian, by whose especiall advice and helpe, Arbaces himselfe was becomes it great : Yet was not this power of Arbaces exercised in so tyrannicall a manner, as might give offence in that great alteration of things, either to the Princes that had affifted him, or to the generalitie of the people. For in the condemnation of Belefus, he used the com-Tell of his other Captaines, and then pardoned him of his owne grace; allowing him to hold not only the City and Province of Babylon, but also those treasures, for emberelling whereof his life had been endangered.

In like manner, he gave rewards to the rest of his partakers, and made them Rulers of Provinces; retaining (as it appeares) onely the Soveraignty to himselfe, which touse immoderately he did naturally abhorre. He is faid, indeed, to have excited the Medis against Sardanapalus, by propounding unto them hope of transferring the Empireto of their Nation. And to make good this his promife, he destroyed the Citie of Ninve, permitting the Citizens neverthelesse to take and carry away every one his ownegoods. The other Nations that joyned with him, as the Persians and Bactrians, he drew to his fide, by the allurement of liberty; which he himselfe so greatly loved, that by flacking too much the reines of his owne Soveraignty, hee did more harme to the generall elate of Media, than the pleasure of the freedome, which it enjoyed, could recompence. For both the Territory of that Countrey was pared narrower by Salmanasar (or perhaps by some of his Progenitors) whom wee finde in the Scriptures to have held some Townes of the Medes; and the civill administration was so disorderly, that the people themselves were glad to see that reformation, which Deioces the fift of Arbaces 19 his Line, did make in that government, by reducing them into stricter termes of obe-

How the force of the Assirians grew to bee such as might infourescore yeares, if not fooner, both extend it self unto the conquest of Ifrael, and teare away some part of Media, it is a question hardly to be answered; not only in regard of the destruction of Nineve, & subversion of the Assirian Kingdom, whereof the Medes, under Arbaces, had the honour, who may seeme at that time to have kept the Affrians under their subjection, when the rest of the Provinces were set at liberty; but in consideration of the Kings themselves, who raigning afterwards in Babylon and Nineve, are confounded by fome, and diftinmissed by others; whereby their Historie is made uncertaine.

I will first therefore deliver the opinion generally received, and the grounds wheremonit stands: then, producing the objections made against it, I will compare together thedetermination of that worthie man Joseph Scaliger, with those learned that subscribe the fellato, and the judgement of others that were more ancient Writers, or have followedthe Ancients in this doubtfull case. Neither shall it be needfull to set down a part the feweral authorities and arguments of fundrie men, adding fomwhat of weight or of clearnessent to another: it will be enough to relate the whole substance of each discourse: which I will doe as briefly as I can, and without fear to be taxed of partialitie, as being no o more addicted to the one opinion than to the other, by any fancie of mine owne, but meerely led by those reasons, which upon examination of each part, seemed to me most forceable, though to others they may perhaps appeare weake.

That which, untill of late, hath paffed as current, is this; That Belofus was the fame King, who, first of the Affyrians, entred Palastina with an Armie; being called Pul, or Phulinthe Scriptures, and by Annius his Authors with fuch as follow them, Phul Belochus. Of this man it is faid, that he was a skilfull Aftrologer, fubrile, and ambitious : that hegot Babylon by composition made with Arbaces; and that not therewith content, he got into his hand part of Affyria: finally that he reigned eight and fortie years, and then e dving, left the Kingdome to Teglat-phalassar his sonne, in whose Posteritie it continued fome few descents, till the house of Merodach prevailed. The truth of this, if Annius his Metasthenes were sufficient proofe, could not be gainfaid: for that Author (such as he is) isperemptorieherein. But, howfoever Annius his Authors deserve to be suspected, it stands with no reason, that we should conclude all to be false which they affirme. They, whomintaine this Tradition, justificit by divers good Allegations, as a matter confirmedby circumstances found in all Authors, and repugnant unto no Historie at all. Foritis manifest by the relation of Diodorus (which is indeed the foundation whereupon all have built) that Arbaces and Belofus were Partners in the action against Sardanapulse; and that the Bactrians, who joyned with them, were thought well rewarded with libertie, as likewise other Captaines were with governments : but that anythird person was so eminent, as to have Assign it selfe, the chiefe Countrey of the Empire bestowed upon him, it is a thing whereof not the least appearance is found in any History. And certainely it stood with little reason, that the Assyrians shouldbe committed unto a peculiar King, at such time as it was not thought meete to trustthem in their owne walles and houses. Rather it is apparent, that the destruction of Nimitaby Arbaces, and the transplantation of the Citizens, was held a needfull policy because thereby the people of that Nation might beckept downe from aspiring to recover the Soveraignty, which else they would have thought to belong, as of right, unto the Seat of the Empire.

Upon such confiderations did the Romanes, in ages long after following, destroy Carthage, and dissolve the Corporation, or Body politike, of the Citizens of Capua; because thole two Towns were capable of the Empire: a matter esteemed over-dangerous, even to Rome it selfe, that was Mistresse of them both. This being so, how can it be thought Rullion, or 25 that the Affyrians in three or foure yeares had erected their Kingdome a-new under one Pul? or what must this Pul have beene (of whose deservings or entermedling, or indeed of whose very name, we finde no mention in the Warre against Sardanapalus) to whom the principal I parts of the Empire fell, either by generall consent in division of the Provinces, or by his owne power and purchase very soone after? Surely he was none other than Belofies 3 whose neare neighbour-hood gave him opportunity (as he was wife enough to play his owne game) both to get Affyria to himselfe, and to empeach any other man that should have attempted to seize upon it. The Province of Babylon, which Belofus held, being (as Herodotus reports) in riches and power, as good as the third part of the Persian Herodot. it. Empire, was able to furnish him with all that was requisite for such a businesse: if that were not enough, he had gotten into his owne hands all the gold and filver that had bin inthe Palace of Ninive. And questionlesse, to restore such a Citie as Ninive, was an enterprise fit for none to take in hand, except he had such means as Belosus had; which Pul, if he were not Belofus, is likely to have wanted.

Besides all this, had Pul been a distinct person from Belosus, and Lord of Asgria, which Bbb 2

lay beyond the Countries of Babylon and Mesopotamia, it would not have beene anease matter for him, to passe quite through an other mans Kingdome with an Armie, seeking bootie a farre off in Ifrael: the onely action by which the name of Phul is knowne. But if we grant, that he, whom the Scriptures call Pul or Phul, was the same whom prophase Josam. Lio.e. 12. writers have called Belosus, Beleses, and Belestis, (in like manner as Josephus acknowlede. eth, that he, whom the Scriptures called never otherwise than Darius the Mede, Was the fonne of Astiages, and called of the Greeks by another name, that is, Cyaxares) then is the foruple utterly removed. For Babylon and Mesopotamia did border upon Syria and Pa lastina: fo that Belofus having fettled his affaires in Asgria towards the East and North might with good leafure encroach upon the Countries that lay on the other fide of his. Kingdome, to the South and West. He that lookes into all particulars, may finde every one circumstance concurring, to prove that Phul, who invaded Ifrael, was none other than Belofus. For the Prince of the Arabians, who joyned with Arbaces, and broughtno finall part of the forces wherewith Sardanapalus was overthrowne, did enter intothat action, meerely for the love of Belofus. The friendship of these Arabians was thin of maine importance, to those that were to passe over Euphrates with an Armicino Syria. Wherefore Belofus, that held good correspondence with them, and whosemed fruitfull Province, adjoyning to their barraine quarters, might yearely doe them inchimable pleasures; was not onely likely to have quiet passage through their borders, hir their utmost assistance : yea, it stands with good reason, that they who loved not lively should for their ownebehoofe have given him intelligence of the destruction and civil broyles among the ten Tribes; whereby as this Pulgot a thousand talents, so it sems that the Syrians and Arabians, that had felt an heavie neighbour of Jeroboam, recovered their owne, setting up a new King in Damasco, and clearing the coast of Arabia, (from the Sea of the Wilderneffe to Hamath) of the Hebrew Garrisons. Neither was it any new acquaintance, that made the Nations, divided by Euphrates, hold together in sogod termes offriendship: it was ancient consanguinitie; the memorie whereof was available to the Syrians, in the time of David, when the Aramites beyond the river came over willingly, to the fuccour of HadadeZer, and the Aramites about Damasco. So Belosus in good reason to looke into those parts: what a King reigning so farre off as Nineve, should have to doe in Syria, if the other end of his Kingdome had not reached to Euphraies, it were hard to shew.

But concerning this last argument of the businesse which might allure the Chaldans into Palastina, it may be doubted, lest it should seeme to have ill coherence with that which hath beene faid of the long Anarchie that was in the tenne Tribes. For if the Crowne of Israel were worne by no man in three and twentie years, then is it likely that Belofus was either unwilling to ftirre, or unable to take the advantage when it was fairelt, and first discovered. This might have compelled those, who alone were not strong enough to feek after helpe from some Prince that lay further off; and so the opinion of those that distinguish Phul from Belosus, would be somewhat confirmed. On the other fide, if we fay, that Belofus did paffe the river of Euphrates, as foon as he found likelihood of making a prosperous journey, then may it seems that the inter-regnum in Israelwas not so long as we have made it: for three and twentic years leasure would have afforded better opportunitie, which ought not to have bin lost.

For answer hereunto, we are to consider, what Orosius and Eusebius have written concerning the Chaldees: the one, that after the departure of Arbaces into Media, they layd hold on a part of the empire: the other, that they prevailed and grew mightie, between the times of Arbaces and Deieces the Medes. Now, though it be held an errour of Orifus, where he supposeth that the occupying of Babylonia by the Chaldaans was inmanner of a rebellion from the Medes; yet herein he and Enfebius doe concurre, that the author ritie of Arbaces did restraine the ambition, which by his absence grew bold, and by his death, regardfull onely of it selfe. Now, though some have conjectured that all Affrit was given to Belosus (as an overplus, besides the Province of Babylon which was his by plaine bargaine made aforehand) in regard of his high deservings; yet the opinion more commonly received, is, that hee did onely incroach upon that Province by live tle and little, whilest Arbaces lived, and afterwards dealing more openly, got it all him felfe. Seeing therefore, that there passed but twelve yeares betweene the death of Arbaces, and the beginning of Menahem his Raigne; manifest it is, that the conquest of Allyria, and fettling of that Countrey, was worke enough to hold Belofus occupyed. besides the restauration of Ninive, which alone was able to take up all the time remaining of his reigne, if perhaps he lived to fee it finished in his owne dayes. So that this argument may rather ferve to prove that Phul and Belofus were one person; for a smuch as the journey of Phul against Ifrael was not made untill Belefus could finde leasure; and the rine of advantage which Belosus did let slip, argued his businesse in some other quarter. namely, in that Province of which Phul is called King. Briefely, it may be faid, that hee who conquered Assyria, and performed somewhat upon a Country so far distant as Pale-Mind Was likely to have been, at least, named in some History, or, if not himselfe, yet his Country to have been spoken of for those victories: but we neither heare of Phul, in any o prophane Author, neither doth any Writer, sacred or prophane, once mention the victor resoracts what soever of the Assyrians, done in those times; whereas of Belosus, and the power of the Chaldaans, we finde good Record.

Surely, that great flaughter of so many thousand Affrians, in the quarrell of Sardana. together with other calamities of that long and unfortunate warre, which overwhelmed the whole Countrey, not ending but with the ruine & utter defolation of Nemust needs have so weakened the state of Assyria, that it could not in thirty yeares frace beable to invade Palastina, which the ancient Kings, reigning in Ninive, had, in all their greatnesse, forborne to attempt. Yet these afflictions, disabling that Countrey, did to helpe to enable Belofus to Subdue it; who having once extended his Dominion to the borders of Media, and being (especially if hee had compounded with the Medas) by the interpolition of that Country, fecure of the Scythians, & other warlike Nations on that fide, might very well turne Southward, and try his fortune in those Kingdomes, whereinto civil differtion of the inhabitants, & the bordering envie of the Arabians and Aramitesabout Damasco, Friends and Cousins to the Chaldeans and Mesopotamians, did invitelim. For these, and the other before alledged reasons, it may bee concluded. That what is faid of Pul in the Scriptures, ought to bee understood of Belofus; even as by the names of Nebuchadne 77 ar, Darius the Mede, Artashalbt, and Abalbuerolb, with the like arethought, or knowne, to be meant the fame, whom prophane Historians, by names better knowne in their owne Countryes, have called Nabopolla flar, Cyaxares, and Artaxerxes: especially considering, that hereby we shall neither contradict any thing that hath been written of old, nor need to trouble our felves and others with framing new conichures. This in effect is that, which they alledge in maintenance of the opinion commonly received.

Now this being once granted, other things of more importance will of themselves easily follow. For it is a matter of no great consequence to know the truth of this point (confidering it apart from that which depends thereon) Whether Pul were Belofus, or fomeother man: the whole race of these Assyrian and Babylonian Kings, wherein are found those famous Princes, Nabona far, Mardocempadus, and Nabopollas far (famous for the Altronomicall observations recorded from their times) is the maine ground of this contention. If therefore Belofus or Belofus were that Phul which invaded Ilrael. if he and his posterity reigned both in Ninive & in Babylon; if he were father of Teglat-Phul-Afer. from whom Salmana (ar, Senacherib, and Afarhaddon descended; then it is manifest, that we must feeke Nabonassar the Babylonian King, among these Princes; yea, and conclude him to bee none other than Salmanafar, who is knowne to have reigned in those yeares which Ptolomy the Mathematician hath affigned unto Nabonasfar. As for Merodech, who supplanted Afar-badden, manifest it is, that he and his successors were of another house. This is the scope and end of all his disputation.

But they that maintaine the contrary part, will not be fatisfied with fuch conjectures. They lay hold upon the conclusion, and by shaking that into pieces, hope to overthrow all the premisses upon which it is inferred. For (fay they) if Nabonassar that reigned in Baylon, could not be Salmanafar, or any of those other Assyrian Kings, then is it manifell, that the races were dictinct, and that Phul and Belofus were severall Kings. This confequence is for plaine, that it needes no confirmation. To prove that Nabonaffar was additinct person from Salmanasar, are brought such arguments as would stagger the refolition of him that had fwomero hold the contrary. For first, Nabonassar was King of Babylon, and not of Affrice. This is proved by his name, which is meerely Chaldean, whereas Salman, the first part of Salmanassars name, is proper to the Assyrians.

Efay 39.1.

It is likewise proved by the Astronom icall observations, which proceeding from the Babylonians, not from the Assyrians, do shew that Nabonassar, from whom Prolony drawes that Epocha, or account of times, was a Babylonian, and no Affyrian. Thirdly, and more strongly, it is confirmed by the successor of Nabonassar, which was Mardocempadus, cal. led in his owne language Mero-dac-ken-pad, but more briefly in Efay his prophetie, Me. rodach, by the former part of his name; or Merodach Baladan, the fon of Baladan, Now if Merodach the some of Baladan King of Babel were the some of Nabonassar, then was Nabonassar none other than Baladan King of Babel, and not Salmanassar King of

The second Booke of the first part

What can be plainer: As for the cadence of these two names, Nabonassar and Salma. nassar : which in Greeke or Latine writing hath no difference, we are taught by Scaling that in the Hebrew letters there is found no affinity therein. So concerning the places of Babylonia, whereinto Salmana [ar carryed captive some part of the ten Tribes; it may well be granted, that in the Province of Babylon, Salmana far had gotten somewhat, ver will it not follow that he was King of Babylon it felfe. To conclude, Merodach beganhie reigne over Babylon in the fixt year of Hezekia, at which time Salmanaffar took Samani. therefore if Salmanaffar were King of Babylon, then must we say that he and Merodach vea and Nabonassar, were all one man. These are the arguments of that noble and learned Writer Joseph Scaliger; who not contented to follow the common opinion founded up. on likelihood of conjectures, hath drawne his proofes from matter of more necessary to Touching all that was faid before of Phul Belofus, for the proving that Phul and Bul. The were not fundry Kings; Joseph Scaliger pities their ignorance, that have spentility labour to so little purpose. Honest and painefull men he confesseth that they were, who by their diligence might have wonthe good liking of their Readers, had they not, by mentioning Annius his Authors, given such offence, that men resused thereupon to read their Bookes and Chronologies. A short answer.

For mine owne part, howfoever I believe nothing that Annius his Berofus, Metalhi. nes, and others of that stampe affirme, in respect of their bare authority; yet am Inglo squeamish, but that I can well enough digest a good Booke, though I finde the names of 30 one or two of these good sellowes alledged in it: I have (somewhat peradventure too often) already spoken my mind of Annius his Authors: Neverthelesse, I may sayherea gaine, that where other Histories are filent, or speake not enough, there may we without shame borrow of these, as much as agrees with that little which elsewhere we finde and ferveth to explaine or inlarge it without improbabilities.

Neither indeed are those honest and painfull men (as Scaliger termes them, meaning, if I mistake him not, good filly fellowes) who set down the Assirian Kings from Pulforwards, as Lords also of Babylon, taking Pul for Belosus, and Salmanassar for Nabonassar, fuch Writers as a manshould be ashamed or unwilling to reade. For (to omit a multitude of others, that herein follow Annius, though difliking him in generall) Gerard Mercaur 10 is not so flight a Chronologer, that he should be laughed out of doores with the name of an honest meaning fellow.

But I will not make comparisons between Scaliger and Mercator; they were both of them men notably learned: let us examine the arguments of scaliger, and see whether they be of fuch force as cannot either be refifted or avoy ded. It will eafily bee granted, that Nabonassar was King of Babylon; that he was not King of Assyria, some mendoubt whether Scaligers reasons be enough to prove. For though Nabonassar beea Chalden name, and Salmanaffar an Affyrian; yet what hinders us from beleeving that one man in two languages might be called by two feverall names ? That Astronomy flourished a mong the Chaldees, is not enough to prove Nabonassar either an Astrologer or a Chaldaan. So it is, that Scaliger himselfe cals them, Prophet as nessio ques, qui Nabonassarum A. stronomum fuissein somnis viderunt; Prophets I know not who that in their fleep have dreamt of Nabonassar, that he was an Astrologer.

Whether Nabonoffar were an Astrologer or no, I cannot tell; it is hard to maintaine the negative. But as his being Lord over the Chaldeans, doth not prove him to have beene learned in their sciences; so dothit not prove him not to have beene also King of Affria. The Emperour Charles the fift, who was borne in Gant, and Philip his Sonne, King of Spaine, and Lords of the Netherlands, had men farre more learned in all Sciences, Sciences, and particularly in the Mathematicks, among their Subjects of the Low Counries, than were any that I read of then living in Spaine, if Spain at that time had any : vet 1thinke, Posteritie will not use this as an argument, to prove that Spaine was none of theirs. It may well be, that Salmana far or Nabona far did use the Affyrian Souldiers. & Rabilonian Schollers; but it seemes, that he and his posteritie, by giving themselves wholly to the more warlike Nation, lost the richer, out of which they first issued as likewife king Philip lost partly, & partly did put to a dangerous hazzard all the Netherlands. buffich a course. As for the two un-answerable arguments, (as Scaliger termes them. being me-thinks none other than answers to somewhat that is or might be alledged on the contrarie fide) one of them which is drawne from the unlike found and writing of to those names, Salmana sar and Nationa Sar in the Hebrew, I hold a point about which no man will dispute; for it is not likenesse of sound, but agreement of time, and many circumstances else, that must take away the distinction of persons: the other likewise may begranted; which is, that Salmana far might be Lord of some places in the province of Babylon, yet not King of Babylon it felfe: this indeed might be fo, and it might be otherwife. Hitherto there is nothing fave conjecture. But in that which is alledged out of the Prophet E fay concerning Merodach the sonne of Baladan; and in that which is said of this Merodach, or Mardokenpadus, his being the Successor of Nabonassar, and his beginnino to raigne in the fixt yeare of Hezekia, I finde matter of more difficultie, than can be ac answered in haste. I will therefore deferre the handling of these objections untill I meet with their subject in his proper place; which will be when we come to the time of He-Reha, wherein Merodach lived, and was King. Yer that I may not leave too great a scruple in the minde of the Reader, thus farre will I here satisfie him; that how Atone foever this argument may feeme, Scaliger himselfe didlive to retractit, ingenupullyconfesting, that in thinking Merodach to be the fon of Nabonassar, he had been de-

Now therefore let us confider, in what fort they have fashioned their Storie, who taking Pulto be a distinct person from Belosus or Belestis, have in like fort, as was necessaoricalifinguished their off-spring, making that of Pul to faile in Asarhaddon, which left allto Merodach the Babylonian. And here I must first confesse my want of Bookes. if perhapsthere be many that have gone about to reduce this narration into some such order as might present unto us the bodie of this Historie, in one view. Divers, indeed, there are, whom I have seene, that since Joseph Scaliger delivered his opinion, have writteninfavour of fome one or other point thereof: but Sethus Calvifius himselfe, who hath abridged Scaligers learned Worke, Deemendatione Temporum, hath not been carefull to giveus notice, how long Belofus, Baladan, Pul, or Tiglat Pulaffar did raigne, (perhaps because he found it not expressed in Scaliger) but is content to set downe Balidan, for the Smeperion with Nabonassar, which Scaliger himselfe revoked. In this case therefore I must lay downe the plot of these divided Kingdomes, in such fort as I find it contrived by Augustinus Torniellus; who onely of all that I have seene, sets downe the succession. continuance, and acts, of those that reigned in Asyria after Sardanapalus, distinguishing them from Belefus, and his Posteritie, of whom he hath the like remembrance. This Tornellus is a Regular Clarke of the congregation of S. Paul, whose Annales were printed the last yeare; he appeares to me a man of a curious industrie, sound judgement, and tree Spirit; yet many times (and I take it, wilfully) forgetfull of thanking, or mentioning those Protestant Writers, by whose Bookes he hath received good information, and miched his workes by inferting somewhat of theirs. But in this businesse he hath openly professed to follow scaleger, whose helpe, without wrong or dishonour to himselfe, he hathboth used and acknowledged. For mine owne part, I will not spare to doe tight unto Torniellus; but confesse my selfe to have received benefit by his writing; and with that his Annales had fooner come to light; for that as he hath much confirmed me in some things, so would be have instructed and imboldened me to write more fully and lessetimorously in other things, which now I have not leasure to revise. Particularly in that conjecture (which I had faintly delivered, and yet feared lest it had over-hastily pasled out of my hand, and beene exposed to other mens constructions) of the foure Kings that invaded the Valley of Siddim, and were flaine by Abraham, I finde him adventuring C. 1. 6.13. as I have done, to fay, that they may probably be thought to have beene some pettie Lords; the contrarie opinion of all Writers notwith standing. But now let us confider how he hath ordered these last Assyrian and Babylonian Kings. After the destruction of Sardanapalus, Arbaces, being the most mighty, sought to get all to himselfe, but was opposed by Belosus; in which contention, one Phul, a powerfull manin Assyria, sided with Belosus, and they two prevailed so far, that finally Arbaces was content to share the Empire with them, making such a division thereof, as was long after made of the Roman Empire between Ostavian, Anthony and Lepidus.

Another conjecture is (for Torniellus offers not this, or the rest, as matter of certainty) that Arbaces made himselfe Soveraigne Lord of all, and placed the seate of his Empire in Media, appointing Belosus his Lievtenant in Babylonia, and Phul in Assyria. But in short space, that is, in source yeares, it came to passe by the just judgement of God, to that Phul and Belosus rebelled against Arbaces, like as Arbaces had done against Sarda. napalus, and in stead of being his Vice-Royes, made themselves absolute Kings. And this latter opinion Torniellus himselfe leanes, holding it much the more probable, as being more agreeable to that which is found in prophane Histories. Why hee did make and publish the former supposition, resolving to hold the latter, I shall anon, without any wrong to him, make bold to ghesse. Having thus devised how Phul and Belosus might, at the sirst, attaine to bee Kings, he orders their time and their successors in this manner.

Foure years after Arbaces, Phul begins to reigne, and continues eight and forty years, Theglasphalafar (whose name, and the names of other Princes, I write diversly, according as the Authors whom I have in hand are pleased to diversifie them) succeeding unto Phul, reigned three and twenty. Salmanassar followed him, and reigned tenne. After him Senacherib reigned seven: and when he was slaine, Asarbaddon his sonne tenyeurs;

in whom that line failed.

The fame time that Phul took upon him as King of Affria, or not long after (why not rather afore? for fo it had been more likely) Belofus usurped the Kingdome of Balylm, and held it threescore and eight years; at the least threescore and eight years didpasse, before Nabonassar followed him in the possession.

To Nabonaffar, whom (with Scaliger) he thinkes to be Baladan, ate affigued fixed twenty years: then two and fifty to Merodach, or Mardocempadus: four and twenty to Ben Merodach: and lastly one and twenty to Nabolassar the father of Nabuchodonossi; who is like to offer matter of surther disputation.

Concerning the original of these Asyrian and Babylonian Kingdomes, I may truly fay, That the conjectures of other men, who give all to Belofus, and confound him with Phul, appeare to me more nearely refembling the truth. Neither doe I thinke, that Tirniellus would have conceived two different waies, by which Phul might have gotten Affyria (for how Belofus came to get Babylon, it is plaine enough) if either of them alone could have contented him. Headheres to the latter of the two, as better agreeing with Diodore, and other Historians. But he perceived, that to make Phul on the sudden King of Affiria; or to give him so noble a Province, as would, of it selfe, invite him to accept ? the name and power of a King, was a thing most unlikely to have happened, unlesselis deserts (whereof wee finde no mention) had beene proportionable to so high a reward-And for this cause (as I take it) hath he devised the means, whereby Pbul might be made capable of fogreat a share in the Empire. If this were a true or probable supposition, then would a new doubt arise, Why this Phul, being one of the three that divided all betweene them, was utterly forgotten by all Historians e yea, why this Division it selle, and the civill Warres that caused it, were never heard of ? Questionlesse, the interverting of some Treasures by Belosus, with his Judgement, Condemnation, and Pardon following, were matters of farre lesse note. Therefore I doe not see, how one of the two inconveniences can this way be avoyded; but that either we must confesse the Do-10 minion given to Phul to have beene exceeding his merits; or else his merits, and name withall, to have beene strangely forgotten : either of which is enough to make us think, that rather the conjecture, inferring fuch a sequell, is wide of the truth. As for the rebellion of Phul, and Belofus against Arbaces, it was almost impossible for the Affricans to recover such strength in source yeares, as might serve to hold out in rebellion: for Belosus ir was needleffe to rebell, confidering, that Arbaces did not feeke to moleft him, butta ther permitted (as being an over-great favourer of liberty) even the Medes that were under his owne Government to doe what they lifted.

But it is now fit that wee peruse the Catalogue of these Kings; not passing through them all (for some will require a large discourse in their owne times) but speaking of their order and time in generall. If it be so unlawfull to thinke, that some of Anne us his rales (let them all be counted his tales, which are not found in other Authors as well as in his may be true, especially such as contradict no acknowledged truth, or apparent likelihood; why then is it faid, that Phul did reigne in Assyria eight and forty yeares? For this hath no other ground than Annim. It is true that painefulland judicious Writers have found this number of years to agree fitly with the course of things in History: yet allofthem tooke it from Annius. Let it therefore be the punishment of Annius his forgery (as questionlesse he is often guilty of this crime) that when he tels truth, or probato bility, he benot beleeved for his own fake; though for our owne fakes wee make use of his boldnesse, taking his words for good, whereas (nothing else being offered) we are unwilling our selves to be Authors of new, though not unprofitable conjectures. Herein we shall have this commodity, that we may without blushing alter a little, to helpe our owne opinions, and lay the blame upon Annius, against whom we shall be sure to finde friends that will take our part.

The reignes of Theglathalafar and Salmanasfar did reach, by Annius his measure, to the length of five and twenty yeares the one, and seventeene the other; Torniellus hath out of two from the former, and seven from the later of them, to sit (as I think) his owne computation; using the liberty whereos I spake last: for that any Author, save our good Metashines, or those that borrowed of him, hath gone about to tell how long each of the did reigne, it is more than I have yet found. To Senacherib and Asarhaddon, Torniellus gives the same length of reigne, which is found in Metasthenes. I thinke there are not many, that will arrogate so much unto themselves, as may very well be allowed unto a man so judicious as is Torniellus: and yet I could wish that he had forborne to condemne the followers of Annius in this businesse, wherein he himselse hath chosen, part, rather to become one of them, than to say, as else he must have done, almost nothing.

The like liberty, we finde that he hath used in measuring the reignes of the Chaldeans, filling up all the space betweene the end of Sardanapalus and the beginning of Nabonassar, with the threescore and eight yeeres of Belosus. In this respectit was, perhaps, that he thought Belosus might have begun his reigne somewhat later than Phulifor threescore and eight years would seem a long time for him to hold a Kingdome, that was no young man when he tooke possession of it. But how is any whit of his age abated by shortning his reigne, seeing his life reacheth to the end of such a time, as were alone, without adding the time wherein he was a private man, enough for along liver? Indeed eight and forty years had been somewhat of the most, considering that he seemes by the story to have been little lesses such that it is joyned with Arbaces; and therefore the addition of twenty years, did well deserve that note (which Torniellus advisedly gives) that if his segmental such time, and therefore the indiction of twenty years, did well deserve that note (which Torniellus advisedly gives) that if his singular was a such as Ineither doe reprehend the boldnesse of Torniessus, in conjecturing, nor the modesty of Sealizer and Sethus Calvissus, in forbearing to set downe as warrantable, such things as depend only upon likelihood. Therefore the fictions (or let them be called conjectures) painted in Maps, doe ferve only to mif-lead fuch discoverers as rashly believe them; drawing upon the publishers. either some angry curses or well deserved scorne; but to keepe their owne credit, they cannot serve alwaies. To which purpose I remember a pretty jest of Don Pedro de Sar. miento, a worthy Spanish Gentleman, who had beene imployed by his King in planting a Colony upon the Streights of Magellan: for when I asked him, being then my Prifice ner, some questions about an Island in those Streights, which, me thought, might have done either benefit or displeasure to his enterprise, he told me merrily, that it was tolher called the Painters wives Island; faying, That whilest the fellow drew that Map, his wife fitting by, defired to put in one Countrey for her; that shee, in imagination, might have an Island of her owne. But in filling up the blankes of old Histories, we need not be fo scrupulous. For it is not to be feared, that time shall runne backward, and by restoring the things themselves to knowledge, make our conjectures appeare ridiculous: Whatif to fome good Copy of an ancient Author, could be found, flewing (if we have it not already) the perfect truth of these uncertainties? would it bee more shame to have beleved in the meane while, Annius or Torniellus, than to have believed nothing ! Here I will not fay, that the credit which we give to Annus, may chance otherwhiles to beegiven to one of those Authors whose names he pretendeth. Let it suffice, that in regard of all thority, I had rather trust Scaliger or Torniellus, than Annius; yet him than them, if his affertion be more probable, and more agreeable to approved Histories than their conje-Eture, as in this point it feems to me; it having moreover gotten some credit, by the probation of many, and those not meanely learned.

To end this tedious disputation; I hold it a sure course in examination of such opini-so ons as have once gotten the credit of being generall, fo to deale as Pacavius in Capitald with the multitude, finding them defirous to put all the Senatours of the Citie to death. He lockt the Senatours up within the State-house, and offered their lives to the Peoples mercy sobtaining thus much, that none of them should perish, untill the Commonly had both pronounced him worthy of death, and elected a better in his place. The condemnation was hafty; for as falt as every name was read, all the town cryed, Let him die: but the execution required more leafure; for in substituting of another, some notorious vice of the person, or basenesse of his condition, or insufficiency of his quality, made each new one that was offered to bee rejected: fo that finding the worse and lesse choice, the further and the more that they fought, it was finally agreed, that the old should be kept 4 for lacke of better.

Of the Olympiads, and the time when they began.

Fter this division of the Assyrian Empire, followes the instauration of the Olympian games, by Iphitus, in the reigne of the same King uzzia, and in his one and fiftieth yeare. It is, I know, the general opinion, that these games were established by Iphitus, in the first of Jotham: yet is not that opinion so generall, but that Authors, weighty enough, have given to them a more early beginning. The truth is, that in fitting those things unto the sacred History, which are found in prophane Authors, we should not be too careful of drawing the Hebrewes to those workes of time, which had no reference to their affaires; it is enough, that fetting in due order these beginnings of accounts, we joyne them to matters of Israel and Juda, where occasion requires.

These Olympian games and exercises of activity, were first instituted by Hercules, who measured the length of the race by his owne foote; by which Pythagoras found out the flature and likely strength of Hercules his body. They tooke name, not from the Mount taine Olympus, but from the Citie Olympia, otherwise Pifa, neareunto Elis; where also Jupiters Temple in Elis, famous among the Grecians, and reputed among the wonders of the World, was knowne by the name of the Temple of Jupiter Olympius. These games were exercised from every fourth yeare compleat, in the plaines of Elis, a Citie of Feisnonnesus neer the river Alphens.

After the death of Hercules, these meetings were discontinued for many yeares, till Aut. Gell. Lx. o. 22 bhitm, by advice from the Oracle of Apollo, re-established them, Lieurgus the Law-gi-ex Plut.

Plut. out of Here verthen living: from which time they were continued by the Grecians, till the reigne of mippus, The befires the Emperour, according to Cedrenus: others think that they were dissolved under Constantine the Great.

from this institution, Varro accompted the Grecian times and their stories to be certo mine: but reckoned all before either doubtfull or fabulous: and yet Pliny gives little Plin. 136.0.4. creditto all that is written of Greece, till the reigne of Cyrus, who began in the five and fifieth Olympiad, as Enfebius out of Diodore, Caftor, Polybins, and others, hath gathered. in whose time the seven wise Grecians flourished. For Solon had speech with Crasus, and Crasus was overthrowne and taken by Cyrus.

Many patient and piercing braines have laboured to find out the certaine beginning of thefeolympiads, namely, to fet them in the true year of the World, and the reigne of fuch and fuch Kings: but feeing they all differ in the first accompt, that is, of the Worlds year. they can hardly jump in particulars thereon depending.

o Cyril against Inlian and Didymus begin the Olympiads thenine and fortieth of Osias, or Azariah.

Eulibius, who is contrary to himfelfe in this reckoning, accounts with those that finde Eulib de Prep. the very first Olympiad in the beginning of the foure hundreth and fixth year after Troy; Evang troces. verherelleth us that it was in the fiftieth year of uzziah, which is (as I find it) two years later.

Ernofthenes placeth the first Olympiad foure hundred and seven years after Troy rec- Eratofth. apad koning the yeares that passed betweene; to whom Dionysius Halicarnasseus, Diodorus Clem. Alex. Siculus, Solimus and many others adhere.

The distance betweene the destruction of Troy and the first Olympiad, is thus collected by Eratof benes. From the taking of Trey to the descent of Hercules his Posterity into Peloponness, were fourescore years; thence to the Ionian expedition, threescore yeares; from that expedition to the time of Lycurgus his government in Sparts, one hundred fiftynine; and thence to the first olympiad, one hundred and eight yeares. In this account the first olympiad is not included.

But vaine labour it were to feeke the beginning of the Olympiads by numbring the yeares from the taking of Troy, which is of a date farre more uncertaine. Let it suffice, that by knowing the instauration of these games to have been in the foure hundreth and eight yeare current after Troy, wee may reckon backe to the taking of that Citie, fetting that, and other accidents which have reference thereto, in their proper times. The certainty of things following the Olympiads must needes teach us how to finde when they

To this good use wee have the ensuing yeares unto the death of Alexander the Great, thus divided by the same Eratosthenes. From the beginning of the Olympiads to the paslige of Xerxes into Greece, two hundreth fourescore and seventeene yeares; from thence to the beginning of the Peloponnesian Warre, eight and forty yeares; forwards to the vidory of Lysander, seven and twenty; to the battell of Leuttra, thirty foure; to the death of Philip King of Macedon, five and thirty; and finally to the death of Alexander, twelve. The whole summe ariseth to 453. years; which number he otherwise also colkeeth, and it is allowed by the most-

Now for placing the institution of the Olympiads in the one and fiftieth year of 1273ia, we have arguments grounded upon that which is certaine, concerning the beginning of Cyrushis reigne, and the death of Alexander; as also upon the Astronomical calculation of fundry Eclipses of the Sunne; as of that which happened when Xerxes set out of Sardis with his Army to invade Greece; and of divers other.

Touching Cyrus, it is generally agreed that his reigne as King before he was Lord of Tulde Direction the great Monarchy, began the first yeare of the five and fiftieth Olympiad, and that hee Full I Tegned thirty yeares: they who give him but rwenty nine yeares of reigne (following Evang tro. 3).

Hypodotus rather than Tuly, Justine, Eusebius, and others) begin a year later, which comes & de Den. all to one reckoning. So is the death of Alexander fer by all good Writers in the first year of the hundreth and fourteenth Olympiad. This latter note of Alexanders death serveth well to leade us back to the beginning of Cyrus; as many the like observations doe. For wen to leade us back of the time of Alexander, wee shall finde all to agree with the yeares of the Olympiads, wherein Cyrus began his reigne, either as King, or (taking the word Monarch, to fignifie a Lord of many Kingdomes) as a great Monarch. From the beginning of Cyrus, in the first year of the five and fiftieth Olympiad, unto the end of the Persian Empire, which was in the third of the hundreth and twelfth O lympiad, we finde two hundred and thirty yeares compleat: from the beginning of Cyrus his Monarchy, which lasted but seven years, we find compleat two hundred and seven years, which was to the continuance of the Persian Empire.

Now therefore seeing that the first yeare of Cyrus his Monarchy (which was thelast of the fixtieth Olympiad, and the two hundrethand fortieth yeare from the inflitution of those games by Iphitus) followed the last of the seventy yeares of the captivity of Jula. and desolation of the Land of I frael: manifest it is, that we must reckon back those seven ty years, and one hundred threefcore and ten years more, the last which passed underthe Kings of Juda, to find the first of these Olympiads; which by this accompt is the one and fiftieth of uzziah, as we have already noted.

The Eclipses whereof we made mention, serve well to the same purpose. Forezanples fake; that which was feene when Xerxes mustered his Army at Sardis, in the two w hundreth threescore and seventh yeare of Nabonassar, being the last of the threescore and and fourteenth. Olympiad, leads us back unto the beginning of Xerxes, and from him to Cyrus, whence we have a faire way through the threescore and ten years, untothede. Aruction of Jerusalem; and so upwards through the reignes of the last Kings of Jula, to the one and fiftieth year of uzza.

Thus much may suffice, concerning the time wherein these Olympiads began. To tell the great folemnity of them, and with what exceeding great concourse of all Greece they were celebrated, I hold it a superfluous labour. It is enough to say that !! bodily exercises, or the most of them, were therein practised; as Running, Wrelling, Fighting, and the like. Neither did they onely contend for the Maftery in those seases, whereof there was good use, but in running of Chariots, fighting with Whorle-bus, and other the like ancient kindes of exercifes that ferved onely for oftentation. Thinker also repaired Orators, Poets, Musicians, and all that thought themselves excellent in any laudable quality, to make tryall of their skill. Yea the very Cryers which produmed the victories, contended which of them should get the honour of having playdise

The Eleans were prefidents of those Games; whose justice, in pronouncing without partiality who did best, is highly commended. As for the rewards given to the Victors, they were none other than Garlands of Palme, or Olive, without any other commodity following than the reputation. Indeed there needed no more. For that was held fomuch, a that when Diagoras had seen his three sons crowned for their severall victories in those games, one came running to him with this gratulation : Morere, Diagoras, nonenimina Tum ascensurus es; that is, Die Diagoras, for thou Shalt not clime up to heaven: asifthere could be no greater happinesse on earth, than what already had befallen him. In the like Neither was it only the voice of the People, or fongs of Poets, that fo highly extolled them, which had wonne these Olympian prizes; but even grave Historians thought it? matter worthy of their noting. Such was (as Tully counts it) the vanity of the Greeks, that they esteemed it almost as great an honour to have wonne the Victory at Running or Wrestling in those games, as to have triumphed in Rome for some famous victory, or conquest of a Province.

That these Olympian games were celebrated at the full of the Moone, and upon the fifteenth day of the Moneth Hecatombaon, which doth answer to our June and what means they used to make the Moneth begin with the new Moone, that the fifteenth day might be the full, I have shewed in another place. Wherefore I may now returne unto the Kings of Juda, & leave the merrie Greekes at their games, whom I shall meet in more ferious employments, when the Perfian quarrells draw the body of this History into the coasts of Ionia and Hellespont.

§. VI. of Jotham and his Contemporaries.

10 Totham the fonne of uzziah, when he was five and twenty yeers old, and in the fecond of Pekah King of Ifrael, was anointed King in Jerusalem, his Father yet living. Hee 2 King 15.33; huilt an exceeding high Gate to the Temple, of threescore cubits upright, and therefore called ophel: besides divers Cities in the Hills of Juda, and in the Forrests, Towers & Palaces: he inforced the Ammonites to pay him Tribute to wit, of Silver an hundred talents, and of Wheat and Barly two thousand measures: hee reigned fixe and twenty vears: of whom Josephus gives this testimonie: Ejusmodi verò Princeps hic fuit ut nullum ineovirtutis genus desideres: ut qui Deum adeo piè coluerit, hominibus suis adeo juste præfuerit urbem ipfam tanta fibicura effe paffus fit, o tantopere auxerit ut univerfum regnum hisibus quidem minime contemnendum, domesticis autem ejus incolis atque civibus falix, fullum & fortunatum sua virtute effecerit. This was such a Prince, as a man could finde no hinde of vertue wanting in him : hee worshipped God so religiously he governed his men so righteoully, be was so provident for the Citie, and did so greatly amplifie it that by his verice and proppeffe he made his whole Kingdome not contemptible to his enemies but to his Servants. Inhabitants and CitiZens, prosperous and happie.

This is all that I find of Jotham: his reigne was not long, but as happie in all things as hehimfelfe was devout and vertuous.

Authomenes about this time fucceeded Phelefteus in Corinth: after whom, the Corinthians erected Magistrates, which governed from yeare to yeare. And yet Paulanias in his second Booke, with Strabo and Plut arch, in many places, are of opinion, That Corinth was governed by Kings of the race of the Bacida, to the time of Cypfelus, who drove Teglathphalassar, or Tiglathpeleser, the son of Phul the second of the Babylonians and Allgrians that was of this new race, about this time invaded Ifrael, while Pekah (who a King 15. murthered his Master Pekeiah) was King thereof. In which Expedition he tooke most of the Cities of Nephtali and Galilee, with those of Gilead, over Jordan, and carried the inhabitants captive. This Tiglath reigned five and twenty years, according to Metafthenes. But Krentz hemius findes, that with his fonne Salmanaffar he raigned yet two yeares longer: which yeares I would not ascribe to the sonne, because the Aera of Nabonassar begins with his fingle reigne, but reckon them to Tiglath Phulassar himselfe, who therewith reigned 27. veeres.

Assembly sthe son of Agammester, about the same time, the twelfth Archon in Athens, ruled 25. years. Alcamenes governed Sparta: after whom, the Estate changed, according to Eustbius. But therein surely Eustbius is mistaken: for Diodore, Plutarch, Pausanias, and others, witnesse the contrary. Paulanias affirmeth, That Polydorus, a Prince of eminent Paulib. 30 vertues, succeeded his father, and reigned 60. years, and out-lived the Messeniack warre:

which was ended by Theopompus, the fonne of Nicander, his royall companion. At this time lived Nahum the Prophet, who fore-told the destruction of the Asyrian Empire, and of the citie of Nineve; which succeeded (faith Josephus) a hundred & fifteen Yeeres after. The Cities of Cyrene and of Aradus were built at this time, while in Media, Sofarmus and Medidus reigned, being the second and third Kings of those parts.

Has, or Acha?, succeeded unto Jotham in the seventeenth yeer of Peka, the son of Remalia: the same being also the last yeere of his fathers reigne, who began of Kemalia: the same being another last years. In the second of the same Peka, and reigned 16. but not compleat yeeres. This

AhaZ was an Idolater, exceeding all his predecessors. He made molten Images for Baa. lim, and burnt his fon for facrifice before the Idoll Moloch, or Saturne, which was represented by a man-like brazen body, bearing the head of a Casse, set up not far from Jerusalem, in a Valley shadowed with Woods, called Gehinnom, or Tophet, from whence the word Gehenna is used for Hell. The children offered, were inclosed within the carkasse of this Idoll, and as the fire encreased, so the facrificers, with a noyse of Cimbals and other Instruments, filled the ayre, to the end the pittifull cries of the children might not bee heard: which unnaturall, cruell, and divellish Oblation, Jeremie the Prophet vehemently reprehendeth, and of which S. Hierome upon the tenth of Matthew hath written at large. By the prohibition in Leviticus the eighteenth, it appeareththat in this horrible finne was ancient: in the twelfth of Deuteronomie, it is called an abhomina tion which God hateth. That it was also practised elsewhere, and by many Nations remote from Judea, divers Authors witnesse; as Virgilin the second of Amids Sanguine placastis, &c. & Silvius --- Poscere cade Deos. Saturne is said to have brough this custome into Italy, besides the casting of many soules into the River of Tyber, in ftead of which, Hercules commanded, that the waxen Images of men should be thrown in and drowned. The Devill also taught the Carthaginians this kinde of butcherie in fomuch, that when their Citie was besieged, and in distresse, the Priest made them beleeve, that because they had spared their own children, and had bought and brought upothers tobee offered, that therefore Saturne had stirred up, and strenghtenedtheir to Enemies against them: whereupon they presently caused two hundred of the noblest youths of their Citie to be flaine, and offered to Saturne or Satan, to appeale him: who Eufeb. de Prep. besides these forenamed Nations, had instructed the Rhodians, the people of Crete, and Chios, of Meffena, of Galatia, with the Maffagets, and others, in thefe his fervices. Fur. ther, as if he were not content to destroy the soules of many Nations in Europe, Asia, and Acoft de Histor. Africa, (as Acofta writeth) the Mexicans and other people of America, were brought val. & mor. For the wickednesse of this King Abaz, God stirred up Rezin of Damascus, and he kah the Son of Remaliah, King of Ifrael against him, who invaded Judea, and besegd, Jerusalem, but entred it not.

The King of Syria, ReZin, possess himselfe of Elah by the Red Sea, and cast the Jens out of it; and Pekah flaughtered in one day an hundred and twenty thousand Judeans, of the ablest of the Kingdome, at which time Maaseiah, the Sonne of Achaz was also saine by Zichri, with Azrikam the Governour of his house, and Eleanath the second person unto the King. Besides all this, two hundred thousand prisoners of women and children, the Ifraelites lead away to Samaria: but by the counsell of the Prophet Oded, they were returned and delivered backe againe.

2 Chron. 28.

As Ifrael and Aram vexed Juda on the North; so the Edomites & the Philistims, who evermore attended the ruine of Judea, entred upon them from the South, and tooke 4 Bethfemes, Ajalon, Gaderoth, Socho, Timnah, & Genzo, flew many people, & carriedaway many prisoners. Whereupon when Achaz saw himselfe environed on all sides, & that his Idols and dead gods gave him no comfort, hee fent to the Affgrian Tiglatphilifer, to defire some aide from him against the Israelites and Aramites, presenting him withthe filver and gold both of the Temple, and Kings house. Tiglatphilefer wanted not a good example to follow, in making profit of the troubles that rose in Palastina. His Father having lately made himselfe from a Provincial Liertenant, King of Babylon and Affyria, had a little before led him the way into Judea, invited by Menahem, King of Ifrael. Wherefore now the Son willingly harkened to Achas, and embraced the advantage. As for Belochus himselfe, hee was content to assigne some? other time for going through with this enterprize: because (as I have said before) he was not firmely fettled at home, and the Syrian Kings lay directly in his way, who were yet firong both in men and fame. But Tiglath, having now, with the treasures of Jerusalem, prepared his Army, first invaded the Territorie of Damasene, wanne the Citie, & killed Rezin the last of the race of the Adads, who began with David, & ended with this Acha (. At Damaleus, Achaz met Tiglath, and taking thence a patterne of the Altar, sentit to uri ab the Priest, commanding the like to be made at Jerusalem, whereon at his returns hee burnt Sacrifice to the gods of the Syrians. In the meane while Tiglath possessall Basan, and the rest beyond Fordan, which belonged to the Tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Manasse. And then paffing the River, he mastered the Cities of Galilee, invaded Ephraim, and the Kingdome of Ifrael, and made them his Vaffals. And notwithstanding that hee was invited and waged by Achaz, yet after the spoile of Ifrael, he posses himself of the greater part of Juda, and, as it feemeth, inforced Achaz to pay him tribute. For in the fecond of Rings, the eighteenth, it is written of Ezechia, that he revolted from Ashur, or rebelled againsthim, & therfore was invaded by Sennacherib. After Ahaz had beheld and borne the full fries, in the end of the fixteenth yeere of his reigne he died; but was not buried inthe Sepulchres of the Kings of Inda.

With AhaZ lived Medidus, the third Prince in Media, who governed 40. years, faith Ealthius: Diedorus and Ctesias find Anticarmus in stead of this Medidus, to have beene Englo. in Chion.

CHAP. 23. S. 7.

Tiglath Philefer held the Kingdome of Affria, all the reign of Abaz: vet fo. that Salmanaflar his Son may feeme to have reigned with him some part of the time. For wee findthat AhaZ did fend unto the Kings of Ashur to belpe him. The Geneva note saies, that these Kings of Ashur, were Tiglath Pileser, and those Kings that were under his Domi- 2 King 28. 16. nion, But that he or his Father had hitherto made fuch conquests, as might give him the Lordship over other Kings, I doe neither find any History, nor circumstance that proveth. Wherefore I thinke that these Kings of Albur, were Tiglath, and Salmanasar his Son, who reigned with his Father, as hath beene faid before: though how long hee reigned with his Father, it had beene hard to define.

At this time began the Ephori in Laced amon, a hundred & thirty years after Lycurgus, plutareh in vita according to Plutarch. Eufebius makes their beginning far later, namely, in the fifteenth solo. Olympiad. Of these Ephori, Elalus was the first; Theopompus and Polydorus being then joynt Kings. Thefe Ephori, chofen every yeare, were controllers as well of their Senaton a of their Kings, nothing being done without their advice and confent. For (faith Citro) they were opposed against their Kings, as the Roman Tribunes against the Confuls Inthetime of AhaZ died Aeschylus, who had ruled in Athens ever fince the fiftieth vereof uzzia. Alcamenon the thirteenth of the Medontida, or Governours of the Athenians (focalled of Medon who followed Codrus) fucceeded his Father Aefchylus, and wasthelast of their Governors: he ruled onely two yeeres. For the Athenians changed finffrom Kings (after Codrus) to Governors for life; which ending in this Alcamenor, they erected a Magistrate, whom they termed an Archen, who was a kinde of Bu ghomaster, or Governor of their City for ten yeeres.

This alteration Paulanias in his fourth Booke begins in the first yeere of the eighth Olympiad. Eufebius & Halicarnaffaus in the first of the seventh Olympiad : at which time indeed, Carons the first of these, began his ten yeeres rule.

The Kingdome of the Latines, governed about three hundred yeare by the Sylvii, of therace of Aeneas, tooke end in the same Abaz time: the foundation of Rome, being slid by Romulus & Remus in the eighth yeere of the fame King. Codoman builds it in the deventh of Achaz, Bucholzer in the eighth, as I thinke he should; others somewhat later, and in the reigne of Exechias. Cicero, Eutropius, Orofins, and others, square the time of the foundation to the third yeere of the fixt Olympiad. But Halicarna flaus, Solinus Antischenus, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Eusebius, to the first yeere of the seventh: who feeme not onely to me, but to many very learned Chronologers, to have kept herein the best accompt.

Of the Antiquities of Italy, and foundation of Rome in the time of Ahaz.

6. I. Of the old Inhabitants, and of the name of Italy.

No here to speake of the more ancient times of Italy, and what Nations possessing it before the arrivall of Aeneas, the place may seemeto invite us: the rather because much fabulous matter hath been mixed with the truth of those elder plantations. Italy before the fall of Italy, was known to the Greekes by divers names: as first Hesperia, then Australy, the one name arising of the seate, the other of the Australy, people inhabiting part of it: one ancient name of it was also or work.

which it had of the Oenotri: whom Halicarnasses thinkes to have beene the first, that brought a Colony of Arcadians into that Land. Afterward it was called Italy of Italia: concerning which changes of names, Virgil speakes thus:

Est locus, Hesperiam Graii cognomine dicunt: Terra antiqua, potens armis, atque ubere glebæ: Oenotrii colucre viri, nunc fama, minores Italiam dixisse, ducis de nomine, gentem.

There is a Land which Greekes Hesperia name, Ancient, and strong, of much fertility:

Oenotrians held it, but we heare by fame,
That by lateages of Posterity,
Tis from a Captaines name called Italy.

Who this Captaine or King may have bin, it is very uncertaine. For Virgil speakes no more of him, and the opinions of others are many and repugnant. But like enough it is, that the name which hah continued so long upon the whole Countrie, and worne out all other denominations, was not at the first accepted without good cause. There fore to find out the original of this name, and the first planters of this noble Countrie, Reineccius hath made a very painfull fearch, and not improbable conjecture. And first of all he grounds upon that of Halicarnasseus, who speakes of a Colonie which the Elans did leade into Italy, before the name of Italy was given to it : Secondly, upon that of Justine, who faith, that Brundusium was a Colonie of the Actolians: Thirdly, uponthat 4 of Strabo, who affirmes the same of Temesa or Tempsa, a Citie of the Brutis in Italy: Lastly upon the authority of Plinie, who shewes that the Italians did inhabite only one Region of the Land, whence afterward the name was derived over all. Concerning that which is faid of the Eleans and Aetolians, who (as he shewes) had one originall; from them he brings the name of Italy. For the word Italia, differs in nothing from Aitalia, fave that the first Letter is cast away, which in the Greeke words is common; & the letter (0) is changed into (a) which change is found in the name of Acthalia an Island neere Italy, peopled by the Aetholians: and the like changes are very familiar in the Aeslie Dialect; of which Dialect (being almost proper to the Aetolians) the accent & pronunciation, together with many words little altered, were retained by the Latines, as Dio-5 ny sius, Halicarnassaus, Quintilian, and Priscian the Grammarian teach-

Hereunto appertaines that of Julian the Apostata, who called the Greekes cousins of the Latines. Also the common Originall of the Greekes and Latines from Javan; and the Fable of Javas, whose Image had two faces, looking East and West, as Greek and Italy lay, and was stamped on Coynes, with a Ship on the other side; all which is, by interpretation, referred to Javan, father of the Greekes and Latines: who say ling over the Ionian Sea, that lies betweene Aetolia and the Westerne parts of Greeke and Italy, planted Colonies in both. Now whereas Reineccius thinkes, that the names of Atlas and Italus belonged both to one man, and thereto applyes that of Berofus, who called Cethim, Italus; though it may seeme strengthened by the marriage of Dardanus, whilest he abode in Italy with Electra, the daughter of Atlas, yet is it by arguments (in my valuation) greater and stronger, easily disproved. For they who make mention of Atlas, place him before the time of Moses: and if Atlas were Cethim, or Kittim, then was he theson of Javan, and nephew of Japheth, the eldest son of Noah: which antiquity far exceedes the name of Italy, that began after the departure of Hercules out of the Country, not long before the Warre of Troy.

Likewise Virgil, who speakes of Atlas, and of Dardanus his marriage with Electra, hith nothing of his meeting with her in Italy, but calleth Electra & her fister Maia (poe-hically) daughters of the Mountaine Atlas in Africa, naming Italus among the Kings of the Aborigenes; which he would not have done, had Atlas and Italus beene one person. As for the authority of Berosus in this case, we need the lesset or regard it, for that Reynausius himself, whose conjectures are more to be evalued than the dreames wherewith Annius hath filled Berofus, holds it but a figment.

That the name of Italy began long after Atlas, it appeares by the verses of Virgil last reharded, wherein hee would not have said, — Nuns fama minores Italiam dixisse duis de nomine gentem, had that name beene heard of ere Dardanus less the Countrey. But seing that, when Hercules, who died a sew yeeres before the Warre of Troy, had less italy a Colonie of the Eleans (who in a manner were one and the same Nation with the Actolians, as Strabo, Herodotus, and Pausanias teach) then the name of Italy began: & seeing Virgil makes mention of Italus among the Italian Kings, it were no great boldenesse to say, that Italus was Commander of these Eleans. For though I remember nothat I have read of any such Greeke as was named Italus; yet the name of Actolus written Greeke Aitolus, was very samous among the Actolians, and among the Eleans, hebeing son of a King of Elis. & sounder of the Actolian Kingdome. Neither is it more hadto derive the name of Italus from Actolias, than Italia from Actolias. So may Virgils authority stand well with the collections of Reprocessing the name of Italy being taken both from a Captaine, and from the Nation, of which he and his people were.

6. I I.

Of the Aborigenes, and other Inhabitants of Latium, and of the reason of the names of Latini and Latium.

Nitaly the Latines and Hetrurians were most famous; the Hetrurians having held the greatest part of it under their subjection; & the Latines by the vertue and selicity of the Romans, who were a branch of them, subduing all Italy, and in few ages what-sower Nation was knowne in Europe: together with all the Westerne parts of Isa, and North of Africk.

The Region called Latium, was first inhabited by the Aborigines, whom Halicarnassaus, Varno, & Reyneccius (following them) thinke to have bin Arcadians: & this name of Aborigines (to omit other fignifications that are strained) imports as much as originall, or native of the place, which they possessed: which title the Arcadians are knowne in vaunting manner to have alwayes usurped, fetching their antiquity from beyond the Moone; because indeed, neitherwere the inhabitants of Peloponnesus inforced to forsake their leates so oft as other Greekes were, who did dwell without that halfe Island, neither had the Arcadians so unsure a dwelling as the rest of the Peloponne sians, because their Countrey was leffe fruitfull in land, mountainous, & hard of accesse, & they themselves (asinfuch places commonly are found) very warlike men. Some of these therefore ha-Vingoccupied a great part of Latinm, & held it long, did according to the Arcadian manner, fille themselves Aborigenes, in that language, which either their new Seate, or their Neighbours there by had taught them. How it might be that the Arcadians, who dwelt somwhat far from Sea, & are alwaies noted as unapt men to prove good Mariners, should have bin Authors of new discoveries, were a question not easie to be answered, were it not fo, that both fruitfulnesse of children, in which those ages abounded, inforced the iperfluous company to seeke another seat, & that some expeditions of the Arcadians, sespecially that of Evander, into the same parts of Italy, are generally acknowledged.

498 After the Aberigines, were the Pelasgi, an ancient Nation, who sometimes gave name to all Greece but their antiquities are long fince dead, for lacke of good records. Neither was their glory fuch in Italy, as could long fustaine the name of their own Tribe; for they were in short space accounted one people with the former inhabitants. The Sicani Aulones Arunci, Rutili, and other people, did in ages following disturbe the peace of Latium, which by Saturne was brought to some civility; and he therefore canonized to

This Saturne S. Augustine calleth Sterces or Sterculius, others terme him Stercutius fay that he taught the people to dung their grounds. That Latzum tooke his name of Sa turne, because he did latere, that is, lie hidden there, when he fled from Jupiter, it isque. Rtionlesse a fable. For as in Heathenish superstition, it was great vanity to think that any thing could bee hidden from God, or that there were many gods of whom one fledde from another; so in the truth of History, it is well knowne, that no King reigning in those parts was so mighty, that it should bee hard to finde one Country or another. wherein a man might be fafe from his pursuit. And yet, as most fables and poeticallife. tions were occasioned by some ancient truth, which either by ambiguity of speech, or fome allufion, they did maimedly and darkely expresse (for so they fained a passage over a River in Hell, because death is a passage to another life; & because this passages hatefull, lamentable, and painfull, therefore they named the River Sigx, of Hate; Couptin, of Lamentation, and Acheron, of Paine: so also because men are stonie-hearted; and he. cause the Greek Naco, people, and Nass stones, are neere in found, therefore they fained in the time of Deucalion stones converted into men, as at other times men into stones:)in like manner it may be, that the original of Saturnes hiding himselfe, was someallison to that old opinion of the wifest of the Heathen, that the true God was ignotus Delli, 35 it is noted in the Alls; whence also Esay of the true God saies, tu Deus abdens te. Forit cannot be in vaine, that the word Saturnus should also have this very fignification, ifit be derived (as some thinke) from the Hebrem Satar, which is to hide: Howbeit Idenie not but that the original lofthis word, Latium, ought rather to be fought elsewhere,

Reyneccius doth conjecture that the Ceteans, who descended of Cethin, the Sonof Javan, were the men who gave the name to Latium. For these Ceteans are remembred by Homer as aiders of the Trojans in their warre. Strabo interpreting the place of Homer, calls them subjects to the Crowne of Troy. Hereupon Reynecerus gathers, that their abode was in Afia: viz. in agro Elaitico, in the Elaitian Territory, which agreeth with Strate. Of a City which the Acolians held in Asia, called Elea, or Elaia, Pausanias makesmention: Stephanus calls it Cidamis, or (according to the Greeke writing) Cidamis, whichmen last rehearsed hath a very neere sound to Cethim, Citim, or Cithim; the Greeke Letter(D) having (as many teach) a pronunciation very like to (TH) differing only in the strength or weakenesse of utterance, which is found betweene many English words written with the same letters. Wherefore that these Ceteans, being descended of Cethim, Cittim, or Kittim, the Sonne of Javan, who was Progenitor of the Greekes, might very welltake a denomination from the City, and Region, which they inhabited, and from thence be called Elaites, or Elaites, it is very likely, confidering that among the Arcadians, Phocians, Actolians, and Eleans, who all were of the Acolique Tribe, are found thenmes of the Mountaine Elaus, the Haven Elaus, the people Elait a, the City Elaus, Elaus, & Elateia; of which last it were somewhat harsh in the Latine tongue to call the Inhabitants by any other name then Elatini, from whence Latini may come. Now whereas both the Cesai and Areadians, had their originall from Cethin, it is nothing unlikely, that agreeing in language and similitude of names, they might neverthelesse differ in sound and pronunciation of one and the same word. So that as he is by many called Sabinus; 10 whom some (deriving the Sabines from him) give the name of Sabus: in the likemanners might he whom the Arcadians would call Elatus (of which name they had a Prince that founded the City Blateia) bee named of the Ceteans Latinus. Reyneceius, pursuing this likelihood, thinkes, that when Eurypilus, Lord of the Ceteans, (being the Sonne of Telephus, whom Hercules begat upon Auge, the daughter of Aleus King of Arcadia) Was flaine by Aebilles in the Trojan Warre: then did Telephus, brother to Eurypilus, conduct the Geteans; who (fearing what evill might befall themselves by the Greeks, if the affaires of Trey should goe ill) passed into that part of Italy, whereas the Arcadians were planted by Oenotrius. And Requeccius farther thinkes, that Telephus being the more gracious among the Oenotrian Arcadians, by the memory of his Grand-mother Auge, an Arcadian Lady, was well contented to take an Arcadian name, and to be called Elatus, which in the dialect and pronunciation either of the Ceteans, or of the Oenotrians, was first Elatime, and then Latinus. That this name of Elatus may have bin taken or imposed by the Arcadians, it is the more easie to be thought, for that there were then two Families. the one of Aphidas, the other of Elatus, who were Sons of ArcasKing of Arcadia, which oavename to the Country: & betweene these two Families the succession in that Kingdoutedid paffe, almost enterchangeably, for many ages, till at the end of the Trojan warre inflinto the hand of Hippotheus of the race of Elatus, in whose Posterity it continued the last. Againe, the name of Latinus, having a derivative found, agrees the better with the supposition of such an accident. This is the conjecture of Reyneccius, which if hemade over-boldly, yet others may follow it with the leffe reproofe, confidering that irisnot easie to find either an apparent truth, or faire probability among these disagreeing Authors, which have written the originals of Latium.

6. III.

Of the ancient Kings of the Latines untill Aneas his comming.

He Kings which reigned in Latium before the arrivall of Aeneas, were Saturnus, Picus, Faunus, and Latinus. Of Saturne there is nothing remembred, fave what is mentioned already, and many fables of the Greekes, which whether they bee appliable to this man, it is for him to judge, who shall bee able to determine, whether this were the Saturne of the Greekes, called by them wow or forme other, stiled Saturne bythe Aborigines. For the age wherein he lived, may very well admit him to have bin the fame: but the names of * Sterces, and Stercutius (for it may bee, this name was not * Excludioficing bossied from the skill which hee taught the people, but rather the foile which they cals the idols bollowed from the skill which need daight the people, and father make him seeme some of the heathers laid on their grounds, had that appellation from him) doe rather make him seeme some of the heathers otherman.

Of Picus it is faid, that he was a good Horse-man. The fable of his being changed into the Evangelist a Bird, which we call a Pie, may well feeme (as it is interpreted) to have growne from we reade of theskill which hee had in footh-saying, or divination, by the slight and chattering of Belegoub, Belegoul, which is Fowles. Faurus, the Son of Picus, reigned after his Father. He gave to Evander the interpreted Do-Arcadian (who having flaine by mischance his Father Echemus King of Arcadia, fled in-minus storoveus: to Italy) the waste grounds on which Rome was afterward built.

Fauna, called Farua, the fifter of Faunus, who was also his wife, as all Historians agree; satura became hewasheld a Prophetesse, and highly commended for her chastity, which praise in her the name of an multineeds have bin much blemished by her marriage, it selfe being meerly incessuous. God that in a Itis not mentioned that Faunus had by his fifter any childe, neither doe we reade of like sense this any other Wife which he had, fave onely that Virgil gives unto him Latinus as his Son, fhould flicke by a Nymph called Marica.

But who this Marica was, it is not found, fave onely that her aboad was about the Aeneid. 7. River Liris neere Minturna.

Ofthename Latinus, there are by Pomponius Sabinus recounted foure: one, the Son of Faunus, another of Herculus, a third of uly ses by Circe, the fourth of Telemachus. Sui- suidas in the du takes notice onely of the fecond, of whom he faith, that his name was Telephus, and word Lairn. the people anciently named the Cetti, were from his furname called Latini. This agrees in effect with the opinion of Regneccius, the difference confisting almost in this only, that Suidas calls Telephus, the fon of Hercules, whereas Reyneccius makes him his Nephew, by a son of the same name. This Latinus having obtained the succession in that Kingdome after Faunus, did promise his only Daughter and Heire Lavinia, to Turnus the son of Vemilia, who was fifter to Amata Latinus his Wife.

But when Aeneas arrived in those parts with fifteene ships, or perhaps fewer, wherein might be imbarked, according to the rate which Thucydides allowes to the Vessels then used, about one thousand & two hundred men: then Latinus finding that it would stand best with his assurance to make alliance with the Trojan, and moved with the great re-Putation of Aeneas, which himselfe had heard of in the Warre of Troy, gave his Daughter tohim, breaking off the former appointment with Turnus; who incenfed

Acts 7.2.3. Elay 45.15herewith, fought to avenge himselfe by warre: which was soone ended with his owne

Of Amata the Wife of Latinus, it is very certaine, that were she an Italian, she could not have borne a Daughter marriageable at the arrivall of Aeneas; unlesse wee should wholly follow Suidas, and rather give the conduct of the Cetei into Italy, to Telephus the Father, than to his Son, who served in the last yeere of the Trojan Warre. But Reyne. Father, than to his Son, who served in the last yeere of the Trojan Warre. But Reyne. cins holds her an Asiaique, and thinkes withall, that Lavinia was borne before Telephus came into Italy. That this name Amata, by which Virgil and Halicarnass callher, was not proper, but rather a surname, it may seeme by Varro; who calleth her Palatia: which name very well might be derived from the Greek name Pallas. Amata, which sign in inseth beloved, or deare, was the name by which the High Priest called every Virgin whom he tooke to serve as a Nunne of Vesta; wherfore it is the more easie to be thought a surname, how soever Virgil discourse of her and Venilia her sister.

Lavinia, the daughter of Latinus, being given in marriage to Aeneas, the Kingdome of Latinum, or the greatest part of that Countrie, was established in that race: whemit continued untill it was over-growne by the might and greatnesse of the Romans.

§. IV.

Of Eneas, and of the Kings and Governors of Alba.

NEAS himselfe being of the Royall bloud of Troy, had the command of the Dardanians: he was a valiant man, very rich, and highly honoured among the Trojans. By his wife Creusa, the daughter of Priamus, hee had a sonne called Assanius; whose surname was Julus, having before the ruine of Troy (as Virgil notes) bin surnamed Ilus. But when Aeneas was dead, his wife Lavinia, the daughter of La. tinus, being great with childe by him, and fearing the power of this Ascanius, fled into the Woods, where she was delivered of a son, called thereupon Sylvius, and surname Postbumus, because he was borne after his fathers Funerall. This flight of Lavinia wash evill taken by the people, that Ascanius procured her returne, entreated her honourably, 70 and using her as a Queene, did foster her young son, his halfe-brother Sylvius. Yet after wards, whether to avoid all occasions of disagreement, or delighted with the situations the place; Ascanius leaving to his mother in law the Citie Lavinium, which Aeneashal built and called after his new wives name, founded the Citie Alba Longa, and therein reigned. The time of his reigne was, according to fome, eight and twenty yeers: Virgil gives him thirty; others five and thirty, and eight and thirty. After his decease, the arose contention betweene Sylvius, the son of Aeneas, and Julus the sonne of Asianus, about the Kingdome: but the people inclining to the sonne of Lavinia, Julus was contented to hold the Priesthood, which he and his race enjoyed, leaving the Kingdomto Sylvius Posthumus, whose posterity were afterwards called Sylvii.

Latinus founded many Townes in the borders of Latinus: who standing much upon the honour of their originall, grew thereby to be called Prifei Latini. Of Tiberinus fomethinke that the River Tiber had name, being formerly called Albula: but Virgil gives it that denomination of another called Tibris, before the comming of Aeneas into tal. The Mountaine Aventinus had name (as many write) from Aventinus King of the Albanes: who was buried therin: but Virgil hath it otherwise. Julius, the brother of Amentinus, is named by Eufebius as father of another Julius, & grandfather of Julius Proculus, who leaving Alba, dwelt with Romulus in Rome: Numitor, the elder fon of Procas, was deprived of his Kingdom by his brother Amulius; by whom also his son Aegesthus was flaine, and Ilia his daughter made a Nunne of Vesta, that thereby the issue of Numifor might be cut off. But the conceived two formes, either by her Uncle Amulus, as forme thinker or by Mars, as the Poets faine; or perhaps by some man of warre. Both the children, their Uncle commanded to be drowned, and the mother buried quicke, according othelaw, which so ordained, when the Vestall Virgins brake their chastitie. Whetherit was so, that the mother was pardoned at the entreatie of Antho, the daughter of Annilius, or punished as the Law required (for Authors herein doe varie) it is agreed by all that the two children were preferved, who afterward revenged the cruelty of their Uncle, with the flaughter of him and all his, and restored Numitor their grandfather to the Kingdome: wherein how long hee reigned, I find not, neither is it greatly mareriall to know; for as much as the Estates of Alba and of Latium were presently eclipfed by the fwift increase of Rome; upon which the computation of Time following (asfarreas concernes the things of Italy) is dependant. After the death of Numitor, the Kingdome of Alba ceased; for Numitor left no male issue. Romulus chose rather to live in Rome; and of the Line of Sylvius none else remained. So the Albanes were governed by Magistrates; of whom onely two Dictators are mentioned, namely Cains Clailius, who in the dayes of Tullus Hoftilius, King of the Romanes, making Warre upon Rome, dved in the Campe; and Metius Suffetius, the fucceffor of Chilling, who furrendred the Estate of Alba unto the Romanes, having committed the hazzard of both Signories to the fuccesse of three men of each fide, who decided the quarrell by Combat: in which, the three brethren Horatio, the Champions of the Romanes, prevailed against the Curiatie, Champions of the Albanes. After this Combat, when Metins (following Tullus Hostilius with the Albane forces against the Veientes and Fidenates) withdrewhis Companies out of the battaile, hoping thereby to leave the Romanes to fuch moverthrow, as might make them weake enough for the Albanes to deale with; Tullus, who notwith standing this falsehood, obtained the victory, did reward Metius with a emelldeath, causing him to be tyed to two Chariots, and so torne in pieces. Then was alba destroyed and the Citizens carried to Rome, where they were made free Denizens, thenoble Families being made Patricians; among which were the Julii : of whom C. Julius Cefar being descended, not only gloried in his ancient, royall, and forgotten pedegree, in full affembly of the Romanes, then governed by a free Estate of the People: but by his rare industrie, valour, and judgement, obtained the Soveraignty of the Romane Empire (much by him enlarged) to himselfe and his posterity; whereby the name of Atmens, and honour of the Trojan and Alban Race, was so revived, that seldome, if ever, any one Family hath attained to a proportionable height of glory.

9. V.

Of the beginning of Rome, and of Romulus birth and death.

From, which devoured the Alban Kingdome, I may here best shew the beginnings, which (though somewhat uncertaine) depend much upon the birth and education of Romahus, the grand-childe of Numitor, the last that reigned in Alas For how not onely the bordering people, but all Nations between Euphrates and he Ocean, were broken in pieces by the yron teeth of this fourth Beast, it is not to be estribed in one place, having beene the worke of many Ages; whereof I now doe and onely the first, as incident unto the discourse preceding. Q. Fabius Pictor, Por-tius Cato Calphurnius Pifo, Sempronius, & others, seeke to derive the Romans from Janus. but Herodotus, Marfylus, and many others of equall credit, give the Gracians for their Strables f. 152 ancestors: & as Strabo reporteth in his fifth Booke, Cacilius rerum Romanarum Scriptor eo argumento colligit, Romamà Græcis esse conditam, quod Romani Græco ritu, antiquo infi tuto Herculi rem sacram faciunt : matrem quoque Evandri venerantur Romani; Cacillia (faith he) a Romane Historiographer, doth by this argument gather, that Rome was built he the Greeks, because the Romanes, after Greekish fashion, by ancient ordinance doe sacrifia to Hercules: the Romanes also worship the mother of Evander.

Plutarch in the life of Romulus remembreth many founders of that Citie: as Romanus the fon of Uly fes and Circe; Romes the fon of Emathion, whom Diomedes fent thither from Troy; or that one Romus, a Tyrant of the Latines, who drave the Tuscans out of that Country, built it. Solinus bestowes the honour of building Rome upon Evander. faving, That it was before times called Valentia. Heraclides gives the denomination to captive Lady, brought thither by the Gracians: others fay, That it was anciently called Februs, after the name of Februa, the mother of Mars; witnesse S. Augustine inhisthird Booke de Civitate Dei. But Livie will have it to be the worke of Romulus, even from the foundation: of whom and his conforts, Juvenal to a Roman Citizen, vaunting of their originall, answered in these Verses:

> Attamen ut longe repetas, longeque revolvas Majorum qui (quis primus fuit ille tuorum, Aut paftor fuit , aut illud quod dicere nolo.

Yet though thou fetch thy pedegree so farre; Thy first Progenitor, who ere he were, Some Shepheard was, or else, that Ile forbeare.

meaning, either a Shepheard or a Theefe

Now of Remulus begetting, of his education and prefervation, it is faid, That held Rhea for his mother, and Mars supposed to be his father, that he was nurst by a Wolfe, found and taken away by Faustula a Shepheards wife. The same unnaturall nursinghad Cyrus, the fame incredible foltering had Semiramis the one by aBitch, the other by Birds. But, as Plutarch faith, it is like enough that Amulius came covered with armour to Rhea, the mother of Romulus, when he begat her with childe: & therein it feemethto methat he might have two purpoles; the one, to deftroy her, because she was the daughterand heire of his elder brother, from whom he injuriously held the Kingdome; the other, to fatisfie his appetite, because she was faire and goodly. For the being made a Nume of the goddesse Vesta, it was death in her, by the Law, to breake her chastitie. I also find Fauchet f. 114. in Fauchet his Antiquite ? de Gaule, that Merouee, King of the France, was begomenby ? Monster of the Sea: but Fauchet sayes, Let them beleeve it that lift; Il le croira quiveldra: Also of Alexander, and of Scipio African, there are poeticall inventions: But to answer these imaginations in generall, It is true, that in those times, when the World was full of this barbarous Idolatry, and when there were as many gods as there were Kings, or passions of the minde, or as there were of vices and vertues; then did many women greatly borne, cover fuch flips as they made, by protesting to bee forced by more than humane power: so did Oenone confesse to Paris, that she had beene ravished by Apollo. And Anchyses boasted that hee had knowne Venus. But Rhea was made with childe by some man of Warre, or other, and therefore called Mars, the god of battell, according to the fense of the time. O enone was overcome by a strong wit, and by fuch a one as had those properties ascribed to Apollo. The Mother of Meroiece might fancie a Sea Captaine, to be gotten with young by fuch a one: as the Daughter of Inachus fancied, according to Herodotus. Aeneas was a bastard, and begotten upon some faire Harlot, called for her beautie Venus, and was therefore the childe of lust, which is Venus. Romulus was nurst by a Wolfe, which was pa, or Lupina; for the Curtesans in those dayes were called Wolfes, Que nunc (thin Halicarnasseus) honesteori vecabulo amica appellantur; Which are now by an houst name called friends. It is also written, that Romulus was in the end of his lifetake up into heaven, or rather out of the world by his father Mars, in a great storme of the der and lightning: fo was it faid that Aeneas vanished away by the River Numices but thereof Livie also speaketh modestly; for hee rehearseth the other opinion that the forme was the furie of the Senators, but feemeth to adhere partially to this taking up; and many Authors agree, that there was an unnatural darkeneffe, both at his birth and or his death; and that he might be flaine by thunder or lightning, it is not unlikely. For the Emperour Anastasius was slaine with lightning; so was Strabo the Father of Fompey Agine with a thunder-bolt: fo Carus the Emperour (who fucceeded Probus) whileft hee lodged with his Army upon the River Tygris, was there flain with lightning. But a Mars of the same Kinde might end him that began him; for he was begotten by a man of war. & by violence destroyed. And that he died by violence (which destiny followed most of the Roman Emperors) it appeareth by Tarquinius Superbus, who was the feventh King after him: who when hee had murthered his Father-in-law, commanded that hee should not be buried, for (faid hee) Romulus himfelfe died and was not buried. But let Halicarnaffausendthis dispute: whose words are these: They (faith hee) who drew neerest to the with lay that he was slaine by his owne CitiZens; and that his cruelties in punishment of offendors, together with his arrogancie, were the cause of his slaughter. For it is reported that both when his mother was ravished, whether by some man, or by a god, the whole body of the Sunnewas eclipsed, and all the earth covered with darkenesse like unto night, of that the same did happen at his death.

Such were the birth and death of Romulus: whose life historified by Plutarch, doth containe (befides what is here already spoken of him) the conquest of a few miles which had some bin forgotten, if the Roman greatnesse built upon that foundation, had not given it memory in all ages following, even unto this day. A valiant man he was, very from of body, patient of travell, and temperate in diet, as for bearing the use of wine & delicacies but his raging ambition he knew not how to temper, which caused him to flay his brother, & neglect to revenge the death of Tation, his companion in the Kingdome, that he himselfe might be Lord alone in those narrow Territories. He raigned 37. yeers first alone, then with Tatius, and after his death, single, till he was slaine, as is already shewed: after which time, the Soveraignty fell into the hands of Numa, a man to him unknown, and more Priest-like than King-like: wherein Rome it selfe in her latter times shath somewhat resembled this King. For having long bin sole Governesse till Constantimple shared with her : afterwards, when as the Greeke Emperour was crushed by forraine enemies, and the Latines disployed of Imperiall power, she fell into the subjection of a Prelate, fivelling by degrees from the Sheepe-hooke to the Sword, and therewith victorious to excessive magnificence, from whence by the same degrees it fell, being driven from luxurie to defensive armes; and therein having bin unfortunate, at length betakes her selfe againe to the Crosser staffe.

And thus much of Rome in this place by occasion of the Storie of the times of King Aha during whose reigne in Jurie, the foundations of this famous Citie were laid.

Of Ezechia, and his Contemporaries.

Of the beginning of Ezechias, and of the agreeing of Ptolomie, Nabonassar, Nabopolaffar and Mardocempadus, with the historie of the Bible.

S the first yeere of Abaz his reigne was confounded with the last of his father Jotham, so was the latter end of his sixteen years taken up in the three first of Ezechias his son. This appeares by the Reigne of Hosea, over Israel, which began in the twelfth of Ahaz, and therefore the third thereof was concurrent with Aba7 his fourteenth. But the third of Hosea was the first of E7echia; so it followes, that Ezechia began to reigne in his Fathers foureteenth yeere. Like enough it is, that the third yeer of Hothe fame being the fourteenth of AbaZ, was almost spent when Ezechia began, and fo the fifteenth vecre of AhaZ may have beene concurrent, for the most part, with the first of Ezechia.

By supposing that Hosea began his Kingdome, when the twelfth yeer of Abaz Wasal most compleat, some would find the meanes how to dis-joyne the first of Hezechia from the fifteenth of AhaZ, placing him yet one year later, of which yeere, AhaZ may per haps have lived not many dayes. But feeing that the foureteenth and fifteenth yeeresof Execbia may not be removed out of their places, it is vaine labour to alter the first yeer

In the fourteenth yeere of Ezechia, Senacherib, invading Juda and the Countries ad. iovning, loft his Armie by a miraculous stroake from Heaven, fled home, and was flaine. The yeere following it was that God added fifteene yeers to the life of Exelling when hee had already reigned foureteen of his nine and twenty : and the fame yeerew that miracle feene of the Sunnes going backe; of which wonder (as I heare) one Bar. tholomen Scultet, who is much commended for skill in Astronomie, hath by calculate on found the very day, which answered unto the twenty fift of April, in the Julian vice. being then Thursday. I have not seene any workes of Sculter; but surely to find a mo. tion so irregular and miraculous, it is necessary that he produce some record of object vation made at such a time. How soever it be, the fifteenth yeare of Ezechia agreedupon and therefore we may not alter the first. As for that faying, which is usuall in like cases 'a Chron. 28.27. that Ahaz flept with bis Fathers, & Ezechia his Sonne reigned in his flead, it dothno more prove that Exechia reigned not with his Father, than the like faying doth inferre thelikes at the death of Jehosaphat, and succession of Jehoram; whereof, as concerning the beginning of the Sonne to reigne whilest his Father lived, wee have already faid enough.

Of this godly King Ezechias, we find, that his very beginning testified his devotion and zeale. For whether it were fo, that his unfortunate and ungracious Father (who had out-worne his reputation) gave way to his Sons proceedings, which perhaps it lay not in him to hinder; or whether (as I rather thinke) the first yeere and first moneth of his 2 Chro. 29. v.3. reigne, wherein Ezechias opened the doores of the Temple, were to bee understoods the beginning of his fole government; wee plainly find it to have beene his first worke, that hee opened the doores of the house of the Lord, which Acha? had shut up, cleaned ; the Citie and Kingdome of the Idols, restored the Priests to their offices & estates, commanded the Sacrifices to bee offered which had bin for many yeeres neglected, &buke down the brasen Serpent of Moles, because the people burnt incense before it. & head led it Nebushan, which fignifieth alumpe of braffe. He did also celebrate the Passe over with great magnificence, inviting thereunto the Ifraelites of the ten Tribes: many there were, even out of those Tribes, that came up to Jerusalem, to this feast. But thegeneral multitude of Ifrael did laugh the Messengers of Ezechia to scorne.

It was not long ere they that fcorned to folemnize the memoriall of their deliverance out of the Egyptian fervitude, fell into a new fervitude, out of which they never were delivered. For in the fourth of Ezechia his reigne, Salmanassar the Son of Tiglathtic Son of Belochus, hearing that Hofea King of Ifrael had practifed with Soe King of Egyh. against him, invaded Israel, befieged Samaria, and in the third yeare (after the inhabitants had endured all forts of miseries) forced it, and carried thence the ten Idolatrous Tribes into Affyria and Media: among whom Tobias, and his Son of the same name, with Anna his Wife, were fent to Nineve; in whose Seates and Places the Assirians sent strangers of other Nations, and among them many of the ancient Enemies of the Israelites, as those of Cutha, Ana, Hamah, and Sphernaim, besides Babylonians: whose Places and Nations I have formerly described in the Treatise of the Holy Land.

These later Assyrian Kings, and the Persians, which followed them, are the first, of whom wee find mention made both in Prophane and Sacred bookes. These therefore ferve most aprly to joyne the times of the old World, (whereof none but the Prophers have written otherwise than fabulously) with the Ages following that were better knowne, and described in course of History. True it is, that of Cyrus and some other Persians, we find in the Bible the same names by which other Authors have recorded them : but of Phal & Salmanaffar, with other Affyrian, Chaldran Kings, diversity of name hath bred question of the persons. Therefore, whereas the Scriptures doe speake of Sal manassar, King of Assur, who reigned in the time of Ahaz and Ezechia, Kings of Juda, & of Hofea King of Ifrael, whom hee carried into captivity : and whereas Piolomy make mention of Nabonaffar, speaking precisely of the time wherein he lived sit is very pertinent to shew; that Salmanassar and Nabonassar were one and the same man. The like reasonalso requireth, that it be shewed of Nabuchadne Zar, that he was the same, whom

Of both these points Bucholerus hath well collected sufficient proofe from the exact calculations of fundry good Mathematicians. For by them it appeares, that betweene Nabona far and the birth of Christ, there passed seven hundred forty and sixe yeeres: at which distance of time the reigne of Salmanasar was. One great proofe hereof is this, which the fame Bucholerus alledgeth out of Erafmus Reinholdus, in the Printerick Tables. Mardocempadus King of Babylon (whom Ptolomy, speaking of three Eclipses of the To Moone, which were in his time, dorh mention) was the same whom the Scriptures call Merodach, who fent Embassadours to HeZechia King of Juda. So that if we reckon backward to the difference of time, betweene Merodach and Salmanassar, we shall finde it the same which is betweene Mardocempadus and Nabonassar. Likewise Functius doth flew, that whereas from the destruction of Samaria, to the destruction of Jerusalem, in the ninteenth of Nabuchadne Zar, we collect out of the Scriptures, the distance of one hundred thirty and three yeeres: the selfe-same distance of time is found in Ptolomy, betweene Nabonassar and Nabopolassar. For whereas Prolomy seemes to differ from this accompt, making Nabonassar more ancient by an hundred and forty yeeres, than the deof fruction of Jerusalem, wee are to understand that he tooke Samaria in the eighth yeere ofhis reigne; so that the seven foregoing yeeres added to these one hundred thirty and three, make the accompts of the Scriptures fall even with that of Ptolomy. Ptolomies computation is, that from the first of Nabonassar, to the fifth of Nabopolassar, there passed one hundred twenty and feven yeeres. Now if wee adde to these one hundred twenty feven, the thirteene enfuing of Nabuchadne Zars yeeres, before the City and Temple were destroyed, wee have the summe of one hundred and forty yeeres. In so plaine a case more proofes are needlesse, though many are brought, of which this may serve for all, that Prolomy placeth the first of Nabopolassar one hundred twenty and two yeeres, after the first of Nabonassar, which agreeth exactly with the Scriptures. To these notes are added the consent of all Mathematicians: which in accomptof times I holdmore fure than the authority of any History; and therefore I think it folly to make doubt, whereas Historians and Mathematicall observations doe so throughly con-

Yetforasmuch as that argument of the learned Scaliger doth rest unanswered, whereby he proved Baladan the Father of Merodach, to have beene this Nabonasar; I will not forceto lose a word or two in giving the Reader satisfaction herein. It is true, that the next observations of the heavenly Bodies, which Ptolomy recorded, after the time of Nabonaffar, were in the reigne of Mardocempadus; the second yeere of whose reigne, is according to Ptolomy, concurrent in part with the twenty feven of Nabonassar. For Ptol. Almag. the fecond of three ancient Eclipses which her calculates, being in the second yeere of 14.68. Mardocempadus, was from the beginning of Nabonassar twenty seven yeeres, seventeenedayes, and eleven houres: the accompt from Nabonassar, beginning at high-noone the first day of the Egyptian Moneth That, then answering to the twenty fixt of Februa-7; and this Eclipse being fifty minutes before mid-night, on the eighteenth day of that Moneth, when the first day thereof agreed with the nineteenth of Februarie; so that the difference of time betweene the two Kings Nabonassar and Mardocempadus, is noted by Rolomy, according to the Egyptian yeers. But how doth this prove, that Mardocempadus or Meradach, was the Sonne of Nabonagar? yea, how doth it prove, that he was his next Successour, or any way of his Linage? It was enough to fatisfie me, in this argument, that Scaliger himselfe did afterwards beleeve Mardocempadus to have beene rather the Nephew than the Sonne of Baladan, or Nabonassar. For if hee might bee cither the Nephew, or the Sonne; hee might perhaps bee neither the one, nor the other. But because our Countrie-man Lidyat hath reprehended Scaliger for chan-Bing his opinion; and that both Torniellus, who followes Scaliger herein, and Sethus Lawifus, who hath drawne into forme of Chronology, that learned worke, De Emendatione Temporum, doe hold up the fame affertion, confounding Baladan with Na-I have taken the paines to fearch, as farre as my leifure and diligence could tach, after any sentence that might prove the Kindred or Succession of these two. Yet cannot I find in the Almagest (for the Scriptures are either filent in this point, or adverse to Scaliger; and other good authoritie, I know none, in this bufineffe) any fentence more neerly proving the fuccession of Merodach to Nabonassar, than the place now last rehear. fed: which makes no more, to shew that the one of these was father to the other, than (that I may use a like example) the as neere succession of William the Conqueror, declares him, to have bin Son, or Grand-child to Edward the Confessor. This considered, we may fafely goe on with our account from Nabonassar, taking him for Salmanassar, and nor fearing, that the Readers will be driven from our Booke, when they finde fomething init, agreeing with Annius, for a smuch as these Kings mentioned in Scriptures, reigned in Baby low and Affria, in those very times which by Diodorus and Ptolomie are assigned to Be. 10 Logus, Nabonassar, and Mardocempadus, and the rest: no good Historie naming any others that reigned there in those ages; and all Astronomicall observations, fitly concurring with the yeares that are attributed to these, or numbred from them.

6. I I.

Of the danger and deliverance of Judas from Senacherib.

Hen Salmanassar was dead, and his son Senacherib in possession of the Empire in the fourteenth yeare of EZechias, he demanded of him fuch Tribute to as was agreed on, at fuch time as Tiglath, the Grand-father of Senacherib, and Father of Salmana flar invited by AhaZ, invaded ReZin King of Damafeus, and delivered him from the dangerous Warre which Israel had undertaken against him. This Tribute and acknowledgement when Ezechias denied, Senacherib, having (as it feemes)a purposeto invade Egypt, sent one part of his Armie tolye before Jerusalem, Now though Ezechias (fearing this powerfull Prince) had acknowledged his fault, and purchased his peace, as he hoped, with thirtie hundred talents of filver, and thirtie talents of gold: wherewith he presented senacherib, now set down before Lachis in Judan; ya under the colour of better affurance, and to force the King of Judea to deliver hostages, the Affyrian invironed Jerufalem with a groffe Armic, and having his fword in his hand 30 thought it the fittest time to write his owne conditions.

Exechias directed his three great Counsellers, to parly with Rabfaces over the Wall; and to receive his demands: who used three principall arguments to perswade the people to yeeld themselves to his Master Senacherib. For though the Chancellour, Steward, and Secretarie, fent by Ezechias, defired Rabfaces to speak unto them in the Syrian tongue, & not in the Jewish, yes he with a louder voyce directed his speech to the multitude in their own language. And for the first, he made them know, That if they cominued obstinate, and adhered to their King, that they would in a short time be inforced to eate their own dung, and drinke their owne urine: Secondly, he altogether disabled the King of Egypt, from whom the Judæans hoped for fuccour; and compared him to 40 a broken staffe, on which who foever leaneth, pierceth his owne hand; Thirdly, that the gods who should helpe them, Ezechins had formerly broken and defaced, meaning chiefely (as it is thought by some) the brasen Serpent, which had beene preserved ever fince Mofes time: and withall hee bade them remember the gods of other Nations, whom, notwithstanding any power of theirs, his Master had conquered and thrown downe; and for God himselfe, in whom they trusted, hee perswaded them by 10 meanes to relye upon him, for he would deceive them. But finding the people filent (for fo the King had commanded them) after a while, when he had understood that the King of Arabia was marching on with a powerfull Armie, he himselfe left the Affyrian forces in charge to others, and fought Senacherib at Libna in Judea, either to informe him of their resolution in Jerusalem, or to conferre with him concerning the Armie of Tarhaca the Arabian. Soone upon this there came letters from Senacherib to Executes, whom he partly advised, and partly threatned to submit himselfe, using the same blasphemous outrage against the all-powerfull God, as before. But Exechiof fending those Counsellers to the Prophet Est, which had lately beene sent to faces, received from him comfort, and affurance, that this heathen Idolater should not prevaile; against whom the King also belought aide from Almightie God, to peating the most insolent and blasphemous parts of Senacheribs letter, before the Alrar of God in the Temple, confessing this part thereof to be true. That the King of Ahur had destroyed the Nations and their Lands, and had set fire on their gods, for they were no 2 Kin.19. gods, but the worke of mans hands, even wood and flone &c.

The reason that moved Senacherib to desire to possesse himselfe in haste of Jerusalem.was, that he might thereinto have retraited his Armie, which was departed as it feemeth from the siege of Pelusium in Egypt, for seare of Terbasa: and though the Scripmires are filent of that enterprise (which in these bookes of the Kings, and of the Chronielsor Parilipomenon, speake but of the affaires of the Jewes in effect) yet the ancient Be-10/10, and out of him Josephus and Saint Hierome, together with Herodotus, remember it Herod. 1.2 p. 69. 25 followeth. Herodotus calleth Senacherib King of Arabia and Affyria: which he might infly doe, because Tiglath his grand father held a great part thereof, which he wirested from Pekah King of Israel: as Gilead over Jordan, and the rest of Arabia Petræa adjovning the same Herodotus also maketh Sethon King of Egypt, to be Vulsans Priest and morteth that the reason of Senacheribs return from Pelusium in Egypt, which healso hesiged, was, that an innumerable multitude of Rats had in one night eaten in ander the Bow-strings of his Archers, and spoyled the rest of their weapons in that kinde, which no doubt might greatly amaze him : but the approach of Tarbaca, remembred by Tolephus and Berofus, was the more urgent. Saint Hierome upon the feven and thir- Fofant Lio, 6 1 rieth of Elay, out of the same Berofus, as also in part out of Herodotus, whom Josephus ci-Hor Europilas teth somewhar otherwise than his words lye, reports Senacheribs retrait in these words. With which destruction being terrefied, and withall affraid what might become of the rest of his Armie, hee made great marches into his Kinedome, to his Royall Citie, which is called Ninus, where shortly after by the treason of two of the eldest of his Sonnes, Adramelech most likely it is, that he had formerly dis-inherited those two, and conferred the Empire on Affarhadden. Tobis tels us, that it was fiftie five dayes after Senacheribs returne, pire on Allar neaure. The formes, during which time he flew great numbers of ere hee was murthered by his formes, during which time he flew great numbers of ere nee was martineses, till the most just God turned the sword against his owne the Israelites in Nineve, till the most just God turned the sword against his owne breaft.

Of Ezechias his fickenesse and recoverie; and of the Babylonian King that congratulated him.

Frer this marvellous deliverie, Ezechias fickned, and was told by Isaiah that he must dye: but after he had besought God with teares for his deliverie, Isaich, as hee was going from him, returned againe, and had warrant from the Spirit of God to promise him recoverie after three dayes, and a prolongation of life for fifteene yeares. But Ezechias somewhat doubtfull of this exceeding grace, prayeth for a figne to confirme him: whereupon, arthe prayer of Isaiah, the shadow of the Sume castit selse the contrarie way, and went backe tenne degrees, upon the Dyall of A. chaz. The cause that moved Ezechias to lament (faith Saint Hierome) was, because he had as yet no sonne, and then in despaire that the Messias should come out of the house of David, or at least of his Seede. His disease seemeth to be the pestilence, by the medicine given him by the Prophet, to wit, a masse of Figges, layd to the Bothor

This wonder when the Wise-men of Cheldea had told to Meredach, King of Ba. bylon, the first of that house; he sent to Ezechias, to be informed of the cause: at which time Ezechias shewed him all the Treasure he had, both in the Court and in the Kingdome: for which he was reprehended by the Prophet Isaiah, who told him; The dates are at hand, that all that is in thine house, and what soever thy Fathers have layd up in fore to this day , Shall becarried into Babel; nothing shall be left, saith the Lord. It may 30 sceme strange, how Ezechia should have got any treasure worth the shewing: for senacherib had robbed him of all, the yeare before. But the spoyle of the same Senecherib his Campe repayed all with advantage, and made Ezechia richer upon the sudden than ever he had beene: which unexpected wealth was a strong temptation to boatting. Afterthis time Ezechia had rest, and spending without noyse that addition which God had made unto his life; he dyed having reigned nine and twentie yeares. One onely offensive Warre hee made, which was against the Philistims with good successe. A. mong his other acts (shortly remembred in Ecclesiasticus) he devised to bring water to

In two respects they say that he offended God: the one, that he rejoyced too much so at the destruction and lamentable end of his enemie; the other, that he so much glored in his riches, as he could not forbeare to shew them to strangers. But the reason which moved Ezechias (speaking humanely) to entertaine the Embassadours of Merodachin this friendly and familiar manner, was, because he came to visit him, and brought him a present, congratulating the recoverie of his health; as also in that Merodach had weakned the house of Senacherib, his fearefull enemie. For Meredach, who was Commander and Lievtenant under Senacherib in Babylon, usurped that State himselfe, in the last yeare of that King, and held it by strong hand against his son Assarbaddon; who was not only simple, but impaired in strength, by the molestation of his brothers. This advantage Merodach espied, and remembring that their ancestor Phul Belachus had sethis own Master Sardanapalus besides the cushion, thought it as lawfull for himselfetorake the opportunitie which this Kings weakenesse did offer, as it had beene for Belochia to make use of the others wickednesse: and so, finding himselfe beloved of the Babyloni ans, and sufficiently powerfull, he did put the matter to hazzard, and prevailed. The fertion of this historic is made by the same arguments that were used in maintaining the common opinion of Writers, touching Phul Belochus; which I will not here againe to hearfe. So of this new race, which cut a-funder the Line of Ninas, there were only five Kings.

Phul Belochus Tiglath Philaffar. SalmanasTar. reigned & 10 > yeares. Senacherib. Affarhaddon.

But for as much as the last yeare of Salmana far was also the first of Senacherib his fort. wereckon the time, wherein the house of Phul held the Assyrian Kingdome, to have bin anhundred and one yeares, of which, the last five and twentie were spent with Ezechia, winder Salmanassar, Senacherib, and Assarhaddon.

The Kingsthat were in Media during the reigne of Ezechia: Of the difference found between fundrie Authors in rehear sing the Median Kings. Other contemporaries of Hezechia: Of Candaules, Gyges, and the Kings descended from Hercules.

-N the time of Ezechia, Medidus, and after him Cardiceas, reigned in Media. Whether it were fo, that varietie of names, by which these Kings were called in severall Histories, hath caused them to seeme more than indeed they were; or whether the sons raigning with the fathers, have caused not onely the names of Kings, but the length of Time, wherein they governed Media, to exceed the due proportion : or whetherthe Copies themselves of Ctesias and Annius his Metasthenes, have bin faulty as neitherofthese two Authors is over-highly commended of trustinesse: so it is, that the mmes.number, and length of reign, are all very diversly reported of these Median kings, that follow Arbaces: therefore it need not feem strange, that I reckon Medidus and Cardieu ascontemporaries with Ezechia. For to reconcile fo great a difference, as is found in those writers that varie from Eusebius, is more than I dare undertake. I will only here set down the roll of Kings that reigned in Media, accordingly as fundry Authors have deli-30 vered it.

Annius his Metasthenes orders them and their reignes thus:

Arbaces. Mandanes. Sofarmon. Articarmin. Arbianes. Artæus. reigned 40 Artines. 22 Astybarus, with his 20 sonne Apanda. Apanda alone. Darius with Cyrus.

Diederus Siculus following Ctefias (as perhaps Annius made his Metasthenes follow Diedore, with some little variation, that he might not seeme a borrower) placeth them thus.

Arbaces. Mandanes. Solarmus. Articas. reigned Arbianes. Arfaus. Artines. Art abanus.

Astyleges. B the continuance of these two he do th not mention.

Mirrator hath laboured, with much diligence, to reconcile these Catologues, and to make them also agree with Eusebius. But for a fruich as it seemes to me an impossible matter, to attaine unto the truth of these forgotten times, by conjectures founded upon Ddd 3

Ctefies and Metasthenes, I will lay the burden upon Eusebies, who lived in an age better furnished than ours, with bookes of this argument. Let it therefore suffice, that these two Kings (whom I have reckoned as contemporaries with Ezekia) Medidus and Caraiceas, are found in Eusebius: for whether Cardicess were Diodorus his Arbianes, I will not stay to fearch. The Kings of Media, according to Eusebius, raigned in this order.

These names, and this course of succession I retaine; but adde unto these, Cyaxare the fon of Astrages, according to Xenophon; and sometimes follow Herodotus, in setting down the length of a Kings reigne, otherwise than Eusebrus hath it: of which variations, I will render my reasons in due place.

The twenty nine yeares of Ezekia were concurrent, in part, with the rule of the force first that were chosen Governours of Athens for ten years, that is, of Charops, Æsimedia, 10 Elidicus, and Hippones. Touching the first of these I heare nothing fave that Rome was built in his first yeare; of which perhaps himselfe did not heare. Of the second andthrd I find only the names. The fourth made himself known by a strange example of justice, or rather of cruelty, that he shewed upon his own Daughter. For he finding that she had offended in unchastity, caused her to be lockt up with an Horse, giving to neither of them any foode: fo the Horse, constrained by hunger, devoured the unhappy Woman.

In Rome, the first King, and founder of that City Romalus, did reigne both before, and somewhat after Ezekia.

In Lydia, Candaules the last King ruled in the same age.

This Region was first called Mæonia. Lydus the son of days reigning in it, gavethe po name of Lydia, if we believe fuch authority as we find. This Kingdome was afterward, by the appointment of an Oracle, conferred upon Argon, who came of Alcaus the fonof Hercules, by Jardana, a bond-woman. The race of these Heraclida continued reigning fifty five yeares (in which two and twenty Generations paffed) the fon continually facceeding the father. Candaules the fon of Myrfus was the last of his race, who doated to much upon the beauty of his owne wife, that he could not be content to enjoy her, but would needs enforce one Gyges the fon of Dascylus to behold her naked body; and placed the unwilling man fecretly in her chamber, where he might fee her preparing tobedward. This was not so closely carried, but that the Queen perceived Gyges at his going forth, and understanding the matter, took it in such high disdaine, that she forced him the next day to require the Kings folly with treason. So Gyges being brought again into the famechamber by the Queen, flew Candsales, and was rewarded not only with his Wife, but with the Kingdome of Lydia. He reigned thirty eight yeares, beginning in the last of EZekia, one year before the death of Romalus.

After Gyges, his fon Ardys reigned nine and forty yeares; then Sadyattes twelve; He lyattes, fifty feven; and finally Crafus the fon of Halyattes, fourteen years: who loft the Kingdome, and was taken by Cyrus of Perfia.

And here by the way we may note that as the Lydian Kings, whom Crafus his Progenitor dispossest, are deduced from Hercules, so of the same Hercules there sprang many o ther Kings, which governed severall Countryes very long; as in Asia, the Mysians; in a Greece, the Lacedæmonians, Messenians, Rhodians, Corinthians and Argives; and from the Argives, the Macedonians, as likewise from the Corinthians, the Syracusanes: be fides many great and famous, though private, Families.

But of the Heraclida that reigned in Lydia, I have not troubled my self to take notice in the time of their severall reignes: for little is found of them beside the bare names, and the folly of this last King Candauler.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of the Kings that reigned in Egypt, betweene the deliverance of Ilrael from thence, and the reigne of Ezekiah in Juda, when Egypt and Juda made a league against the Assyrians.

That many names of Egyptian Kings, found in Historie, are like to have belonged onely to Viceroges. An example proving this out of William of Tyre his Historic of the Holy

He emulation and quarrels arising in these times, betweenethe mightie Kingdomes of Egypt and Assyria, doe require our pains, in collecting the most memorable things in Egype, and setting down briefly the state of that Countrey, which had continued long a flourishing Region, and was of great power, when it contended with Affria for the Mastrie. Of Cham the son of Noah, who first planted that Countrey, and of Ofris, orus, and other ancient Kings, that reigned there, untill the Ifraelites were thence delivered, more hath bin faid alreadie than I can stand to; though I hold it no shame to falle in fuch conjectures. That which I have delivered, in speaking mine opinion of the Egyptian Dynasties, must here againe helpe me. For it may truely be affirmed, That the great number of Kings, which are faid to have raigned in Egypt, were none other than 30 Viceroyes or Stewards, such as Joseph was, and such as were the Soldanes in later ages. Therefore I will not onely forbeare to fecke after those, whom Herodotus and Diodorus have reckoned up, from the mouths of Egyptian Priests, delivering them by number, without rehearfing their names; but will fave the labour of marshalling them in order, whose names onely are found; the yeares of their raigns, and other circumstances proving them to have bin Kings indeed, being not recorded.

Butthat I may not seeme before hand to lay an imaginarie ground, whereupon after I may build what I list; it were not amisse, to give unto the Reader such satisfaction in this point, as apparent reason, and truth of Historie doth afford. First therefore, we ought not to believe those numbers of Generations, which the lying Priests have reckoned up, 6 to magnifie their Antiquities. For we know, that from Abraham our Saviour Christ was removed onely fortie two descents; which makes it evident, that in farre shorter time, namely before the Persian Empire, there could not have passed away twice as many succeffions in Egypt: especially confidering, that many of these, whose continuance is expressed, having raigned longer than fortie years. It followes that we should square the number of the Egyptian Kings in some even proportion, to those which did beare rule mother Countries. As for the rest, whose names we finde scattered here and there any man that will take the paines to reade the ninteenth booke of the holy War, written by William Archbishop of Tyre, may easily perswade himselfe, that it is not hard to find names enow, of fuch as might bethought to have reigned in Egypt, being none other than Regents or Viceroyes. Yet will I here infert, as briefly as I can, some things making to that parpole for the pleasure and information of such, as will not trouble themselves With turning over many Authors.

When Elabdech the Caliph ruled in Egypt, one Dargan, a powerfull and a subtle man, made himselfe Soldan, by force and cunning, chasing away Sanar an Arabian, who was Soldan before and after him. This Dargan ministred matter of quarrel to Amalrick king of Jerufalem; and fustained, with little losse, an invasion, which Amalrick made upon Egypt. Hereupon he grew so insolent and proud, that Sanar the former Soldan hoped to make his partie good against him, if he could get any forces wherwith to enter Egypt.

Briefly, Sanar fueth to Noradine, King of Damasco, for aide, who sends an Armie of his Turks, under the command of Syracon, against the Soldan Dargan. So Dargan and Sanar met, and fought: The victorie was Dargans; but he enjoyed it not: for in few dayes after, he was slaine by treason, whereby Sanar did recover his Dignitie: which to establish, he slew all the kindred and friends of Dargan, that he could finde in the great Ci-tie of Cairo.

To all these doings, the Caliph Elhadech, gave little regard : for he thought it little concerned him, which of them lived, and had the administration of the Kingdome, whilest Le might have the profit of it, and enjoy his pleasure. But new troubles presently arise, which (one would thinke) do neerly touch the Caliph himselfe. Syracon with his Turkes, 10 whom Sanar had gotten to come into Egypt, will not now be intreated there to leave him, and quietly go their way home. They seize upon the Town of Belbeis, which they fortifie, and there attend the arrivall of more companie from Damasco, for the conquest of all Egypt. The Soldan perceives their intent, and findes himselfe not strong enough to expell them, much leffe to repell the Turkish Armie, that was likely to second them. He therefore fends Messengers to King Almaricke of Jerusalem, whom with large promises, he gets to bring him aide, and so drives out the Turkes. Of all this trouble the great Caliph heares nothing, or not fo much as should make him looke to the playing of his own game.

A greater mischiefe ariseth, concerning the Caliph Elhadech particularly in hisowne 10 Title. Syracon, Captaine of the Turkes that had been in Egypt, goes to the Caliphof Baldach (who was opposite to him of Egypt, each of them claiming as heire to Mahomet that false Prophet, the Soveraigntie over all that were of the Saracen Law) and tels him the weakenesse of the Egyptian, with his owne abilitie of doing service in thosepans, offering his best means for the extirpation of the Schismaticall Calipb, and the reduction of all Egypt, with the Western parts, under the subjection of the Babylonian. This motion is readily and joyfully entertained; all the Eastern Provinces are up in Armes, and Syracon, with a mightie power, descendeth into Egypt. The noyse of this great expedition so affrighteth King Almaricke, that with all his forces he hasteth into Egypt: well knowing how nearely it concerned him and his Kingdome of Jerusalem, to keepe the jo Saracens from joyning all under one head. Sanar the Soldan perceiving the faithfull care of the Christians his friends, welcomes them, and bestirs himselfe in giving them all manner of content, as it behoved him: for by their admirable valour, he finally drave the enemies out of the Countrie-But this victorie was not so soone gotten, as it is quick-

Strange it is (which most concernes our present purpose) that of so desperate a danger, the Caliph, as yet, seemes to know nothing. May we not thinke him to have been king in title onely, who meddled so little in the Government . The Soldan, finding that the Christians (without whose helpe all was lost) could not well stay so long as his necessities required: makes large offers to King Almaricke, upon condition that he should abide 40 by it. He promiseth a great Tribute(William of Tyrecalls it a Tribute; the Saracens, perhaps, called it a Pension) which the Kings of Jerusalem should receive out of Egypt, for this behovefull assistance. But the Christians understanding that the Soldan (how much seever he tooke upon him) was subject to a higher Lord, would make no bargain of such importance with any other than the Caliph himselfe. Hereupon Hugh Earle of Cafarea, and a Knight of the Templars, are fent unto Elbadech to ratifie the covenants. Now shall we fee the greatnesse of the Calipb and his estate.

These Embassadours were conveighed by the Soldan to Cairo, where arriving at the Palace, they found it guarded by great troupes of Souldiers. The first entrance was through dark Porches, that were kept by many armed bands of Ethiopians, which with all diligence, did reverence to the Soldan as he passed along. Through these streights the Warders led them, into goodly open Courts, of such beautie and riches, that they could not retaine the gravitie of Embassadours, but were inforced to admire the things which detained their eyes. For therethey faw goodly Marble Pillars, gilded Beames, all wrought over with embossed workes, curious pavements, fish-ponds of marble with cleare waters, and many forts of strange birds, unknown in those parts of the World, as comming perhaps from the East Indies, which then was undiscovered. The further they went, the greater was the magnificence; for the Calipb his Eunuches conveyed them into other Courts within these, as far excelling the former, as the former did surpasse ordinarie houses. It were tedious perhaps to rehearse how the further they entred, the more high state they found, and cause of marvaile; suffice it, that the good Archbishop, who wrote these things, was never held a vaine Author. Finally they were brought into the Caliphs owne lodgings, which were yet more stately and better guarded; where entring the Presence, the Soldan having twice prostrated himselfe, did the third time cast off his Sword that he wore about his necke, and throw himselfe on the ground before the curtaine, behinde which the Caliph fate. Presently the traverse wrought with Gold and Pearles was opened, and the Caliph himselfe discovered, sitting with great majesty on a throne of gold, having few of his most inward servants and Euruches about him. When 10 the Soldan had humbly kissed his Masters feet, he briefly told the cause of his comming, the danger wherein the land stood, and the offers that he had made unto King Almerick, desiring the Caliph himselfe to ratisfie them in presence of the Embassadors. The Caliph answered, That he would throughly perform all which was promised. But this contented not the Embaffadors: They would have him to give his handupon the bargaine; which the Egyptians that stood by thought an impudent request. Yet his greatnesse condescended at length, after much deliberation at the carnest request of the Soldan, to reach out his hand. When the Earle of Cæsaria saw that the Caliph gave his hand neither willingly nor bare, he told him roundly thus much in effect: Sir, Truth feekes no holes to hide it felfe; Princes that will hold covenant, must deale openly, nakedly and fincerely; Give us therefore your bare hand, if you meanethat we shall trust you, for we will make no bargaine with your Glove. Much adoe there was about this : for it feemed against the Majesty of such a Prince to yeeld so far. But when it would none otherwise be, with a smiling cheare (though to the great griefe of his Servants) hee vouchsafed to let the Earle take him by the bare hand; and fo rehearfing the covenants word by word, as the Earle spake them, he ratified all; dismissing finally the Embassadors with such rewards as testified his greatnesse.

Inthis Caliph and his Sultan, we may discerne the Image of the ancient Pharaob, and his Viceroy: we see a Prince of great estate, sitting in his Palace, and not vexing himselfe with the great preparations made against him, which terrefie his neighbour Countries: we fee his Viceroy, in the meane feafon, using all Royall power; making war and peace; entertaining and repelling Armies of strangers; yea, making the Land of Egypt tributary toa forrain Prince. What greater authority was given to Joseph, when Pharaoh faid unto him, Thou shalt be over mine house, and at thy word shall all my people be armed, only in the Kingsthrone will I be above thee. Behold I have let thee over all the Land of Egypt? Idoe not commend this forme of Government; neither can I approve the conjecture ofmine Author, where he thinkes, that the Egyptians, ever fince Josephs time, have felt the burden of that fervitude which he brought upon them, when he bought them and their Lands for Pharaoh. Herein I finde his judgement good; that he affirmes this manto her of the Egyptian Kings, in taking their ease, and ruling by a Viceroy, to be part of the ancient customes practifed by the Pharaohs. For we find, that even the Ptolomies (excepting Ptolomaus Lagi, and his fon Philadelphus, founder and establisher of that race) were given, all of them wholly to please their owne appetites, leaving the charge of the Kingdometo Women, Eunuches, and other ministers of their desires. The pleasures which that Country afforded, were indeed sufficient to invite the Kings thereof unto a voluptuous life; and the awfull regard wherein the Egyptians held their Princes, gave them fecurity, whereby they might the better trust their Officers with so ample commission. But of this matter, I will not stand longer to dispute. It is enough to have shewed, that the great and almost absolute power of the Viceroyes governing Egypt, is set down by Moofes, and that a lively example of the same is found in William of Tyre; who lived in the fame age; was in few yeares after Chancellour of the Kingdome of Jerusalem; and had full discourse with Hugh Earle of Cæsaria touching all these matters. Wherefore it remaines, that we be not carried away with a vaine opinion, to believe that all they were Kings, whom reports of the fabulous Egyptians have honoured with that stile; but rest contented with a Catalogue of fuch, as we find by circumstance, likely to have reigned in that Country; after whom it followes that we should make inquiry.

CHAP.26.5.3.

Of Acherres; whether he were Uchoreus that was the eighth from Osymandyas. of Osya mandyas and his Tombe.

N this businesse I hold it vaine to be to o curious. For who can hope to attaine to the perfect knowledge of the truth, when as Diodorus varies from Herodorus, Eu-A feb:us from both of them; and late Writers that have fought to gather the truth out of these and others, finde no one with whom they can agree? In this case Annius would doe good service, if a man could trust him. But it is enough to be beholding 10 to him, when others doe either say nothing, or that which may justly be suspected. I will therefore hold my selfe contented with the pleasure that he hath done me, in saying somewhat of Ofiris, 16s, Orus, and those antiquities removed so farre out of fight: as for the Kings following the departure of Ifrael out of Egypt, it shall suffice that Herodorus. Diodorus, and Eusebius have not beene filent, and that Reineccius hath taken paines to range into some good order the names that are extant in these, or else found scattering in others.

From the departure of Israel out of Egypt, unto the reigne of Thuris (who is generally taken to be the same that the Greeks call Proteus) there is little or no disagreement about the Egyptian Kings. Wherefore I fet down the fame which are found in Eufebiun, 20 and give to every one the fame length of reigne.

Acherres was the first ofthese, who succeded unto Chencres, that perished in the Red Sea. This King seemes to Reineccius to be the same whom Diodorus calls Uchoren, the founder of Memphis. But whereas mention is found in Diodorus of a great King, named Ofymandya, from whom Wehereus is faid to be the eighth; it will either hardly follow, that Timaus (as Reineccius conjectures) was the great Offmandyas; or else that this dehures was uchoreus : for the distance between them was more than eight generations. Mr. cator judgeth Ofmandyas to have bin the husband of Ancheres, Orus the seconds daughter; thinking that Manethon (cited by Josephus) doth omit his name, and insert his wives into the Catalogue of Kings, because he was King in his wives right. As for Uchoreus, it 20 troubles not Mercator to find him the eighth from this man: for he takes Ogdons, notto fignifie in this place of Diodore (as that Greek word elfe doth) the eighth, but to bean Egyptian name, belonging also to uchoreus, who might have had two names, as many of the rest had. I will not vexe my braines in the unprofitable search of this, and the like inextricable doubts. All that Diedore hath found of this O (ymandyas, was wrought upon his monument; the most thereof in figures, which I think the Egyptians did fabilities ly expound. For whereas there was portrayed a great Army with the fiege of a Town, the captivity of the people, and the triumph of the Conqueror; all this, the Egyptians faid to denote the conquest of Bactria made by that King: which how likely it was, let others judge. I hold this goodly piece of worke, which Diodore to particularly de-40 scribes to have beene crected for a common place of buriall to the ancient Kings and Queens of Egypt, and to their Viceroyes; whilest yet they were not so ambitious, as every one to have his owne particular monument, firriving therein to exceed all others. This appeares by the many statuaes therein placed, by the Wars, the judgement seate, the receiving of Tribute, the offering facrifice to God, the account of revenues, and plenty of all cartell and food; all which were there curiously wrought, shewing the severall Offices of a Governour. On the Tombe of Ofymandy as was this inscription. I am Ofyman dyas King of Kings; If any desire to know what I am, or where I lye, let him exceed some of my workes. Let them that hope to exceed his works, labour to know what he was. But fince by those words, or where I lye, it should feem that he lay not there interred, we may s lawfully suspect that it was Joseph, whose body was preserved among the Hebrewes, to be buried in the land of Canaan, and this empty Monument might King Orus, who outlived him, erect in honor of his high deferts, among the royal fepulchres. To which put pose the plenty of Cattell, and all manner of viands, had good reference. The name of of mandy as doth not hinder this conjecture 3 feeing Joseph had one new name given to him by Pharach, for expounding the dream, and might, upon further occasions, have another, to his increase of honour. As for that stile, King of Kings, it was perhaps no more than Beglerbeg, as the Turkish Bassare called, that is, Great above the Great. NOW

Now although it be forthat the reckoning fals out right, between the times of Joseph and Acherres (for Acherres was rhe eight in order, that reigned after the great Orus, whose Viceroy Joseph was) yet will I hereby seeke, neither to fortiste mine ownconjecture, as touching Foleph, nor to infer any likelihood of Acherres his being Uchoreus. For it might well be that Memphis was built by some such King as was Geboar, Lievtenant unto the John Leo, Hist. Caliph Eleain; who having to his Masters use conquered Egypt, and many other Coun-afficiations ries, did build, not far from old Memphis, the great Citie of Cairo (corruptly fo pronounced) naming it El Cahira, that is, an enforcing, or an imperious Mistresse, though he himfelfe were a Dalmatian flave.

of Cherres, Armeus, Ramesses, and Amenophis. of Myris, and the Lake that beares

THen Acherres had raigned eight years, Cherres succeeded and held the kingdome fifteen years: then raigned Armew five years, and after him Rameffes, threescore and eight. Of Armew and Ramesses is that Historie understood by Eufebius, which is common among the Greekes, under the names of Danaus and E-20 ceptus. For it is faid that Danaus, being expelled out of Bayps by his brother, fled into Gruse: where he obtained the Kingdome of Argos: that he had fiftie Daughters, whom mon seeming reconciliation, he gave in marriage to his brothers fiftie fons, but commanded every one of them to kill her husband the first night; that onely Hypermaestra, one of his Daughters, did fave her husband Lyncens, and luffered him to escape; finally, That for this fact, all the bloudie fifters, when they dyed, were enjoyeed this foolish punishment in Hell, to fill a leaking veffell with water.

Thereign of Danaus in Argos was indeed in this age; but that Armeus was Danaus and Aumsses, Express; is more than Reineccius beleeves: he rather takes Armeus to have bin 30 Myris, or Meris, who caused the great lake to be made which beares his name. For my ownpart, as I can eafily believe, that he which fled out of Egypt into Greece, was amon offuch qualitie as the Soldan Sanar, of whom we spake before; so doe I not find how insoshort a raigne, as five years, a worke of that labour could be finished, which was required unto the Lake of Myris, and the Monuments therein; whereof his own Sepulchre and his wives being fome part, it is manifest that he was not buried in Argos. Whereforcof Myris, and of all other Kings, whose age is uncertaine, and of whose raignes we haveno affurance, I may truly fay, that their great works are not enough to prove them of the house of Pharaoh, seeing that greater deeds or more absolute, than were those of Joseph, who bought all the people of Egypt as bondmen, and all their land for breads of Gihar, who founded Cairo; and of Sanar, who made the Countrey Tributarie; were to performed by none of them.

Itsfall therefore be enough to fet down the length of their reignes whom we finde to havefollowed one another in order of succession : but in rehearing the great acts which were performed. I will not stand to examine, whether they that did them were kings or

The Lake of Maria, is, by the report of Diodore and Herodotus, three thousand fix hundred furlongs in compasse, and fiftie fadomes deep. It served to receive the waters of Nihas, when the over-flow, being too great, was harmefull to the Countrie: and to supply the defect, by letting out the waters of the lake, when the riverdid not rife highenough. In opening the fluces of this lake, for the letting in or out of waters, were spent liftie talents but the Lake it self defraied that cost; seeing the tribute imposed upon fish taken therein was every day one talent, which Myris gave to his Wife to buy fweet oyntments, and other omaments for her bodie. In the middest of it was left an Iland, wherein were the Sepulchres of Myris and his Wife, and over each of them a Pyramis, that was a furlong, or (according to Herodotus) fiftie paces high; having on the tops their statues, fitting in Thrones. I find not the description of this Lake in Maps, answerable to the report of Hi-Rorians: yet it isvery great. The years of Armeus are by Manethon divided, by inferting One Armefis (whom Eufebius omits) that should have raigned one year and odde moneths of the time: but I hold not this difference worthie of examination.

Fohra Leo 8.

After Ramesses, his son Amenaphis held the Kingdome fortie years. Some give him on-Ty nineteene yeares; and Mercasor thinkes him to have been the King that was drowned in the Red Sea: whereof I have alreadic spoken in the first Booke.

6. IV. Of the Kingsthat reigned in the Dynastie of the Larthes.

Ethofis, or Zethus, reigned after his Father Amenophis, fiftie five yeares. To himate afcribed the famous acts of that ancient Sefoftris. But the state of the world was not such at these times, that so great an expedition as the old Sesoftris made, could to have been either eafily performed, or forgotten in the Countries through which hepaf. fed, had it now been performed; as any man will perceive, if he looke upon my Chronologicall Table, and consider who lived with this Zeshus. With this King began the Dynastic of the Larths; which Reinescius conjectures to have had the same fignification, wherein the old Kings of Hetruria, were called Lartes, (the Hetrurians being iffued our of Lydia, the Lydians out of Egypt) and to have fignified as much as Imperator, or Ge. nerall. The wars in which thefe Kings were Generals, I take to have been against the Athiopians: for fure I am, that they troubled not the Countrie of Palaftina, that lav next unto them on the one hand; nor is it likely that they travelled over the defart fands, to on the other hand; to feek matter of conquest, in the poore Countries of Africa. But these Generals (if the Larthes were such) were not many. Five only had that title; and the last of these rooke it, perhaps, as hereditarie from the first; in such fort as the Remane Emperours were proud, for a while, to be called Antonini, till the most unsuble conditions of Heliogabalus, made his successors forbeare the name,

Here it may be objected, that the Dynastics (as appeares by this particular) took name from the Kings; that the Kings also did administer the government themselves, and that therefore I am deceived in ascribing so much unto the Viceroyes. But it is to be consdered, that what is faid of these Larthes, depends only upon conjecture, and that the arthoritie of the Regents, or Viceroyes, might be great enough, though some few Kings 10 took the conduct of Armies into their owne hands. For so we finde in John Leo, that the Soldan of Egypt (after fuch time as the Soldan Saladine, murdering the Caliph, gor the Soveraigntie to himselfe) had under him a Viceroy, stilled Eddaguadare, who hadauthoritie to place, or displace, any Magistrates, or Officers; and that this mans Familie was almost as great, as the Soldans owne. Yet was there also the Amir Cabir, or Lord Generall of the Soldans forces, who had the charge of defending the Land, and might, as he thought good, spend of the Soldans treasure. So might the office of the Viceroyes continue, though the Kings themselves, taking the charge, or title of Generals upon them, did somewhat abridge the greatnesse of that second place. As for the names of the Dynasties, it skills not whence they were drawn, whether from their Countrey, as those so of the Thebans and Diapolitans; or from some eminent men, or man, who ruled in that time; as many think, that the seventeenth Dynastie was called of the Shepheards, because Joseph governed in part thereof; or from the Kings themselves that reigned; asthis was faid to be of the Larthes or Generals. The next, as Manetho (but Annius his Manthe) hath it, was without any Larths or Generals, yet was it not without kings, for almuch as Vaphres, and Sefac, raigned therein, if many others did not. But let us now return to the Rameses was King after Zethus, or Sethosis, threescore and sixe yeares. He is mistaken for that second Sefostris, of whom I have spoken in the first booke. I find nothing worth rehearfall of this Rameses, or of Amenophis and Annemenes, that followed him in order, the former of which reigned fortie, the latter fixe and twentie yeares. Wherefore it may very well be, that the name which Zethus had from valour, was taken by theseas he-reditarie. Thurris, the last of the Larthes, reigned only seven years; yet is he thought to have bin that Proteus, of whom Herodotus hath mention, faying, That he took Helena from Paris, and after the fack of Troy, restored her to Menelaus. I need say no more in resutation of this, than that the time of T buoris his raign lasted not so long as from the Rape of Heles to her restitution.

This Proteus or Cetes (as he is named by some) together with Thon, and others, mentioned by Greek Writers in this businesse, or in other such matters, may seeme to be under-Officers: for fuch only are like to have had their residence about Phares, and the sea-

Of Proteus, who detained Helen, it is faid that he could foretell things to come, and that he could change himselfe into all shapes: whereby is signified his crasty head, for which he is grown into a Proverb. The Poets fained him a Sea-God, and keeper of Neptunes Seale-fishes, for belike he was some under-Officer to the Admirall, having charge of the Fishing about the Isle of Pharos, as was said before.

CHAP.26.5.5.

Remphes the Son of Proteus, is reckoned the next King, by Diodore, as also by Herodo-To tus, who calls him Ramfinitus, and tells a long tale fit to please children, of his coverousnesse, and how his treasure-house was robbed by a cunning thiefe, that at last married his Daughter. But of this a man may beleeve what he lift. How long this King reigned I knownot, nor think that either he or his father did reigne at all.

6. V.

Of the Egyptian Kings, whose names are found scattering in sundry Authors, their times being not recorded. The Kings of Egypt, according to Cedrenus. Of Vaphres and Sesac.

Any other names of Egyptian Kings, are found scattered here and there; as To nephersobis, of whom Suidas delivers onely the bare name and title; Senemures, or Senepos, mentioned in Macrobius, who perhaps was the same that by Suidas is called Senyes, or Euenes, noted by occasion of a great Physician that lived under him; Banchyris, recorded by the same Suidas for his great justice; and Thulis, of whom Suidas telsgreat matters; as, that his Empire extended to the Ocean Sea; that he gave name to the Isle of Thule, which some take to be Iseland; and that he consulted with the Divell, or (which is all one) with Seraphis, defiring to know, who before him had beene, or afterhim should be so mighty as himselse. The answer or consession of the Divell was remarkeable; which I find Englished in the translation of Plesishis work, Of the truenesse of Christian Religion. The Greek Verses are somewhat otherwise, and much more imperfectin those Copies that I have of Cedrenus and Suidas, but the sense is all one; which is

First God, and next The Word, and then The Spirit, Which three be one, and joyne in one all three: Whose force is endlesse. Get thee hence fraile wight, The man of Life unknowne excelleth thee.

I should have thought that Suidas had borrowed all this of Cedrenus, had I not found somewhat more in Swidas than Cedrenus hath hereof; as the forme of invocation which o Thulis used, and that clause of his giving name to the Hand: though in this last point I hold said to be deceived; as also Cedrenus is, or (at least) feems to me, in giving to this Kingfuch profound antiquity of reigne. Indeed the very name of that booke, cited often by Cedrenus, which he calls Little Genefis, is alone enough to breed suspition of some imposture : but the Frierly stuffe that he alledgeth out of it, is such as would serve to discredit himselfe, were it not otherwise apparent that he was a man both devout and of good judgement in matters that fell within his compasse. I will here set downe the List of old Egyptian Kings delivered by him, and leave the censure to others.

The first King of Egypt that he sets downe, is Milraim the sonne of Cham. After him he finds many of a new race, deriving their pedegree thus: Nimrod the sonne of Chus was also called orion, and further took upon him the name of the Planet Saturne, had to wife Semiramis, who was of his owne Linage, and by her three fons; Picus, surnamed Jupiter, Belius and Ninus. Picus chasing his father out of Assiria into Italie, reigned in his stead thirtie yeares, and then gave up that Kigndome to Juno his fifter and wife, and to Belus his son :after which Belus, who reigned onely two yeares, Ninus had the Kingdome, and marriedhis owne Mother Semiramis. But Pieus went into Italie to visit his old Father Saturne; Saturne forth with refigned the Kingdome unto him. Picus Jupiter reigned in Italie threescore and two yeares, had threescore and tenne Wives or Conubines, and about as many children: finally dyed, and lyes buried in the Isle of Crete.

The Principall of Jupiters sons were Faunus, Perseus, and Apollo. Faunus was called by the name of the Planet Mercurie: heer eigned in Italie, after his Father, five and therety yeares: and then (finding that all his brethren conspired against him) he went in. to Egypt, with abundance of Treasure; where, asserthe death of Misraim, he got the Kingdome, and held it nine and thirty yeares. After Mercury, Vulcan reigned in Egypt, foure yeares and a halfe. Then Sol, the sonne of Vulcan, reigned twenty yeares and a halfe. There followed in order sosis, ofiris, orus and Thules, of whom we spake before, the length of their severall reignes is not set downe. After Thules, was the great Sesofru King twenty yeares. His successor was Pharaob, called Narecho, that held the Crowne fiftie yeares, with which there passed from him the surname of Pharaoh, to a very long to These reports of Cedrenus I hold it enough to set downe as I find them: let their creposteritie.

dit rest upon the Author.

Others yet we find, that are faid to have reigned in Egypt, without any certaine note. when, or how long: about whom I will not labour, as fearing more to be reprehended of vaine curiofitie, in the fearch made after these already rehearsed, than of negligence, inomitting such as might have been added.

Vaphres, the father in law to Salomon, and Sefae, the afflicter of Rehoboam, lead us again into faire way, but not farre. The name of Vaphres is not found in the Scriptures; but we are beholding to Clemens Alexandrinus and Eusebius for it. These give us not the length to of his reigne; but we know that he lived in the times of David and of Salomon. Hecame into Palestina with an Armie, took Gezar from the Canaanites, and gave it to his daugh. ter, Salomons wife: though for her fake perhaps it was, that in time following either he, or (as I rather take it) Sefac his fon did favour the enemies of Salomon, who kept formany Wives and Concubines, besides this Egyptian Princesse. In the life of Rehoboam all hun bin written that I find of Sefac, excepting the length of his reigne, which must have bin fixe and twenty yeares, if he were that Smendis with whom Eufebius begins the one and twentieth Dynastie.

Now forasmuch as it would serve to no great purpose, that weeknew the length of Sefae his reigne, and of theirs that followed him, unlesse therewithall we knew thebe. ginning of Sefac, upon which the rest have dependance; this course I take. From the fourth year of Jebojakim king of Juda, in which Pharao Neco was flain, I reckonupwards the yeares of the same Neco, and of his Predecessors, unto the beginning of Sefae: by which accompt, the first year of Sefac is found concurrent with the twentieth of Salomons reigne, and the twenty fixe of Sefac with the fifth of Rehoboam: wherein Sefac spoyledthe Temple, and dyed, enjoying the fruits of his Sacriledge no longer than Joas the Ifrallie, and Crassus the Romane did; who after him spoyled the Temple of Jerusalem.

To fill up the time between Sefac and Neco, I have rather taken those kings that I find in the Greeke Historians, than them which are in Eusebius his Catalogue. For of those that are delivered by Eusebius, we find no Name nor Act recorded elsewhere, save only 10 of Bocchoris, who is remembred by Diodore, Plutareb, and others, much being spokenof him, that makes him appeare to have bina King. Hereunto I may adde, that the succession on is often interrupted in Eusebius by Athiopians, which got the kingdome often, and held it long: whereas contrariwise it appeares by the Prophet Esay, that the Counsellors of Pharaoh did vaunt of the long and flourishing continuance of that house, insomuchthat they faid of Pharach, I am the sonne of the wife, I am the sonne of the ancient King. Butthat which overthrows the reckoning of Eusebius, is the good agreement of it with his mistaken times of the Kings of Juda. For though it please him well to see how the reigns of Josias and Neco meet by his computation, yet this indeed marres all; the reignof Josias being misplaced. This errour growes from his omitting to compare the reignes of the Kings of Juda with theirs of Ifrael: by which occasion Joran King of Ifrael, is made to reigne three yeares after AhaZia of Juda; Samaria is taken by Salmanasfar before Helichiawas King: and in a word, all, or most of the Kings have their beginnings placeding some other yeare, of their collaterals than the Scriptures have determined.

of Chemmis, Cheops, Cephrenes, and other Kings recited by Herodorus and Diodorus Siculus, which reigned betweene the times of Rehoboam and Ezechia.

Ollowing therefore the Greeke Hiftorians, I place Chemmis, or (according to Diodore) Chembis, first in the ranke of those that were Kings after Sefac. Hee reigned fiftie yeares, and built the greatest of the three Pyramides, which was accounted one of this worlds Wonders. The Pyramis hath his name from the shape, in that irrefembleth a flame of fire, growing from the bottome upwards narrower and narrower to the top. This of Chemmis being foure-fquare, had a Base of seven acres every way, and was about fixe acres high. It was of a very hard and durable stone, which hadlasted, when Diodore saw it, about a thousand yeares, without complaining of any injurie that it had suffered by weather in so long space. From the reigne of Chemmis, untotheage of Augustus Casur, wherein Diodore lived, are indeed a thousand yeares; which doth give the better likelihood unto this time wherein Chemmis is placed. As for this and other Pyramides, late Writers doe testifie, that they have seene them yet

After Chemmis, Diodore placeth Cephrenes his brother; but doubtfully, and enclining Diodor Las ratherto the opinion, that his fon Chabreus succeeded. Herodotus hath Cheops (who Herod.las might be Chabrens) and Cephrenes after him. These are said to have been brethren; but the length of their reignes may argue the latter to have been fonne to the former: for Chups reigned fifty yeares; Cophrenes fifty fixe. These were, as Chemmis had beene, builders of Pyramides, whereby they purchased great hatred of their people, who alreadyhad over-laboured themselves in creeting the first. These Pyramides were ordained to be Tombes for those that raised them; but the malice of the Egyptians is faid to have cast out their bodies, & to have called their Monuments by the name of an Heardsman, that kept his Beafts thereabouts. It may be, that the robbing them of their honour, andentiuling a poorefellow to their works, was held to be the casting out of their bodies; otherwise it is hard to conceive how it might be, that they, who had not power to avoyd the like flavery laid upon them by the younger brother or forme, should have power or leafure to take fuch revenge upon his Predecessor. To the like malice may be ascribed the tale devised against Cheops his Daughter; That her Father wanting money, didprostitute her, & that she getting of every man that accompanyedher, one stone, did build with them a fourth Pyramis, that stood in the midst of the other three. Belike she was an infolent Lady, and made them follow their drudgery for her fake, longer a while than they thought to have done, in raising a Monument with the superfluity of her Fathers provisions.

Mycerinus the fon of Cephrenes reigned after his Father fixe yeares. He would have built as his fore-goers did, but prevented by death, finished not what he had begun. The People thought him a good King, for that he did fet open the Temples which Cheeps and cephrenes had kept shut. But an Oracle threatned him with a short life of fixe years only, because of this his devotion; For (faid the Oracle) Egypt should have beene afflitted an hundred and fiftie yeares, which thy Predecessors knew, and performed for their parts; but thou hast released it therefore shalt thou live but sixeyeares. It is very strange, that the gods should be offended with a King for his piety; or that they should decree to make Countrey impious, when the people were defirous to ferve them; or that they having fodecreed, it should be in the power of a King to alter destinie, and make the ordinance of the gods to faile in taking full effect. But thefe were Egyptian gods. The true God was doubtleffe more offended with the institution of such Idolatry, than with the interruption. And who knowes whether Chemmis did not learne somewhat at Jerusalem in the last yeare of his Father Sesac, that made him perceive, and deliver to those the chi that followed him, the vanity of his Egyptian superstition ? Most fure it is, that his reins reigne, and the reignes of Cheops and Cephrenes were more long and more happy than that of Mycerinus, who, to delude the Oracle, revelled away both dayes and nights, as if by keeping candles lighted, he had changed his nights into dayes, and for doubled the time appointed: a fervice more pleasing to the Divell, than the restitution of Idolatry durft then feeme, when it could speed no better. I finde in Reineceius fiftie years affigned to this King; which I verily believe to have bin some errour of the print, though I find it not corrected among other such oversights: For I know no Author that gives him so many years, and Reineceius himselfe takes notice of the Oracle, that threatned Mycerinus with a short life, as is before shewed.

Boschorus is placed next unto Mycerinus, by Diodore, who speakes no more of him than this, that he was a strong man of body, & excelling his predecessors in wit. He is spoken of by divers Authors, as one that loved justice; and may be taken for that Banchyris whom Suidas commends in that kinde: Eusebius reckons 44 years of his reigne.

After Boccorus, one Sabacus an Athiopian followes in the Catalogue of Diodore; but certaine ages after him. Herodotus quite omitting Bocchorus, hath Ajychis; who made a to sharpe law(as it was then held) against bad debtors, that their dead bodies should be in the creditors disposition, till the debt were paid. This Asychis made a Pyramis of brick. more costly and faire, in his owne judgement, than any of those that the former Kings had raised. Besides this Asychis, Herodosus placeth one Anysis, a blind man, beforethe Ethiopian. The reignes of these two are perhaps those many ages which the Egypti. ans, to magnifie their antiquities, accounted betweene Boschorus and him that followed them. But all this could make but fixe yeares; and fo long doth Functions, fo long doth Reineceius hold, that these two Kings bet ween them both did govern If any man would lengthen this time, holding it unprobable that the reignes of two Kings should have bin fo soone spent; he may doe it by taking some yeares from Sethon or Pfammiticus, and 10 adding them to either of these. To adde unto these without subtracting from some ther, would breed a manifest inconvenience : forasmuch as part of Sefac his reigne, TKing 14-25. must have beene in the fifth of Rehoboam, as also the last of Pharas Neco was the fourth 2 Chro, 12.02. of Jehojakim, and the first of Nebuchadne Zzar. For mine owne part, I like it bettertoal low fixe years only to these two Kings, than to lose the witnesse of Herodotus, who, concurring herein with the Scriptures, doth speak of Sennacheribs war: at which time Seihon was King of Egypt. I will not therefore adde years unto these obscure names; for byadding unto these men three years, we shall thrust the beginning of Sethen out of place, and make it later than the death of Semacherib. In regard of this agreement of Herodotas with the Scriptures, I am the more willing to hold with him in his Egyptian Kings. Otherwife 30 it were a matter of no great envie to leave both Afychis and Anylis out of the roll; which were eafily done, by placing Sefac lower, and extending his life yet fixe years further, or more(if the like abridgement shall be required of Pfammiticus his reigne) into the years

Of Sabacus the Athiopian, who took the Kingdome from Anysis, it is agreed by the most, that he reigned fiftic years. He was a mercifull Prince, not punishing all capitall offences with death, but imposing bondage and bodily labour upon malefactors; by whose toile he both got much wealth into his owne hands, letting out their service hire, and performed many works of more use than pompe, to the singular benefit of the Countrey. Zonoras calls this King Sna; the Scriptures call him So. Hosea, the last King of the Israel, made a league with him against Salmanassar, little to his good: for the Egypuss was more rich than warlike, and therefore his triendship could not preserve the Israelian formed and the salmanssar.

It seemes, that the encroaching power of the Assirian grew terrible to Egyptabout these times; the victories of Tiglath Phulassar and Salmanassar having earen so fare into Syria, in the reigne of this one King So or Sabacus. Yea, perhaps it was in his daies for his reigne began in the fourth of Menahem) that Phul himselfed did make the first entrance into Palassina. This caused So to animate the halfe subdued people against their Conquerors; but the helpe which he and his Successor gave them was so faint, that Seemecheribs Embassador compared the Egyptian succour to a broken staffe of Reed. Such so indeed had Hose sound it, and such Ezechia might have found it, had he not beene supported by the strong staffe of him that ruleth all Nations with a rodde of you. It appeares by the words of Rabsake, that the opinion was great in Juda, of the Egyptian sorces, for Chariet sand Horse-men; but this power, what soever it was, great needfull, within a little while, for the desence of Egypt it selfe, which So less und Diseased have both one tale, from the relation of Egyptian Priess, concerning the departure of this King; saying, that he less the Countrey, and willingly retired into Bishiopia, because because it was often fignified unto him in his dreames, by the god which was worthipded at Thebes, that his reigne should be neither long nor prosperous, unlesse he slewall the Priests in Egypt; which rather than to do, he resigned his Kingdome. Surely, these Egyptian gods were of a strange quality, that so ill rewarded their servants, and invited Kings to doe them wrong. Well might the Egyptians (as they likewife did) worthip Dogs as gods, when their chiefe gods had the property of Dogs, which love their Masters the better for beating them. Yet to what end the Priests should have seigned this tale, I cannot tell; and therefore I thinke that it might be some device of the searcefullold man, who feeing his Realme in danger of an invation, fought an honest excuse for his departure out of it; and with-drawing himselfe into Ashiopia, where he had bin bred 10 inhisyouth. What if I should say, that the Athiopia into which he went, was none otherthan Arabia, whereof Tirhaka the King (perhaps at the instigation of this man) raifedan Armie against Sennacherib, when he meant to invade Egypt within two or three years after : but I will not trouble my felf with fuch enquirie. This I hold, that So, or Sebeens was not indeed an Athiopian (for in his time lived the Prophet Efer, who mentioneth the antiquity of Phar ashs house) but only so surnamed for his education, and because iffling from thence, he got the kingdome from Anylis, who was his opposite. The quiet and milde form of his government, his holding the kingdome folong without an Army, and many other circumstances argue no leffe. But whether finally he betooke a private life, or whether he fore-went his life and kingdom at once, being now very old, it is time that we leave him, and speake of Sethon his next Successor, who is omitted by Diodore, but remembred by Herodotus, by a fure token of his having been King.

of Sethon who reigned with Ezechia, and fided with him against Sennacherib.

He first yeare of Sethons reigne falls into the twelfth of Ezeshia, which was the fift of Sennacherib. It was a troublesome age, and full of danger; the two great Kingdomes of Assyria and Ezypt, being then ingaged in a warre, the issue where of was to determine, whether of them should rule or serve. The Assyrian had the better men of Warre; the Ezyptian better provision of necessaries: the Assyrian more Subjects; the Ezyptian more Friends: and among the new conquered halfe Subjects of Assyrian that were Ezyptian in heart, though Assyrian in outward shew.

Of this last fort were Ezebia and his people; who knowing how much it concerned Pharao, to protect them against his owne great Enemy, preserved the friendship of so neare and mighty a Neighbour, before the service of a terrible, yet sarreremoved King. But herein was great difference betweene Ezebia and his Subjects: For the good King sixing his especial considence in God, held that course of policy, which he thought most slikely to turne to the benefit of his Country: the multitude of Judea looking into the faire hopes which this Egyptian league promised, were pussed up with vaine conceits, thinking that all was safe, and that now they should not need to feare any more of those injuries which they had suffered by the Asyrtans, and so became forgetful of God, taking counsell, but not of him. The Prophet Esay complained much of this presumption; Esay 30.1. giving the people of Juda to understand, That the Egyptians were men, and not God, and their Horses stell, and not spirit; that God himselfe should defend the and not God, and they should fall by the sword, but not of man. As for the Egyptians (said the Pro-Esay 30.7. phet) they are vanity, and they shall help in vaine, their strength is to sit still.

According to the prophers words it came to passe. For in the treaty of Confederacy of that was held at Zoan, all manner of contentment and assurance was given to the Jewes by they did not looke (as Esay saith) unto the holy One of Israel, nor seeke unto the Lord. But he Esay 31.1.2.

After a while came Sennacherib with his Army, & wakened them out of these dreams; for Sethon their good Neighbour, as neare as he was, did seeme farre off, being unready, when his helpe vias most needfull. It may seem that he purposed rather to make Pale. Sina than Egype, the stage whereon this great Warre should be acted, and was not without hope, that the Assignment and Jewes, weakening one another, should yield unro him.

faire advantage over both. Yet he fought with monie; for he sent Horses and Camels laden with treasure, to hire the Arabians, whom Esay calleth a people that cannot profit These Arabians did not profit indeed; for (besides that it seemes by the same place of Esay, that the rich treasures miscarried, and fell into the enemies hands before any helpe appeared from Tirbaca, all the strong Cities of Juda were taken by Senacherib, except Libna, Lachie, and Jerufalem it selfe, which were in sore distresse, till the sword of God and not of Man, defeated the Affrian, who did goe, for feare, to his Tower, that is, he fled to Nineve, where he was flaine.

Elay 349.

Concerning this expedition of Senacherib, Herodotus takes this notice of it: That it was purposed against Egypt, where the men of warre, being offended with Sethon their, King, who had taken away their allowance, refused to beare armes in defence of him and their Countries that Sethon being Vulcans Priest, bemoaned himselfe to his god, who by dream promifed to fend him helpers; that hereupon Sethon, with fuch as would follow him, (which were craftf-men, shop-keepers, and the like) marched towards Pelasium; and that a great multitude of field-mice entring the Campe of Senacherib by night, dd fo gpaw the bowes, quivers, and ftraps of his mens armour, that they were faine thenext day to flie away in all hafte, finding themselves disarmed. In memorie hereof (faith Herodotus) the statue of this King is set up in the Temple of Vulcan, holding a Mouse in his hand, with this inscription: Let him that holds mee ferve God. Such was the relation of the Egyptian Priefts, wherein how farre they fwarved from the truth, being defirousto to magnific their owne King, it may eafily be perceived. It feemes that this Image of sethon was fallen down, and the tale forgotten in Diodorus his time, or elfe perhaps, the Priests did forbeare to tell it him (which caused him to omit it) for that the nation of the Jewes was then well knowne to the world, whereof every childe could have told, how much falsehood had beene mingled with the truth.

We find this historie agreeable to the Scriptures, thus farre forth; That Senathrib King of the Affrians and Arabians, (fo Herodotus calleth him : the Syrians, or peradventure some borderers upon Syria, being meant by the name of Arabians) lived in this age, made Warre upon Egypt, and was miraculously driven home. As for that exploye of the Mice, and the great pleasure that Fulcan did unto his Priest; happie it was (if Scibon 30 were a Priest) that he tooke his god now in so good a moode. For within three or some yeares before this, all the Prices in Egypt should have been slaine, if a merciful King had not spared their lives, as it were halfe against the gods will. Therefore this last good turne was not enough to ferveas an example, that might fir up the Egyptians topicite, feeing that their devotion, which had lasted so long before, did bring all the Priests into danger of such a bad reward. Rather I thinke, that this Image did representations. cherib himselfe, and that the Mousein his hand, signified Hieroglyphically (as was the Egyptian maner of expressing things) the shamefull issue of his terrible expedition, or the destruction of his Armie, by meanes which came, no man knew from whence. For the vengeance of God, shewed upon this ungodly King, was indeed a very good mo-40 tive to pietie. Butthe Embleme, together with the Temple of Vulcan (being perhaps the chiefe Temple in that Towne where this Image was erected) might give occasion to such a fable; the Divell helping to change the truth into a lie, that God might be robbed of his honour. Yet that we may not belie the Divell, I hold it very likely, that Sethon finding himselfe in danger, did call upon his gods, that is, upon Vulcan, Serapu, or any to whom he had most devotion. But so had other of his predecessors done in the like need: yet which of them had obtained fuccour by the like miracle: Surely the Jewes (even such of them as most were given to Idolatrie) would have bin ashamed of the confidence which they reposed in the Chariots of Egypt because they were many bin the Horsemen, because they were very firong ; had it bintold them, that Sethon, in freed of ge fending those Horse menand Chariots, was beseeching Vulcan to send him and them good lucke; or else (for these also were Egyptian gods) addressing his prayers to some Onyon or Cat. Howfoever it was, doubtlesse the Prophecie of Esay tooke effect, which laid, They ball be all ashamed of the people that cannot profit them, nor help, nor doe them god, but shall be a shame and also are proach. Such is commonly the iffue of humane wisedoms, when resting secure upon provision that it self hath made, it will no longer seem to stand innecd of God.

Some there are who take Sethon to have bin fet down by Enfebins under the name of Tarachus the Athiopian; and therefore the twenty years which are given to Tarachus, they allow to the reigne of Sethon. These have wellobserved that Tarachus the Ethiopian is mentioned in the Scriptures, not as a King of Egypt, but as a friend to that Country, or at least an enemy to Sennacherib, in the war last spoken of; the Æthiopians (as they are englished) over which he reigned, being indeed Chustes or Arabians. Hereupon they suppose aright, that Eusebius hath mistaken one king for another. But whereas they think that this Tarachus or Tirhaka is placed in the roome of Sethon, and therefore give to Sethen the twenty years of Tarachus, I hold them to have erred on the other hand. For this Ethiopian (as he is called) began his reigne over Egypt, by Eusebins his accompt, after the death of Sennacherib and of Ezechia, in the first year of Manaffes King of Juda. Therefore he or his years have no reference to Sethon.

Herodotus forgets to tell how long Sethon reigned; Functions peremptorily, citing no author, nor alledging reason for it, sets him downe thirty three yeares; many omit him quite; and they that name him, are not carefull to examine his continuance. In this case, Ifollow that rule which I propounded unto my felf at the first, for measuring the reigns of these Egyptian Kings. The yeares which passed from the fifth of Rehoboam, unto the fourth of Jehojakim, I so divide among the Egyptians, that giving to every one the proportion allowed unto him by the Author in whom he is found, the rest is to be conferredupon him whose length of reigne is uncertaine; that is, upon this Sethon. By this accompt I find the thirty three years that are fet downe by Functius, to agree very nearely, if not precifely, with the time of Seebons reigne; therefore I conforme my owne reckoning to his, though I could be content to have it one yeare leffe. The reason of this computation I shall render more at large, when I arrive at the time of Plammisicus, whereupon it hath much dependance, and whereinto the course of this History will shortly bring me, the Egyptian affaires growing now to be interlaced with the matters of Juda, to which it is meet that I returne.

CHAP. XXVII

Of Manasses and his Contemporaries.

6. I.

The wickednesse of Mahasses. His imprisonment, repentance and death.

Anasse the Sonne of Exechias, forgetting the piety of his Father, and the prosperity which followed him, set up, repaired, adorned and furnished all the Altars, Temples and high Places, in which the Divell was by the Heathen worshipped. Besides, he himselfe esteemed the Sun, the Moone, and the Starres, with all the Hoast of heaven, as gods, and worshipped them: and of all his acts the most abominable was, that he burnt his sons for a Sacrifice to the Divel Means of Malchar in the Valley of Himselfe and the Size of Sacrifice to the Divel Means loch, or Melcher, in the Valley of Hinnon, or Benhinnen: wherein was kindled the fire of Sacrifice to the Divels.

He alfo gave himselfe to all kind of Witcheraft and Sorcery, accompanied and maintained those that had familiar Spirits, and all sorts of Enchanters: besides, hee shed so much innocent bloud, as Jerusalem was replenished therewith, from corner to corner. For all his vices and abominations, when he was reprehended by that aged and reverent Prophet E (ay) (who was also of the Kings race, and as the Jewes affirm, the Father-in-law Just Marty). of the King) he caused the Prophet neer unto the Fountaine of Silve, to be sawne in sunCedrenus c.gt. der with a wodden Saw, in the eightieth year of his life: a cruelty more barbarous and Glyaspa.275.
Torust del'ar, monstrous than hath beene heard of. The Scriptures indeede are silent hereof, yet the fame is confirmed by Epiphanius, Isidore, Eusebius, and others, too many to rehearle, and too good to be suspected. Therefore the Lord brought upon them the Captaines of the Heast 2'Chr.33.126 of the Kings of Ashur, which took Manasse, and put him in fetters, and bound him in chains, and carried him to Babel: Where, after he had lyen twenty yeares as a captive, and dispoyled of all honour and hope; yet to his hearty repentance and continuall prayer, the God of infinite mercy had respect, and moved the Assirians heart to deliver him.

It is also likely that Merodach, because he loved his father Ezechias, was the easilier perswaded to restore Manasse to his liberty and estate. After which, and when he was againe established, remembring the miseries which followed his wickednesse, and Gods againe established, remembring the miseries which followed his former foolish and divellish greatmercies toward him, he changed forme, detested his former foolish and divellish squared as a downe the Idols of his owne erecting, prepared the Altar of God, and Idolatry, and cast downe the Idols of his owne erecting, prepared the Altar of God, and sacrificed thereon. He repaired a great part of Jerusalem: and dyed after the long reigne facrificed thereon. He repaired a great part of Jerusalem: and dyed after the long reigne facrificed thereon. 6. II.

Of troubles in Egypt following the death of Sethon. The reigne of Pfammiticus.

The occasion of this diffention feems to have bin the uncertainty of title to that king-dome (for that the crowne of Egypt passed by succession of bloud, I have often shewed) which ended for a while, by the partition of all among twelve, though things were not ferled untill one had obtained the Soveraignty. These twelve Rulers governed fifteene yeares in good seeming agreement, which to preserve, they made strait covenant & alliances one with another, being jealous of their estate, because an Oracle had foretold, that one of them should depose all the rest, noting him by this token, that he should make a drink-offering in Vulcans Temple, out of a Copper goblet. Whilest this un'y lasted, they joyned together in raising a Monument of their Dominion, which was a Labyrinth, built near unto the Lake of Meris; a worke to fo admirable, that (as Herodotus, who beholding it, affirmes) no words could give ir commendation answerable to the statelinesse of the worke it selfe. I will not here set downs that unperfect description which Herodotus makes of it, but think enough to fay that he preferres it farre before the Piramides, one of which (as he faith) excelled the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, or any of the fairest workes in Greece. Diodorus reports this Labyrinth to have bin the worke of Marus or Menides, a King which lived five generations before Proteus, that is, before the warre of Troy; and from this Labyrinth (faith he) Dedalus took the patterne of that which he made for Minos in Crete. Who this Marus, of Menides was, I cannot tell. Reineccius takes him to have bin Annemenes, which reigned immediatly before Thuoris. But this agrees not with Diodore: for Dadalus & Minos wert 9 both dead long before Annemenes was King. Belike Reineccins, desiring to accommodate thefabulous relations of Manethon, Charemon, & others, that are found in Josephus, touching Amenophis and his children, to the story of Amasis and Actis fanes the Ethiopian, mentioned by Diodore; held it consequent, after he had conjectured Manethons Amenophi, to be Diederus his Amasis; that Sethon should be Actisanes, and that Annemenes should be Marus. If in this case I might intrude a conjecture, the times which we now handle are those about which Reineccius hath erred in making search; Amasis was Anysis, Allifanes was Sabacus 3 & Marms was one of these twelve Princes to whom Herodorus gives the honour of building this famous Labyrinth. For Actifanes the Athiopian deposed Anassis, Sabacus the Athiopian deposed Anysis, Actifanes governed well, and was milde in punishing offenders; folike wise was Sabacus; Marus the next King after Actifanes built this Labyrinth; and the next (saving Sethen, whom Diodore omits, as having not heard of him) that ruled after Sabacus, performed the same work, according to Herodotus, who was more likely to heare the truth, as living nearer to the Age wherein it was performed. The variety of names, and difference of times wherein Diodore believed the Priests, might be a part of the Egyptian vanity, which was familiar with them in multiplying their Kings, and boasting of their antiquities. Here I might adde, that the twelve great Halls, Parlours, and other circumstances remembred by Herodotus, in speaking of this building, doe helpe to prove that it was the worke of these twelve Princes. But I hasten to their end.

At a folemne feast in Vulcans Temple, when they were to make their drinke-offerings, the Priest, forgetting himselfe, brought forth no more than eleven Cuppes. Hereupon, Psammitteus, who standing last, had not a Cup, tooke off his brazen Helmet, and therewith supplyed the want. This caused all the rest to remember the Oracle, and to suspect him as a Traytor; yet, when they found that it was not done by him upon set purpose or ill intent, they forbare to kill him, but being jealous of their estate, they banished him to the marish Countries by the Sea side. This Oracle, and the event is held by Diodore as fable, which I beleeve to have bin none other: Inthe rest Herodotus and Diodore agree, saying, that Psammiticus hired Souldiers out of Caria and Ionia, by whose aide he vanquish his Companions, and made himselfe sole King.

They are so of his reigne, according to Herodotus, were fiftie foure; according to Eule-bius, forty foure; Mercator, to reconcile these two, gives fortie foure years to his single reigne, and ten to his ruling joyntly with the Princes before spoken of. Indeede, he that was admitted, being a man growne (for he cannot in reason be supposed to have beene then a young fellow) into the number of the twelve Governours, must be thought to have lived unto extreme age, if he ruled partly with others, partly alone, threescore and nine years. It therefore yeeld rather to Eusebius; but will not adventure to cut five years from the Arestocratic: though peradventure Psammiticus was not at first one of the twelve, but succeeded (either by election, or as next of bloud) into the place of some Prince that dyed, and was ten years companion in that government.

Another scruple there is, though not great, which troubles this reckoning. The years of the Egyptians, as we finde them set downe, are more by one, than serve to fill up the time between the fift of Rebeboam and the sourth of Jehojakim. This may not be. Wherefore either we must abate one yeare from Sethons reigne, that was of uncertain length; or else (which I had rather doe; because Functions may have followed better authority than know, or than himselfe alledgeth, in giving to Sethons a time so nearely agreeing with the truth) we must consound the last yeare of one reigne with the first of another. Such a supposition were not insolent. For no man can suppose, that all the Kings, or any great part of them, which are set downe in Chronological tables, reigned precisely so many yeares as are prescribed unto them, without any fractions: it is enough to thinke that the surplusage of one mans time supplyed the defect of anothers. Wherefore I confound the last yeare of those fifteene, wherein the twelve Princes ruled, with the first of Psammiticus; who surely did not fall out with his Companions, fight with them, and make himselfe Lord alone all in one day.

Concerning this King, it is recorded, that he was the first in Egypt who entertained any strait amity with the Greekes; that he retained in pay his Mercenaries of Caria, Ionia, and Arabia, to whom he gave large rewards and possessing and that he greatly offended his Egyptian Souldiers, by bestowing them in the lest wing of his Armie, whilest his Mercenaries held the right wing (which was the more honourable place) in an expedition that he made into Syria. Upon this disgrace it is said, that his Souldiers, to the number of two hundred thousand, for sook their natural Countrey of Egypt, and went into Ethiopia, to dwell there: neither could they be revoked by kind Messages, nor by the King himselse, who over-took them on the way; but when he told them of their Countrey, their Wives and Children, they answered, that their weapons should get them a Countrey, and that nature had enabled them to get other Wives and Children.

CHAP.27.5.3.

It is also reported of him, That he caused two Infants to be brought up in such son. as they might not heare any word spoken; by which meanes, he hoped to find out what Nation or Language was most ancient; for a finuch as it feemed likely, that nature would teach the children to speake that Language which men spake at the first. The issue hereof was, that the children cryed, Beccus, Beccus, which word being found to fignific Bread in the Phrygian tongue, served greatly to magnifie the Phrygian antiquity. Goropius Beca. nus makes no small matter of this, for the honour of his Low-Dutch; in which the word Becker fignifies (as Baker in English) a maker of bread. He that will turne over any part of Gorepius his works, may find enough of this kind, to perswade a willing man, that 4. dam and all the Patriarks used none other tongue than the Low-Dutch, before the confufion of languages at Babel; the name it felf of Babel being also Dutch, and given by occafion of this confusion; for that there they began to babble and talke one knew not what.

But I will not infift upon all that is written of Psammiticus. The most regardable of his acts was the fiege of Azotus in Palastina, about which he spent nine & twenty years. Never have we heard (faith Herodotus) that any City endured folong a fiege as this; yet Psammiticus carryed it at the last. This Towne of Azotus had been won by Tartan, a Captain of Sennacherib, and was now, as it feemeth, relieved, but in vaine, by the Babib. nian, which made it hold out so well.

6. III.

What reference these Egyptian matters might have to the imprisonment and enlargements Manasses. In what part of his reigne Manasses was taken prisoner.

Fere it certainly knowne, in what year of his reigne Manaffes was taken prifoner, and how long it was before he obtained liberty; I thinke we should finde these Egyptian troubles to have been no small occasion, bothoshis captivity and enlargement: God fo disposing of humane actions, that even they, who intended onely their owne businesse, fulfilled onely his high pleasure. For either the civill Warres in Egypt that followed upon the death of Sethon, or the renting of the 20 Kingdome, as it were, into twelve pieces, or the Warre betweene Psammiticu and his Colleagues, or the expedition of Pfammitieus into Syria, and the fiege of Mistus, might ministerunto the Babylonian, either such cause of hope to enlarge his Dominion in the South parts; or such necessity of sending an Armie into those parts, to defend his owne, as would greatly tempt him to make fure worke with the King of Juda. The same occasion sufficed also, to procure the deliverie of Manasses, afterhe was taken. For he was taken (as Josephus hath it) by subtlety, not by open force, neither did they that apprehended him, winne his Countrey, but onely wasten. So that the Jewes, having learned wit by the ill successe of their folly, in redeeming 4maZia, were like to be more circumspect, in making their bargaine upon such another 40 accident: and the Babylonian (to whom the Egyptian matters prefented more weighty arguments of hope and feare, than the little Kingdome of Juda could afford) hadnoresfon to spend his forces in pursuing a small conquest, but as full of difficulty as a greater, whereby he should compell his mightiest enemies to come to some good agreement; when by quitting his present advantage over the Jewes, he might make his way the fairer into Egypt.

Now concerning the year of Manaffes his reigne, wherein he was taken prisoner; or concerning his captivity it felfe, how long it lasted, the Scriptures are silent, and Josephus gives no information. Yet I find cited by Torniellus three opinions, the one of Bellarmine, who thinks that Manaffes was taken in the fifteenth year of his reigne; theother so of the Author of the greater Hebrew Chronologie, who affirmes, that it was in his twenty seventh yeare; the third of Rabbi Kimbi upon Ezecbiel, who saith, that he was for ty yeares an Idolater, and lived fifteene yeares after his repentance. The first of these conjectures is upheld by Torniellus, who rejects the second, as more unprobable, and condemnes the third as most false. Yet the reasons alledged by Torniellus inde fence of the first, and refination of the last opinion, are such, as may rather prove him to favour the Cardinall as farre as he may, (for where neede requires, hee doth freely diffent from him) than to have used his accustomed diligence in examining the maner, before he gave his judgement. Two arguments he brings to maintaine the opinion of Bellarmine: the one, that ammon the Sonne of Manasses, is said by Fosephus to have followed the workes of his fathers youth; the other, that had Manafes growne old in his finnes, it is like that hee should have continued, as heedid, in his amendment unto the endofhislife. Touching the former of these arguments, I see no reason why the sinnes of Manafes might not be diftinguished from his repentance in his old age, by calling them works of his youth, which appeared when he was twelve yeares old; though it were granted that he continued in them (according to that of Rabbi Kimki) untill he was but fifteen yeares from death. Touching the second; howsoever it be a fearefull thing, to catoffunto the last those good motions unto repentance, which we know not whether 10 ever God will offer unto us againe; yet were it a terrible hearing, That the fins which are not for faken before the age of two and fiftie yeares, shall be punished with finallimpenitencie. But against these two collections of Torniellus, I will lay two places of Scripture, whence it may be inferred, as not unlikely, That Manaffes continued longer in his wickednesse than Bellarmine hath intimated, if not as long as Rabbi Kimki hath affirmed. In the second Booke of Kings, the evill which Manasses did, is remembred at large, and his repentance utterly omitted; fo that his amendment may feeme to have taken up no great part of his life; the storie of him being thus concluded in the one and twentieth Chapter: Concerning the rest of the Acts of Manasses, and all that he did, and his sin that 2 Kings 21. 17.

20 he suned, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Juda? The other place is in the foure and twentieth Chapter of the fame Booke, where, in rehearling the clamities with which that Nation was punished in the time of Jehojakim, the great Grand-childe of this Manasses, it is said; Surely by the commandement of the Lord came this 2 Kings 24.3.4. soon Juda; that he might put them out of his fight, for the sinnes of Manastes, according to all that hadid, & for the innocent bloud that he shed (for he filled Jerusalem with innocent blond) therefore the Lord would not pardon it. Who fo confiders well these places, may find finall cause to pronounce it most false, That the repentance and amendment of Manasses was moralier than fifteen yeares before his death; or most probable, That when he was

30 twentie seven yeares old, he repented, and becomming a new man, lived in the seare of God fortie yeares after. I will no longer dispute about this matter, seeing that the truth camothe discovered. It sufficeth to say, that two yeares of civill diffention in Egypt, fourteene or fifteene yeares following, wherein that Kingdome was weakned by partition of the Soveraigntie: the warre of Pfammiticus against his Associates: and foure and twentie yeares of the nine and twentie, wherein the fiege of Azotus continued; beingall within the time of Manasses, did leave no one part of his raigne (after the first fiftecneyeares) free from the danger of being oppressed by the Baby lonean, whose men of warrehad continual loccations of vifiting his Countrey. All which I will adde hereto, is this; that the fifteenth of Manaffes was the last yeare of Sether in Egypt, and the one andthirtieth of Merodach his reigne, or (accounting from the death of Afarhaddon) the so twentieth: The fever and twentieth of Manaffes was the tenth of the twelve Princes. and the three and fortieth of Merodach: his fortieth, was the twentie third of Planmi. tions, and the fift of NabulaBar, the sonne of Merodach, in Babylon: but which of these was the yeare of his imprisonment, or whether any other, Iforbeare to shew mine opinion, lest I should thereby seeme to draw all matters over-violently to mine owice computation. This was the first great mastrie that the Babylonians had of the kingdome of Juda. For though Achaz promised Tribute to Salmanasar, yet Ezechias never payed it. True it is, that he hoped to flay Senacheribs enterprise against him, by presenting him with three 2 King 18 hundred talents of filver, and thirtie of gold, befides the plate which covered the doores

50 and fillars of the Temple.

But Manaffes being pressed with greater necessitie, could refuse no tolerable conditions, that the Baby lonian would impose upon him; among which it seems, that this was one, (which was indeed a point of servitude) that he might not hold peace with the E-37 prians, whilest they were enemies to Babylon. This appeares not onely by his fortifiing with men of warre all the strong Cities of Juda after his return (which was rather against Planmiticus, whose partie he had for saken, than against the Baby lonian, with whom hehad thenceforth no more controversie) but likewise by that opposition, which Josias madeafterwards to Pharas Neco, infavour of Nabulassar, which had beene against all reason and policie, if it had not bin his dutie by covenant. Of this I will speake more in convenient place.

6. IV.

of the first and second Messenian Wars, which were in the reignes of Ezechia and Manasses. Kings of Juda.

TOw concerning fuch actions as were performed abroad in the world, about these times of Manasses, the most remarkeable were the Messenian Wars; which hap pened in this age, and being the greatest action performed in Greece, betweene the Trojan and Persian Wars, deserve not to be passed over with silence.

The first Messenian Warre began and ended in the daies of Ezechia; the second in the raign of Manaffes: but to avoyd the trouble of interrupting our Historie, I have thought it best, to rehearse them both in this place. Other introduction is needlesse, than to lay, that the posteritie of Hercules, driving the issue of Pelops and the debeans out of their feats, divided their lands between themselves, and erected the kingdomes of Lacedamon, Argos, Messene, and Corine b; all which agreeing well together a while, did afterwards for get the bond of kindred, and fought one anothers ruine with bloudie wars, whereof these Messenian were the greatest.

The pretended grounds of the Messenian war are scarce worth remembrance, they were fo fleight. Ambition was the true cause of it: wher with the Laced emonians were so transported, that any thing served them as a colour to accomplish their greedie desires. Yao ther matter was alledged; namely, that one Polychares a Messenian had sain many Lacde. monians, for which the Magistrates of Sparsa desiring to have him yeelded into their hands, could not obtain it. The Messenians on the other fide, excused Polychares, for thatle was grown frantick, through injuries received from Eucephnes a Lacedamonian. This Euaphnes had bargained to give pasture to the Cattell of Polychares, & was therefore to receive part of the increase: but not contented with the gain apponted, he fold the Cattell, & flaves that kept them, to Merchants, which done, he came with a faire tale to his friend, 19 faying, that they were stollen. Whilst the lye was yet scarce out of his mouth, one of the flaves that had escaped from the Merchants came in with a true report of all. The Laudamonian being thus deprehended, confessed all, and promised large amends; which to receive he carried the fon of Polychares home with him; but having him at home; hevillanously slew him. Wherefore the Lacedamonians having refused, after long suite made by the wretched Father, to do him right against this Theese and Murderer, ought not to pick matter of quarrel out of those things which he did in that madnesse, whereintothey themselves had cast him. So said the Meffenians, and further offered to put the matter to compromise, or to stand unto the judgement of the Amphietyones, who were as the generall Counsell of Greece, or to any other faire course. But the Lacedemonians, who had a 40 great defire to occupie the fair Countrie of Meffene, that lay close by them, were not content with fuch allegations. They thought it enough to have some shew for their doings, which the better to colour, they reckoned up many old injuries, and fo without fending any defiance, secretly took an oath to hold war with Messene till they had masteredit: which done, they seized upon Amphia, a frontier Town of that Province, wherein they put all to the Sword without mercie, very few escaped.

Hereupon the Messenians tooke Armes, and were met by the Enemie. A furious bat. tell was fought between them, which ended not untill darke night, with uncertaint victorie. The Messenians did strongly encampe themselves; The Lacedamonians, unable to force their Campe, returned home. This Warre began in the second yeare of the so ninth Olympiad, and ended in the first of the fourteenth Olympiad, having lasted twentie yeares. The two enemie Nations tried the matter, for a while, with their proper for ces; the Lacedemonians wasting the inland parts of Messene; and the Messenians, the Sea-coast of Laconia. But it was not long ere friends, on both sides, were called in to helpe. The Arcadeans, Argives, and Siegonians, tooke part with Meffene; the Spartans had, besides many Subjects of their owne, aide from Corinth, and hired Soulds ers out of Crete. So a fecond, third, and fourth battell, were fought, with as great ob stinacic as the first, faving that in the fourth battell the Laced mornians were enforced to turn their backs; in the other fights, the victorie was still uncertain, though in one of them the Messensans lost Enphases their King, in whose stead they chose Aristodemus,

Many years were spent ere all this bloud was shed; for pestilent diseases, and want of money to entertaine Souldiers, caused the warre to linger. And for the same reasons. did the Messenians for sake all their inland towns, excepting Ithorne, which was a Mounraine with a Town upon it, able to endure more than the enemies were likely to doe. But as some Authors tell us, the Lacedemonians were so obitinate in this War, because surable. of their vow, that having absented themselves ten yeares from Sparta, their wives sent orginal control them word, that their Citie would grow unpeopled, by reason that no children had been homethem in all that time: Whereupon they fent backe all their ablest young men. o promifcuoufly to accompany the young women, who got fo many of them with child, prodless asther became a great part of their Nation, and were called parthenians. Diodorus referres the begetting of these Parthenians to a former time. But in processe of this Messenian Warre, when the Divellin an Oracle had advised the Messenians to facrifice a Virgin of the stocke of * Azyptus, that so they might be victorious against the Laceda- * This Acqueus monians; the lot falling upon the Daughter of one Lycifcus; Epibolus the Priest, willing was the younto save her, said, she was only a fostered childe, and not borne of the wife of Lycifcus : gett son of crej which answer giving delay to the execution of the Maide, Lycifeus secretly fled away the daughter of with her into Sparta. Then Aristodemus, which afterwards was King, voluntarily Cypilus King of Arcadia; of offered his owne Daughter: but a young Nobleman; being in love with the Maide, which crefphon when otherwise he could not prevaile, said openly that she was no Virgin, but that he thechiefe Nohaddefloured her, and got her with childe: whereupon the Father in a rage ripped Meffenians was un his innocent Daughters belly, to disprove the Lovers slander: at the grave of which propagated. Daughter of his, afterwards falling, by other superstitions, into despaire of prevailing against the Lacedemonians, he slew himselfe, to the great hurt of his Countrey, which he loved most dearly. For after his death the Messenians lost their courage, and finding themselves distressed by many wants, especially of victuals, they craved peace, which they obtained with most rigorous conditions. Halfe the yearely fruits of their Land they were bound to fend unto Sparta; and they, with their Wives, to make for lemnelamentations at the death of every Spartan King; they were also sworne to live intrue subjection to the Laced amonians; and part of their Territorie was taken from them, which was given to the Asmai, and such as had followed the Spartans in this Warre.

This peace being made upon fo uneven termes, was not like to hold long. Yet nine and thirtie yeares it continued (the Messenians not finding how to helpe themselves) and then brake out into a new and more furious Warrethan the former. The able young men, that were growne up in the roome of those Messenians whom the former Warre had confumed, began to confider their owne strength and multitude, thinking themselves equall to the Lacedamonians, and therefore scorned to serve such Masters as had against all right, oppressed their Fathers. The chiefe of these was Aristomenes, a Noble Gentleman, of the house of Agratus; who perceiving the uniform defires of his Countrie-mensadventured to become their Leader. He therefore founding the affections of the Argives and Areadians, which he found throughly answerable to his purpose, began open warre upon the State of Lacedamon. This was in the fourth yeare of the three and twentieth olympiad; when the Lacedamonians hasted to quench the fire before it should grow too hot, with such forces as they could raise of their owne, without troubling their friends, meaning to deale with their enemies, ere any fuccour were lent them. So a strong battell was fought between them, and a doubtfull; save that the Messenians were pleased with the issue, forasmuch as they had thereby taught their late proud Lords, to thinke their their equals. Particularly, the valour of Aristomenes appeared fuch in this fight, that his people would have made him their King: but he, refufing the honour of that name, accepted of the burthen, and became their Generall. Within one yeare another battell was fought, whereinto each part camebetter provided. The Lacedamonians brought with them the Corinthians, and some other friends to helpe: the Messenians had the Argives, Arcadians, and Sicyonians. This also was a long and bloudie fight; but Aristomenes did so behave himselfe, that finally he made the Enemies runne for their lives. Of such importance was this victorie, that the Letedamonians began to bethinke themselves, of making some good agreement.

But

But one Tyrtau an Ashenian Poet, whom by appointment of an Oracle they had gotten to direct them re-inforced their spirits with his Verses. After this, Aristomenes took hu furprise a Town in Laconia, and vanquished in fight Anaxander King of Sparta, who did fet upon him in hope to have recovered the bootie.

The second Booke of the first part

But all these victories of Aristomenes perished, in the losse of one battell, whereofthe honour (if it were honour) or furely the profit, fell upon the Lacedamenians, through the treason of Arefocrates, King of Arcadia, who being corrupted by the enemies with money, fled away, and left the Mefenians exposed to a cruell butcherie. The losse was fo great, that together with Andania their principall Citie, all the Towns of Messene. standing too farre from the Sea, were abandoned for lack of men to defend them, and the Mount Ers fortified, whither the multitude, that could not be fafe abroad, was convey. ed into a place of fafetie. Here the Lased amonians found a tedious work, that held them eleven yeares. For besides that Era it selfe was a strong peece, Aristomenes with three hundred front Souldiers, did many incredible exploits, that wearied them, and hindred their attendance on the siege. He wasted all the fields of Messene, that were in theenemies power, and brake into Laconia, taking away Corn, Wine, Cattell, and all provifions, necessary for his owne people; the Slaves and houshold stuffe he changed into money, fuffering the owners to redeeme them. To remedy this mischiefe, the Laceda monians made an Edict, that neither Messene, nor the adjoyning parts of their owne Countrey, should be tilled or husbanded; which bred a great turnult among private 10 men, that were almost undone by it. Yet the Poet Tyrteus appealed this uprore with pleasing Songs. But Aristomenes grew so bold, that he not only ranged over all the fields. but adventure dupon the Towns, surprised, and fackt Amycla, and finally caused the enemies to encrease and strengthen their Companies; which done, there yet appeared no likelihood of taking Era.

In performing these and other services, thrice Aristomenes was taken prisoner ; vet fill he escaped. One escape of his deserves to be remembred, as a thing very strange and marvellous. He had with too much courage adventured to fet upon both the Kings of Sparta; and being in that fight wounded, and felled to the ground, was taken up fenfeleffe, and carried away prisoner, with fiftie of his Companions. There was a deepena- 39 turall Cave into which the Spartans used to cast head-long such as were condemned to dye for the greatest offences. To this punishment were Aristomenes and his companions adjudged. All the rest of these poore men dyed with their fals; Aristomenes (howsoever it came to passe) tooke no harme. Yet was it harme enough to be imprisoned in a deepe Dungeon, among dead carcaffes, where he was like to perish through hunger and stench But after a while he perceived by fome small glimmering of light (which perhaps came in at the top) a Foxe that was gnawing upon a dead bodie. Hereupon he bethought himselfe, that this beast must needs know some way to enter the place and get out-For which cause he made shift to lay hold upon it, and catching it by the taile with one hand, faved himselfe from biting with the other hand, by thrusting his coate into the 40 mouth of it. So letting it creepe whither it would, he followed, holding it as his guide, untill the way was too strait for him; and then dismissed it. The Foxe being loofe, ran through an hole at which came in a little light; and there did Aristomenes delve so long with his nailes, that at last he clawed out his passage. When some sugitives of Messen brought word to Sparta, that Aristomenes was returned home, their tale founded alike, as if they had faid, that a dead man was revived. But when the Corinthian forces, that came to helpe the Lacedamonians in the fiege of Era, were cut in pieces, their Captains flain, and their Camp taken; then was it eafily beleeved, that Aristomenes was alive indeed.

Thus eleven yeares passed whilest the enemies hovering about Era, faw no likelihood 19 of getting it; and Aristomenes with small forces did them greater hurt than they knew how to requite. But at the last, a flave, that had fled from Sparta, betrayed the place. This fellow had enticed to lewdnesse the wife of a Messenian, and was entertained by her, when her husband went forth to watch. It happened in a rainie-winter-night, that the husband came home unlooked for, whilest the Adulterer was within. The Woman hid her Paramour, and made good countenance to her husband, asking him by what good fortune he was returned so soone. He told her, that the storme of soule weather was fuch, as had made all his fellowes leave their Stations, and that him felfe had done as the reft did; as for Aristomenes, he was wounded of late in fight, and could not look abroad: neither was it to be feared, that the enemies would stirre in such a darke rainie night as this was. The flave that heard thefe tidings, rofe up fecretly out of his lurking hole, and gothim to the Lacedæmonian Campe with the newes. There he found Emperames his Master commanding in the Kings absence. To him he uttered all; and obtaining pardon for his running away, guided the Army into the Town. Little or nothing was done that night. For the Allarme was prefently taken; and the extreme darknesse, together with the noise of winde and raine, hindred all directions. All the next day was spent in most cruell fight; one part being incited by meere hope of ending a long worke; the wherenraged by meere desperation. The great advantage that the Spartans had in num-10 hers, was recompensed partly by the assistance, which women and children (to whom the hatred of fervitude had taught contempt of death) gave to their husbands and fishers; partly by the narrownesse of the streetes and other passages, which admirrednot many hands to fight at once. But the Messenians were in continual toyle; their Enemies fought in course, refreshing themselves with meate and sleep, and then remining supplyed the place of their wearie fellowes with fresh Companions. Aria flomenes therefore, perceiving that his men for want of reliefe were no longer able to holdout. (as having beene three dayes and three nights vexed with all miseries, of labour, watchings, fighting, hunger and thirst, besides continuall raine and cold) gathered together all the weaker fort, whom he compassed round with armed men. and sattempted to breake out through the midst of the Enemies. Emperamus Generall of the Lacedamonians was glad of this: and to further their departure, caufed his Souldiers to give an open way, leaving a faire passage to these desperate mad-men. Sothey iffued forth, and arrived fafe in Arcadia, where they were most lovingy en-

Upon the first bruit of the taking of Era, the Arcadians had prepared themselves to therescue: but Aristocrates their false-hearted King, said it was too late, for that all was alreadie lost. When Aristomenes had placed his followers in safetie, he chose our five hundred the luftiest of his men, with whom he resolved to march in all secret haste unto 30 Sparta, hoping to finde the Towne secure, and ill manned, the people being runne forth to the spoyle of Messene. In this enterprise, if he sped well, it was not doubted, that the Laced emonians would be glad to recover their owne, by restitution of that which they had taken from others; if all failed, an honourable death was the worst that could happen. There were three hundred Arcadians that offered to joyne with him; but Arifforates marred all, by fending speedie advertisement thereof to Anaxander King of Sparta. The Epistle which Anaxander sent back to Aristocrates was intercepted by some that mistrusted him to whom it was directed. Therein was found all his falshood, which being published in open affemblie, the Arcadians stoned him to death, and casting forth his bodie unburied, erected a monument of his treacherie, with a note; That the Perjurer o cannot deceive God.

Of Aristomenes no more is remaining to be said, than that committing his people to the charge of his fon Gorgus and other fufficient Governors, who should plant them in some new seate abroad, he resolved himselse to make aboad in those parts, hoping to finde the Lacedamonians work at home. His daughters he bestowed honourably in mariage. One ofthem Demagetus, who reigned in the Ile of Rhodes, tooke to wife, being willed by an Oracle, to marry the daughter of the best man in Greece. Finally, Aristomenes went with his daughter to Rhodes, whence he purposed to have travelled unto Ardys the Sonne of Gyges King of Lydia, and to Phraortes King of Media: but death prevented him at Rhodes, where he was honourably buried.

The Messenians were invited by Anaxilas (whose great Grandfather was a Messenian an, and went into Italie after the former war) being Lord of the Rhegians in Italie, to take his part against the Zaneleans in Sicilie, on the other side of the Streights. They did fo; and winning the Towne of Zancle, called it Messene, which name it keeps to this

This second Messenian warre ended in the first yeare of the twentie eighth Olympiad. Long after which time, the rest of that Nation, who staying at home served the Lacedamonians, found meanes to rebell; but were foone vanquished, and being driven to forfake Peloponnesus, they went into Acarnania; whence likewise, after few ages, they Fff 2 were expelled by the Lacedamonians, and then followed their ancient Countrie-men into Italie and Sicilie; some of them went into Africa, where they chose unto themselves

It is very strange, that during two hundred and sourescore years, this banished Nation retained their name, their ancient customes, language, hatred of Sparta, and love of their for saken Country; with a defire to return unto it. In the third year of the hundred and se. cond Olympiad, that great Epaminondas, having tamed the pride of the Laced amonians. revoked the Messenians home, who came flocking out of all quarters where they dwell abroadinto Peloponnesus. Thereldid Epaminondas restore unto them their old possess. on, and help them in building a fair Citie, which by the name of the Province, was called in Messene, and was held by them ever after, in despight of the Lacedamonians, of whom they never from thenceforth stood in seare.

Of the Kings that were in Lydia and Media, while Manasses raigned. Whether Deiocesthe Mede were that Arphaxad which is mentioned in the Booke of Judith. Of the bistorie of Tudith.

Rdys King of Lydia, and Phraortes of the Medes, are spoken of by Pausanias, as to reigning Thortly after the Meffenian war. Ardys succeeding unto his father Gyes, began his reigne of nine and fortie yeares, in the fecond of the five and twentieth Olympiad. He followed the steps of his father, who encroaching upon the lomans in Afia, hadtaken Colophon by force, and attempted Miletus and Smyrna. Inlikemmer Ardys wan Priene, and affailed Milesus; but went away without it. In his reigne, the Cimmerians, being expelled out of their own countrie by the Scythians, over-rana greatpart of Afia, which was not freed from them before the time of Alyattes this mans Grandchilde, by whom they were driven out. They had not only broken into Lydia, butwan the Citie of Sardes; though the Castle or Citadell thereof was defended against them, and held still for King Ardys; whose long reigne was unable, by reason of this great 30 storme, to effect much.

Phraortes was not King untill the third yeare of the nine and twentieth Olympial, which was fixe years after the Messenian war ended; the same being the last year of Mamasses his raigne over Juda.

Deioces the father of this Phraortes, was King of Media, three and fiftie of these sive and fiftie yeares in which Manaffes reigned. This Deioces was the first that ruled the Medes in a strict forme, commanding more absolutely than his Predecessours had done. For they, following the example of Arbaces, had given to the people so much licence, as caused every one to defire the wholesome severitie of a more Lordly King. Herein Deioces answered their desires to the full. For he caused them to build for him a stately 40 Palace; he tooke unto him a Guard, for defence of his person; he seldome gave presence; which also when he did, it was with such austeritie, that no mandurst presume to spit or cough in his fight. By these and the like ceremonies he bred in the people an awfull regard, and highly upheld the Majestie, which his predecessors had almost letten fail, through neglect of due comportments. In execution of his Royall Office, he did uprightly and severely administer justice, keeping secret spies to informehim of all that was done in the Kingdome. He cared not to enlarge the bounds of his Dominion, by encroaching upon others; but studied how to govern well his own. The difference found between this King, and fuch as were before him, seems to have bred that opnion which Herodotus delivers, that Deioces was the first who reigned in Media.

This was he that built the great Citie of Echatane, which now is called Tauris; and therefore he should be that king Arphaxad, mentioned in the storie of Judith, as also Ben Merodach, by the fame account, should be Nabuchodono for the Affrian, by whom Ar phaxad was flaine, and Holofernes fent to worke wondersupon Phul and Lud, and I know not what other Countries. For I reckonthe last yeare of Deioces to have been the nineteenth of Ben Merodach; though others place it otherwise, some earlier, in the time of Merodach Baladan, some later, in the reigne of Nabulassar, who is also called Nabucho done for.

In fitting this book of Judith to a certainetime, there hath much labour beene spent with ill successe. The raignes of Cambyses, Darins Hystaspis, Xerxes, and Ochus, have been fought into; but afford no great matter of likelihood: and now of late, the times, foregoing the destruction of Jerusalem, have beene thought upon, and this age that we have in hand, chosen by Bellarmine, as agreeing best with the storie; though others herein can-The (Ifpeake of fuch as faine would) agree with him. Whileft Camby fes raigned, the Temple was not re-built, which in the storie of Judith is found standing and dedicated. The other two Persian Kings, Darius and Xerxes, are acknowledged to have beene very favourable rothe Jewes; therefore neither of them could be Nabuchodonofor, whose part they refused to take, & who sent to destroy them. Yet the time of Xerxes hath some conveniences, aptly fitting this Historie; and above all, the opinion of a few ancient Writers (without whose judgement the authoritie of this Booke were of no value) having placed this argument in the Persian Monarchie, inclines the matter to the raigne of this vainglorious King. As for ochus, very few, and they faintly, entitle him to the bufinesse. Manifest it is, and granted, that in the time of this Historie, there must be a returne from captivitie lately foregoing; the Temple rebuilt; Joachim High Priest; and a long peace of threescore and ten yeares or thereabout, ensuing. All these were to be among the Jewes. Likewise on the other fide, we must find a King that reigned in Nineve, eighteene years at the least; that vanquished and slew a King of the Medes; one whom the Jewes refused to affish; one to that fought generally to be adored as God, and that therefore commanded all temples, of such as were accounted gods, to be destroyed; one whose Vice-roy or Captaine Generall knew not the Jewish Nation, but was faine to learn what they were of the bordering

Of all these circumstances; the Priesthood of Joachim, with a returne from captivitie, are found concurring, with either the time of Manaffes before the destruction of Ferusalimor of Xerxes afterward: the re-building of the Temple a while before, and the long pracefollowing, agree with the reigne of Xerxes; the rest of circumstances requisite, are to be found all together, neither before nor after the captivitie of the Jewes, and desolation of the Citie. Wherefore the briefe decision of this controversie is, That the book 30 of Judith is not Canonicall. Yet hath Tornsellus done as much, in fitting all to the time of Xurxes, as was possible in so desperate a case. For he supposeth, that under Xerxes there wereother Kings, among which Arphaxad might be one (who perhaps reftored and reedified the Citie of Echatane, that had formerly been built by Deioces) and Nabuchodowomight be another. This granted; he addes, that from the twelfth yeare to the eighteenth of Nabuchodono for that is, five or fixe yeares, the ab sence and ill fortune of Xerxes inhis Grecian expedition (which he supposeth to have beene so long) might give occafionunto Arphaxad, of rebelling: and that Nabuchodonofor, having vanquished and flaine Arphaxad, might then seeke to make himselfe Lord of all, by the Armie which he sent forth unto Holofernes. So should the Jewes have done their dutie, in adhering to to Xirxes their Soveraigne Lord, and refifting one that rebelled against him 3 as also the other circumstances rehearsed before, be well applied to the argument. For in these times, the affaires of Jurie were agreeable to the Historie of Judith, and such a King as this supposed Nabnehodonofor, might well enough be ignorant of the Jewes, and as proud as we shall need to thinke him. But the silence of all Histories, takes away beliefe from this conjecture : and the supposition it selfe is very hard, that a Rebell, whose King was abroad, with an Armie confisting of feventeene hundred thousand men, should presume so farre, upon the strength of twelve hundred thousand foot, and twelve thoufand Archers on horsebacke, as to thinke that he might doe what he list, yea that there. was none other God than himselfe. It is indeed easie to finde enough that might be so faid against this device of Torniellus: yet if there were any necessitie of holding the booke of Judish to be Canonicall, I would rather choose to lay aside all regard of prophane Histories, and build some defence upon this ground; than, by following the opinion of any other, to violate, as they all doe, the text it felf. That Judith lived under none of the Persian Kings, Bellarmine (whose workes I have not read, but find him cired by Torniedus) hath proved by many arguments. That she lived not in the Raigne of Manaffes, Torniellus hath proved very fubstantially, shewing how the Cardinall is driven, as it were to breake through a wall, in faying that the text was corrupted, where it fake of the destruction of the Temple foregoing her time. That the Kings Arpharad and Nabuchodonofor, found out by Torniellus, are the children of meere fantafie, it is so plaine that it needs no proofe at all. Wherefore we may truely fay, that they, which have contended about the time of this Historie, being well furnished of matter, wherewith to confute each other, but wanting wherewith to defend themselves (like naked men in a stonie field) have chased Holofernes out of all parts of time, and left him and his great expenie field) dition, Extra anni solisque vias, in an age that never was, and in places that were never

But I will not buffe my felfe herewith; having already fo farre digreffed, in Thewing who lived not with Manafles, that I thinke it high time to returne unto mine owne worke, and rehearse what others I finde, to have had their part, in the long time of his Raigne.

Of other Princes and actions that were in the setimes.

He first yeare of Manasses was the last of Romulus; after whose death, one yeare to the Romanes wanted a King. Then was Numa Pompilusa Sabyne chosen, a peaceable man and feeming very religious in his kinde. He brought the rude people, which Romulus had employed onely in warres, to some good civilitie, and a more orderly fashion of life. This he effected by filling their heads with superstition; as perswading them, that he had familiaritie with a Nymph called Egeria, who taught him a many of Ceremonies which he delivered unto the Romanes as things of great importance. But all these devices of Numa were, in his owne judgement, no better than meere delusions, that ferved onely as rudiments to bring the favage multitude of theeves and out-lawes, gathered into one bodie by Romulus, to some forme of milder discipline, than their boyfterous and wilde natures was otherwise apt to entertaine. This appeared by the Books 10 that were found in his grave, almost fixe hundred yeares after his death, whereinthe Superstition taught by himselfe was condemned as vaine. His grave was opened by chance, in digging a piece of ground that belonged to one L. Petilius a Scribe. Two Coffines or Chests of stone were in it, with an inscription in Greeke and Latineletters, which faid, That Numa Pompilius the fon of Pompo, King of the Romanes lay there. In the one Coffin was nothing found; his bodie being utterly confumed. In the other were his Bookes, wrapped up in two bundels of waxe; of his owne constitutions seven, and other seven of Philosophie. They were not only uncorrupted, buting manner fresh and new. The Pretour of the Citie desiring to have a sight of these Books, when he perceived whereunto they tended, refused to deliver them back to the owner, and 49. offered to take a solemn outh that they were against the Religion then in use. Hereupon the Senate, without more adoe, commanded them to be openly burnt. It seemes that Numa did meane to acquite himselfe unto wifer ages, which he thought would follow, as one that had not beene so foolish as to believe the Doctrine wherein he instructed his owne barbarous times. But the poyfon wherewith he had infected Rome, when he fate in his Throne, had not left working, when he ministred the Antidoteour of his grave. Had these Bookes not come to light, untill the dayes of Tully and Casar, when the miste of ignorance was somewhat better discussed; likely it is that they had not only escaped the fire, but wrought some good (and peradventure generall) effect. Being as it was, they ferved as a confutation, without remedie, of Idolatrie that was inve-

Numa raigned three and fortie years incontinuall peace. After him Tullus Hostilius the third King was chosen, in the fixe and fortieth of Manasses, and reigned two and thirtie years, builed, for the most part, in warre. He quarrelled with the Albanes, who met him in the field; but in regard of the danger, which both parts had cause to feare, that might grow unto them from the Thuscanes, caused them to bethink themselves of a course, whereby without effusion of so much bloud, as might make them too weake for a common enemie, it might be decided, who should command, and who obey.

There were in each Campe three Brethren, Twins, borne at one birth (Dionylius faves that they were Cousin Germans) of equally eares and strength, who were appointed to fight for their severall Countries. The end was, that the Horatii, Champions for the Romanes got the victorie, though two of them first lost their lives. The three Curatiz that fought for Alba(as Livietels it) were all alive, and able to fight, yet wounded, when nwo of their opposites were slain; but the third Horatius, pretending feare, did runne away, and thereby drew the others, who by reason of their hurts, could not follow him withequall speed, to follow him at such distance one from another, that returning upon them, he flew them, as it had been in fingle fight, man after man, ere they could joyne together and fet upon himall at once. Diony sims reports it somewhat otherwise, telling To very particularly, what wounds were given and taken, and faying, that first one of the Horatii was flaine, then one of the Curatii, then a fecond Horatius, and lastly the two Curatii, whom the third Horatius did cunningly severtheone from the other, as is shewed

This is one of the most memorable things in the old Roman Historie, both in regard of theadionit selfe, wherein Rome was laid, as it were, in a wager, against Alba, and in refreehof the great increase which thereby the Roman State obtained. For the Citie of Albadidimmediately become subject unto her owne Colonie, and was shortly after, upon fometreacherous dealing of their Governour, utterly razed, the people being removed 20 unto Rome, where they were made Citizens. The ftrong Nation of the Latines, whereof Alia, as the mother Citie, had been chiefe, became ere long dependant upon Rome. though not subject unto it, & divers pettie States adjacent, were by little and little taken in which additions, that were small, yet many, I will forbeare to rehearse (as being the worksof fundry ages, and few of them remarkeable confidered apart by themselves) untill such time as this fourth Empire, that is now in the infancie, shall grow to be the main subject of this Historie.

The seventh yeare of Hippomenes in Athens, was current with the first of Manasses. Alsomethree last Governours for ten yeares, who followed Hippomenes, were in the same 36 Kingstime. Of these I finde only names, Leocrates, Absander, and Erizias. After Erizias vearly Rulers were elected.

These Governours for ten years, were also of the race of Medon and Codrus, but their time of rule was shortned, and from term of life reduced unto ten years; it being thought likely that they would govern the better, when they knew that they were afterwards to live private men under the command of others. Ifollow Dionyfius of Halicarnassus, in applying their times unto those yeares of the Olimpiads, wherein the Chronologicali Tible, following this work, doth fet them. For he not only professeth himselfe to have takengreat care in ordering the reckoning of times; but hath noted alwayes the years of Dion. ance of this Historie. Whereas therefore he placeth the building of Rome, in the first 10 yeare of the seventh Olympiad, and affirmes, that the same was the first yeare of Charops government of Athens; I hope I shall not need excuse, for varying from Pausanias, who fetsthe beginning of these Athenians somewhat sooner.

In the reign of Manasses it was, that Midas, whom the Poets fained to have had Asses cares, held the kingdome of Phrygia. Many fables were devised of him; especially that he obtained of Bacchus, as a great gift, that all things which he should touch, might immediately be changed into Gold: by which meanes he had like to have been starved (his meate and drinke being subject to the same transformation) had not Bacchus delivered him from this miserable facultie, by causing him to wash himselse in the River Pattolus, the streame whereof hathever since, for sooth, abounded in that preso cious metall. Finally, it is faid he dyed by drinking Buls bloud; being invaded by the Scythians.

In this age flourished that Antimachus, who (faith Plutarch in the life of Romulus) obferved the Moones Eclipse at the foundation of Rome.

The Milesians, or, (as Eusebius hath it) the Athenians having obtained some power by Sca, founded Macieratis a Citie on the Fast of Egypt. Psammiticus herein seems to have affifted them, who used all meanes of drawing the Greeks into Egypt, accounting them his furest strength. For neither Miletus nor Athens were now of power sufficient to plant a Colonie in Egypt by force.

Josias succeeded unto Ammon, being but a child of 8 vears old, he began to feek after the God of David his Father; and in his twelfth yeare he purged juda and Ferusalem from the high places, and the groves, and the carved and molion Images: 16 and they brake downe in his fight the Altars of Baalim: He caused all the Images, as well those which were graven, as molten, to be stampt to powder, and strewed on their graves that had erected them; and this he commanded to be done throughout all his dominions. He also slew those that sacrificed to the Sun and Moon, and caused the Chariots and horfes of the Sun to be burnt. Of Josias it was prophecied in the time of Jerobeam the first, when he erected the Golden Calfe at Bethel, that a child should be born unto the house of David, Josias by name, and upon thee (faid the Prophet speaking to the Altar)shall he sacrifice the Priests of the high places, that burne incense upon thee :a prophecievery remarkeable.

In the eighteenth yeare of his raigne, he re-built and repaired the Temple, at which 50 time Helkiab the Priest found the Booke of Moses; called Deuteronomie, or, of the Law, which he fent to the King : which when he had caused to be read before him, and considered of the severe commandements therein written, the prosperitie promised to those that observe them, and the sorrow and extirpation to the rest, he rent his garments, and .commanded Helkiah, and others, to aske counsell of the Prophetesse Huldab; or, Olda, 2 Chron 34.24 concerning the Book, who answered the messengers in these words: Thus faith the Lord, Behold, I will bring evillupon this place, and upon the inhabitants thereof, even all the curfes that are written in the Book, which they have read before the King of Juda, because they have for saken mee, and burns incense to other gods. Only for the King himselfe, because he was 2 Kin, 22, 35, alover of God and his Lawes, it was promifed that this evill should not fall on Juda and 2 Chron 34 Jerufalem in his dayes, but that he himselfe should inherit his grave in peace.

Tolias affembled the Elders, caused the Booke to be read unto them, made a covenant with the Lord, and caused all that were found in Jerusalem and Benjamin to doe the like, promifing thereby to observe the Lawes and Commandements in the Book con-

The execution done by Josias upon the Altar, idols, monuments, and bones of the fille Prophets at Bethel, argueth his Dominion to have extended unto those Countries. that had beene part of the Kingdome of the ten Tribes. Yet I doe not thinke, that any To victory of Josias in war got possession of these places; but rather that Ezechias, after the flight & death of Sennacherib, when Merodach opposed himselfe against Afarbaddon, did nfe the advantage which the faction in the North presented unto him, and laid hold upon so much of the Kingdome of Israel, as he was able to people. Otherwise also it is not improbable, that the Babylonian finding himselfe unable to deale with Psammiticus in Syria (as wanting power to raise the siege of AZotas, though the Towne held outnine &twenty yeers) did give unto Manasses, together with his liberty, as much in Israel as himselfe could not easily defend. This was a good way to breake the amity that the Kines of Juda had fo long held with those of Egypt, by casting a bone between them. 20 & withall by this benefit of enlarging their Territories with addition of more than they could challenge, to redeem the friendship of the Jewes, which had been lost by injuries done, in feeking to bereave them of their owne. When it is faid, that Manaffes did after his deliverance from imprisonment, put Captaines of War in all the strong Cities of Juda; 2 Chron 33.14 it may be that fome such businesse is intimated, as the taking possession, and fortifying of places delivered into his hands. For though it be manifest that he tooke much paines, in making Jerusalem it selse more defensible ; yet I should rather beleeve, that he, having already compounded with the Babylonian, did fortifie himselfe against the Egyptians. whose fide he had for faken, than that he travelled in making fuch provisions only for 30 his mindes fake. The earnest nesse of Josias in the King of Babel his quarrell, doth argue. that the composition which Manasses had made with that King or his Ancestor, was upon fuch friendly termes, as required not onely a faithfull observation, but a thankfull requitall. For no perswasions could suffice to make Josius sit still, and hold himselfe quier ingood neutrality, when Pharao Necho King of Egypt passed along by him, to war upon the Countries about the River of Euphrates.

The last yeer of Josias his reigne it was, when as Necho the son of Psammiticus, came with a powerfull Army towards the border of Judæa, determining to paffe that way, being the nearest toward Euphrates, either to strengthen the passages of that River about 2 Chron. 35,200 Carchemish, or Cercusium, for the defence of Syria (as long after this, Dioclesian is said by Ammianus Marcellinus to have done,) or perhaps to invade Syria it selfe. For it see-40 meth that the travaile of Psammaticus had not beene idlely consumed about that one Towne of Azotus, but had put the Egyptians in possession of no small part of Syria, especially in those quarters, that had formerly belonged unto the Adades Kings of Damasco. Neither was the industry of Necho leffe than his Fathers had bin, in pursuing the war against Babel. In which warre, two things may greatly have availed the Egyptians, and advanced their affaires and hopes: the extraordinary valour of the mercenary Greekes, that were far better Souldiers than Egypt of it selfe could afford; & the danger wherein Affyria stood, by the force of the Medes, which under the command of more absolute Princes, began to feele it felfe better; and to shew what it could doe. These were great helpes, but of shorter endurance than was the warre; as in place more convenient shall to be noted. At the present it seems, that either some preparation of the Chaldzanstoreconquer, did enforce, or forme difability of theirs to make refistance, did invite the King of Egypt, into the Countries bordering upon Euphrates; whither Pharao Necho afcended with a mighty Army.

These two great Monarchs, having their swords drawne, and contending for the Empire of that part of the World, Josias advised with himselse to which of these he might adhere, having his Territory set in the mid-way between both, so as the one could not invade the other; but that they must of necessity tread upon the very face and body of his Country. Now though it were so that Necho himselfe defired by his Embassadours, leave to passe along by Judea, protesting that he directed himselfe against the Asyrians only, without all harmefull purpose against Josias; yet all sufficed not, but the King of Israel would needs fight with him. Many examples there were, which taught, what little good the friendship of Egypt could bring to those that had affiance therein: as that of Hosea the last King of Israel. who when he fell from the dependance of the Affyrian, and wholly trusted to Sabacus or Sous King of Egypt, was utterly disappointed of his hopes, and in conclusion lost both his life and estate, which the Affyrian so rooted up and tare in pieces, as it could never after be gathered together or replanted. The calamities also that fel upon Juda in the thirteenth and fourteenth years of Ezechia, whilest that good king and his people relied to upon Sethon; and more lately, the imprisonment of Manajes, were documents of suffcient proofe to flew the ill affurance, that was in the helpe of the Egyptians, who (neare neighbors though they were)were alwaies unreadie, when the necessities of their friends required their affiftance. The remembrance hereof might be the reason why Necodid not feeke to have the Jewes renew their ancient league with him, but only craved that they would be contented to fit still, and behold the pastime between him and the Ally. rians. This was an easie thing to grant; seeing that the countenance of such an Armie.30 did, soone after this, out-face Nabulassar upon his own borders, left unto the Jewes, a lawfull excuse of feare, had they forborne to give it any checke upon the way. Wherefore I beleeve that this religious and vertuous Prince Josias, was not stirred up only by 10 politick respects, to stop the way of Neco; but thought himself bound in faith and honor. to doe his best in defence of the Babylonian Crown; whereunto his Kingdome was obliged, either by covenant made at the enlargement of Manasses, or by the gift of such part as he held in the Kingdome of the ten Tribes. As for the Princes and people of Juda. they had now a good occasion to shew, both unto the Babylonians, of what importance their friendship was, and to the Egyptians what a valiant Nation they had abandoned and thereby made their enemie.

Some think that this action of Josias was contrary to the advice of Jeremy the Prophet; which I doe not find in the Prophecie of Jeremie, nor can find reason to beleeve. Others hold opinion that he forgat to ask the counsell of God: and this is very likely; feeinghe 30 might beleeve that an enterprise grounded upon fidelitie and thankfulness due to the King of Babel, could not but be displeasing unto the Lord. But the wickedness of the people (in whom the corruptions of former times had taken fuch root, as all the care of Joseph in reforming the Land, could not pluck up) was questionlesse far from hearkening how the matter would stand with Gods pleasure, and much farther from enquiring into his secret will, wherin it was determined that their good king, whose life stood between them and their punishment, should now be taken from among them, and that in such fort, as his death should give an entrance to the miseries ensuing. So Josius levying all the strength he could make, neare unto Megiddo, in the halfe Tribe of Manaffes, encountred New and there he received the stroak of death, which lingring about him till he came to Jerusalem, 49 brought him to the Sepulchres of his Ancestors. His losse was greatly bewailed of all the people and Princes of Juda, especially of Jeremie the Prophet, who inserted a forrowfull remembrance thereof in his Book of Lamentations.

6. II.

Of Pharao Neco that fought with Josias: Of Jehoahaz and Jehojakim Kings of Fthese warres, and particularly of this victorie, Herodotus hath mention among 50 the acts of Neco. He tels us of this King, that he went about to make a channell, whereby Ships might passe out of Nilus into the Red Sea. It should have reached above an hundred miles in length, and been wide enough for two Gallies to row in front. But in the middest of the worke, an Oracle foretold that the Barbarians should have the benefit of it, which caused Neco to defist when halfe was done. There were confumed in this toylesome businesse twelve hundred thousand Egyptians ; a losse great enough to make the King for fake his enterprise, without troubling the Oracle for admonition. Howsoever it were, he was not a man to be idle; therefore he built a Fleet, and levied a great Armie, wherewith he marched against the King of Babel. In this expedition, he used the service, as well of his Navie, as of his land-forces; but no particular exploits of his therein are found recorded, fave only this victoric against Josias, where Herodorus cals the place Magdolus, and the Jewes Syrians; which is a small error, seeing that Judaa was a Province of Syria, and Magdolus or Magdala is taken to have bin the fame place (though diversly named) in which this battell was fought. After this, Necus Jos. Ant. Fud. lib. tooke the Citie of Cadytis, which was perhaps Charchemish, by Euphrates, and made 10.cap.7. himselfe Lord, in a maner, of all Syria, as Fosephus witnesserh.

Particularly we find, that the Phænicians, one of the most powerful Nations in Syria, Herodla. were his Subjects, and that by his command they furrounded all Africa, fetting fail from To the guife of Arabia, and so passing along all the coast, whereon they both landed, as need required, and fowed corne for their sustenance in that long voyage, which lasted three yeares. This was the first Navigation about Africa, wherein that great Cape, now called of good hope, was discovered, which after was forgotten, until Vasco de Gamathe Portingall found it out, following a contrarie course to that which the Phanicians held; for they, beginning in the East, ranne the way of the Sun, South and then Westward, after which they returned home by the pillars and fireights of Hercules (as the name was then) called now the streights of Gibraliar, having Africke still on the right hand; but the Peningals, beginning their voyage not far from the same streights, leave Africke on 20 the Larboord, and bend their course unto the East. That report of the Phenicians, which Herodotus durst not beleeve, how the Sun in this journey was on their right hand, that is, on the North fide of them, is a matter of necessary truth; and the observation then made hereof, makes me the better to beleeve, that fuch a voyage was indeed performed. But leaving these discourses of Neco his magnificence, let us tell what he did, in matters more importing his Estate. The people of Juda, while the Egyptians were busic at Charchemift, had made Johnaha their King, in the roome of his father Josias. The Prophet Journe calls this new King Shallum, by the name of his younger brother; alluding per-Jer. 22.32. hapsto the short reigne of Shallum King of the ten Tribes: for Shallum of Ifrael reign-30 ed but one moneth; Jehoaha I no more than three. He was not the eldeft son of Josias: Wherefore it may feem that he was fet up as the best affected unto the king of Babel, the rest of his house being more inclined to the Egyptian, as appeares by the sequele. An 2 kin. 34.32. Idolater he was, and thrived accordingly. For when as Neco had dispatched his business in the North parts of Syria, then did he take order for the affaires of Judea. This Countiewas now fo far from making any refistance, that the King himselfe came from Riblabin the land of Hamath, where the matter went fo ill on his fide, that Neco did cast him intobonds, and carry him prisoner into Egypt, giving away his Kingdome to Eliakim his elder brother, to whom of right it did belong. The Citie of Riblah, in after times called Antiochia, was a place unhappy to the Kings and Princes of Juda, as may be obferved in divers examples. Yet here Jehojakim, together with his new name, got his 40 Kingdome; an ill gain, fince he could no better use it. But how-ever Jehojakim thrived by the bargaine, Pharao sped well, making that Kingdome Tributarie, without any stroke stricken; which three moneths before was too stout to give him peace, when he defired it. Certaine it is, that in his march outward, Neco had a greater taske lying upon his hands, than would permit him to wast his forces upon Judea: but now the reputation of his good successe at Megiddo, and Charchemish, together with the diffention of the Princes Jossas his sonnes (of whom the eldest is probably thought to have stormed at the preferment of his younger brother) gave him power to doe even what should please himselfe. Yet he did forbeareto make a conquest of the Land, perhaps upon the same reason, which had made him so earnest in seeking to hold peace withit. For the Jewes so had suffered much in the Egyptians quarrell, and being left by these their friends, in time of need, unto all extremities, were driven of necessitie to forsake that partie, and to joyne with the enemies; to whom if they shewed themselves faithfull, who could blamethem: It was therefore enough to reclaim them; feeing they were fuch a people as would not upon every occasion shift side, but endure more than Pharao, in the pride of his victories, thought that any henceforth should lay upon them: fo good a Patron didhe meane to be unto them. Neverthelesse he laid upon them a Tribute, of an hundred Talents of filver, and one Talent of gold; that so he might both reap at the prefent some fruit of his paines taken, and leave unto them some document in the suture, of greater punishment than verball anger, due to them, if they should rebell. So he departed, carrying along with him into Egypt the unfortunate King JehoahaZ, who died in his Captivitie.

The second Booke of the sirst part

The reigne of Jeheahaz was included in the end of his Fathers last yeare; otherwise it would hardly be found, that Jehojakim his successor, did reign ten whole years; where. as the Scriptures give him eleven, that are current and incomplete. If any man will rather cast the three moneths of this short reigne, into the first yeare of the brother, than into the fathers last; the same arguments that shall maintaine his opinion, will also prove the matter to be unworthie of disputation; and so I leave it.

Tehojakim in impietie was like his brother, in faction he was altogether Egyptian, as having received his Crown at the hand of Pharas. The wickednesse of these last Kings. being expressed in Scriptures none otherwise, than by generall words, with reference to all the evill that their Fathers had done; makes it apparent, that the poyfon wherewith Ahar and Manafles had infected the Land, was not fo expelled by the zealous goodnesse 2 Chron. 36.14. of Folias, but that it still cleaved unto the chiefe of the people, Tea unto the Priest's also, and therefore it was not strange, that the Kings had their parts therein. The Royallanthoritie was much abased by the dangers wherein the Countrey stood, in this trouble. some age; the Princes did in a manner what they listed; neither would the Kings for. beare to professe, that they could deny them nothing. Yet the beginning of Jebojakim had the countenance of the Egyptian to grace it, which made him infolent and cruell; to as we finde by that example of his dealing with uria the Prophet: though hereinallo the Princes do appeare to have been instigators. This holy man denounced Gods indements against the Citie and Temple, in like fort as other Prophets had formerly done, and did in the same age. The King with all the men of power, and all the Princes, hearing of this, determined to put him to death. Hereupon the poore man fled into Egypt: but fuch regard was had unto Jehojakim, that uria was delivered unto his Embassadour. and fent backe to the death; contrarie to the custome used, both in those dayes, and sinceamong all civill Nations, of giving refuge unto strangers, that are not held guiltie of such inhumane crimes, as for the generall good of mankind should be exempted from all priviledge.

It concerned Phoras to give all contentment possible to Jehojakim: for the Assiran Lyon, that had not stirred in many yeares, began about these times to roare so loudupon the bankes of Euphrates, that his voice was heard unto Nilus, threatning tomake himselfe Lord of all the Forrest. The causes that hitherto had withdrawne the house of Merodach from opposing the Egyptian in his conquest of Syria, require our consideration in this place; before we proceed to commit them together at Carehemilh, where shortly after this the glory of Egypt is to fall.

6. III.

Of the Kings of Babylon and Media. How it came to passe that the Kings of Babel could not give attendance on their businesse in Syria : which caused them to lose that Province.

- Erodach the sonne of Baladan, who taking the advantage that Senacheribs misadventure and death, together with the diffention between his children, prefented, made himselfe King of Babylon, was eleven years troubled with a powerfull Enemie, Afarhaddon the son of Senacherib, reigning over the Assyrians in Nineve; from whom whilest he could not any other way divert his cares, he was faint to omit all businesse in Syria, and (as hath beene formerly shewed) to make overunto Ezechia, some part of the Kingdome of the ten Tribes. From this molestation, the 10 death of Afarhadden did not only fet him free, but gave unto him some part of Affria, if not (as is commonly, but leffe probably thought) the whole Kingdome. How greatly this was to the liking of the Affirians, I will not here stand to enquire: his long reigne following, & his little intermeddling in matters of Syria, make it plain, that he had work enough at home, either in defending or in establishing that which he had gotten. Jostphus gives him the honour of having wonne Nineve it selfe, which we may believe; but furely he did not hold it long. For in the times foone following, that great Citie was frce, and vanquished Phraories the Median. Perhaps it yeelded upon some capitulation:

and refused afterwards to continue subject, when the Kings, being of the Chaldwan race. preferred Babylon before it.

Some thinke that this was the Affyrian King, whose Captaines tooke Manasses prisoner, but I rather beleeve those that hold the contrary, for which I have given my reafons in due place. To fay truth, I finde little cause why Merodach should have looked into those parts, as long as the Jewes were his friends, and the Egyptians, that maligned the Northerne Empire, held themselves quiet at home, which was untill the time of Planmaticus, about the end of this Kings Reigne, or the beginning of his son.

Ren Merodach the fon and fucceffour of this King, is not mentioned in the Scriptures; o vetishe named by good consent of Authors, and that speake little of his doings. The lenoth of his Reigne is gathered by inference to have beene one and twenty yeeres; for formuch remaineth of the time that passed betweene the beginning of his Fathers and his Nephewes Reignes (which is a knowne fumme) deducting the yeeres of his Father, and of his sonne Nabulassar. This (as I take it) was he that had Manasses Prisoner, and relased him. Hee sped ill in Syria; where Psammiticus, by the vertue of his Mercenary Greekes, did much prevaile. This may have been some cause that he released Manastes. and did put into his hands some part more of the Kingdome of Samaria: which is made probable by circumstances alledged before.

Nabulassar that reigned in Babylon after his father Ben Merodach, had greater business inhis owne Kingdome, than would permit him to looke abroad: infomuch as it may be thought to have been a great negligence or over-fight of Pfammiticus & Neco, that they did not occupy some good part of his Dominions beyond Euphrates. For it was in his time, that Phraortes King of the Medes invaded Affyria, and befreged Nineve; from whence he was not repelled by any force of Nabula far, but constrained to remove by the comming of the Scythians, who in these ages did over-slow those parts of the world, layinghold upon all that they could mafter by ftrong hand. Of these Scythians, and the Lordhip that they held in Asia, it is convenient that I speak in this place; shewing briefly afore-hand, how the Medes, upon whom they first fell, were busied in the same times with hopes of conquering Affyria.

Phraortes, the sonne of Deioces, King of the Medes, having by many victories enlarged his Dominions, conceived at length a faire possibility of making himselse Lord of

That City (as Herodotus reports it) having been a Soveraigne Lady, was not for faken merodific to of all her dependants; yet remained in such case, that of her selfe she was well enough.

This makes it plain, that howfoever Merodach had gotten possession of this imperiall feat, and made it subject as was the rest of the Country; yet it found the meanes to set it felfeat liberty: as after this againe it did, when it had been regained by Nabulaffar his Grande-childe.

Sharpe warre, and the very novelty of fuddaine violence, use to dismay any State or Country, not inured to the like: but custome of danger hardeneth even those that are unwarlike. Nineve had been the Palace of many valiant Kings lately reigning therein; ithad suffered, and resisted, all the surv, wherewith either Domesticall tumults between the fons of Sennacherib, or forreigne war of the Babylonians, could afflict it: and therefore it is the leffe wonderfull, that Phraortes did speed so ill in his journey against it. He and the most of his Army perished in that expedition: whereof I finde no particular circumstances (perhaps hee undervalued their forces, and brought a lesse power than was needfull.) It is enough, that herein we may beleeve Herodotus.

Claxares the fon of Phrastes, a braver man of war than his Father, wan as much of Affathe leffe, as lay Eastward, from the River of Halys; hee fought revenge upon the Affyrians for the death of his father, & befieged Nineve it felfe, having a purpose to destroy it. I rather believe Eusebius, That bee tooke the City, and fulfilled his displeasure uponit, than Herodotus, That the Scythian Army came upon him whilest bee lay before it. For whereequall authorities are contradictory (as Eusebins, though far later than Herodorus, yet having seen other Authors that are now lost, it is to be valued according to his great reading) there do I hold it best, to yeeld unto the best likelihoods.

To thinke that the Scythians came upon Cyaxares, whileft he lay before Nineve, were to accuse him of greater improvidence, than ought to be suspected in one commended 45 a good Souldier. But to suppose that he was faine to leave the Towne, when a Warre fo dangerous fell upon his owne Country, doth well agree both with the condition of fuch businesses that Scythian expedition brought into those parts, and with the State of the Chaldæan and Assyrian affaires ensuing.

The destruction of this great City is both foretold in the Booke of Tobit, and there fet down as happening about these times; of which book whosoever was the Author, he was ancient enough to know the Story of those ages, & hath committed no such errour in reckoning of times, as should cause us to distrust him in this. As for the Prophesical Nahum, though it be not limited unto any certaine terme, yet it appeares to have taken effect, in the finall destruction of Nineve by Nabuchodonofor, according to the common opinion. For the Prophet hath mention of a conquest of Egypt, foregoing this calamity, whereof we will speake in due place. Some that ascribe more authority than the refor. med Churches yeeld, to the booke of Tobit, are carefull, as in a matter of necessity, to affirme, that about these times, Nineve was taken; but they attribute (conjecturally) the victory over it to Ben Meredach: a needless conjecture, if the place of Enfebius bewel confidered. Yet I hold it probable, that Nabulassar the fon of Ben Merodach, did five upon it, and place a King or Vice-roy therein, about fuch time as the Country of Affrin was abandoned by Cyaxares, when the Scythian Warre over-whelmed Media, For then was the Conquest wrought out ready to his hand; the swelling spirits of the Ni. nevites were allayed, and their malice to Babylon formuch affwaged, that it might be though a great favour, if Nabulasar, appointing unto them a peculiar King, tookehim& to them into protection: though afterwards to their confusion, this unthankfull People and their King rebelled againe, as shall be shewed in the Reigne of Nabuchodonosor.

4. I V.

The great expedition of the Scythians, who ruled in Asia eight and twenty years.

†. I. The time of this expedition.

TOw that I have shewed what impediment was given by the Assyrians and the Medes, to the Babylonians, who thereby were much disabled to performeany action of worth upon the Egyptians in Syria; it is time that I speake of that great Scythian expedition, which grievously afflicted not only the Babylonians butthe Medes & Lydians, with the Countries adjacent, in fuch wife, that part of the troubleredounded even to the Egyptians themselves. Of the Scythian people in generall, Havdotus makes very large discourse, but interlaced, as of matter ill knowne, with many Fables: of this expedition he tels many particulars, but ill agreeing with confent of time. Concerning his fabulous reports, it will be needle fle to recite them; for they are fare enough diffant from the businesse in hand. The computation of times which by inference out of his relations, may feeme very ftrange, needeth fome answer in this place: lest otherwise I should either seeme to make my selfe too bold with an Authour, inciting him after a manner different from his ownetale; or else to bee too forgetfullofmy felfe, in bringing to act upon the Stage, those persons, which I had already buried-Eight and twenty yeeres, hee faith, that the Scythians reigned in Afia, before Cjaxares delivered the Countrey from them. Yet hee reports a warre betweene Cjaxanes and Haliattes the Lydian, as foregoing the fiege of Nineve; the fiege of Nineve being ere the Scythians came. And further he tels, how the Scythians, having vanquished the Medes, did passe into Syria, and were encountred in Palestina by Pfammiticus King of 50 Egypt, who by gifts and entreaty procured them to depart from him. These narrations of Herodetus may, every one of them, betrue; though not in such order of time, as he hath marshalled them. For Pfammitieus was dead before Cyaxares began to reigne: and Cyanares had spent halfe of his forty yeeres, ere Halyattes was King of Lydia, so that hee could not, after those Lydian Warres, reigne eight and twenty veeres together with the Scythians. It is true, that Eufebins dothalfo call Pfummis the fonne of Pharao Nece, by the name of Pfammiticus; and this King Pfammis may, by some straimed conjecture, be thought to have beene he that met with the Scythians: for heelived with both Cyaxares and Halyattes. But Eusebius himselfe referres all that businesse of the Scythian irruption into Palæssina, to Psammiticus the Father of Necho, whom he leaves dead before the Reigne of Halyattes. Therefore I dare not relye upon Herodotus, in this matter, otherwise than to believe him, that such things were in these ages, though not in such order as he sets them downe.

Irremaines, that I collect as well as I can, those memorials which I finde of this expedition scattered in divers places: a worke necessary, for that the greatnesse of this action was such, as ought not to be omitted in a generall History; yet not easie, the consent of those that have written thereof, being nothing neare to uniformity.

CHAP.28.S.4. +.2.

Ihave noted before, that in the reigne of Ardys King of Lydia, the Cimmerians overranthat Kingdome, and were not expelled, untill Halyattes the Nephew of Ardys got theupper hand of them. In these times therefore of Ardys, Sadiattes, and Halyattes, are weto finde the eight and twenty years, wherein the Scythians reigned ouer Afia. Now foralmuch as Pfammiticus the Egyptian had fome dealings with the Scythians, even in the height of their prosperity, wee must needs allow more than one or two of his last verres unto this their Dominion. But the beginning of Halyattes his Reigne in Lydia. heing three and twenty yeers compleat after the death of Pfammiticus, leaves the space very scant, either for the great victories of the Scythians, necessarily supposed before they could meete the Egyptian in Syria, or for those many losses, which they must have received ere they could be driven quite away. To increase this difficulty, the vi-Actions Reigne of Nabuchedonofor in Babylon, is of no small moment. For how may wee thinke it possible, that hee should have adventured the strength of his Kingdome against the Egyptians & Jewes, had he stood in daily feare of losing his owne, to a more mighty nation, that lay upon his necke ? To speake simply as it appeares to me, the vi-Rories ascribed to Cyaxares and Halyattes over these warlike people, were not obtained against the whole body of their Army, but were the defeatures of some troopes, that infested their severall Kingdomes; other Princes, and among these, Nabulasar, having the like successe, when the pleasures of Asia had mollified the courages of these hardy Northeme Laddes. Wherefore we may probably annexe the eight and twenty years of the Scythians rule, to as many almost the last of Nabulassars Reigne, in compasse whereof their power was at the greatest. This is all that I can fay of the time, wherein Asia sufferedthe violence of their oppressors.

Ouching the expedition it felfe, Herodorns tels us, that the Cimmerians being driven out of their Country by the Scythians, invaded and wasted some part of Afia; & that the Scythians, not contented with having wontheland of the Cimomerians, did follow them; I know not why, into farre removed quarters of the world, fo (as it were by chance) falling upon Media & Egypt, in this pursuit of men that were gone another way into Lydia. Hereby we may gather that the Cimmerians were an odious & base people; the Scythians, as mischievous & foolish; or else Herodotus, & some other of his Country-men, great flanderers of those, by whom their Nation had been beaten, and Ionia, more than once, grievously ransackt. The great valour of the Cimmerians or Cimbrians is fo well known, and their many Conquests so well testified in Histories of divers Nations, that the malice of the Greekes is infufficient to staine them with the note of Cowards. These were the posterity of Gomer, who peopled the greatest part of Our Westerne World; and whose re-slow did overwhelm no small portion of Greece & Assas well before and after, as in the age whereof we do now entreat. He that would more largely informe himselse of their original and actions, may peruse Goropius Becamushis Amazonica; of many things in which Booke, that may be verified, which the learned Ortelius is faid to have spoken, of all Goropius his works, that it is easie to laugh at them, but hard to confute them: There we finde it proved, by such arguments and authorities, as are not lightly to be regarded, that the Cimmerians, Scythians and Sarmatians, were all of one Linage and Nation; how soever distinguished in name, by reason of their divers tribes, professions, or perhaps dialect of speech. Homer indeed hath mention of the Cimmerians; whose Country whether he placeth in the West, as neare unto the Ggg 2

Ocean and bounds of the Earth, or in the North, as being farre from the Sunne, and covered with eternall darkneffe; certain it is that he would have them near neighboursto Hell: for hee had the same quarrell to them which Herodotus had, and therefore believe would have made them feeme a kinde of Goblins. It was the manner of this great Poet (as Herodotus writing his life affirmes) to infert into his works the names of fuch as lived in his owne time, making such mention of them, as the good or ill done by them to him. felfe deserved. And for this reasonit is proved by Eustarbius, that the Cimmerians were fo differed by him, because they had wasted his Country. Perhaps that invasion of Phrygia by the Amazons, wher of Homer puts a remembrance into Priamus his discourse Phrygia by the Amazons, which Eufebius noteth to have happened fomewhat be with Helen, was the very fame, which Eufebius noteth to have happened fomewhat be. fore the age of Homer, at what time the Cimmerians with the Amazons, together inva-

This is certain, that both the Amazons & the Cimmerii (who in after-times were called Cimbri) did often breake into Greece and Asia; which though it be not in express rermes written, that they did with joynt-forces, yet feeing they invaded the felfe-fame places, it may well be gathered, that they were companions. One journey of the Ama. zons into Greece, mentioned also by Ensebius, was by the streights of the Cimmerians. Diod. 16.4. c.2. as we finde in Diodore, who further tellethus, that the Scythians therein gave themaf. fistance. The same Authour, before his entry into those discourses of the Amazone Diodatio. 2.4.11. which himselfe acknowledgeth to be fabulous, doth report them to have beene wives to of the Scythians, and no lesse Warre-like than their Husbands; alledging the example of that Queen who is faid to have flaine the great Persian Cyrus. That it was the manner of the Cimbri to carry their wives along with them to the warres; and how define. rate the courage was of those Women; the terrible descent of them into Italy, when Marius the Romane overthrew them, gives proofe fufficient. I will not here enterinto a difcourfe of the Amazons; another place will give me better leifure to speake of them: but seeing that they are noted by divers Historians to have belonged unto the Cimmerians, to the Scythians, and to the Sarmatians, we may therefore the better and prove Goropius his conclusion, That these three nations were one, at least that they were

> Now as concerning the expulsion of the Cimmerians by the Scythians, it appeares to 32 have beene none other than the fending a Colony of them forth into Affa, with an Army of Scythians to helpe them, in purchasing a new seate, and establishing the plantation.

The Sarmatians also were companions in this journey. For the City of Novogradin Ruffia (which Country is the fame that was called Sarmatia) flood in their way homewards, as shall anon bee further shewed. So that all the North was up in Armes: and therefore it is no marvell though many Countries felt the weight of this great inundation. Such another voyage was that, which the same people made five hundred years and more after this, when they were encountred by the Romans. For they iffued from 40 Plutarth in the parts about the Lake Mæotis; they were then likewise affisted (faith Plutarch in the life of Mains. most likely report of them) by the Scythians their neighbours; they had in their Armie above three hundred thousand fighting men, besides a huge multitude of women and children; they wandred over many Countries, beating all downe before them; and finally, thinking to have fettled themselves in Italy, they divided their Company, for the more easie passage thither, and were consumed in three terrible battailes by the Roman Confuls. Meere necessity enforced these poore Nations to trouble the World, in following fuch hard adventures. For their Countrey being more fruitfull of men than of sustenance, and shut up on the North side with intolerable cold, which denied iffue that way to their over-swelling multitudes; they were compelled to discharge up- 50 on the South, and by right or wrong to drive others out of possession, as having title to all that they had power to get, because they wanted all, that weaker, but more civill, people had. Their sturdy bodies, patient of hunger, cold, and all hardnesse, gave them great advantage over fuch as were accustomed unto a more delicate life, and could not be without a thousand superfluities. Wherefore most commonly they prevailed very farre; their next neighbours giving them free passage, that they might the sooner bee ridde of them; others giving them, besides passage, victuals and guides to conduct them to more wealthy places; others hiring them to depart with great prefents; fo as the farther they went on, the more pleafant Lands they found, and the more effeminate people.

t. III. Of the Cimmerians warre in Lydia.

He first Company of these, consisting for the most part of Cimmerians, held the way of the Euxine Seas, which they had fill on the right hand; leaving on the other side, & behinde them, the great Montains of Caucasus. These having pasfedthrough the Land of Colchis, that is now called Mengrelli, entered the Country of 16 Pontus, & being arrived in Paphlagonia, fortified the Promontory, whereon Synope, 2 famous Haven Towne of the Greeks, was after built. Here it seemes that they bestowed Hard lib. 4 the weakest and most unserviceable of their traine, together with the heaviest part of their carriages, under some good guard: as drawing near to those Regions, in conquest wherof they were to trie the utmost hazzard. For in like fort afterwards did the Cimbri (of whom I spake even now) dispose of their impediments, leaving them in a place of frength, where Antwerpe now stands, when they drew neare unto Gaule, upon which they determined to adventure themselves in the purchase. From Sinope, the way unto Phrygia, Lydia, and Ionia, was faire and open to the Cimmerians, without any ledge of Mountaines, or any deep Rivers at all to stay their march: for Iris and Halys they had

What battels were fought between these invaders and the Lydians, & with what vasible successe the one or other part wanne and lost, I finde not written, nor amable to conjecture. This I find, that in the time of Ardys, the Cimmerians got possession of Sardesthecapitall City of Lydia; only the Castle holding out against them. Further I obferve, that whereas Herodorus tells of the acts performed by Gyges and Ardys Kings of Lydia, before this invasion, and by Halyattes and Crasus in the times following, all that Ardy did against the Cimmerians, and all, save burning the Milesians Corn fields, that was done in twelve years by Sadyattes his Son(who perhaps had his hands fo full of this bufinesse, that he could turne them to nothing else) is quite omitted: whereby it may feme, that neither of the two did any thing worthy of remembrance in those wars, but were gladenough that they did lose all.

Certainly the miseries of war are never so bitter and many, as when a whole Nation, orgreat part of it, for faking their owne feats, labour to root out the established possesfoursof another Land; making roome for themselves, their wives and children. They that fight for the mastery, are pacified with tribute, or with some other services and acknowledgements; which had they beene yeelded at the first, all had been quiet, and no fword bloudied. But in these migrations, the affailants bring so little with them, that they need all which the defendants have, their Lands and Cattell, their houses and their goods, even to the cradles of the fucking infants. The mercileffe termes of this controversie arme both sides with desperate resolution: seeing the one part must either winne, or perish by famine; the other defend their goods, or lose their lives without redemption. Most of the Countries in Europe have selt examples thereof; and the mighty Empire of Rome was overthrowne by fuch invasions. But our Isle of Britaine canbell witnesse the diversity of Conquests; having by the happy vietory of the Romans, gotten the knowledge of all Civill Arts, in exchange of liberty, that was but stenderly instructed therein before, whereas the issue of the Saxon and Danish Wars, was, as were the causes, quite contrary. For these did not seeke after the Dominion onely, but the entire possession of the Country, which the Saxons obtained, but with horrible cruelty, eradicating all of the British Race, & defacing all memorial of the ancientinhabitants through the greater part of the Land. But the Danes (who are also of the Cimmerian bloud) found such end of their enterprize, as it may seem that the Cimmerians in Lydia, & Scythians in the higher Afia, did arrive unto. So that by confidering the processe of the one, we shall the better conceive the fortune of the other. Many battailes the Danes wonne, yet none of such importance, as sufficed to make them absolute Conquerours: Many the Saxons won upon the Danes, yet not so great, as could drive them quite away, and backe from hence, after they had gotten firme footing. But in tourle of time, the long continuance even of utter enmity, had bred fuch acquaintance betweene them, as bowing the natures of both the se people, made the one more pliant unto the other. So their diagreeable qualities, both ill and good, being reduced into one milde temper, no small number of the Danes became peaceable cohabitants with the Saxons in England, where great flaughter had made large roome; others returning home, found their owne Country wide enough to receive them, as having disburthened it selfe of many thousands, that were sent to seeke their graves abroad. And such (as I thinke) was the end of the Cimmerian warre in Lydia; whereunto though fome victory of Halyantes may have hastened the conclusion, yet the wearisome length of time seems to have done most, in compelling them to defire of rest. I know not why I should search to adde hereunto my further conjecture; which is, that the matter was so compounded to between the Cimmerians & Halyattes, that the River of Halys should divide their Territories. For Halys was henceforth the border of the Lydians, and on the Easterne fide of the River was the Country of the Amazons, that is indeed, of the Cimmerians and other Scythian people; whose wives and daughters these warlike women are supposed to have been.

And hereunto the quarrell enfuing betweene Halyattes and Cyaxares the Mede, hath very good reference. For Halyattes (as is faid) fought in defence of certain Scythians, up. on whom the Median fought revenge. And it stands with reason, that the Lydians and Cimmerians, being much weakened with mutuall flaughters, should have joyned in a league of mutuall defence for their common fafety: though otherwise it had been dan 20 gerous to Halyattes, if hee had permitted the Median to extend his Kingdome lofarre Westward, what soever the pretences might be, of taking revenge upon such as had spoiled each of their Countries. As for that occasion of the Warre betweene theetwo Kings, which Herodotus relates, I finde it of little waight, and leffe probability. He tells of Scythians, that being chased out of their Country by faction, came unto Cyus. ares; who committed unto them certaine Boyes, to be instructed in the Scythian tongue, and feate of Archery. Now it fo fell out (faith he) that these Scythians using mucho hunt, &commonly bringing home fomewhat with them, did nevertheleffe other-while misse of their game, and came home as they went. Hereupon the King being frown & cholericke, bitterly reviled them; & they, as impatient as he, killed one of the Boys? that was under their charge, whom dreffing like Venison, they presented unto him; which done, they fledde unto Halyattes. This Herodotta delivers, as the ground of awar that lasted fixe yeeres betweene the Medes and Lydians; the one King demanding these Fugitives to be delivered into his hand, the other refusing to betray such men as were become his suppliants. To this I will say no more, than that I see no cause that might induce the Scythians to betake themselves to either of these Kings, unto whom their Nation had wrought so much displeasure. Particularly, they had reason to distrust Cyaxares, for the treachery that he shewed in the massacring of their Country-menthat were in his Kingdome, of whom it is now meet that we should speake.

t. IV.

The Warre of the Scythians in the higher Afia.

S the Cimmerians held their course westerly, along the shores of the Euxine sea. fo the Scythians & Sarmatians took the other way, & having the Caspian Scaon their left hand, passed between it & Caucasus through Albania, Colthere, and other obscure Nations, where now are the Countries of Servan and Georgia, & so they entered into Media. The Medes encountred them in Armes; but were beaten, & thereup on glad to come to any agreement with them. This was in the time of Phraortes, whileft Plammaticus reigned in Egypt. If it were in the fixt yeere of Nabulassars Reigne over Babylon (supposing him to have reigned five & thirry; otherwise we must allow to Bes Merodach what we take from him) then doe the eight & twenty yeares of their Domi nion end, one year before the great Nabuchodonofor was King; fo giving him good leave to provide securely for the invasion of Syria; which expedition hee began while his Father yet lived, as fosephus out of Berefus relates the History.

Now the Medes, defirous to fave themselves as well as they might, from this terrible nation, which when they had no luft to a fecond triall of the fword, refused not to under goe the burthen of a Tribute, but thought nothing dishonourable, that would serve to remove these troublesome guests into some other lodging. On the other part, the Sevthians finding still the Countries pleasanter & better, the further that they marched into the South, did fuffer themselves to be perswaded, that a little more travaile would adde agreat deale more to their content. For they relyed so much upon their owne valour, that they feared no refistance; & being the bravest men, they thought it reason that they hould dwell in the best Region. That Phraortes perswaded them into Egypt, I doe not think: Babylon was neare enough; whither if he could fend these Locusts to graze, then thould not his unfriendly Neighbours have cause to laugh at his misfortune. What shift Nabulassar made with them, or that at all he had any dealings with them, I do not reade. 10 But it is well known that his Dominions lay in the middest betweene Media & Egypt; as also, that they made all those parts of Asia Tributary; wherefore we may very well heleeve, that they watered their horses in his Rivers, and that he also was content to give Plammities hearing of their progresse (like the jealous Husband of a faire Wise) took care that they might not looke upon Egypt; left the fight thereof should more easily detaine them there, than any force or perswasion that hee could use, would send them going. Therefore hee met them in Syria, prefuming more on the great gifts which he ment to bestow upon them, than on his Army that should keepe them backe. Egypt was rich; and halfe the riches had not been ill spent in faving all. Yet Pfammitieus tooke themost likely course, whereby to make his part good against them by strong hand, in case they had been so obstinate as to refuse all indifferent composition. For he lay close monthe edge of the Wildernesse in Gaza(as I take it) the Southermost border of Palzfina: whence he never advanced to meete with the Scythians; but gave them leave to feeleasmuch of the scalding Sunne-beames, ill agreeing with their temper, as all the length of Syria could beate upon them. When they were come as farre as Afcalon, the next City to Gaza, then did he affay them with goodly words, accompanied with gifts, which were likely to work fo much the better, by how much the worse they were plealed with the heate of a Climate so farre different from their owne. Plammiticus had this backe a vast wildernesse, over the scorching fands whereof, the Scythians more patient of cold and wet, than of the contrary diftempers, could ill have endured to pursuchim through unknowne wayes, had they fought with him and prevailed: especially the Kingdome of Egypt being ready to entertaine him with reliefe, and them with newtrouble at the end of their weary journey. Wherefore they were content to be intreated, & taking in good part his courteous offers, returned back to visit their acquaintance in the high Countries: The Egyptian King (befides that hee preferred his owne Effate from a dangerous adventure, by hyring this great Army to depart from him foundall his Coast well repayed in the processe of his wars in Syria, wherethe Nation's beyond Euphrates had no power to molest him, being more than ever troubled themle kives with the returne of their oppressors. For the Scythians, resolving now to seeke no further, began to demand more than the Tribute formerly imposed. And not contented to fleece the Naturals with grievous exactions, they prefumed to live at discretion upon the Countrey, taking what they lifted from the Owners; and many times (as it were to fave the labour of taking often) taking all at once. This Tyrannous Dominion they long used over the higher Asia, that is, over the Country lying between the Caspianand Red Seas; and betweene India and Asia the lesse. Happy it was for the poore people, that in so large a space of ground, there was room enough for these new comers; otherwise the calamity that fell, as it were by chance, upon those private men, to whose wealth any Scythian did beare a fancy, would have lighted in general! upon all at one clap, leaving few alive, and none able to relieve their fellowes. Yer it feemes that the heaviest burthen lay upon Media; for it was a fruitfull Countrey not farre from their own home, and lay under a Climate well agreeing with the constitution of their bodies; therealfo it was that they had the farall blow, by which their infolent Rule was taken from them.

Gyaxares King of the Medes, who in this extremity was no better than a Rent-gathe- Hand His. ter for the Scythians, perceiving that his Land lay unmanured and waste, through the negligence of his people, that were out of heart by daily oppressions, and that the matter could not be remedied by open force, refolved to prove what might be done by Aratagem.

Herod, lib.4.

stratagem. The manging of the businesse is thus delivered in briefe; That he, and his Medes, feafted the better part of the Scythians, made them drunke, and flew them; recovering hereby the possession of all that they had lost.

Such another flaughter was committed upon the Danes in England; but it was reven. ged by their Countrimen, with greater cruelty than ever they had practifed before. That the Scythians which escaped this bloudy feast, made any stirre in Media, I do not find. neither do I reade that either in revenge hereof, or upon other pretence, the Medes Were troubled by invasson from Scythia in time following.

This is the more strange, for that the Army returning home out of Media, was year frong & encountred with opposition (as Herodotus reports it) no lesse than it had found in abroad. Wherefore it may be, that the device of Cyaxares to free his Country, took good effect, with leffe bloud-fined than hath been supposed. For if he surprised all the chiefe of them, it was no hard matter to make a good composition. Many of them doubt leffe in eight and twenty years had fo well fetled themselves, that they were desirous of rest, and might be permitted, without any danger, to remaine in the Country; many (of whom I shall speake anon) having done what they could in the businesse, for which they came forth, were willing to returne home with what they had gotten; fuch as were not pleased with either of these two courses, might goe joyne with the Cimmerians in Lydia, or feeke their fortunes in other Provinces among their owne Companions Whereas all the Families of the North are faid to have bin with Nabuchadne Zar, it may to be understood, that a great part of the Scythians, upon hope of gaine, or define to keepe what they had already gained, were content to become subject unto Nabulat. far: mens love of their wealth being most effectuall, in taming the more unquiet love of inordinate liberty. This is certaine, that Nabuchadne Zar, as ever after, fo inhis full beginning of warre, did beate the Egyptians, who in ages foregoing had been accu-Romed to deale with the Babylonians after another fashion: & this new successe of that King may be imputed, in regard of humane meanes, to fuch addition as this of new

Of the Scythian Army returning out of Media, divers Authors report a Story, which confirmes me in the opinion, that this Company went forth to a flift their kinredard to friends, in acquiring a new feat, and establishing their plantation. For these had left their wives behinde them; a good argument to prove that they meant to come againe. The Scythian women to comfort them felves in their husbands abfence became bed-follows to their flaves. These got a lusty broad of youths, that were loth to be troubled with Fathers-in-Law, & therfore prepared to fight with them at their returne. If they were onely the children of flaves, which compounded an Army (as Herodotus would have it, who tels us, that the Scythians were wont to pull out all their bond-mens eyes) it mult needes be that they were very Boyes, or elfe that the Women did very little whilecontinue chaste. Wherefore I rather believe that tale as it is told by the Russesthemselves, who agreeing in the rest with the consent of Histories, make that report of their Ance-16 Rors returning homewards, which I will fet down, as I finde it in Mafter Dottor Fletchtr Rus. commence, his exact discourse of the Russe Common-wealth. They under stood by the way, that their Chrislopey or Bond-flaves, whom they left at home had in their ab conce poffe fed their townes lands, boufes. Wives, and all. At which newes being somewhat amazed, and yet disdaining the lillany of their fervants, they made the more speede home: and so not farre from Novogradmet them in warlike manner marching against them. Whereupon advising what was best to bee > vile condition, thereby to terrefic them, and abatet beir courage. And so marchine on & lasting all together with their whips in their hands, they zave the onfee; which semed servible so in the eares of their Villaines, and frooke fuch a feafe into them of the smart of the whip, which they had felt before , that they fled altogether like Sheepe before the Drivers. In memory of this victory the Novogradians ever fince have stamped their Coine (which they call a Dingot Novogradskoy current through all Russia) with the figure of a Horseman shaking a whip a done, they agreed alfo to fet upon them with no other frem of weapon but with their horfe while

(which, as their manner is, every man rideth withall) to put them in remembrance of their [t]-

loft in his hand. It may feeme, that all the women of that Country have fared the work ever fince, in regard of the universall fault: for such a Pudkey or whip, as terrefied those flaves, curioufly wrought by her felfe, is the first present that the Moscovian wife, even in time of wooing, fends to him that shall be her husband, in tooken of subjection; being well affured to feele it often on her own loines. But this was a Document unto the Scythians, or rather Sarmatians (for Novograd stands in the Country that was called Sarmatia) to beware of ablenting themselves any more so long from their wives; which afterthis, I finde not that they did.

Thus much I thought good to fet down of the Scythian expedition; not only because it is the most memorable act performed abroad by that Nation, famous in Histories, and terrible to many Countries; but for that it appeares to have been a great cause of the Egyptians prevailing hitherto in Syria, and about Judæa, which continues yet a while the

of Princes living in divers Countries, in these ages.

Aving thus far digressed from the matters of Juda , to avoide all further occasion of doing the like, I will here insert a note of such Kings, and men of marke, as were betweene the death of Manasses, and the ruine of Jerusalem. Of the Egyptians, Babylonians, Medes, and Lydians, I have spoken as much as I thought need full. In Rome, Tulius Hostilius held the Kingdome, untill the one and twentieth yeere of Josas; at which time Ancus Martius succeeding, reigned soure and twenty yeeres. After him L. Tarquinius Priscus, a new-come stranger, but very rich, prevailed so farres by his gracious fires samong the people, that he got the Kingdom to himself, disappointing the sonnes of Ancus, over whom he was Tutor. He began in the fourth yeere of Zedekia, and reigned eight and thirty yeares. In this time it was namely, in the fecondyear of the thirtieth Olympiad, that the Lacedamonians bethinking them how to beavenged of the Arcadians, who gave fuccour to the Messenians against them in the former war, entred their Territory, took the City of Phigalia or Phialia, from whence their Garrifons were foone after beaten out. Cypfelus expelling the race of the Bacide, madehimselse Lord of Corinth about these times, & governed it in peace thirty yeeres leaving for fuccessour his sonne Periander, one of the seven Sages, but a cruell Tyrant: who among other vile acts, flew his owne wife, & afterwards, as in her honour, stripped allthe Corinthian women ftark naked, burning their apparell, as an acceptable offering to her Ghost. Hereby we may perceive, that the wisedome of the Greekes was not excellent in those dayes, when such a one as this could bee admired as excelling all the

In these times also were Zaleucus & Draco, famous Lawgivers, the one among the Lotrians in Italy, the other in the City of Athens. The Lawes of Draco were for igorous, thathe was faid to have written them with bloud: for he rewarded every small offence with death. Wherefore his Constitutions were foon abrogated, & power given to Solon by the Athenians, to make new in their stead. But the Lawes of Zaleueus were very mild. he forbadany Gentlewoman to walk abroad with more than one Bond-woman attending on her, unlesse it were when she was drunke; or to goe forth of the Towne by night, unlesse it were to some sweet-hearts bed; or to dresse her selfe up in immodest bravery, unlesse it were to inveigle a lover. By which pleasant Ordinances he effected his defire; for none would feeme, in breaking the Statutes, to be in such case as challenged the dispensation. It is noted in this man as a fingular example of justice, that when his own son hadcommitted adultery, and was therefore to lose both his eyes, he did not cause him tobe pardoned, but gave one eye of his owne to fave the young man (who also lost one) from utter blindnesse.

I shall not henceforth neede so farre to wander, as hitherto I often have done, in purhing of actions collaterall to the History, for inserting them in their order of time-The Chaldaeans will foon fall under the Persians; ere long, encounter with the Greeks; the Greeks, with the Romans; the Romans, with many Nations. Concerning all these, as they shall successively present themselves, in their flourishing Estate, it will be enough to recapitulate the most memorable accidents, that befell them in their Minority. But in the long space of more than thirteen hundred yeeres, which passed betweene the calling of Abraham, and the destruction of Jerusalem, wee finde little matter, wherein the History of Israel had any dealing with other Nations, than the very stearest borderers. Yet read we of many Kingdomes, that in these many ages were erected, and throwne downe; as likewise, many memorable acts were performed in Greece and elsewhere, though not following one another at any neare distance; all which must have beene quite omitted, or else reserved unto a very unseasonable rehearfall, had they not beene disposed in this method, whereof he that will not allow the conveniency, may pardon the necessity.

S. VI.

The oppression of I udea, and destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans.

Ow to returne to the Jewish Story, from whence we have so farre digressed in the third year of Jehojakim, Nabuchodono for the fecond, his Father yet living entred Judza with a great Army, who befieging and forcing Jerusalem, made Je. hojakim his Vassall in despight of Necho, that had established him King, and tooke with him for pledges Daniel, being as yet a childe, with Ananias, Misael, and Azarias, Alfo he tooke a part of the Church treasures; but stayed not to search them throughly; for Necho hasted to the succour of Jeho jakim, hoping to find Nabucho dono for in Judæa: wherein this great Babylonian had no disposition to hazzard himselfe and his Army, it being a Country of an evill affection towards him, as also far off from any succour or sure place of retrait. If he had, asmay be supposed, any great strength of Scythian hors-men in his Army; it was the more wifely done of him, to fall backe, out of the rough, mountaine mous, and over-hot Countrey, into places that were more even and temperate. But befides all these reasons, the death of his father happening at the same time, gave him inf occasion to returne home, and take possession of his owne Kingdome; before heeproceeded further in the second care, of adding more unto it. This hee did at reasonable good leisure: for the Egyptian was not ready to follow him so farre, and to bid him Battaile, untill the new yeere came in; which was the fourth of Jehojakim, the first of Nabuchodonofor, and the last of Necho. In this yeere the Babylonian lying upon the Bank Euphrates (his owne Territory bounding it on the North-fide) attended the arrivall of Necho. There, after a resolved contention for victory, Necho was staine, and his Army remaining forced to fave it felfe; which full ill it did, by a violent retrait. This victory, Nabuchodonofor fo well pursued, as he recovered all Syria, and what soever the Egyptians held out of their proper Territory towards the North. The Egyptians being in this conflict beaten, and altogether for the present discouraged, Jehojakim held himselfquet, as being friend in heart unto the Egyptian, yet having made his peace with the Chaldean the year before; who contented with fuch profit as hee could then readily make, had forborne to lay any Tribute upon Juda. But this coole refervednesse of Jehojakim, was, on both fides, taken in ill part. The Egyptian King Plammis, who succeeded unto Neche, began to thinke upon restoring JehoahaZ, taken prisoner by his Father, and setting him up as a Domesticall Enemy, against his ungratefull brother. Against all such accidents, the Judæan had prepared the usuall remedy, practifed by his fore-fathers: forher had made his owne fonne Jechonia King with him long before, in the fecondycer of his own Reigne, when the ? by was but eight years old. As for this rumour of Jehodhal his returne; the Prophet Jeremy foretold, that it should prove idle, saying: He shallout Jerem. 22. 11. & returne thither, but be shall die in the place whither they have led him captive, and hall see this Land no more. The Egyptians indeede, having spent all their Mercenary forces, and received that heavie blow at Carchemish, had not remaining such proportion of sharpe seele, as of faire gold, which without other helpe, is of little effect. The valour of Necho was not in Pfammis Apries, who reigning after Pfammis, did once adventure to shew his face in Syria; but after a bigge looke, hee was glad to retire, without adventuring the hazzard of a battaile. Wherefore this decaying Nation fought onely with 5 brave words, telling fuch frivolous tales, as men that meane to doe nothing, use, of their glorious acts fore-paffed, against fofias & Jehoaha Z. In this case it was easie for Jehojakim to give them fatisfaction, by letting them understanding the sincerity of his affection to wards them, which appeared in time following. But Nabuchedenofor went to worke more roundly. He fent a peremptory meffage to Jehojakim, willing him not to stand upon any nice points, but acknowledge himselfe a Subject, and pay him Tribute: adding hereunto such fearefull threats, as made the poore Judean lay aside all thought of Phe rabb, and yeeld to doe, as the more mighty would have him. So bee continued in the obedience of Nabuchodonofor three years. At this time Ferent the Prophet cried out against the Jewes, putting them in minde that he had now three and twenty yeares exhorted them to repentance, but because they had stopt their eares against him, and the restof the Prophets, hee now pronounced their captivity at hand, and that they should endure the yoke of bondage full seventy yeares. The same calamity hee threatned to all theneighbouring Nations, to the Egyptians, Moabites, Ammonites, Idumæans, & the reft; foretelling that they should all drink out of the Babylonian Pitcher, the wine of his fury, whom they had forfaken; and after the feventy yeeres expired, that the Babylonians themselves should taste of the same Cup, and be utterly subverted by the Medes, & Jerem, 25. the Judgans permitted to returne againe into their owne Fields and Cities. The first imprisonment of the Prophet Jeremy seemes to have been in the fourth yeere of this Jehoideim, at which time Baruch the Scribe wrote all his Prophecies out of his mouth, whom he sent to reade them unto the People, and afterward to the Princes, who offered them with King: but fearing the Kings fury, they had first fet Jeremy at liberty, and advised him and Baruch to hide themselves.

Achorakim, after he heard a part of it & perceived the ill newes therindelivered, made no more adoe, but did cut the Booke in pieces and cast it into the fire. All which Jeremy caused to be new written with this addition; that the dead body of Jehojakim should be cast out, exposed in the day to the hear, and in the night to the frost, & there should be none of his feed to fit on the Throne of David.

Timethus running on, while Jehojakim rested secure of all danger, as Tributary to the Babylonian, yet well thought of by the Egyptian; the mighty City of Tyre opposed it felle against the Chaldean forces ; & upon just confidence of her own strength, despised all preparation that could be made against her. Now forasmuch as the terme of seventy veeres was prescribed unto the desolation, as well of Tyre, as of Jerusalem, and other townes & countries; it is apparent, that they which referre the expugnation of this City unto the nineteenth yeere of Nabuchodonofor, have fure authority for their warrant. Whereupon like wife it followes of necessity, that the fiegethereof began in the seventh of his Reigne; as having lasted thirteen yeeres.

Here I will take leave to intrude a briefe note, concerning the feverall beginnings that are reckoned of this great Prince his Rule, whereupon hath rifen much disputation. The third yeere of Jehojakim, was the last of Nabulasar, who being delivered from other cares, tooke notice of fuch as had revolted from him unto Pharao Necho, and fent this Noble Prince his sonne, with an Army into Syria, to reclaime them. In this expedition was Daniel carried away, who therefore makes mention of the same yeer. The yeer next Dan 1.10 following, being the fourth of Jehojakim, was the first of Nebuchadne Zar; which Jere-Jerem. 25. 13 my affirmeth in expresse words; and from this we reckon all his time and actions that follow. In his three and twentieth yeere he conquered Egypt; and then began to reigne as a great Monarch, finding none that durst offend him. The second from this yeere it was, wherein hee faw that vision, of the Image confisting of fundry Metals; which did prefigurate the succession of great Kingdomes, that should rule the Earth, before the comming of Christ. I will not stand to dispute about this, which is the best conclusion that I finde, of long disputations: but returne unto the siege of Tyre, which began in the leventh of his Reigne.

The City of Tyre covered all the ground of an Island, that was divided from the maine, by a deep and broad channell of the Sea. The Chaldeans had no Fleer, and were no Sea-men; the Tyrians, in multitude of goodly Ships, & skill to use them, excelled all other Nations; and every winde, from one part or other, brought needfull provisions into the City. Where fore neither force, nor famine could greatly hurt the places where ofneverthelesse the judgements of God(denounced against it by Esay, Jeremy, Exechiel) Esay 23. had threatned the destruction; and the obstinate resolution of Nabuchodonofer, had fully Ezek 16, determined to performe it. This high-minded King, impatient of relistance, undertook a valt piece of worke, even to fill up the Sea, that parted the Island from the Continent. The City of old Tyrus, that stood opposite to the new, upon the firme Land, and the mountain of Libanus near adjoyning that was loaden with Cedars, and abuildance of other trees, might furnish him with materials. Thirteene yeeres were spent in this laborrious, and almost hopelesse businesse. Which needeth not seeme strange: for Alexander working upon that foundation which was remayning of Nabuchodonofors Peere; and being withall affifted by a strong Fleet, was yet seaven moneths ere he could make war Into the City. Wherefore, if the raging of the Sea was able to carry away that where with Alex ander laboured to cover a thelve; with much more violence could it overtuin and asit were confume, the worke of Nabuchedonofer, who laid his foundations in the bottome of the deepe; striving as it were, to fill the empty belly of this Cormorant whereas the Macedonian did only stop the throat of it. Every man knowes, God could have furthered the accomplishment of his owne threats, against this place (though it had not pleased him to use, either miracle, or such of his more immediate weapons, as are Earthquakes, and the like) by making at least the Seas calme, and adding the favourable concurrence of all second helps. But so it pleaseth him oftentimes, in chastising the pride of man, to use the hand of man; even the hand of man striving, as may seem, againstall refistance of nature and fortune. So in this excessive labour of the Chaldwans, Even bead was made bald, and every shoulder was made bare. Yet Nabuchodonofor would not give over till he was mafter of the Towne.

Fud.lib.10. c.7.

When he was entred upon this desperate service; whether it were so, that somelosses received, some mutiniy in his Army, or (which is most likely; & so Josephus reports it) fome glorious rumours of the Egyptians, gave courage to his evill willers; Jehojakimie. nounced his subjection, & began to hope for the contrary of that which quickly felour. For Nabuchodone for gave him no leifure to doe much hurt: but with part of his Amy marched directly into Judæa, where the amazed King made fo little refiftance (the Egyp-10 tians having left him, as it were, in a dream) that he entred Jerusalem, and layed handson Fehojakim: whom he first bound & determined to fend to Babylon, but changing counfell, hee caused him to be slaine in the place, and gave him the Sepulchre of an Ase. to be devoured by beafts and ravenous birds, according to the former Prophecies: laving in his place, Jehojakim or Jechonias his sonne; whom, after three moneths & tendais, Nabuchodonofor removed, and fent prisoner to Babylon, with Ezekiel, Mardochaus & jefedech, the high Priest. The mother of Jechonias, together with his servants Eunuchs. and all the ablest men, and best Artificers of the Land, were also then carryed away Caprives. This Jechonias, following the counfell of Jeremy the Prophet, made novefiftance: but submitted himselfe to the Kings will: wherein hee both pleaseth God, and did that which was best for himselfe; though at the present it might seeme otherwise, to fuch as confidered the swill that befell him, rather than the greater evill that hethere by avoided. This onely particular act of his is recorded; which was good. But it fems that hee was partaker, at least of his Fathers faults, if not an instigator: which was the cause, that his submitting himselfe to Gods pleasure did not preserve his Estate : for so we reade in generall words, that he did evill in the fight of the Lord, according to all that his Father had done. In his fread Wabuchodonofor established Mathania his Uncle in the Kingdome of Juda, and called him Zedechias, which is as much to fay, as the justice of God. For like as Neco King of Egypt had formerly displaced Jeboahaz, after his Father Josias was flaine, & fet up Jehojakim, the fon of another mother; fo Nabuchodonofor flew Jehojakim, who depended on the Egyptians, and carrying his fon Jechonias Prisoner to Babel, gave T the Kingdome to this Zealchias, that was whole Brother to that Jehoaha Z, whom New tooke with him into Egypt. From Zedechias he required an oath for his faithfull obedience, which Zedechias gave him, and called the living God to witnesse in the same, that he would remaine affured to the Kings of Chaldaa.

In the first yeere of Zedechias, Fereny faw and expounded the Vision of the ripe and rotten Grapes, the one fignifying those Judæans that were carried away captive, the orher those that stayed and were destroyed.

In the fourth of Zedechias, Jeremy wrote in a booke all the evill that should fall upon Babylon, which book or scrole he gave to Sheraia, when he went with the King Zedekias to Babylon, to visit Nabuchedone for; willing him first to read it to the Captive Jewes, and then to binde it to a stone, and cast it into Euphrares, pronouncing these words: Thus Shall Babel be drowned, and shall not rife from the evill that I will bring upon her. This journie of Zedechias to Babel is probably thought to have beene in way of visitation, carrying some presents. Bur I further thinke, that he had some suite there to make, which his Lordly Master refused to grant, and sent him away discontented. For at his returne all the bordering Princes sent Messengers to him, inciting him (as it seemes) to those we quiet courses from which Jeremy dehorted both him and them. The Prophet, by Gods appointment, made bonds and yokes, one of which he wore about his own neck, others he sent unto the five Kings, of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre and Zidon, by those Messengers which came to visit Zedechias: making them know, that if they and the Kings of Juda abode in the obedience of Babylon, they should then possesse and enjoy their own counries; if not, they should affuredly perish by the sword, by fire, and by pestilence.

Healfo foretold them, that those Vessels which as yet remianed in Ferusalem, should affortavell after the rest, and at length they should be restored againe.

The same yeare Ananias, the false Prophet, tooke off the woodden Chaine which 7erem wore in figne of the Captivity of the Jewes, and brake it : Vaunting, that in like manner, after two years God would breake the strength of Babel, and the yoke which helaydon all Nations; restore Jechonias and all the Jewes, with the Vessels and riches of the Temple, and give an end to all the fe troubles. But Fereny, in stead of his woodden voke, wore a Coller of yron : and in figne that Ananias had given a deceitfull and false hone to the people, he foretold the death of this cold Prophet, which feized upon him in the second Moneth. After this, when Zedechias had wavered long enough between Faithand Passion, in the eighth yeare of his reigne he practised more seriously against Nahuchodonofor, with his Neighbours the Edomites, Ammonites, Moabites, Tyrians, and others that were promifed great aydes of the Egyptians: in confidence of whose resiflame, he determined to shake off the Babylonian yoke. He reof when Nabuchodonofor had knowledge, he marched with his Army in the dead of Winter, toward Jerusalem, and heffeged it. Jeremy perswaded Zedechias to render the City and himself; but being confident of the helpe from Egypt, and being perswaded by his Counsellors and false Prophers, that it was impossible that the Kingdome of Juda should be extirpate, untill the comming of Silo (according to the Prophecy of Jacob) he despised the words of Jeremy, Gen. 49.16 and imprisoned him. For Jeremy had told the King that the City should be taken and Jer. 32.834 bumt; that the King should not escape, but be taken prisoner, and brought to the presence of Nabuchodonofor; that he should not perish by the sword, but being carried to Babildie his naturall death.

Junfalem being the following yeare furrounded by Nabuchodonofors Armie; the King of Egypt, Pharas Hophra, according to Jeremy, (Herodotus calleth him Apries) en- Jer. 44. tredthe border of Juda with his Army to succour Zedechias, of whose revolthe had Hared that beenethe principall Author. But Jeremy gave the Jewes faithfull counsell, willing them notto have any trust in the fuccours of Egypt: for he affured them that they should retime againe, and in no fort relieve them. And it fell out accordingly. For when the Chaldeans removed from Jerusalem to encounter the Egyptians, these vaunting Patrons abandoned their enterprise, and taking Gaza in their way homeward, returned into Eapplasifthey had already done enough; leaving the poore people of Jerusalem to their destined misseries.

Inthemeane while the Jewes, who in their first extremity had manumised their Hebrin Bond-men (as Gods Law required at the year of Jubile) and made them free, there- Leviers 393 by the better to encourage them to fight; did now upon the breaking up of the Chalda- 40.66. an Army, repent them of their Charity: and thinking all had beene at an end, held Jen 34. them perforce to their former flavery. But the Chaldees being returned to the fiege, the Prophet Jeremy, when the State of Jerusalem began now to grow to extremity, counfelled Zedechias to render himselse unto them; affuring him of his owne life, and the Jer.39; fafetie of the Citie, if he would so do. But his obstinate heart conducted him to that wretchedend, which his neglect of God, and his infidelitie and perjurie, had provided for Three and twenty Moneths (as some do reckonit) or, according to Josephus, eighteen, Jer. 393 the Babylonian Army lay before Jerusalem, and held it exceeding straightly besieged. For they built Forts against it round about, or (as P. Martyr hath it) extruxerunt contra camtur - akings 25.23 remligneam per circuitum: They surrounded the Citiewith woodden Towers, so as the befieged could neither fally out, nor receive into the Citie any supply of men or vi-Chals. Is splents reports, that they over-topped the Walls with high Towers raised for Am Judition upon Mounts; from which they did so beat upon the Wall with their Engines, that the defendants were compelled to for fake their Stations. Now although it were fo that the besseged also raised Counter-buildings, like unto these, yet the great King of Babel, who commanded all the Regions there-abouts, and had the Woods and Rivers to obey him, found means to overthrow all the Citizens endeavours; and to beat down as fast from without, as they raised from within; the body and foundation of his owne workes being guarded by the Walles of Jerusalem interposed; and theirs within, layd open to their enemies disturbance. Besides, both Famine and Pessilence (which components of their enemies disturbance) are specified, both Famine and Pessilence (which components of the Jewes failed, the Chaldeans made a breach, and for number, strength, and courage of the Jewes failed, the Chaldeans made a breach, and for cing an entry, their Princes did seat themselves, as Lords of the Towne, in the middle cing an entry, their Princes did seat themselves, as Lords of the Towne, in the middle cing an entry, their Princes did seat themselves, as Lords of the Towne, in the middle cing an entry, their Princes and shis uncomfortable sight, and sinding no remedy of the danger present, lost both his courage and his hope at once; and shisted himselfe, together with his Wives, Children, Princes, and principall servants, out of the Citie, by a way to under ground; leaving his amazed and guidelesse people, to the mercilesse swords of their enemies. Thus he, who, when Jeremy the Prophet persuaded him to renderhimselse, despised both the counsell of God and the force of Nabuchodonosor; used now that remedy, which Wolphius truely termeth, Triste, turpe, & infalix: Wosull, shamefull, and unfortunate.

By this fecret subterrane vault, Zedechias making his stealth, recovered (by the helpe of the darke night) the Plaines or Desarts of Jericho: but by reason of the train that sollowed him and his (every one leading with him those whom they held most deare und them) he was easily traced and pursued. How great soever the company was that attenthem) he was easily traced and pursued. How great soever the company was that attenthem) he was easily traced and pursued. How great soever the company was that attenthem) he was easily traced and pursued. How great soever the company was that attenthem) he was easily traced and pursued, but they all abandoned his defence, and shifted sooner beheld the Gbaldeans approach, but they all abandoned his defence, and shifted themselves into the Desarts as they could. For whom God had forsaken, no man followed, but the ministers of his vengeance; by whom Zedechias being made Prisoner, with his Children and Princes, he was conveyed to Rebla or Reblath, a City (as somethink) of Nephtalim, where Nabuchodonosor then lay, as a place indifferent between Jerusalmand Tyre, with both which at once he had to doe.

Now after Nabuchodono for had layd before Zedechias the many graces and benefits conferred upon him, together with the notable falshood and perjury, wherewith he had required them; he commanded his Children, Princes and Friends to be flaine before his face. This being done, to the end that so lamentable a spectacle should bee the last that e 30 ver he should behold in the World, he caused his eyes to be torne out of his head, and so carried him in a slavish manner to Babel, where he consumed the rest of his wretched life in perpetual limprisonment. Herein this most marvellous Prophecy of Ezechiel wasperformed; Adducameum in Babyloniam, Sipsam non videbit: I will bring him into Babylon, and he shall not see it.

Thus in the eleventh and last year of Zedechias, which was the eighteenth of Nature chodonofor, the Chaldeans entred the City by force, where sparing no sexe nor age, they committed all to the sword that they therein sound.

In the year nex following, Nabu Zaradan Generall of the Army, burnt the Kings Palace, and the rest of Jerusalem: and after this fire had lasted from the seventh to the tenth 40 day, he also burnt the Temple of God to the ground, when it had stood source hundred thirty and one years.

After this, upon a fecond fearch, Nabu Zaradan (not yet fatiated with bloud) commanded seventy and two others to be slaughtered, which had hidden themselves from the first fury, to wit, the chiefe and the second Priest, two Commanders of Zedechias his men of Warre, five of his House-hold servants, and others to that number; carrying away to Babylon the ablest of the people throughout all Judan; and leaving the poorest labouring soules, with some that followed the party of Nabuchodonofor, to till the ground: over whom he left Governour, Godolia the Nephew of that Saphan, whom Josias had formerly employed in the reformation of Religion, who is, for his justice and equity, by Josephus highly commended. This man, a Jew by Nation, left Zedubias, as it seemeth, in the beginning of the Warre : and by Jeremies defire to live with him, it appeareth that he had embraced the same advice which the Prophet gave unto Zddechias; which was, to submit himselfe altogether to the Babylonian; who being ordained by God to exercise his justice, was therefore resistlesse. The Prophet Jeremy being left to his own choice, either to live in Chaldaa or elsewhere, he made election of Godolists to whom he was recommended; who not only embraced Jeremy, but gave comfort to all the other Jewes that were left under his charge, promising them favour & liberty, folong as they remained obedient subjects to Nabuchodonosor, by whom he was establified Provinciall Governour of his owne Nation.

But ere that year was expired, a Prince of the late Kings house (who during the siege of firulatem, had kept himself our of the storme, with Baalis King of the Ammonites) being followed by tenother chosen men, while Godoliah feasted them in Malpha or Mirspa, the City of his residence, trayterously slew him, together with divers Chaldrans and Janus that accompanied him. This done, he made an escape, and in his way encountring with eighty persons, repairing towards Godoliah with presents, he slew the most of them; and spared the rest, because they promised to discover unto him some Treasures hidden in the fields during the war. He also took with him a Daughter of Zedechias, committed to the care of Godoliah by Nabuchodopofor. This practice and intent of Ismael had beene somety discovered unto Godoliah by Jehanan, one of the Leaders of the sew remaining that; but Godoliah was incredulous.

Judea being now left without a Governour (for Ismael durst not take it upon him, but refred himselfe, or rather fled as fast as he could to the Ammonites) the residue of the Jewes, searing the revenge of the Chaldeans, resolved to slye away into Egypt, and besought Jeremy to aske counsell of God for them: who readily made them answer, that if they senialed in Judea, God would provide for them, and shew them mercy; but if they sought to save themselves in Egypt, that they should then undoubtedly perishing they sought to save themselves in Egypt, that they should then undoubtedly perishing they sought to save themselves in Egypt, and their determination; and despising the Oracleof God, and constraining Jeremy and Barneth to accompany them, they travelled into Egypt, and inhabited by the permission of Pharas, neare unto Taphnes: where when Jeremy often reprehended them for their Idolatry, foretelling both the de-ffruction of themselves, and the Egyptians also, hee was by these his owne hard-hearted and ungratefull Country-men, stoned to death; and by the Egyptians, who greatly reverenced him, buried neare the Sepulchre of their own Kings.

THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORIE OF THE VV or LD:

Intreating of the Times from the destruction of Jerusalem. to the time of PHILIP of MACEDON.

THE THIRD BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

Of the time passing between the destruction of Jerusalem, and the fall of the Affyrian Empire.

Of the connexion of facred and prophane Historie.

HE course of Time, which in profune Historiesmight rather be discerned through the greatest part of his way, hirherto passed in some out-worne foot-steps, thaninany beaten path, having once in Greece by the Olympiads, & in the Easterne countries by the accompt from Nabe-40 nassar, left furer marks, & more appliable to actions concurrent, than were the war of Troy, or any other token of former date; begins at length in the ruine of Jerusalem to discover the connexion of antiquity fore-spent, with the story of succeeding ages. Manifest it is that the original and progresse of things could ill be sought in those that were ignorant of the first creation: as likewise that the affaires of Kingdomes and Empire afterwards growne up, are not to be found among those that have now no state nor policy remaining of their own. Having therefore purfued the flory of the World unto that age, from whence the memory of succeeding ace cidents is with little interruption of fabulous discourse derived unto us, I hold it now convenient briefly to shew by what means & circumstances the History of the Hebrews, which of all other is the most ancient, may bee conjoyned with the following times, wherein that Image of fundry mettals, discovered by Godunto Nebuchadne Zar, did reigne over the earth, when Ifrael was either none, or an unregarded Nation.

Herein I doe not hold it needfull to infift upon those authorities which give, as it were by heare-say, a certaine year of some old Assyrian King unto some action or event, whereof the time is found expressed in Scripture: for together with the end of Ninus his line in Sardanapalus, if not before, all fuch computations were blotted out; the fucceffion of Belochus & his iffue that occupied the kingdome afterwards, depending upon the uncertaine relations of fuch as were neither constant in affigning the years of his beginning, flor of credit enough for others to rely eupon. Let it therefore suffice that the conlent and harmony which some have found in the years of those over-worne Monarchs. dothpreserve their names, which otherwise might have been forgotten. Now concerning the later Kings of that Nation, howsoever it be true that we finde the names of all or most of them in Scriptures, which are recorded by prophane Historians, yet here-by could we only learne in what age each of them lived, but not in what year his reigne begin or ended, were it not that the reigne of Nabuchadne Zar is more precisely applyed to the times of Jehojakim and Zedechia. Hence have we the first light whereby to difcover the meanes of connecting the facred and prophane Histories. For under Nabuchadue X ar was the beginning of the captivity of Juda, which ended when 70. yeares were expired; and these 70. years took end at the first of Cyrus, whose time being well knowne, affords us meanes of looking back into the ages past, and forwards into the race ofmen succeeding. The first yeare of Cyrus his reigne in Persia, by generall consent, is iovned with the first yeare of the 55.01/mpiad, where, that he reigned three and twentwieares before his Monarchy, and seven years afterwards, it is apparent, and almost ont of controver fie. Giving therefore four hundred and eight yeares unto the distance between the fall of Troy, and the instauration of the Olympiads by Iphitus; we may easily arrive unto those antiquities of Greece, which were not meerly fabulous. As for Princes mling the whilest in sundry parts of the world, S. Augustine and others may be trusted in fetting down their times, which they had by Tradition from Authors of well-approved faith and industry.

From Cyrus forwards, how the times are reckoned unto Alexander, and from him to the battell of Actium, it were (peradventure) in this place impertinent to fee downe. But ieeing that the beginning and end of the Babylonian captivity are marks whereby we are chiefly directed, in passing from the first unto the latest years of the world through any thory, with least interruption; it is very expedient that wee take some paines to informe or felvestruly of the 70. years during which it continued, even from Nabushadnexarunto Cyrus.

6. II.

Abinferehearfall of two opinions touching the beginning of the captivity: with an answer to the cavils of Porphyrie. inverghing against S. Matthew and Daniel, upon whom the later of the seopinions is founded.

Any Commentators, and other Historians and Chronologers finde that the Captivity then began when Jechonius was carried prisoner into Babylon, eleven years before the final destruction of Jerusalem under Zedechias. This they prove om of divers places in Ezechiel, especially out of the fourteenth chapter, where he makes aplaine distinction betweene the beginning of the Captivity, and utter destruction of Jetofalem by Nabuzaradan, in these words: In the five and twentieth yeare of our being Execherous "Captivitie, in the beginning of the yeare, in the tenth day of the moneth, in the fourteenth c.3.v.II.& 15. start after that the Citie was smitten. In which words hee beginneth the captivity in plaine termes, eleven years before the City was destroyed. Beroaldus is of opinion that itheganinthe first of Nabuchodorofor, and the fourth of Joakim; which he endeavours to prove out of the second of Chronicles, but more especially out of Saint Matthew, and Daniel, whose words afford matter of disputation, but serve not to make good so much as Berealdus would enforce. That place of S. Maithen, and the whole booke of Daniel have ministred occasion of scoffing and railing at the Christian Religion to that wretched man Perphyrie, who, not understanding how the sonnes of King Josias were called by diversnames, as Epiphanius hath shewed at large, thought that the Apostlehad spoken he knew not what in reckoning the fonnes, or, according to some Translations, the Some and Nephewes of that good King, begotten about the time of the Captivity. Upon Daniel also the same Porphyrie doth spend the twelfth of his malicious bookes written against the Christians, affirming, that these prophecies and visions remembred by Daniel, were written long after his death, and at, or neare the time of Amischus Epiphanes. This fond supposition of his Eusebius, Apollomius, and others, have sufficiently answered. For the seventy Interpreters, who converted the old Testament about an hundred yeares before Epiphanes, did also turne this booke of Daniel out of Hebrew into Greeke, as a part of Scripture received. And were there no other argument to consound Porphyrie, than that of Alexander Macedon, it were sufficient, who lived divers yeares before Antiochus Epiphanes. For Jaddus the high Priest shewed that great Conquerour, when he came towards Jernsalem to have destroyed it, this booke of Daniel, wherein he beheld his owne glory foretold, as the same was plainly expounded unto him; which not only stayed his hand from the harme of that City and people, but his assurance and resolution was so confirmed and strengthened thereby, as as despissing all future perill and resistance, hee conquered Darius, and the Easterne Empire in a shorter time than Nabuchodonosor had done one City, to wit, Tyre in Phanicia.

It is true indeed that the Jewesthernselves give lesse authority to Daniel, thanto Ma. fes and the Prophets, accompting his booke among those which they call Cetaphin, or Hagiographa, or holy Writings, which they fay Efdras and the Seniors of the Synagogue compiled after their returne from Babylon. But first, that the booke of Daniel (Imean fo much as is found in the Hebrew) is Canonicall: fecondly, that it was written by Daniel himselfe, and not by Esdras and the Seniors, we may assure our selves by testimony of Councels and Fathers. For in the Councell of Landicas held about the year of our Lord in 368. after the death of Jovinian the Emperour, and after the Nicene Councell three and forty yeares, this booke of Daniel was received, verified and confirmed among the other Canonicall Scriptures, as in the Epitomy of the fame Councell it may be seene; and to doth Meliton the most ancient Bishop of Sardis number it, witnesse Eusebins in his Ecclefiafticall History, the fourth booke, and five and twentieth chapter: fodoth the fame Author in the Catalogue of Canonicall books upon Origen: fo doth Hilariu in his Preface upon the Pfalmes and Epiphanius in his book of Weights and Measures, &c. To thefe I may adde Saint Hierome, Gregorie Nazianzene, and others. For the Hagiographa books or holy Writings, the Jewes and Rabbines reckon to be these, Daniel, Pfalms, Proverbs, 70b, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclefiaftes, Hester, Efra, Nehemia, and the Chre- 20 nicles. And that it was Daniel, and not Eldras, that wrote this booke, Gods commandement unto him by his Angell, to feale up the fame to the time appointed, is an unanfiwrable testimony. Yea, that which exceedethall strength of other proofe, our Saviour Christ, who citeth no Apocry phall Scripture, in Matthew & Mark alledgeth Daniel the Prophet, to wit, the last verse of his ninth chapter. Further, in the fifth of 70hn, Christ distribute the risen from the dead as in Daniel the twelfth, verse the second. Saint Paul describeth Antichrift out of Daniel, and the Revelation is wholly an interpretaion of Daniels visions.

§. II I.

That the 70. years of captivity are to be numbred from the destruction of Jerusalem; not from the migration of Jechonia.

Aving thus farre digreffed in maintaining that authority which must often bee cited in the present argument, it is now convenient, that we returne unto the differences of opinion concerning the beginning of these 70. yeares. Neither will I stand to trouble my selfe and others with laying open the grounds or weakensse of that which Eusebius and some sew namelesse. Authors have sometimes held in this point, which is lately revived by Beroaldus; but will forth-with enter into consideration 50 of that opinion, which many both ancient and late Writers have so earnessly maintained, that it wants not much of being common.

Foure Kings of Juda were carried away captives to Babylon: First, Manassisten Jehojakim, and with him among others, Daniel the Prophet: thirdly, Jeconias, and with him Executed: lastly, Zedechias, at which time the city & temple were destroyed. To the first of these captivities the beginning of the 70. yeares is referred by none that I have read; to the second, by few and with weak proofe; to the third, by very many and with much considence. For besides those places of Executed already cited, there is a strong argument gathered out of Jeremy, which may feeme to make the matter plaine. For the Prophet in comforting the people that were carried away with Jechopias, useth these words: Thus suit the Lord, After 70. years be accomplished at Babel, I will visit you, and perform my good Jec. 29, 10. promise towards you, and cause you to return to this place.

But it stands indeed with little reason that we should seeke the interpretation of a prophecy out of circumstances, when the prophecy is such as doth sufficiently expound it felfe. Jeremy hath already, in the fourth yeare of Jehojakim, denounced the judgement of God against the Land, for the sinnes and impenitency of that obstinate people, in these words: Behold, I will fend and take to me all the families of the North, faiththe Lord, Jer, 29, ver, 16, and Nebuchadne Zar the King of Babel, my fervant; and will bring them against this Land, 17.05 18. 10 and wainft the Inhabitants thereof, and against all these Nations round about, and I will delive them, and make them an afton shment, and an hi fing, and a continual defolation. Moreour. I will take from them the voyce of mirth, and the voyce of gladneffe, the voyce of the Bridgeroome, and the voyce of the Bride, the noy se of the mil stones, and the light of the candle and this whole Land shall be desolate, and an astonishment, and these Nations shall serve the King of Babel 70 yeares. And when 70. yeares are expired. I will visit the King of Babel. Herewe see prescribed unto the captivity the terme of 70. yeares, which were to commence, neither when the prophecy was uttered; nor when 7ehojakim, who then reigned. was taken by Nebuchadne Zar; nor yet in the time of Jechonia; but with the utter defolation of the City, whereof Jeremy did againe give notice to those that were already in 20 Balelon, at fuch time as he fent them the comfort of deliverance before rehearfed. And fodid the people understand this prophecy, in those times when they saw it accomplihad beginning the 70 yeares at the time of the defolation, as manifefully appeares in the end of the History of Juda, where it is faid thus: They burm the house of God, and brake downs the wall of Jerusalem, and burns all the Palaces thereof with fire, and all the precious 2 Chro. 36.19. veffels thereof to deftroy all : And they that were left by the sword carried he away to Babel, andthey were fervants to him and to his sonnes, untill the kingdome of the Persans hadrule. tofulfill the word of the Lord by the mouth of Jeremia, untill the Land had her fill of her Sabbathi: for all the dayes that the lay defolate, thee kept Subbath, to fulfill 70. yeares. But in the first yeare of Cyrus King of Persia (when the word of the Lord, Token by the mouth of Jere-30 mia, was finished) the Lord stirred up the spirit of Cyrus. We seldome finde one piece of Scripture so precisely and plainely expounded by another, as in this prophecy, to have afterwards beene the subject of altercation. For one can hardly devise how either the delolation could have been expressed more sensibly than it was by the Prophet, or the event of the prophecy have been more exactly fet downe, than it was in the place now last of all cited. If it be requisite that we bring more proofe in so evident a case, the ninth Chapter of Daniel yeelds testimony sufficient, unto this expedition of Jeremia his prophecy, that Jerusalem was to lye waste 70. yeares. For in the first yeare of Darius the Mede, which was the last of the 70. Daniel obtained of God the deliverance that had been promised by prayer, which he made upon consideration of the time that was expired: as he telleth in these words: In the first years of his reigne, I Daniel understood by Dan. 9, 20] bookes the number of the yeares whereof the Lord had spoken unto Jeremialithe Prophet, that he would accomplish 70 years in the desolation of Jerusalem. So that how soever the time of Daniel his owne captivity be reckoned from the taking of Jehojakim, and that the people carryed away with Jeconia, did accompt, as well they might, the years of their owne aprivity; yet with the generall desolation of the Country, wherein were sew or none of the Ifraelites left remaining to inhabite, began in the nineteenth yeare of Nabuchodo-Mir the great captivity, which by Gods appointment continued unto the end of leventy yeares.

This I will not further feek to prove, by the authority of Josephus and others affirming the lame; for a finished as that which already hath been produced, is enough to latisfie any manthat bath not fully determined to hold the contrary.

Sundry opinions of the Kings which reigned in Babylon during the 70. years.

Hat Kings reigned in Babylan, during these seventy years of the Captivity, & how long each of them did wear the Diademe, it is a matter of no great importance to know, for a finuch as neither their acts were notable in the age wherein they lived, nor the length of their reignes, any way helpfull to the concor. Xenople, cyroped, dance of times, foregoing or facceeding. The conquests recounted by Xenophon of Syria. Arabia (or rather some part of it) Hyrcania, Battria, & perhaps of some other Countries, 10 may seeme fruits of the victories obtained by Nebuchadnezzar the Great (or by some of his Ancestors) in the former part of his life, before he betooke himselfe to ease, and m the sumptuous building of his great Babel, for the house of his Kingdome, and for the honour of his Majesty, where it may seeme that hee and his Heires kept a great state. and did very little. The idle behaviour of the Affyrian Souldiers, in such skirmishes as afterwards they had with the Medes, doth argueno lesse. For whereas under Nabuchad. neggar, they were fo front and industrious, that (to omit other proofes) they attemp. ted, and finished that hardy piece of worke, of winning the strong City of Tyre, by joyning unto it the continent, filling up the deepeand broad channell of the Sea, dividing it from the maine with a mole or piece of earth, and other matter; the reparation whereof when the Sea had washed it away, was the very greatest of Alexander. workes: in the times following, they became timerous, that they durft not approach nearer to the enemy than their bowes would carry, but were ready to turne their backs! as fooneas any though inferiour in numbers, adventuring within the diftance offered to charge them.

Xenoph. Cyroped. 1.1.0-1.3.

Now as their actions from the end of Nabuchadne Z ars warres, till the ruine of their Empire, were not worthy to be recorded; so was the diffinction of their times, and reigne of their severall Kings, unworthy of the great labourthat hath in vaine been taken in that busine sie. For when it is granted, that the captivity of Juda, ending with that Empire, lasted 70. yeares, we may as reasonably forbeare to search into the particular 20 continuance of two or three flothfull Kings, as we are contented to be ignorant of the ges of the Patriarchs, and their children living in the Egyptians servitude; resting satisfied in both with the generall affured fumme.

Yet forasinuch as many have travelled in this businesse, upon desire (as Itakeit) to approve the beginning and end of the 70. years, not only by the reigns of other Princes, ruling elsewhere, but by the times of the Assyrians themselves: I will not refuse to taken little paines in collecting their opinions, and shewing what I thinke may best be held for likely, if the certaine truth cannot be found.

The opinions are many, and greatly repugnant, both in recounting the Kings themfelves, and in fetting downe the years of their feverall reignes. The first (as I take it) the 40 furest, is theirs, who meerely follow the authority of the Scriptures, without borrowing any helpe from others. These name onely three Kings, Nabuchadne Zar, Evilmerodach, and Balthafar. Neither have they only the filence of Daniel, who names noneother to be their warrant, but the prophecy of Jeremy precisely, and in a manner purposely teaching the very same. For God, by the mouth of that Prophet, shewing that he being absolute Lord of all, would dispose of all according to his owne will, and mag king it known that he had put some Countries here named, into the hands of the King of Babel, faith thus : And all Nations shall serve him, and his Sonne, and his Sonnes Soune, until the very time of his land come also : then many Nations and great kings [hall serve themselves of him. These words expressing the continuance of the Chaldean Empire, and number of 50 the Kings will hardly be qualified with any distinction. But indeed I finde nootherned ceffity of qualification to be used herein, than such as may grow out of mens desire to reconcile the Scriptures unto profane Authors. And this defire were not unjust, if the consent of all histories were on the one fide, and the letter of the holy Text were single on the other fide.

But contrariwife, the Authors which are cited in this case, are so repugnant one to the other, & the proofes of their different reports are so slender & unsufficient, that the succession of these Princes, had it not bin thus delivered in Scriptures, but only set down by some Author of equall credit with the rest, might very well have found and deserved as good beliefe, as any of those things which they have delivered in this point. For some there are, who following Josephus, derive that Empire, as by descent, from father to son, through five generations; beginning with Nabuchodonosor the great, and giving to him 43. yeares; to Evilmerodach 18. to Niglifar the fon of Evilmerodach, 40. to Labofardach the son of Niglisar 9 moneths, and lastly, to Balthasar (whom Josephus intimates to be ofthe race of Nabuchodonosor, without naming his father) 17. yeares. And this opinion (fave that he forbeares to reckon the yeares, and plainely calls Balthafar the fonne of on (art Labofardach) Saint Hierome doth follow, alledging Berofus and Josephus as a sectator of Beofus, for his Authors; though Berofus, as he is cited by Jof phus, report the matter far 10 otherwise. For he tels us that Evilmerodach the sonne of Nabuchodonosor did reigne but Joseph. 1. two yeares, being for his wickednesseand lust, staine by his fisters husband Niziglassor who occupied the kingdome after him foure yeares, and left it to his owne forme Labofardach; who being an ill-conditioned boy, was at the end of nine moneths slaine by fuch as were about him, and the kingdome given to one Nabonidus, who held it by the election of the Conspirators, and left it unto Cyrus after 17-yeares. This relation illagrees with that of Josephus, and both of them as bad with the Scriptures, in number either of yeares, or of generations; yet the particularities which they handle, have procuredunto them some authority, so that the names which they have inserted, are taken as it were upon truft. There is a third opinion which makes the three last Kings brethren, and formes of Evilmerodach; and this may well enough agree with the Scripture: though I had rather beleeve Xenophon, who faith that the last King of Babylon was immediate succellour to his father. But whereas the Author of the Scholasticall History, who is founderofthis opinion, placeth between him that took Jerusalem, and Evilmerodach, another Nabuchodonofor : plaine enough it is that he hath, out of any History facred or profane, aslinle warrant to guide him, as we have reason to follow him. Eusebius, Sulptius, Severus and Theodores, upon better ground have supposed, that Evilmerodach and Balthasar werebrethren and sonnes of the great Nabucho dono for. This is built on the fifth Chapter of Daniel, wherein Balthafar (for of Evilmerodach there is none that ever doubted) is ofe tencalled Nabuchodonofor his fonne. And fo common grewthis explication, that S. Hieromecalled it the vulgar opinion. But the place of Jeremy before cited, proves that Balthasar was not the son indeed, but the grand-childe of that great Conqueror, though by thephrase very common in Scriptures, and familiar in those Eaestrne languages, he was called the fon-

Anniushis Metasthenes hits very rightly the seventy years of captivity, giving to Nabuchedonofor 45. yeares, to Evilmerodach 30. yeares, and to the three fons of Evilmeroduch, Nephewes of Nabuchodonofor, fourteen years; that is, to Reg-Affar the eldeft fon, three yeares, to Lab-Affar Dach the second some, fixe yeares, and to Balshafar the third fonne, five.

Tothis accompt agreeing with the Scriptures, both in the whole summe of yeares, and in the number of generations, I have formerine subscribed, as not daring to reject an appearance of truth, upon no greater reason than because the Author was of Annius his dition. Yet could I not satisfie my selfe herein; both for that none of the Ancient, and fewfuch of the moderne Writers as deserve to be regarded, have consented with this Metafhenes; and forthat in making Balthafar fucceed unto his brother in the kingdome, and not unto his father, he is wholly against Xenophon, whose History of the elder Cyrus inhis Assertian warre I cannot flightly value in many respects, and especially because it is very agreeable to the Scriptures, in the taking of Babylon, while the king was at his drun-

Seeking therefore diligently into all circumstances that might give any light in this obscurity, I found manifest proofe, that the time allotted unto Balthasar by Annius his Dan. 8:1. 6 27. Menefibenes, was farre short of the truth, which is enough to render all suspected that he hathsaidin distributing what part of the 70. yeares he pleased amongst the rest. For in thethird yeare of Balthafar, Daniel faw a vision, after which he was sicke certain dayes, but when he rose up, he did the Kings businesse: from which businesse, that he did afterwards withdraw himselfe, and live retired, solong, that he was forgotten in the Court, it appeares plainly, both by the many words which the old Queene used to set out his sufficiency, and by the Kings asking of him, when he came into his prefence, whether he Danselly 13, were Daniel. Now to think that a man of fuch account and place as Daniel had held, could in two yeares have been worne out of remembrance, were in my judgementa ve ry strange conceit, which rather than I would entertaine, I can well be contented to think the whole story (thus related) a part of Annius his impostures.

Out of these reports of Josephus, Berosus, and others, many new opinions are framed, by conjectures of late Writers. For the endurance of the captivity being 70. yeares, and these years extending unto the first of Cyrus, in which course of time Nabuchadnezzar, his fon and grand-child, must have reigned; it hath seemed needfull to supply the years of these three descents, by inserting some, whose reignes might fill up the whole continu ance of the captivity; with which the time allotted by Berofus and others, to Evilmero. 10 dach and Balthafar, joyned unto the yeares following the nineteen of Nabuchadnez ar, (wherein Jerusalem was laid desolate) are nothing even. Therefore Mercator and others following him, fashion the yeares of Evilmerodachin this fort. They fay, that the 18. yeares given to him by Josephus in the tenth of his Antiquities, should be read and numbred 28. years, and the two years that Berofus hath allowed to Evilmerodach should be written 23 in the first number the figure of(1) is mistaken for the figure of (2.) and in the latter there should have bin added the figure of (3) to that of (2.) this granted (to wir) that Evilmerodach reigned 28. years, whereof five together with his father, and 23. after his death, and the fame number of 23. added to the 25. which Nabuchodonofor lived after the destruction of Jerufalem, make 48. then 4. years of 10 Nightfar according to Berofus, 9. moneths of Labaffardach his fon, and 17. years of Lab. nidus or Balthafar, make up the number of 70. years to the first of Cyrus. But whether by errour in figures, or in words, the numbers be utterly miltaken in all copies extant supon how weake a foundation do they build, who having nothing to help them, fave onely the bare names of two unknown Kings, found in authors manifeftly corrupted, and fuch as if they had been entirely extant, were not worthy to have that place of Jeremy called into dispute, in regard of their authority ?

A more particular examination of one opinion touching the number persons, and reigns of the 3 Babylonian Kings.

Ther suppositions, little different in substance from this of Mercator, I purpokly forbeare to rehearfe, as falling under the fame answer. That of Joseph Sea-Viger I may not forget, as deserving to be confidered apart from the rest. Hee gives to Nabuchadne Zar 44. years, to Evilmerodach two, to Belfazer five : and to Nabo. nidus 17. So that from the 19.0f Nabuchadnezzar, in which Jerufalem was destroyed; unto the time of Cyrus, he accounteth only 59 years; beginning (as many do) the captivity 11. years sooner from the transportation of Jechonia. But hereof enough hathbin said already. That which we are now to confider, is his distribution of the time running between the 19.0f Nabuchadne 73 ar, and the fall of the Caldaan Empire: wherein if he have erred, then is all further inquisition frivolous.

Concerning the length of Nabuchadne ZZar reigne, I shall hereafter upon better occasson deliver my opinion. The time which he gives to Evilmerodach is very short, and more precisely agreeing with Berofus than with the Scriptures. For we findein Jaim, that this Evilmerodach in the first of his reign, shewing all favour to Jechonia, did, among other things, take order for him at his table; and that he did continually eat bread before him all the dayes of his life. His portion was a continuall portion given him of the King of Babel, every day a certaine, all the dayes of his life untill he died. The very found of these words (which is more to be esteemed than the authority of Berosus, were he per feetly extant) imports a farre longer time than two yeares, wherein Jechonia, under this gentle Prince, enjoyed the comfort fent by God, whole commandement he had obeyed in youlding himselfe to Nabuchadne Zar. Indeed how long Jechonia did live, it dame be proved; but plaine it is hereby, that all his remaining dayes he did ear bread before this King. Now that he lived not fo short a while after this as 2. yeares, it is more than likely; for he was but 55. yeares old when hewas fet at liberty. having bin 37. years in the prison, whereinto he was cast at the age of 18. yeares ; after which time it penes plaine that he begat Salathiel, as well by the age of Emebalel, who is faid to have been but a young man, and one of Darius his Pages threescore years after this, as by other circumstances of his imprisonment it selfe.

Of Belfazer, to whom Scaliger gives the next five years, naming him also Laborofoar. dech, I should wonder why he cals him Nebuchadne Z ars daughters son, were it not that herein I find him very carefull to help out Berofus, by thifting in his Niriglessor, as hufband to Nebuchadne Zars daughter, and Protector of his son foure of these years ; bv which means there remaines about one year to BelfaZer alone, agreeing nearly with the nine moneths affigned by Berofus to the sonne of Niglifar. But Jeremy hath told us that it was to Nebuchadne Zzar, and to his fon, and to his fons fon (not to his daughters fon) that the Empire was promifed: which difficulty, if Scaliger could not help, it was well done of him to passe it over with silence.

Nabonidus the last of these, whom others (desirous to reconcile Berosus to the Scripnues have judged to be all one with Balthafar, is by Scaliger thought to be Darius of the Medis. But herein Scaliger is no firme Berofian. for Berofius makes him of the fame stock or race, a Babylonian. I speake not this to difference the travell of that most learned man for thighly commends his diligence and judgement, that he was not fo wedded to anv author, as affected with the love of truth) but to shew that he himselfe, having in some points disliked those Writers, whom in generall he approveth, might with greater reafon have wholly reformed them by the Scriprures, wherin can be no error. Two things there are which chiefly did breed or confirme this opinion in Scaliger, that he whom Berosuscals Nabonidus, was the same whom Daniel had called Darius of the Medes: First. the phrase of Scripture, which signifies unto us, that Darius took the Kingdome, not saying that he wanne it by force of armes : Secondly, a fragment of Megasthenes found in Englisus, wherein this Nabonidus is called the Median. Touching the word of the Origimillor of the Greek translation, which expressing no force of armes, doth only signific that Darrus took or received the Kingdome; I fee no reason why we should thereupon inferresthat the next King entred by Election : feeing Daniel relateth nor the meanes and circumstances of Balthafars death, but onely the swift accomplishment of his owne prophecy. Neither could it indeed have properly been faid (if Daniel had cared to use the most expressive termes) that Darius of the Medes, breaking into the City, did winne the Kinedome; feeing this was performed by Cyrus in the absence of Darius, though by his forces, and to his use. Now concerning the fragment of Megasthenes, true it is, that in Eustbius his works printed at Basile, in the yeare 1559. I finde onely thus much of Megashines, cited out of Alpheeus; That Nabuchodonofor was more valiant than Hercules; thathe subdued all Lybia, and the rest of Asia, as far as to the Armenians; and that, as the Chaldeans report, being returned into his kingdome, and rapt with a divine fury, he cryed with a loud voyce : O Babylonians, I foresell ye of a great salamity that shall come upon Jouwhich neither Bel, nor any of the gods shall avert : There will come a Persian, halfe an Affestat shall bring flavery upon yee: and that, this and the like when he had spoken, he vanished. Of all this I believe little or nothing, faving that Nabuchodonosor knew beforehand, that his Empire should be translated, as Daniel had foretold, from the golden head, to the filver breast. But that he wanne all Affrica or Lybia, I doc hold it neither true nor probable.

If Scaligers copy of Eusebius were the more perfect, out of which Megasthenes tells us that Nabuchodonofor wanne both Affrick and Spaine, I beleeve the fragment so much the leffe: and am as little moved with the authority of it, where it calls a Median the pride and confidence of the Affyrians; as where it tels of Nebuchadne 77 ar his owne vanishing away. Indeed that same title of halfe an Asse, by which he calleth Cyrus, makes me to appet the fable, as cunningly forged out of Apollo his Oracle, wherein he termeth hima Mule, because his parentage was more noble on the mothers side than on the fathers; as Males are begotten by Affes upon Mares. And thus much in answer of the two Principall foundations whereon this opinion is built. As for the concinnity and coherence which it had within it selfe, I easily allow it. But this proves nothing; for meere fi-Clions have not wanted these commendations: neither can any man believe that one so Judicious, industrious, and deeply learned as Joseph Scaliger, would overshoot himselfe, in letting downerepugnancies.

It now remaineth to examine the agreement of this with the Scriptures, from which there is no appeale. And herein it feems that Scaliger, well knowing his own fufficiency, hath beene little carefull to fatisfie menthat would frame Arguments against him. For if the prophecy of Daniel were true, that the Kingdome of Balthafar was divided, and given to the Medes and Persians, either we must thinke that Darins of the Medes was not Nabonidus, or else we must bethinke our selves what Persian it might be that shared the Kingdome with him. For it is not more certaine that Balthafar loft his life and King. dome, than that his Kingdome was divided and given to the Medes and Persians. Nei ther did the Medes and Persians fall out and fight for it, as by supposing Nabonidusto have been Darius, they should be thought to have done; but these two Nations did compound the body of that Empire, and were accounted as Lords over all the subject Provinces, infomuch that the Greek Historians did commonly call those Warres which Darius, and after him Xerxes, made upon Greece, The Warres of the Medes. Yeato cleare this point, even Daniel himselfe resembles that King, with whom Alexander fought, unto a Ramme with two hornes, calling him the King of the Medes and Per. Gans. Wherefore the whole Nation of Chronelogers were not to have beene condemned by Folep's Scaliger, for maintaining upon fuch good grounds, that Darius of the Medes was partner with Cyrus in his victories, and not a Chaldean King by him fibdued. Neither was Josephus to be the leffe regarded, for affirming that Balthafar wasde. stroyed by Darius of the Medes, and his Nephew Cyrus, though herein he varied from Berefus and others, whose authority elsewhere he gladly citeth. For Josephus had notes fonto beleeve any mans faith or knowledge of those times half so wel as Daniels, whom to I beleeve that he understood as farre as was needfull in this case. Lawfullit was forhim to alledge all Authors that had any mention, though unperfect, of the same things that were contained in the writings of the Jewes, to whose Histories thereby he procuredreputation in the Romane world, where they were strangers, and might seeme fabulous. E. venso doe Eusebius and other Writers willingly embrace the testimonies of Heathen bookes making for the truth in some particulars; yet will they not therefore between generall by the felfe same Ethnicke Philosophers, but leave them where they are against the truth; as Josephus in this case hath left Berofus. And thus much I thought it mento fay of Scaligers opinion in this point; holding neverthelesse indue regard his learning and judgement, which if in some things it had not failed, the miracle had then bent to very great.

The third Booke of the first part

6. V I.

What may bee held as probable of the Persons and Times of Nabuchodonosor his suceffors.

T now remaines that I freely acknowledge mine owne weakenesse, who cannot find how the 70. years of captivity are to be divided among them which reigned in Bay. I finde that the distribution made of them, in such wise as already ister hearfed, be ill agreeable to the holy Scriptures. Wherefore I may truely fay with furreus, that we ought liberally to pardon those whose feet have failed them in the slippery waies of Chronology, wherein both learning and diligence are subject to take a fall atome time or other, by ignorance, forgetfulnesse, or heedlesse reckoning. Yet will I advenute to deliver my opinion, wherein the judgement of Lyra and others (holding tholeonly to have reigned over the Chald cans, whose names are found in the Scriptures) appears more conformable to reason and account of time, than any of the other Sentences of Conjectures before rehearfed. Not that I will take upon me to defend Lyra his Conje-Ctures, when he supposeth by Niglifar and Labosardach to be meant the same persons which are called in Scriptures Evilmerodach and Balthafar (for this can by no goodco lour be maintained) but only to shew that the Kings by him cited, are likely to have occupied the whole time of seventy years. First therefore let us consider the reigneof Na buchadnezzar, in whose eighteenth yeare Jernsalem was taken and sackt, but in his nine teenth laid utterly desolate.

Most of Writers have given to him 43. years of reigne, following therein Berofin There are who have added one yeare more; and forme have made it up 45. To dispute about the certainty were needlesse: for in shewing by what length of time the Scrip tures measure him, we shall shew the certaine truth.

Manifest it is, that the 19. year of Nebuchadne Zar, is joyned with the 11. of Zedechia; 2King 25. 8. Manuel this eighth yeer, was the first yeere of Jechonia his captivity; the reigne of Ze- 2 King 2.5. 8.

45 2160 that his eighth yeer, was the first yeere of Jechonia his captivity; the reigne of Ze- 2 King 2.5. 8. delia occupied all the meane space, being of 11. years. This is generally agreed upon, so a king 24. 12. that it needs no further proofes: As for the beginning of his fucceffor Evilmeredach, it 2 King 25,270 was in the seven and thirtieth yeare of Jechonia his captivity; so that Nebuchadne 77 ar & Jerenia 32.31. after his 8. yeare (which was the first of Jechonia his bondage) reigned 35. whole years, and peradventure a good part of the fixe and thirtieth, forasmuch as Jechonia was inlarged with fo great favour, not untill the end of the year. Substracting therefore out of thelefoure and forty, which Nebuchadnez Zars reigne did well neere occupie, those eighteeneyears of his which passed away before the captivity of Juda, and ruine of the city, we have remaining fixe and twenty years of the feventy, that were almost wholly spent when his fon beganto reigne.

Itis now to be confidered how the remainder of the seventie yeares were divided between the Kings ruling in Baby lon untill the first of Cyrus. A question more difficulte as Isadbefore) than greatly needfull: the whole some being certaine, and the distinction oftimes affording no benefit in knowledge of their actions, who were flothfull Princes. Neither can any manthe more justly suspect the beginning or end of the whole 70-years, for that the distribution of some part of them is only conjecturall; seeing that none who gives any other termes to their beginning or end, hath refused to follow both unlikely and desperate conjectures in dividing them. I will therefore be bold to doe as others havedone; knowing well before-hand, that who soever shall discover my error, must do methe pleasure (which I could rather wish in a case more materiall) of making me to

Of the foure and forty yeeres remaining in accompt of Nebushadne Tars death, wee are to take away the last, which was the first of Darius the Mede, & then having authority good enough to warrant us from blame of prefumption, in giving us seventeene vears to Balibalar, we finde left in our hands to befrow upon Evilmerodach fixe & twenty yeares. Of the yeare belonging unto Darius the Mede, I have already spoken what I thought sufficient, in delivering my opinion of the beginning and continuance of this captivity. That Balthafar did reigne seventeen yeeres, we have the authority of Josephus, beforecited in expresse words; Wee have also the generall consent of all, or the most late Writers, interpreting Berofus his Nabonidus, who reigned folong; & Balthafar to have been one. But nothing moveth me so much to believe this Tradition, as first those evident places in Daniel, shewing that in the third yeare of Balthafar hee followed the Dan 8.13 Kings businesse, and yet was forgotten ere the end of his reigne, (a proofe sufficient of & 27. &cap.5. no few yeeres, passing under this man, especially seeing it is no where sound that Daniels employments tooke end either that yeare or the next.) Secondly, the confideration of Cymhis warres against the Assyrians, which beginning with the death of this mans fathe, & being alwaies prosperous, could hardly have occupied any longertime; though weemake large allowance to his deeds in the lower Afia, which fell out in the middeway: I have already shewed, that there appeares in the Scriptures likelihood enough to make it credible, that the reigne of Evilmerodach was not short, and that men of great judgment have found it most probable, that he was a King three and twenty years. More, I thinke, they would have allowed him, had not the defire of fatisfying Berofus, called them to rest content with this. And furely it were greatly to bee wished, that bookes of fuch antiquitie, as those of Berofus, were extant without corruption; a great light (no doubt) they would yeeld in many darke passages of Antiquitie. I will yet confesse, that were his workes never so excellent, and in all things else unquestionably the, I would not therefore condescend unto him in some one point, wherein the Scripthe were his open enemie: How much leffe ought I obey a broken fragment of his, containing onely seven or eight lines, and part even of the title corrupted, as they beeve that follow him in the reft . The Scriptures have told us that God gave the Eurire to Nebuchadne Xar, to his fonne, and to his fonnes forme: How long each of Jerem 27.7. hem held it, wee finde not expressed; yet would we gladly know it of Berofus, or of by other that would teachus; provided alwayes, that helping us in a particularity, he estroyed not thereby the generall truth. More words are needlesse. It is enough Pay withorhers, this Berofus, or Josephus who cited him, hathi beene wronged by the relesses of Scribes; and that it was as easie for those Scribes to erre in writing two for fixe and twenty, as for three & twenty, or perhaps more easie. For , the omiffion of the second figure, was as likely the one way as the other; and the Character 5. fignify. ing 6. hath a neerer refemblance of $ that stands for 2. than hath y which is used for 3. So that the numerall notes 85. expressing 26. were not safe enough from being mistaken in the true copie, and might bee altered, as ill written, if some crooked hand, or other mischance not unusuall, had omitted the first stroke of the former letter, or added a dash to the latter, which might cause them to seeme not two different figures, but the onea correction of the other, which how it could bee supposed in by standing for 23. I doe not well perceive. As for the Arithmeticall figures now in use, they were long after the time of Josephus brought in by the Arabians, and therefore doe not appertaine unto this 10 businesse; unlesse were should ghesse that his workes were corrupted in that unlearned age, which following the Saracen conquest, was little occupied in the studies of humanity, but in a fort wholly given over to the doctrine of Aristotle. If this will serve to make Berosus our friend, so let it be; if not, I will not purchase the favour of his authority, by forfaking Jeremy and Daniel, when they seeme to be his opposites.

Of the victories which Nabuchodonosor obtained betweene the destruction of Jerusalem 10 and conquest of Egypt.

7 Ith what actions this time of 70. years was entertained by the Babylonian Kings, few have written, or little is remaining in record. Which may peradventure have been some cause that the time it selfe was, & is yet sought to bee abridged, as not having left fufficient matter to witnesse the length of it. Butby fuch an argument we might as well deny to many people even their being. For every Nation (Iknow not whom I should except) betweene the beginning and last endosis, hath in some flothfull age rather dreamt away the time, than spent it. It is thereforeno marvell, if the posterity of Nabuchodonofor, finding all things ready to their hand, which 30 their hearts could have defired, betooke themselves to their ease and pleasures, thinking perhaps, like the prodigall fons of greedy fathers, their own wisedome greater, which knew how to enjoy, than that of their Ancestors, which wearied away their dayes in the restlesse travell of purchasing: Though indeed the reigne of Nabuchodonosor was sodivided, that his yout hfull and stronger yeares having been exercised in victorious arms. no finall part of his life was remaining to be spent in establishing what was gotten, and gathering the fruit of his worthie labours past. The nineteenth yeere of his reigneit was, when destroying utterly the great and mighty Citie of Jerusalem, hee enriched himselfe with abundance of spoile, & terrefied all that would offer to resist him, by that fearefull example. From that time forward, he, untill his three and twentieth yeare, 1-4 boured in the conquest of those adjoyning Regions, which God had exposed unto his fword, and commanded to weare his yoke; namely, the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, Tyrians, Sydonians, and Egyptians, though some of these were already become his followers, and ferved under him, when Jerusalem was beaten down and burnt. But the Tyrians, whose Citie was founded on an Island, safe enough from any danger of a Land-army, & whose fleet was so strong, that they needed not to feare any enemy at sea, were neither daunted with the fall of their neighbour cities, nor with the obstinate reso lution of this mighty Prince, imploying all his power to their subversion.

That the City of Tyre was rather well pleased, than any way discouraged with the fall of Jerusalem (which had held the same course that Tyrus did, and endured all that might bee in the same quarrell against the common enemie) it appeares by the words which Ezekiel condemneth as the common voice of Tyrus; Aha, the gate of the people is broken, it is turned unto me; for seeing she is desolate, I shall be replenished. Yet at length even in the nineteenth year of Nabuchodonofor, that great worke of his, whereof we have already spoken, began to appeare above the waters, and threaten them with inevitable

But those prophecies of Jeremy & of Elay, which appoint unto this desolation of Tyte mischiefe. the same terme of 70. years, that was prescribed unto the reign of the Chaldans, dot plainly shew, that she followed Jerusalem, the same nineteenth year of Nabuchodenosor, in the fame, or a very like fortune. The particularities, which doubtleffe were memorable in the issue of so great and laborious a siege, are in a manner utterly lost. Thus much we finde, That the Citizens perceiving the Town unable to hold out, embarked themfelves, and fledde into the Isle of Cyprus. Neverthelesse it seemes that this evasion serredonly the principall men, who escaping with their goods, abandoned the poorer fort unto the enemies fury. For, not onely such people of Tyre as dwelt on the Continent, (who are called her Daughters in the field) were put to the fword; but the like execution was done in the streets, into which, with excessive labour, the Assyrian made way for his Horses and Chariots. Thus Nabuchodonosor caused his Armie to serve a great ser- Ezech.29.18. will against Tyrus, wherein every head was made bald, and every shoulder was made bare. net had hee no mages, nor his Armie; but was faine to rest contented with the Honour of having destroyed that Citie, which in all mens judgements had beene held in-

The destruction of these two great and powerful cities, having made the name of the Chaldrans dreadfull in the eares of all the Nations thereabout, Nabuchodonofor used the advantage of that reputation which he had obtained by victories already gotten, to the getting of more, and more profitable, with leffe paine. The Kingdome of Egypt was the marke at which he aimed; a Country so abounding in all riches and pleasures, that it might well have tempted any Prince, finding himselfe strong enough to seek occasion of quarrell against it; and so farre an enemie to the Crown of Babylon, that had it bin poorer, yet either it must have beene subdued, or the conquest of Syria could ill have beenestablished. Neverthelesse it was needfull, that before hee entred into this businesse, the Countries adjacent should bee reduced into such termes, that either they should wholly stand at his devotion, or at least be unable to worke him any displeasure. Andherein the decree of God concurred, as in all prosperous enterprises, with reason of state. For the people of Moab, Ammon, Edom, Damascus, Kedar, Hazar, and other adjoyning Regions, whom God for their finnes had condemned to fall under the Babylonian fwords, were fuch, as regarding only their owne gaine, had fome of them, like Ravens, followed the Chaldaan Armie, to feed upon the karcasses that fell by the emelty thereof; others taking advantage of their neighbours miferies, occupied the Countries which were by his victories belonging to Nabuchodone for: all of them thinking, that when the Affyrian had fatisfied his fury, he should be faine to for sake those defolate parts, and leave the possession to those that could lay hand upon it. Particularly Ezech. 25.12.8 the Edomites and Philistims had shewed much malice to the Jewes when their city was 15. taken. What good service they had done to the Chaldaans, I finde not; if they did any, itis likely to have beene with reference to their owne purposes, wherein they were difappointed. The Ammonites were not contented to rejoyce at the fall of Jerusalem, but Ezech 25.3. presently they entered upon the Country of Gad, and took possession, as if not the Assy. Jerem. 49.1. rians, but they, had subdued Israel. Neither can I perceive what other ground that pradicehad of Baalis King of the Ammonites, when he fent Ismael, a Prince of the bloud of Juda, to murther Gedalia, whom the King of Babel had left Governour over those that remained in Israel, and to carry captive into the Ammonites Countrey the people that abode in Mizpah, than a defire of embroiling Nabuchodono for with so many labours at once, as should make him retire into his owne Countrey, and abandon those wasted Jerem 40.14.88 Lands to himselfe and others, for whom they lay conveniently. Such or the like policy Jere 28.27. &c. the Moabites did exercise; whose pride and wrath were made frustrate by God, & their diffinulation condemned, as not doing right.

All these nations had the art of ravening, which is familiar to such as live or border upon defarts; and now the time afforded them occasion to shew the uttermost cunning of their theevish wits. But Nebuchadne 27 ar did cut a sunder all their devices by sharpe and suddaine warre, over-whelming them with unexpected ruine, as it were in one rights according to the prophecies of Esay, Jeremy, and Ezekiel, who foretold, with little dif- Esay 16.14. ference of words, the greatnesse and swiftnesse of the misery that should come upon them. With which of them hee first began, I finde not; it seemes that Moab was the last which felt his hand : for so doemany good Authors interpret the prophesic of Esay, threatning Moab with destruction after three yeeres, as having reference to the third Year following the ruine of Jerusalem; the next yeer after it being spent in the Egyptian

Ezek, 26.2.

Jerem. 25. Mai.23.15. expedition. This is manifest, that all the principall townes in these Regions were burnt, and the people slaine, or made slaves, sew excepted, who being preserved by slight, had not the courage to returne to their habitations over-hastily, much lesse to attempt any thing against Nabuchdoneser, but lived as miserable out-lawes, or at least oppressed wretches, untill the end of the seventy yeares, which God had prescribed unto the descolation of their Countries, as well as of the Land of Juda.

6. VIII.

That Egypt was conquered, and the King therein reigning slaine by Nabuchodonosor, contrarie to the opinion of most Authors: who, following Herodotus and Diodorus, relate it otherwise.

THen by a long course of victory Nabuchodone for had brought into subjection on all the Nations of Syria, & the bordering Arabians, in such wise, that no enemy to himself, nor friend of the Egyptian, was left at his backe, that might give impediment unto his proceeding, or take advantage of any misfortune; then did he forth-with take in hand the conquest of Egypt himselfe, upon which those other Nations had formerly bin depending. Of this expedition, and the victorious iffuethere-10 of, the three great Prophets, Esay, Jeremy, and Ezekiel, have written so plainely, that I hold it altogether needlesse to looke after more authoritie, or to cite for proofehalfe of that which may bee alleged out of these. Neverthelesse, wee finde many and good Authors, who following Herodosus, & Diodorus Siculus, are well contented to fraine these Prophecies with unreasonable diligence unto such a sense, as gives to Nabuchods. nofor little more than the honour of having done fome spoile in Egypt, omitting the conquest of that Land by the Babylonian, and referring the death of Apries or Hophis to a chance long after following, which had no coherence with these times or affaires. So preposterous is the delight which many men take in the meanes and second helpes conducing to their purpose, that oftentimes they doe preferre the Commentator be to fore the Author; and to uphold a sentence, giving testimony to one clause, doe carelefly overthrow the history it selfe, which thereby they sought to have maintained. The reports of Herodotus and Diodorus, concerning the Kings of Egypt, which reigned about these times, are already rehearsed in the former booke: but that which they have spoken of Apries, was purposely referved unto this place. Herodotus doth affirme that he was a very fortunate King, but wherein he telleth not; (unlesse we should understand that he was victorious in the Warre, which he is faid to have madeupon Tyrus and Sydon) that he reigned five and twenty yeeres, and was finally taken and putto death by his owne Subjects; who did fet up Amasis, as King, which prevailed against him. The rebellion of the Egyptians hee imputeth to a great losse which they received a in an expedition against the Cyrenians, by whom almost their whole army was destroyed. This calamity the people of Egypt thought to bee well pleafing to their King, who had fent them on this dangerous expedition, with a purpose to have them consumed, that so he might with greater securitie reigne over such as staied at home. So they who escaped, and the friends of such as were slaine, rebelled against Apries, who sent Amasis to appeale the tumult; but Amasis became Captain of the rebells, & was by them chosen King. Finally, the whole Land consented unto this new Election; whereby Apries was driven to trust unto his forraine Mercenaries, the Ionians and Carians, of whom he kept continually in readinesse thirty thousand good Souldiers that fought valiantly for him, but were at length vanquished by the great number of the Egyptian for st ces, amounting unto two hundred and fiftie thousand, which were all by birth and education men of Warre. Apries himselse being taken prisoner, was gently intreated by Amasis for a while, untill the Egyptians, exclaiming upon him, as an extreme ene mie to the Land, got him delivered into their hands, and strangled him, yet they gave him honourable buriall. Such is the report of Herodotus, with whom Diodorus Siculus doth neerely agree, telling us that Apries didvanquish the Cyprians and Phoenicians in battell at Sea, tooke by force and demolished Sydon, wanne the other towns of Phoenicia, and the Isle of Cyprus, and finally, perished, as is before rehearsed, whenhe had reigned two and twenty yeeres. This authority were enough (yet not more than enough) to informe us of Apries his hiftory, if greater authority did not contradict it. But the destruction of Egypt by the Babylonian, foretold by the Prophets, which hath no coherence with these relations, hath greater force to compell our beliefe, than have the traditions of Egyptian Priests (which the Greeke Historians followed) and greater probabilities to perswade those that looke only into humane reasons. For Esay prophetical long before of the shannefull captivity of the Egyptians, whom the King of Ashur should carry away naked, young & old, in such wise, that the Jewes, who sled unto them for deliverance from the Assyrian, should be assamed of their owne vaine considerce in menso unable to defend themselves.

10 But Ezekiel & Jeremy, as their prophecies were neerer to the time of execution fo they handled this argument more precisely. For Ezechiel telleth plainly, that Egypt should begiven to Nabuchadne Zar, as wages for the service which he had done at Tyre: Also hee recounteth particularly all the chiefe Cities in Egypt, faying, That thefe by name &c.30. hould be destroyed, and goe into captivity, yea, that Pharao and all his Army should be Ezech. 32.336 Maine by the sword. Wherefore it must needes bee a violent exposition of these Prophecies, which by applying the iffue of fuch threatnings to an infurrection and rebellion concludes all, without any other alteration in Egypt, than change of the Kings perfon, wherein Amasis did succeed unto Apries, by force indeed, but by the uniforme consent of all the people. Certainely, if that notable place of Jeremy, wherein hee foretelleth how the Jewes in Egypt should see Pharao Hophra de vered into the hand of his enemies, as Zedekia had beene, were to be referred unto the time of that rebel-Jerem. 44 20 lion, whereof Herodotus hath spoken, as the generall opinion hath over-ruled it: then Jerem. 45. 10. was it vainely dorte of the same Prophet (which God forbid that any Christian should thinke, seeing hee did it by the appointment of God himselfe) to hide in the clay of a Bricke-hill, those very stones, upon which the Throne of Nabuchodonofor should bee fer and his Pavilion spred. Yea then was that prophecy no other than false, which expresent the end of Pharaoh thus: Behold, I will visit the common people of No, & Pharaoh, Jerom. 45.7.25. and Egypt, with their gods and their Kings, even Pharaoh, and all that trull in him: and & 26, I will deliver them into the hands of those that seeke their lives, and into the hand of Nabuchadnezzar, King of Babel, and into the hands of bis fervants. The cleareneffe of this prophecy being such as could not but refute that interpretation of many other places. which referred all to the rebellion of Amasis, it caused me to wonder what those Commentators would fay to it, who are elsewhere so diligent in fitting all to the Greeke Hiflorians. Wherfore looking upon Junius, who had in another place taken the enemies of Jun. in Joren's Pharas Hophra to bee Amasis and his followers, I found him here acknowledging that cap. 44. v.36. the Egyptian Priests had notably deluded Herodotus with lies, coyned upon a vain-glorous purpose of hiding their owne difgrace and bondage. And furely it may well bee thought, that the history of Nabuchadnez Zar was better knowne to the Jewes, whom it concerned than to the Greekes, that scarcely at any time heard of his name. Therefore I see no cause why we should not rather believe Josephus, reporting that Nabuchodonosor in the three and twentieth yeer of his reigne, and the fift yeere of the destruction of lerulalem, did conquer Egypt, kill the King thereof, and appoint another in his stead than Hirodotus or Diodere; who being meere itrangers to this businesse, had no great reason to labour in searching out the truth, but might rest contented with any thing that the Priests would rell them. Now if setting aside all advantage of authority, we should onely confider the relations of Josephus, and of the Greeke Historians, as either of them might be verified of it felfe by apparent circumstances, without reflecting upon the Hebrew Prophets, or Egyptian Priests; me thinkes the death of Apries can no way be approved as having beene wrought by confent of the people, but affords great matter of sufficient, year, though no man had opposed the reports of Herodotus and Diodore. For the greatlove & honor which the Egyptians did beareunto their Kings, is notorious by the Toleth. And Jack uniforme restimony of all others that have handled the matters of that Countrey, as beiocition well as by the report of Diddore himselfe. How then can we thinke it probable, that A. prieshaving wome great victories, did for one onely losse fall into the hatred of all his People, or which may ferve to perfwade us, that a King of Egypt would feeke, or fo demedic himself, that he might be thought to seek the destruction of his natural subjects! Asfor that Army of thirty thousand souldiers, Cartans and Ionians, which the King of Egypt, whom Amasis tooke prisoner, is said to have kept for his defence: doth it nor argue that he was a forrainer, and one that armed himself against the Egyptians, wishing them few and weake; rather than any of the Pharaohs, who accounted the force of the Countrey, as affuredly their owne, as the strength of their owne bodies? It were more tedious than any way needfull, to use all Arguments that might be alledged in this case. The very death of this supposed Apries, which the clamours of the people obtained of Amasis, who sought to have kept him alive, doth intimate that hee was some forraine Governour, not anaturall Prince; otherwise the people would have defired to save his life, and Amalis to take it quickly from him. I will not labour any further to disprove that opinion, whereunto I should not have yeelded, though it had stood upon greatap- 10 pearance of truth, confidering that the voice of truth it selfe cries out against it; but leave the circumstances, proving the Conquest of Egypt by Nabuchodonofor, to be observed where due occasion in course of the story following shall present them.

How Egypt was subdued and held by Nabuchadnezzar.

T is a great losse, that the general History of the World hath suffered, by the spoile and waste which Time hath made of those Monuments, that should have 10 preferved the memory of fuch famous actions as were accomplished by this mighty Prince Nabuchodonofor; wherein, whether his Vertue, or Fortune were greater. it is now uncertaine. That his Victories following the Conquest of Syria, and the Neighbour-Provinces, were fuch as did more enlarge his Dominion, than all theformer Warres had done, it may easily bee gathered out of Ezekiel, who reckoneth upin his thirtieth Chapter (besides the whole Countrey of Egypt) Phut and Lud, with other Nations that may seeme to have reached out into Mauritania, as people subdued by this great Babylonian. The circumstances of these Warres are in a manner utterly loft; but that the victory was easteand fwift, any man shall finde, who will take the paines to conferre the places, wherein the three great Prophets touch this Argu-20 ment. Thus much I thinke worthy of more particular observation; that Pharaoh, who (as is already noted in the former Booke) thought himselfe most safe in Egypt by the well defenced fituation of his Countrey, did very unwifely in fuffering his enemiesto fweepe the way cleane unto his owne doores, by confuming all his friends and adherents in Syria. For as the labour of this businesse did more harden than weary the Chaldæan Army, fo the confidence and vaine fecurity of the Egyptians, relying uponthe difficult paffages which the enemy was to make thorow the Arabian defarts, and the much advantage which the great river of Nilus would affoord unto themselves, didlittle availe them in provision for the war, and much astonish them (as may justly be thought) in the time of execution: it being usually scene, that the hearts of men faile, when 40 those helpes faile, in which they had reposed more confidence than in their owne vertue. Hitherto the Kingdome of Egypt had flourished under the rule of the Pharachs, about a thousand five hundred and sourescore yeeres; but from this time forward it remained forty yeeres without a King, under the subjection of the Babylonians; & then at length it began to recover by little and little the former greatnesse, yet so, that it wasnever dreadfull unto others, God having said of that people, I will diminish them, that they Ezek.29.13.14. Shall no more rule the Nations. For whereas it hath beene faid of Pharaob: I am the fanne of the wife, I am the sonne of the ancient Kings: & whereas he had vaunted, The River is mint, Efay 19.11. Ezech. 29.9. and I have made it; the Princes of Egypt now became fooles, the river failed them, the King himselfe was taken & slaine, and that ancient linage quite extinguished. This came jo to passe in the first yeere after the destruction of Jerusalem, and the three and twenti-Joseph Ant. Jud. eth of Nabuchadne ZZar, at which time (faith Josephus) Hee flew the King then reigning, 16. 10.611. placed another in his recome and another in his recome placed another in his roome, and carried captives thence to Babylon, the lewes whom he found in that Country. Now concerning the time which Josephus gives unto this businesse, and the businesse it selfe, I have already shewed, that it is warranted by all the prophecies which infinuate the same. As likewise the last destruction of Jerusalem, and carry ing away those unto Babel, who inhabited the miserable ruines of that great city, which was in the same three & twentieth yeer of Nabuchadne Zar, is not unprobably thoughtby good authors to have beene at the returne from this Egyptian expedition. But whereas Julephus tels us, that there was another King put in the roome of Apries by Nabuchad-nexter, we must understand, that he was only a Vice-roy, and not (as some have mistakenit) thinke that this was Amasis. For to place the beginning of Amasis his reigne in the three and twentieth of Nabuchadne Zar, were as well repugnant unto the prophecies hefore alledged, as to all Chronology and History. Some there are, which to help this inconvenience, imagine that there were two fuccessively bearing the name of Amalis; others, that there were two Apries, the one flaine by Nabuchadne Zzar, other by Amafis: aquestion of small importance, because the difference is onely about a name, it being once granted that the person mentioned in Scriptures, was deprived of life & Kingdome by the Affyrians. Yet for any thing that I can perceive, that Apries, of whom the Greeke Historians wrote, could not be the Deputy of Nabuchadne Zar, feeing that he was the Grand-childe of Pharas Necho, & made war (as they report) upon the Phoenicians, who wer, ebefore the Egyptians, become subject unto the Crowne of Babylon. Imight adde, perhaps, that he whom Nabuchadne Zar left as Governour of Egypt, was more likely to have had fome Chaldean or Affyrian, than Egyptian name; unleffe wee thould thinke that he had beene a traitor to his naturall Prince, and so rewarded by the Conquerour with Lievtenantship of the Courtrey : about which it were but frivolous todispute. Thus much in briefe we ought to beleeve that Nabuchodonofor made an absoline Conquest of Egypt; that he was not so soolish as to give it away, any man may gheffe; that he appointed one to rule the Countrey, it is consequent unto the former, and hath authority of Josephus; that his Governour (or some Successour of his) was afterwardstaken and flaine by Amasis, I see probability enough to perswade my selfe, and yet can well be content, that others use their liberty, and beleeve what they lift. As for the army which this Egyptian King Apries is supposed to have kept of Ionians & Carians, I hold them to be none other than the garrifons of mercenary fouldiers which were left by the Affyrian for the guard of his Viceroy, and cultody of the new fibdued Province: as likewise the company returning from Cyrene & Barce, who together with the friends of fuch as were flaine in that expedition, remembred before out of the Greek Hiflorians, deposed & flew Apries, I take them to have been the Egyptian fugitives, which then recovered their own Countrey. Sure it is that this Ptophecy of Ezekiel was verified, Asshe end of forty years will I gather the Egyptians from the people where they were scattered, and I will bring against the captivity of Egypt, and will cause them to returne into &14. the land of Pathros, into the land of their habitation & they shall be there a small Kingdome. If the Egyptian Priests alluded hereunto in the tale which they made of Amasis his obtaining the Kingdome, then are they to be helped with this or the like interpretation; if they devised matter that had no shadow of truth, only to keepe the Greeks from knowledge of their Countries differace; then are they little to be regarded, fince we know the med with them.

Of the fundry accounts drawne from fundry acts of Nabuchadnezzar, and of the destruction of Ninever by him the time of which action is uncertaine.

Hele victories brought the greatnesse of the Assyrian Empire to the full, & from them was reckoned the time of Nabuchadnezzars reigne in fundry places of Scripture. To speake any more of the questions ariling about the supputation of Nabuchadne Zar his times, might feelie to be the over-handling of one Argument: Yet thus much I will note that whereas Daniel was carried captive in the third yeere of Jehighims reign (which ran along with some part of Nabuchadnezzars first yeare) & was Dan. 1.8 2 kept indict three years more, before hee was brought into the Kings prefence; it could not be the second of Nabuchadne Zars Kingdome, wherein he interpreted the forgotten dreamof the great Image, foreshewing the successe of Monarchies, but the second of his Empire The fame or the like may be faid of divers places which referre fundry matters unto their fet years; as that of Exekiel before cited, where he fore-tels, that Egypt should bee given in reward for the fervice done before Typus, dating his prophecy in the feven and twentieth year; and that of Daniel, placing the erection of the golden Image in the sighteenth yeare; for these yeares held no dependance upon either the beginning of

CHAP.I. S.II.

Nabu hadnezzars Kingdome, or of his Empire, nor yet upon any of the captivities, but had reference to some memorable actions, omitted in Scripture, and therefore not easie to be found, nor worth the labour of uncertaine search.

Of any warre made by Nabuchadne ZZar, after fuch time as he returned from the Con. quest of Egypt, I doe not reade : excepting that against Nineve, the destruction whereof was fore-told by the Prophet Nahum. Nineve had long before been taken by Merodach (as in due place hath beene shewed) and together with the rest of Assyria made subject to Babylon. Yet was it left under a peculiar King, who rebelling against the Chaldwan.ac Jehojakim and Zedechias, tributary Kings of Juda, had done, tasted likewise of the same fortune. That the destruction of Nineve followed the Conquest of Egypt, it appear reth by the comparison which Nahum the Prophet made betweene this City, that was to fall, and the City of No in Egypt, that was fallen already. But how long after this came to passe, it is (me thinkes) impossible to finde out. For whereas it is found in an Hebrew Chronology, that it was in the first of Nabuchadnez Zars reign, the place of Nahum last cited is enough to disprove it. Whereas it is referred by some unto the first of his Monarchy, which began at the end of the Egyptian warres; the whole Prophecy of Nahum which went betweene the one and the other, argueth strongly, that there was a longer space of time intercurrent. So that to enquire into the very yeare of this defini-Ction, or other circumstances of the Warre, whether managed by Nabuchodonosorin per. fon, or by his Lievtenants, were fomewhat like unto the vaine curiofity of Tyberius Ca. 10 far, enquiring who was the Mother of Hecuba, or to the like idle paines which he should take, who would feek to learne what woman that HuZZab Queen of Nineve was, whose woefull captivity the same Prophet Nahum likewise did fore-tell.

6. X I.

Of the latter time of Nabuchadnezzar; his buildings, madnesse, and death.

F the time which this great Monarch spent in quiet, I think there are no monuments extant; save those which we finde among the prophecies of Daniel. A-30 mong these we may reckon his great workes of Babylon, wherewith he pleased himselfe so well, that he brake out into these glorious words: Is not this great Babilibut I bave built for the house of the Kingdome, by the might of my power of for the honour of my Majesty? Surely if those things be true that are by Josephus rehearsed of him out of Borglus & Megasthenes, he might well delight himself with the contemplation of such goodly & magnificent buildings. For it is said, That he fortisted Babylon with a triple wall; that besides other stately works, he raised those huge arches wherewith were borne up the high Orchards, hanging as it were in the aire, & equalling the tops of Mountaines, which most sumptuous frame, that out-lasted all the remainder of the Assyrian, and all the Persian Empire, is said to have been ereared, and sinished in sisteene dayes.

But of all this, & other his magnificence, we find little else recorded, than that (which indeed is most profitable for us to consider) his over-valuing of his owne greatnesseabased him unto a condition, inferiour to the poorest of men. And not undeservedly sell these judgements of God upon him. For whereas God had honoured him, not onely with many victories, and much happinesse in his owne life, but with a discovery of things to come after him, yea and had approved the certainty of his dreame, by the miraculous reducing of it into his memory, and interpretetion thereof by Daniel the Prophet thee neverthelesse became so forgetfull of God, whose wonderfull power he had seene and acknowledged, that he caused a golden Image to be set up and worthipped : ordaining 1 crucil death as reward unto them that should dare to disobey his Kingly will and pleafure, which was utterly repugnant to the law of him that is the Kings of kings. Hereof S. Hierome hath well noted 3 Veloxoblivio veritaris, ut qui dudum fervum Dei quaft Deum adoraveras, nunc statuam fibi fieri jubeat , ut ipse quafe Deus in ftatua adoraretur : A hastie forgerfullneffe of the truth that he who fo lately had worfbipped (Daniel) the fervant of God; as if hee had beene God himselfe, should now command a statua to bee creeted unto himselfe, wherein himfelfe might bee worshipped as God. From this impiery it pleased God to te claime him, by the strange and wonderfull delivery of those blessed Saints one of the fire crie fornaces who being throwne insoit bound, for refuling to commit Idelatry, were affifted by an Angell; preserved from all harme of the fire; loosened from their bands; and finally called out with gracious words, and reftored to their former honour, by the King: who amazed at the miracle, made a decree tending to the honour of God, which hy erection of his Image he had violated. Yet this devotion of Nabuchadne 77 ar was not fo rooted in him, that it could bring forth fruit answerable to his hastie zeale. Therfore was he forewarned by God in a dreame of the terrible judgement hanging over his headwhich Daniel expounding, advised him to breake off his sinne by righteousnesse, and his iniquitie by mercy towards the poore, that there might be an healing of his errour. Hereby it feemes that injustice and crueltie were the faults, for which hee was threatned; but this threatning fufficed not unto his information. For, that fo great a Monarch should be dri-10 ven from among men; (according to the tenor of the dream & interpretation) year compelled to dwell with the beafts of the field, and made to eate graffe as the Oxen, was a thing so incredible in mans judgement, that easily it might be thought an idle dreame; and much more easily be forgotten at the yeeres end. One whole yeares leasure to repent was given to this haughty Prince: which respite of the execution may seem to have bred in him a forgetfulnesse of Gods sentence. For at the end of twelve moneths, walking in the royall Palace of Babel, he was fo over-joyed and transported with a vain contemplation of his owne feeming happinesse, that without all seare of Gods heavie judgement pronounced against him, he uttered those lostie words before rehearsed, in valinting of the Majesticall workes which he had reared, as well beseeming his majestiall person. But his high speeches were not fully ended, when a voyce from heaven, telling him that his Kingdome was departed from him, rehearfed over unto him the fentence againe, which was fulfilled upon him the very fame houre.

That Salomon, and many other Princes, and great ones, have taken delight in their ownbuildings, it cannot any way be doubted; yet I doe not remember that ever I have readfany, that were punished for rejoycing in workes of this kinde (though it is hard injoy, or any passion of the minde, to keepe a just measure) excepting onely this Nabu-chadret ar.

The like may be faid of Danid: for other (and fome very godly) Kings have mustred alltheir forces to the very last man; but few or none have been knowne to have beene ³⁰ punished as David was. Surely I not only hold it lawfull to rejoyce in those good things wherewith God hath bleffed us; but a note of much unthankfulneffe to entertain them with a fullen and unfeeling difposition. Yet as all humane affections, wherein due reference to God is wanting, are no better than obfcure clouds, hindring the influence of that bleffedlight, which clarifies the foule of man, and predisposeth it unto the brightnesse of eternall felicity; fo that infolent joy, which man in the pride of his vaine imagination conceive th of his own worth, doth above all other paffions blaft our mindes, as it were with lightning, & make us to reflect our thoughts upon our feeming inherent greatneffe, forgetting the whilest him, to whom we are indebted for our very being. Wherefore these Mala ment is gaudia; The ewill joyes of the minde, were not unaptly, by the Prince of Latine Poets, bestowed in the entrance of hell, and placed further inward than forrowes, cares, and feares: not far from the yron Cabbins of the Furies. And certainly it is no unlikely token of vengeance neere at hand, when these unreasonable stushes of proud and vaine joy, doe rage in a minde, that should have been humbled with a just repentance, and acknowledgement of ill deferving.

but his understanding. Seven yeares expired, it pleased God to restore Nabuchodonolar both to his understanding, and his estate, for which he acknowledged and praised God all the rest of his life, confessing his power, and everlasting being; that he was the Lord of heaven and earth, and wrought without refistance what he pleased in both; that hie workes were all truth, and his wayes righteous. Which gave argument to many of the Fathers, and others, not to doubt of his falvation; namely, S. Augustine, Theodoret, Lyra Carthusianus, and others. And for that place of Esay the fourteenth, out of which his perdition may bee gathered, the aforenamed Authors apply the same to Balthafar, because Ifay, both in the thirteenth and fourteenth Chapters, speaketh of the King, and thede. struction of Babylon jointly.

6. XII. of Evilmerodach.

Aving already spoken what I could of the succession and yeeres of Nebuchadnezzars posterity; the most that may bee said of him, is said of Evilmeredach which I will not here againe rehearfe.

He lost some part of that which his father had gotten; and left his Kingdome burning in a warre that confumed it to ashes. Hee lost Egypt by rebellion of the people, in the nineteenth yeare of his reign, which was forty yeeres after his Father had conqueredit. 10 But this agrees neither with the accompt of Herodotus, who allowes to Amasis foure & forty yeares of reigne; nor with that of Diodorus, who gives him five and fifty, faying that he died in the third yeere of the threescore and third Olympiad, when Camby sedid conquer Egypt. There were indeed but seven and thirty yeeres, which passed between the second yeere of the foure and fiftieth Olympiad, (which was the nineteenth of Ewilmerodach, and the first of Amasis) and the fift of Cambyses his reigne, wherein he wan Egypt; of which seven and thirty yeers it is credibly held, that Pfammiticus, the son of Amasis, reigned three: so that Amasis could bee no longer King than foure and thirty yeeres. But feeing that thefe two Greek Historians have bin abused by Egyptian Priess. in the substance of that which was spoken of Amasis, it is no marvell though they were 30 also deceived in the length of his reigne. This is the plaine answer to this objection. For to say either that the numbers were mis-written, & foure & forty set down instead of foure and thirty, or that Amasis did temporize a while with the Affyrians, and not beare himself as absolute King of Egypt, untill the nineteenth of Evilmerodach (at which time, and not before, it hath been proved out Exechiel, that Egypt became againe a Kingdome) I hold it a superfluous excuse.

Whether these Egyptian troubles did animate the King of the Medes to deale with Evilmerodach, as with a Prince greater in fame & reputation, gotten by the decayed valour of his people, than in present forces; or whether (as I rather thinke) some foylere ceived by the Assyrian invading Media, emboldned the Egyptians to rebell against him: 40 I will neither undertake, nor seek to define. Xenophon tels, that the first service of young Cyrus in warre, was under Aftyages King of the Medes, his Grand-father, in a profperous fight against the Assyrian Prince, who did set upon him; at which time Cyrus was fifteene or fixteene yeares old. If therefore Cyrus lived threescore and three yeares (as Kemph. Cyroped. he is faid to have died well stricken in yeares) which is held to be the ordinary terme of no short life, then was this encounter in the third yeere of Evilmerodach his reigne. Yet by the same reckoning it should follow, that the warre began more early between these Nations, for as much as the manner of their fight in former times, with other circum. stances infinuating as much, are found in the same place of Xenophon. And it may well bec, that the death or destruction of Nabuchodonosor gave courage unto those that had 50 felthim a troublesome neighbour, to stand upon prouder termes with the Assyrians, than in his flourishing estate they durst have used. Howsoever the quarrell beganne, we find that it ended not before the last ruine of the Assyrian Monarchie. For the Babylomian, being too proud to digest the losses which he received by the Medes and their Allies the Persians, drew unto his partie the Lydians, and all the people of the lesser Asia, with gifts and strong perswasions, hoping so to over-whelme his enemies with a strong invasion, whom in vaine hee had sought to wearie out with a linguist

This happened after the death of Afrages, who left the world in the nineteenth year of Evilmerodach, at which time Amafis tooke possession of Egypt. So that the Assyrian having his hands already full of bufineffe, which more earneftly did affect him, feemes thereby to have given the better meanes unto the Egyptians, of new erecting their Kingdome, which by long diffance of place did fundry times find occasion to rebell in afterages, and set up a King within it selfe, against the far more mighty Persian.

The issue of these great preparations made by Evilmerodach against the Medes, was fuch as opened the way unto the fulfilling of those prophecies, which were many years before uttered against Babel, by Esay and Fereny.

For, the Affyrians and their Confederates, who, trusting in their numbers, thought mhave buried the Medes and Perfians under their thicke showres of arrowes and darts, were encountred with an army of front and wel-trained men, weightily armed for close fight, by whom they were beaten in open battell, wherein Evilmerodach was flaine. So that great frame of Empire which Nabuchodonofor had raifed and up-held, being flaken and grievoufly crackt under his unfortunate for, was left to be fuftained by his unworthy Nephew: a man more likely to have overthrown it, when it was greatest and strongest, thanto repaire it, when it was in way of falling.

16 A private conjecture of the Author; ferving to make good those things, which are cited out of Berofus, concerning the Successors of Evilmerodach, without wrong to the truth. The qualitie, and death of Balthafar.

Hough I have already (as it feemes to me) fufficiently proved that Balthafar was the Son, and immediate Succeffour to Evilmerodach, yet confidering earnestly the conjectures of those Writers, which following Berosus, insert Neglisar, or Ninglissor, and his fon Labassardach betweene them: as also that which I finde in Herodofus of Nitocris, a famous Queene of Babylon, who greatly adorned and fortified that City; I have thought it not superfluous here in this place to shew, by what means it was possible that some errour might have crept into the Historie of those times, and ³⁹ thereby have brought us to a needleffe trouble of fearching out the truth, as it were by candle-light, in the uncertaine fragments of lost Authors, which we might have found by day-light, had we adhered only to the Scriptures. First therefore I observe, that the time which Berofus divides betwixt Evilmerodach, and the two next Kings, agrees with the yeares in which Nebuchadnezzar lived wilde among brute beafts in the open field: Secondly, that the fuddennesse of this accident, which came in one houre, could not but work much perturbation in that State, wherein doubtleffe the honour of fo noble a Prince was highly regarded, his calamity pitied, and his restitution hoped; the prediction of Daniel finding reputation in that clause which promised his recoverie, as being ve-, used in that which had bin more incredible. Now if we doe in common reason judge, what course was like to be taken by the great ones of the Kingdome, for setling the government, whileft the King was thus diftracted, wee shall finde it most likely, that his Son and Heire did occupie the Royall Throne, with condition to restore it unto his Father, when God should enable him to repossesse it. In this his rule, Evilmerodach being to supply the utter want of understanding in his Father, as Protectors doe the unripenesse Herodoc. Ellers. of it in young, but reasonable Kings, might easily either commit the infolences, or fall into the troubles, incident to fuch an office. That he had in him very fmall abilitie of government, it appeares by his ill maintaining the Empire, when hee held it in his owne right. That his fifter Nitocris (if Nitocris were his fifter) was a woman of anhigh spirit, so tappeares by that which Herodotus reports of her, faying, that slice was more cunning than semiramis, as appeared in her magnificent and usefull workes about the River of Euphrates, and her fortification of Babylon against the Medes, who had gotten many Townes from the Affyrians, and amongst them Nineve. Wherefore it were not unreasonable to thinke, that such a woman, seeing how the Empire went to decay through her brothers misgovernment, used practices to get the rule into her owne hands, and afterwards, as a mother, to leave it unto her ungracious fon. Other time than this, wherein Nitocris could have reigned, wee doe not finde; but wee finde in Berofus (as Fosephus hathcited him) that Niglissar, who got the Kingdom from Evilmeredach, was his fifters husband; which argues this to have been the fame woman. As for Labaffardach the fon of Nielistar, if at the end of nine moneths reigne he were for his lewd conditions slaine by the Nobility, as the same Berofus reporteth, it seemes that God prepared hereby the way for NebuchadneZZars restitution (whose terms of punishment was then expired by raising such trouble, as should make him the more desired, both of the Princes and the people. I will not here use many words to confute that which Berefus hath further fer down of Evilmerodach, telling us that he was flaine by his fifters husband : for the plain words of the Scripture, named the yeare wherein he gave liberty to Jechonia, do plainly testifie that he out-lived the three or foure and fortieth yeare of his Fathers reign, which was the last of his life.

This may suffice to shew, that they who are faid to have succeeded Evilmerodachin the Kingdom, might indeed have so done, though not when he held it in his owne right. Of Balthafar, who was his Sonand Heire, we finde, that he had fuch conditions, as God permitted to be in a King for the ruine of the people. Hee was from his young yeeresof a mischievous nature; having in his Fathers time slaine a Noble young man that should have married his fifter, only for spight and envie to see him kill two wilde beafts in hunting, at which himselfe having throwne his Javeline had missed them. Another erest Lord he had gelded, because a Gentlewoman commending his beauty, said it were ahan. pie woman that should be his wife. Such barbarous villanies caused many which hadlo. ved his Father (as a good and gracious, though unfortunate Prince) to revolt from him to unto the enemie as soone as hee was King. Neither doe I finde that hee performedant thing worthy of record, but as a coward and a foole he loft all; fitting still, and not once daring to give battell to them that daily took somewhat from him. Yet carelesly feathing when danger had hemmed him in onevery fide, & when death arrested him by the linds of those whom hee had wronged in his Fathers life. So the end of him was base & misrable; for hee died as a foole taken in unexcufable fecurity, yet had not that happinesse, fuch as it is, of a death free from apprehension of seare, but was terrefied with a dreadful vision; which had shewed his ruine not inmany houres before, even whilest he was drinking in that wine, which the fwords of his infulting enemies drew out of him, together with his latest bloud. It is therefore in this place enough to say of him, That after adil 10 honourable reigne of seventeene yeares, he perished like a beast, and was slaine as hedeferved. The rest that concerneth him in question of his time, hath beene spoken heretofore; in matter of his affaires, shall be handled among the acts of Cyrus, to whose story that of Balthafar is but an appendix.

CHAP. II.

Of the original and first greatnesse of the Persians.

That the Medeswere chiefe altors in the subversion of the Babylonian Empire.

HE Line of Belochus being now extinguished in Balthafar, the Empire of Babylon, and of Assyria, was joyned first to that of Media, which then was governed by Cyaxares or Darius Medus, after whom Cyrus became Lord and Monarch, both of Affytia and of Media it felfe.

Of the race of Pbul Belochus there were tenne Kings besides him selfe, and of Arbaces as many are found by Metasthenes. These two Provinciall Governours having cut downe the last branch of Nious in Sardanapalus, divided betweene them the Easterne Empire. Craxares (whom the Scriptures call Darius Medius) the last of the race of Arbaces, dying about two yeeres after that the line of Belechow was ended in Balthafar; the Dominions aswell of the Conquerour, as of the conquered, fell to a third Family, namely, to Cyrus of the house of Achamenes, the Princes of which bloud reigning in Persia, had formerly been dependants on the Medes, and were of as little power at home, as of fame abroad in the world.

Of the Familie of the Achemenes, and Line of the Persian Kings, we shall hereafter finde occasion in due place to intreat.

CHAP.2. $.2.

The Nation of the Medes descended from Madai the third some of Japhes; that they had Kings soone after the Floud, Lactantins and Diodorus have found record: For Lastantius remembreth an ancient King of the Medes called Hydaspes, and Diodore freaketh of Pharnus with his feven fonnes, flain by the Affirian in the beginning of their Empire.

But of these who succeeded Arbaces the first, that freed his Nation from the Asserte 10 ans. I take the lift and number from Eufebius, adding Darius Medus: of whom I have from benin their proper places heretofore; and they are thefe.

Arbaces. Solarmus 30. years. Medidus. 40. years. Cardiceas. 13. years. Diocles. 53. years. Phraortes. 24. years. Cvaxares. 32. years. Astyages. 38. years. Darius Medus.

And though the Greekes afcribe the conquest of Babylon to Cyrus alone, yet the Scripnuresteach us, that Darius was not only King of Media, and had the Perfians his followers, but that the Armie victorious over Bali hafar was his; as the Asyrian and Babylonian Empire also was during his owne life. For we finde in Daniel, that Dariss of the Medes tookthe Kingdome being three score and two years old: And further, what Officers it pleased him to set over the Kingdome. And so was it prophecied by 1/47 long before: Be-30 hold I will stirre up the Medes against them, &c. And by Jeremie; The Lord hathraised up Cap. 13. V.17. the Spirit of the King of the Medes : for his purpose is against Babel to destroy it ; and in the cientand twentieth Verse, Prepare against her the Nations, with the King of the Medes, the Dukes thereof, the Princes thereof, and all the Land of his Dominion. These Scriptures Julim Affricanus doth well open, who taking authoritie from Diodore, Caffor, Thallus, and others.delivereth that Babylon was taken before Cyrus began to reign; which also agreeth with Strabo, where he faith, That as the Medes were subjugated by the Persians, so before Libert that both the Babylonians and Affyrians were mastered by the Medes. And therefore the reports of Juline and Herodoius are not to be received, who attribute the taking of Babylon to Cyrus alone.

By what means the Empire was translated from the Medes to the Persians.

TOw the Kingdome of the Medes fell into the hands of Cyrus, it is a doubt not fufficiently cleared by Historians, but rather their different relations of his beginnings have bred the former opinion of those who give the conquest of Babel to the Persian only. For some there are who deny that Astrages had any other Successor than Cyrus his grand-child by Mandane. Whereas Ctefias on the contrary fide affirmeth, that Cyrus was no way descended from Astages (whom he calleth Astigus or Apania) but only that having vanquished him in battell, and confined him to Bactria, he married his Daughter Amytis. But I find the relations of Ctesias often cited & seldome followed, and himselfe sometimes very justly reproved of wilfull untruth.

Piginier, a diligent and learned Historian of this age, produceth many probable reasons that Afrages had no fuch fon as Cyaxares, or Darius Medus; and to confirm this opinion the more, he citeth Diodore, Juline, Strabo, Plato, Ariftotle, Ifocrates, and before them Ca-Stor, Thallus, and Phlegen; who doe not find any fuch fuccessor. Neither do Tatianus, The-Philus Antiochenus, Julius Affricanus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Justine Martyr, Lactantius, Eusebius, S. Hierome, or S. Augustine, make report out of any faithfull Author by them tead, that hath given other Sonor Successor to Astyages than Cyrus.

Zon.l. 1. C.19-

Yet seeing that this manner of argument ab authoritate negative, doth never inforce consent; we may be the bolder (all this great list of noble Writers by him alledged notwithstanding) to affirme, that either Aftyages himselfe must have beene Darius of the Medes, which cannot agree with his place in the course of time; Or else to give him some other Successfor, according to Josephus and Xenophon, the same whom Daniel calleth Da. rims. For it is manifest and without dispute, that the King of the Medes commanded in chiefe, and was absolute Lord of that Conquest, Cyrus during his life, being no other than the Lievtenant of his Armie, and subject to his authoritie; The strength of both Nations, to wit, the Medes and Persians, with other the Vassals of Darius, being joyned together to compound it.

But it is very certaine that the honour of that great victorie over Babylon was wholly given to Cyrus, who was the instrument preordained and forenamed by God himself for this action, but for the deliverie of his Church; a greater worke not only in the eyes of God, than the subversion of any Stare or Monarchie how powerfull soever.

And it may well be thought, that the Souldiers imployed in that service did rather as cribe the glorie to him that was the best man of war, than to the Median, who was greater test in riches and power. All which also falling upon Cyrus by succession, and continuing in his posteritie, did much augment the same of his vertue; which among profanehistorians overgrew altogether the honour due to Cyaxares, both because he was old, and didnothing in person; as also because he soon after quitted the world, and left all to Cyrm, who to was possest of whatsoever belonged to Darius, before the same of any such King or Conqueror was carried farre off.

And for the Greek Historians, they took all things from the relation of the Persians, who gave to Cyrus all the praise of a most excellent Prince, making none his equal. Only Daniel in the first, fift, and fixt Chapters of his Prophecie, makes it plain, that himselfe not onely lived a great Officer under King Darius, but that he continued in that estateto the first of Cyrus; which being the year of Daniels death, could not have bin distinguished from the reigne of Darius, if they had begun together and raigned joyntly: Neither can it be imagined that Darius held the Kingdome by Cyrus permission, considering that 30 Cyrus began after him.

6. III.

Xenophons relation of the Warre with the Medes and Persians, made with joynt forces spon the Affyrians and others.

Hele Testimonies of the Scriptures, which need no other confirmation, yet made more open to our understanding, by that which Xenophon hath writtenoschese wars: The cause whereof, according to his report, was this.

When the Affrian had enlarged his empire with victories, and was become Lord of all Syria, and many other Countries, he began to hope that if the Medes could be brought 40 under his subjection, there should not then be left any Nation adjoyning able to make head against him. For the King of the Medes was able to bring into the field threescore thousand foot, and ten thousand horse, to which the forces of Persia being joined, made an exceeding strong Armie.

The Affirian confidering the strength of such a Neighbour, invited Crassus King of Lydia, a Prince very mightie both in men and treasure, and with him other Lords of Asia the lesse, to his assistance, alledging, that those Easterne Nations were very powerfull, and so firmely conjoyned by league and many alliances, that it would not be eafie, no not possible for any one Nation to resist them. With these incitements, and strengthened with great presents, he drew to himself so many adherents, as he compounded an Armie of two hundred thousand foot, and threescore thousand horse; of which, tenne thousand horse, and fortie thousand foot were led by Crass, who had great cause of enmittie with the Medes, in regard of the Warre made by them against his Father Alyattes, But this great Armie was by Cyaxares King of the Medes, and by Cyrus Generall of the Persian forces, utterly broken; Upon which defeat the Assirian King being also slaine, so many of the Asyrians revolted, as Babylon it selfe could not longer be affured without the succours of Mercenaries, waged with great summes of money out of Asia the lesse, Egypt, and elsewhere. Which new gathered forces were also scattered by Cyrus, who following his advantage, possess himselfe of a great part of the leffer Afia; at which time it was, as I take it, that Crafus himselfe was also made prisoner.

The attempt of Babylon following foon after, the Armie lying before it being paid by Darius, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, & led by Cyrus his fifters fon, prevailed against Ralthalar, as in due time shall be set downe.

CHAP.2. S.4.

Those Persians which followed Cyrus, and by him levied, are numbred thirtie thoufand foot-men, of which a thousand were armed Gentlemen, therest of the common fortwere Archers, or fuch as used the Dart or Sling. So far Xenophon. Of whom in this argument, as it is true, that he described in Cyrus the pattern of a most Heroicall Prince, withmuch Poeticalladdition: so it cannot be denied, but that the bulke and grosse of his Narration was founded upon meere Historicall truth.

Neither can it indeed be affirmed of any the like writers, that in every speech and circumstance he hath precisely tyed himselfe to the phrase of the speaker, or nature of the occasion, but borrowed in each out of his own invention, appropriating the same to the rimes and persons of whom he treated. Putting therefore apart the Morall and Politicke discourse, and examining but the Historie of things done, it will easily appear, that Xenophon hath handled his under-taken subject in such fort, that by beautifying the face thereof he hath not in any fort corrupted the bodie.

6. IV.

The estate of the Medes and Persians in times fore-going this great War.

Oritis commonly agreed upon, that Achamenes the sonne of Perses being Gowernour of Perfia, did affociate himselfe with Arbaces, who commanded in Media in that rebellion against Sardanapalus, and that each of them after the victoricobtained, held for himselfe the Dominion of those Countries, which he had formerly nied for the Affirians; as also that they conveyed over the same honor and power to their posterities which in Media was not absolutely Regall, but with some restraint limited,untill such time as Deioces tooke upon him the full authoritie and majestie of a King. From the death of sardanapalus to the reigne of Deioces, are usually acounted about an hundred and fortie years, in the last fixty whereof there reigned in Affyria mightie Princes, namely, Salmanassar and his Successors; whose great archievements in Syria and elsewhere, witnesse, that the Medes and Persians found it not for their advantage to underiake any offensive war against those victorious Kings, it being also probable that the league continued as vet between these the successors of Belochus and Arbaces, who had formerly shared the Empire.

Now from the beginning of Deioces to the first of Astraces, there past above ninetic oyears, in which, if Herodotus have written truly, that Phraortes conquered Perfia, and how he and other Kings of Media by many victories greatly enlarged their Dominions, and commanded many parts of Asia, it had bin but an unadvised enterprise of the Assirans and Babylonians, to have wasted themselves against the Syrians and Egyptians, leaving so able and victorious a Nation on their backes. But that the Medes had done nothing upon the South parts of Persia, and that the Persians themselves were not masters of Susiana in Nabuchodonofors time, it is manifest in Daniel, who was then Governour for the Babylonian in Sufa, or Sufan, the chiefe Citie thereof. It is true indeed, that the Medians, either under Cyaxares or Astyages, or both, had quarrell with Halyattes the father of Crafus, which after fome fixe yeares dispute was compounded.

How the affaires of Persia stood in so many ages, I doe not finde any memoric. It seemeththat the roughnesse of the mountainous Countrey which they then possest; with the confederacie which they continued with the Medes, gave them more securitie than fame: For if their Kings, being the posteritie of Achamenes, had done any memorable acts, the greatnesse which they afterward obtained would not have suffered any forgetfulnesse thereof. But as we finde all Xenophons reports, both of these Warres and the flate of those countries to be very consonant and agreeable to the relation of many other good Authors, so it appeares, that the race of Achamenes held the Principalitie of Perfor from Father to Sonne for many descents. And therefore we may better give credit to Xenophon, who affirmeth, That Camby festhe father of Cyrus was King of Persia; than to those that make him a meane man, and fay, that Assages gave him his daughter Man. dane in marriage, to the end that her son (whose nativitie he feared) might be disabled from any great undertaking by his fathers ignobilitie.

The third Booke of the first part om any great uncertaking of an analysis, that the fon of his daughter should For what cause of griefe could it be to Astrages, that the son of his daughter should become Lord of the best part of Asia? No, it was more likely, that upon such a Prophecie his love to his grand-childe should have encreased, and his care been the greater to have married her to some Prince of strength and eminent vertue. Yea, the same Herodotus, who is the first Author, and as I think the deviser of the mis. chiefe intended against Cyrus by his Grandfather, doth confesse, That the line of the Achiefe intended against Cyrus by his Grandfather, doth confesse, That the line of the Achiefe intended was so renowned, that the great King Xerxes in the height of his prospering to did thence derive himselse, and vaunt of it: which he would never have done, had they binignoble, or had they bin the vaffals of any other King or Monarch. For in this fort Xerxes in the feventh of Herodotus deriveth himfelfe.

Of the Achamenida there were two races : of the first was Cyrus the great, whose isse to male failed in his two fonnes, Camby fes and Smerdis. This royall familie is thus fet downe by the learned Reineccius.

Achemenes, the fon of Perfes, first King of Perfia.

Cyrus, the first of that name, had Cambyses and Atossa; who married to Pharnaces, King of Cappadecia, had Arty stona and other daughters.

Suides derives this Nation sometimes from Assur, sometimes from Magog, of whom they were called Magusai; which Magusai, according to Eusebius, are not to be taken for the Nation in generall, but for those who were afterward called the Magi or Wisemen. 10 So doethe Greeks, among many other their fayings of them, affirme, That the Persians were anciently written Artai, & that they called themselves Cephenes. But that they were Elamita, Moses & the Prophets, Esay, Jeremie, EZekiel, Daniel and Esdras, inmany places confirme : Which also S. Hierome upon Jeremie the five and twentieth, upon Daniel the cight, and also in his Hebrew questions, approveth, saying: Elam, a que Elamit a Principes Perfidis ; Elamof whom were the Elamites Princes of Perfia.

And that Citie which the Author of the fecond book of the Maccabees calleth Perfepolis, is by the Author of the first called Elimais, but is now called Siras, being the same which Antiochus, for the great riches thereof, twice attempted in vaine, and to his great dishonour. And yet this Citie, now called Siras, was not the old Persepolis; for Alexander 5 at the request of Thais the Harlot, burnt it. The first King of Persia to us known, if we follow the current of Authors interpreting the fourteenth chapter of Genefis, was Chederlasmer, who lived with Amraphel or Ninia, and joyned with him in the war against those Arabians; who was afterward extinguished by the forces of Abraham.

But the great Cyrus was not the first of that name. Herodorus otherwise; and that Cyrus fignifieth a father in the Persian Tongue, and therefore so intituled by the people.

It is true that for his Justice and other excellent vertues he was indeed called a Father; but that the name of Cyrus had any fuch fignifi-cation. I think it be mistaken.

Plutarch hath a third opinion, affirming, That Cyrus is as much to fay as the Sunne, Plus invite Attain in the same Language. How soever it be, yet the Prophet Esay, almost two hundred veries before Cyrus was borne, gives him that name, Thus faith the Lord unto Cyrus his

Before the Conquest of Babylon, the victories which Cyrus obtained were many and great:among which, the Conquest of Lydia, and other Provinces thereto subject, together with the taking of Crashes himselfe, are not recounted by Eusebius, Orosius, and others, but placed among his latter atchievements: whose opinion for this difference of timeisfounded upon two reasons; namely, That of the Median there is no mention in that last war against Crasus: and that the obtaining of Sardis is referred to the eight and fiftieth o lymprad, and the glorious victorie which Cyrus had over Babylon, to the five and fiftieth Olympiad.

The former of which might have bin used (and was by the Greekes) to exclude the Medes from the honour of having won Babylon it felfe, which in due place I have answer red. The latter feems to have reference to the fecond War which Cyrus made upon Lydia, when it rebelled; at which time he so established his former Conquest, as after that timethele Nations never offered to revolt. Wherefore I like better in this particular to believe with Herodotus, whom the most of Chronologers follow, and finde the enterprise of sardis to precede that of Babylon.

Have in the last Book spoken somwhat of Crassus, of his race and predecessors, as also of this kings which governed Lydia in more ancient times: of which the first (to prophane Authors known) was Lydus the fon of Airs: which Familie extinguished, the kingdome was by an Oracle conferred upon Argon, descended from Hercules, whereof there were two and twentie generations, Candaules being the last, who by shewing his hir wife naked to Gyges his favorite, he was by the fame Gyges (thereto urged upon peril of of his own life by the Queen) the next day flain. Which done, Gyges enjoyed both the Queen and the Kingdome of Lydis, and left the fame to Arys his fon, who was father to Salyantes, the father of Halyantes (who thrust the Cimmerians out of Asa) and Halyantes, begat Crasus. Which five Kings, of a third race, enjoyed that kingdome an hundred and Herodia page sevente years. Haly sees the father of Crass was an undertaking Prince, and after he had 400 1. continued a war against Cyaxares the Median, a Prince very powerfull, and maintained it fixe years, a peace was concluded upon equal conditions between them.

Allyages, the son of Cyaxares, and grandfather to Cyrus, thought himselfe greatly honoured by obtaining Argenes, Crasus fifter, whom he married.

But Crasus so farre enlarged his dominions after his father's death, as he was nothing inferior in territory to any King or Monarch of that age: Of which, about that timethere were foure in effect of equall ftrength; to wit, the Median, the Babylonian, the Egyptian and the Lydian: only Nabuchodonofor, after he had joyned Phanicia, Palassina, and E. gypt to his Empire, had thence-forward no Competitor during his owne life.

But Crafus, notwith standing the men and treasure spent in the quarrell of the Babyla. nians, he yet mastered Æolis, Doris, and Ionia, Provinces possest by the Greeks in Asia the lesse, adjoyning to Lydia; gave law to the Phrigians, Bithynians, Carians, Mysians. Paphlagonians, and other Nations. And that he also inforc't the Ephesians to acknowledge him, notwithstanding they compassed their Citie with Diana's girdle, Herodotus witness feth. Moreover, Athenaus out of Berofus (which also Strabe confirmeth) makes report of a Signall victorie which Crassus obtained against the Sacaans, a Nation of the Seythians. in memorie whereof the Babylonians his allies did yearly celebrate a Feast, which they called Sacaa: All which he performed in fourteen years.

And being now confident in the continuance of his good fortune, and envious of Cyrue fame, doubting alfo, that his prosperous undertakings might in the end grow perillous to himselfe, he consulted with the Oracle of Apollo, whom he presented with marvellous rich gifts, what successe he might hope for against cyrus, if he undertooke him: from whom he received this riddle; Croefus, passing over the River Halys, shall diffolve agreat Dominion. For the divell being doubtfull of the fuccesse, payed him with merchandize of 10 both fides alike, and might be inverted either way, to the ruine of Persia, or of his owne Lydia.

6. III.

Croesus his Expedition against Cyrus.

PEreupon Crafus being resolved to stop the course of Cyrus fortunes, if he could, despised all the arguments used by Sandanes to the contrary, who desired him to fore-think. That he urged a Nation inhabiting a barren and mountainous Re- 10 gion, a people not covered with the foft filke of worms, but with the hard skins of beafts; not fed with such meat as they fancied, but content with what they found; drinkers of water, not of wine: and in a word, a Nation warlike, enduring, valiant and profperous; over whom if he became victorious, he could thereby enrich himselfe in nothing but fame, in which he already excelled: and if by them beaten, and subjected, so great would his losse appeare of all things which the world hath in account, as the same could neither hastily be told, nor readily conceived.

Notwithstanding this folid counsel, Crassus having prepared a powerful armie, he led the fame toward Media, but in his passage he was arrested at Pterium, a City of great strength in Cappadocia; which while he fought by all means to furprise or to force, Cyrus cameon, 40 and found the Lydians encamped before it. That each was inferior to other in strengthor opinion, I doe not find: for out of doubt, Crafus, as he excelled any Prince of that age in riches and abilitie; so was he not under any in territorie and fame that then lived.

But as Cratippus of Mitylene answered Pompey when he complained against the gods, because they favoured a disturber and usurper of the Common-weale against hint who fought for the Romane libertie, That Kingdomes and Common-weals had their encreafe and period from divine Ordinance: fo at this time was the winter of Crasus prosperitie at hand, the leaves of his flourishing fortune ready to fall, and that of Cyrus but in the flower and first spring. The God of all power, and not Admetis Herdman, spotto, had given a date to the one, and a beginning of glory to the other.

When thefe two Armies were in view of each other, after the entertainment of divers skirmishes, the Persians and Lydians began to joyn in grosse troupes: supplies from both Kings thrust on upon the falling off, and advancement of either Nations: and as the Persans had somewhat the better of the day, so when the darkevaile of night had hidden each Armie from the others view, Crasus doubting what successe the rising Sunne would bring with it, quitted the field to Cyrus, and with all speed possible retyred, and taking the next way into Lydia, recovered Sardis his first Citie and Regall Seat, without any pursuit made by Cyrus to retard him. Where being arrived, and nothing fuspecting Cyrus approach, or any other warre for that Winter, he dismissed the Souldiers, and fent the troupes of his fundrie Nations to their owne Provinces, appointing them to re-affemble at the end of five moneths, acquainting his Commanders with his intents for the renewing of the warre at the time appointed.

6. IV.

The Conquest of Lydiaby Cyrus.

Trus in the following morning finding the Lydians departed, put his Armie in order to pursue them, yet not so hastily, and at their heeles, as to be discovered. But having good intelligence of Crasus his proceeding, he so measured his marches, as he presented not himselfe before Sardis, till such time as Crasus had disposed his Armie to their wintring garrifons: which being altogether unlooked for, and unfeared. he furrounded Sardis with his Armie; Wherein Crassis having no other Companies than his Citizens and ordinary Guards, after fourteen dayes fiege the same was entred by affault, and all executed that refifted. Crafus having now neither arms to fight, nor wings to flie, Sardis being on all parts strongly encompassed, thrust himselfe into the heape and In communicates miserable multitude of his vassals, and had undergone the common fortune of common que habet fortu-20 persons vanquished, had not a son of his, who had been dumb all his life (by extremitie nam, curi, of passion and feare enabled) cried out to the Souldiers to spare Crassis. Who thereup demonstrates released despoyled of all things but the same factor of the permit timer vo onbeing taken and imprisoned, despoyled of all things but the expectation of death, he cit estimates was forthwith tied in fetters, and let on the top of a great and high heape of wood, to tum, oc. be confumed to ashes thereon. To which when the fire was fet and kindled, remembring solinare the discourse which he had with the Athenian Law-giver, he thrice cried out on his name, Solon, Solon, Solon: and being demanded what he meant by that invocation, he first used silence: but urged againe, he told them, That he had now found it true which Solon had long fince told him, That many men in the race and courses of their lives might 30 well be accounted fortunate, but no man could discerne himselfe for happy indeed, till his minecalamito

Of which answer Cyrus being speedily informed, remembring the changes of fortune meminis sia, cag. and his owne mortalitie, he commanded his ministers of Justice to withdraw the fire with all diligence, to fave Crafus, and to conduct him to his prefence: Which done, Cymidemanded of him, Who it was that had perfwaded him? or what felfereason had conducted him to invade his territorie, and to make him of a friend an enemiee To whom hethus answered; It was thy prosperous, and my unprosperous destiny (the Grecian god flattering therewithall my ambition) that were the inventers and conductors of Crasus warre against Cyrus.

Cyrus being pierc't with Crafts answer, & bewailing his estate, though victorious over it, did not only spare his life, but entertained him ever after as a King and his companion, hewing therein a true effect of mercy indeed, Que non caufam, fed fortunam fect at.

And herein is the reall difference discerned between that behaviour which we call bemilitium latronis, and gratiam Principis: Atheefe sometime sparing the life of him which isin his power, but unjustly: A King that giveth breath, and a continuance of being, to him that was the cause and author of his owne evill.

The report made by Xenophon, is, That Cyrus did friendly entertain Crasus at the first fight, not mentioning that which Herodotus delivers, and is here already fet down, that he fould have bin burnt alive. It may very well be, that Xenophon pourtraying (in Cyrus) an heroicall Prince, thought an intent so cruell, fitter to be forgotten than rehearsed, as too much mis-beseeming a generous nature. And it is very likely, that neerenesse of alliance might with-hold Cyrus (had he bin otherwise vicious) from so cruell a purpose against his grandmothers brother. How soever it was, the morall part of the Storie hath given much credit and reputation to the report of Herodotus (as to many the like it often doth) and made it passe for currant, though the trust reposed in Crasus afterwards may seem to argue, that Cyrus did not use him inhumanely at the first.

For as Herodotus himselfetelleth us, when Cyrus past with his Armie over Araxes into Seythia, he left Crafus to accompany and advise his sonne Cambyses, Governour of the Empire in his absence, with whom he lived all the time of Cyrus, & did afterward follow

Camby ses into Egypt, where he hardly escaped his tyrannous hand. What his end was, I

But in this time the races of three of the greatest Kings in that part of the world took end; to wir, of the Babylonians, Medians, and Lydians; in Balthafar, Cyaxares, and Crafu.

6. V.

How Cyrus won Babylon.

Fter this Lydian War enfued the great Conquest of Babylon, which gave unto 10 Cyrus an Empire fo large & mightie, that he was justly reputed the greatest Mo. narch then living upon earth. How long time the preparations for this great action took up, it is uncertain; only it feems, that ten whole years did passe between his taking those two Cities of Sardis and Babylon; which neverthelesse I doe not thinke to have bin wholly occupied in provision for the Affyrian war, but rather to have bin spent in fettling the Estate which he had already purchased. And hereunto perhaps may bereferred that which Crefic hath in his fragments of a war made by Cyrus upon the Sentians, though related as foregoing the victorie obtained against Crasas. He telleth us, That Cyrus invaded Seythia, and being victorious over that Nation, took Amorges their King prisoner: but being ira second battell overthrown by the wife of Amorges, Sparetha, and, therein taken, the one King was delivered for the other.

Likewise it may be thought, that no finall part of those troubles which arose in the lower Affa, grew foon after the departure of the victorious armie, before the Conquest was fully established.

For after Cyrus was returned out of Afia the leffe, many Nations, conquered formerly by Crassis, and now by Cyrus, revolted from him; against whom he imployed Pattin, and then Harpagus, who first reduced the Phocians under their former obedience, and then the rest of the Greekes inhabiting Asia the lesse, as the Ionians, Carians, Rollans, and Lycians, who refolvedly (according to the strength they had) defended themselves. But in the attempt upon Babylon it felfe, it is not to be doubted, that Cyrus employed all his to forces, having taken order before-hand, that nothing should be able to divert him, orto raise that siege, and make frustrate the work upon which he did set all his rest. And great reason there was, that he should bend all his care and strength unto the taking of thatcitie, which beside the same and reputation that it held, as being head of an Empiretherron depending, was fo strongly fenced with a treble wall of great height, & surrounded with waters unfoordable, so plentifully victualled for many years, that the inhabitants were not only free from all doubt and fear of their estate, but despised and derided all purposes and power of their befiegers.

The only hope of the Medes and Persians, who despaired of carrying by affault a Citie so wel fortified & manned, was in cutting off all supplies of victuals and other necessaries: 40 wherof though the Town was faid to be stored sufficiently for more than 20. years, yet might it well be deemed, that in such a world of people as dwelt within those gates, one great want or other would foon appear, &vanquish the resolution of that unwarlike multitude. In expecting the fuccess of this course, the besiegers were likely to enduremuch travel, & all invain, if they did not keep streight watch & strong guards upon all quarters.

This was hard to doe, in regard of the valt circuit of those walks which they were to gird in, with numbers neither great enough, nor of men sufficiently assured unto their commander: The confideration whereof ministred unto the Babylonians matter of good Kenuph, Cyropad, paltime, when they faw the Lydians, Phrygians, Cappadocians, and others, quartered a bout their Town to keep them in, who having bin their ancient friends and allies, were so more likely to joyne with them, if occasion were offered, than to use much diligence on the behalfe of Cyrus, who had, as it were, yesterday layd upon their neckes the galling yoake of servitude. Whilest the besieged were pleasing themselves in this deceitfull and vaine gladnesse, that is the ordinarie fore-runner of fudden calamitie; 69rus, whom the Ordinance of God made strong, constant, and inventive, devised by formany channels and trenches as were sufficient and capable of Euphrates, and so to draw the same from the walls of Babylon, thereby to make his approach the more facile and affured: which when by the labour of many hands hee had performed, he stayed the time of his advantage for the execution: for he had left certain bankes or heads un-cut, between the maine river which furrounded the Citie, and his owne Tren-

Now Balthasar, finding neither any want or weaknes within, nor any possibilitie of approach for his enemies without, prepared an exceeding fumptuous feast, publike Plaves and other Pastimes, and thereto invited a thousand of his Princes or Nobilitie, besides his wives, curtizans, & others of that trade. This he did either to let the befiegers know. that his provisions were either sufficient, not onely for all needfull uses, but even for iollitie and excesse: Or because he hoped that his enemies, under the burthen of many diffress were well neere broken; or in honour of Bel his most reverenced Idoll:Or that To it was his birth or coronation day: Or for many or all these respects. And hee was not contented with fuch magnificence as no Prince else could equal, but (using Daniels words) He lifted himself up against the Lord of Heaven: for he & his Princes, wives & concibines, made carowing cups of the Veffels of God, in contempt of whom he praifed hisown puppets, made of Silver and Gold, of Braffe, Iron, Wood, and Stone; Quanta fuit fultitia in vafibus aureis bibentes, ligneos & lapideos deos landare; Hom great a foolifhne fe wait (faith S. Hierome) drinking in golden Cups, to praise gods of Wood and Stone. While Bathalar was in this fort triumphing, and his braines well filled with vapors, he beheld ahand, which by divine power wrote on the wall opposite unto him, certaine words which he understood not : wherewith so great a feare and amazement seized him, as the iounts of his loynes were loofed, and his knees smore one against the other. Which past. Dans. 6. from when he had in some part recovered, he cried out for his Chaldwans, Astrologians. and Soothfayers, promising them great rewards, and the third place of honor in the kingdome to him that could reade and expound the writing; but it exceeded their Art. In this diffurbance and aftonishment the Queen hearing what had past, and of the Kings amazement, after reverence done, used this speech: There is a man in thy Kingdome, in whom is the Pirit of the holy Gods, and in the dayes of thy father light, and understanding & willdome, like the wifedome of the Gods, was found in him, whom the King Nabuchodonofor. 30 the father the King (I say) thy father made chiefe of the Inchanters, Aftrologians, Chaldeans, and Sooth fayers, because a more excellent spirit, and knowledge, and understanding oc. were found in him, even in Daniel, &c. Now let Daniel be called, and he will declare the interpretation.

This Queen. Folephow takes for the grandmother; Origen and Theodoret for the mother orige Thank of Balthafar : either of which may be true : for it appeareth, that the was not any of the in Dan. Hopps. Kings wives, because absent from the feast; and being past the age of dancing and ban-ant. 10. quetting, the came in upon the bruit of the miracle, and to comfort the King in his diftraation: And whereas Daniel was forgotten and neglected by others both of younger yeares and times, this old Queene remembred well what he had done in the dayes of Nabuchedono for, grandfather to this Balthafar, and kept in mind both his religion and di-

When Daniel was brought to the Kings presence, who acknowledged those excellent graces wherewith God had enriched him, he prayed him, together with promises of reward and honour, to reade and interpret those words miraculously written; to whom Daniel made answer in a farre different style from that he used towards his Grandsather: for the evill which he foretold Nabuchodonofor, he wished that the same might befall his enemies: but to this King(whofe neglect of God and vice he hated) he answered inthese words. Keepethy rewards to thy selfe, and give thy gifts to another, yet will I reade the writing unto the King, and shew him the interpretation. Which before he had performed, he gave him first the cause of Gods just judgement against him, and the reason of this terrible sentence, whereof the King and all his Wise men were utterly ignorant. Which being written at large in Daniel, hath this effect, That forgetting Gods good-neffects his Father, whom all Nations feared and obeyed, and that for his pride and neglect of those benefits, as he deprived him of his estate and understanding; so upon the acknowledgement of Gods infinite power he restored him to both. This King notwithstanding lifted himselfe up against the same God, and presuming both to abuse those vessels dedicated to holy uses, and neglecting the Lord of all power, praised and Worshipped the dead Idols of Gold, Silver, Brasse, Iron, Stone, and Wood: and therefore those words from the Oracle of a true God delivered, (to wit) Mene, Tekel, Maharfin, gave the King knowledge, that God had numbred the time of his kingdome, and finished it: That he was weighed in the ballance of Gods justice, and found too light; and that his Empire was divided and given to the Medes and Persians.

is empire was divided and get of this day, wherein Balthafar feafted and perished, Cyrus. either by his espiall, according to Xenophon, or inspired by God himselfe, whose ensigne he followed in this warre, found the time and opportunitie to invite him: and therefore while the Kings head, and the heads of his Nobilitie were no leffe filled with the vapors of wine, than their hearts with the feare of Gods judgement, he caused all the banks and heads of his trenches to be opened and cut downe with that diligence, as by them hee neads or his trenches to be opened and current, by whose channell running, his to drew the great River of Euphrates dry for the present, by whose channell running, his to Armie made their entrance, finding none to disturbe them. All the Town lay buried (as the Poet faith) in fleepe and wine: fuch as came in the Persians way, were put to the fword, unlesse they saved themselves by slight, as some did, who ranne away crying, and filling the streets with an uncertaine tumult.

Such Assirian Lords as had revolted from Balthafar, and betaken themselves to the partie of Cyru, did now conduct a selected companie to the Kings Palace; which having eafily forced, they rushed into the chamber where the King with his Princes were banquetting, flew both him and them without any mercie, who struggled in vain tokeep those lives which God had newly threatned to take away. And now was the prophecie of Jeremie fulfilled, and that of Efay, two hundred yeares before this subversion, who in his seven and fortieth Chapter, and elsewhere, writeth this destruction so feelingly and lively as if he had beene present both at the terrible slaughter there committed and had scene the great and unfeared change and calamitic of this great Empire; yea, and had alfo heard the forrowes and bewailings of every furviving foule thereunto subject. His Prophecie of this place he beginneth in the se words: Come downe, and sit in the dust, o virgin daughter of Babel : fit on the ground, there is no Throne, &c. And again, Sit fill and get thee into darkenesse, O daughter of the Chald aans, for thou shall no more be called the La die of Kingdomes. For though it cannot be doubted, that God used Nabuchodonofer and the Chaldrans, to punish the Idolatric of the Judrans, yet Esay teacheth us in this place, That he did not yet forget, that the execution of his judgements was mixt with a rigo- 30 rous extremitie. For (faith Efay) in the person of God, I was wroth with my people, I have polluted mine inheritance, and given them into thine hand thou didft shew them no mercy, but thou didft lay thy very heavy yoak upon the ancient. I will rife up against them faiththe Lud of Hofts, and will cut off from Babel the name and the remnant, and the sonne and the nephin. And in the thirteenth, Every one that is found, shalbe stricken thorow and who sever joyneth himself, shalfall by the sword, their children also shall be broken in pieces before their cies, their houses soyled, and their wives ravished. So as there is no Historian who was either present at this victory of Cyrus, or that received the report from others truly as it was, that could better leave the same to posteritie after it happened, than Esay hath done in many places of his Prophecies, which were written two hundred years before any thing attemp- 40 ted.

The greatnesse and magnificence of Babylon, were it not by divers grave Authors set down, might seem altogether fabulous : for, besides the reports of Saint Hierome, Solinus, and Orofius, Aristotle in the third of his Politikes, the second Chapter, received the report for true, That one part of the Citie knew not that the rest was taken three dayes after. Which is not impossible, if the testimonie of Diodorus Siculus may betaken; who findes the compatte thereof at three hundred and threescore Stadia or Farlongs, which makes five and fortie miles: the walls whereof had fo great a breadth, that fixe Chariots might passe in front thereon. And of height, according to Ctesias and Clitracus, three hundred threescore and five foot, garnished with an hundred and fiftie Towers, so Strabo in the beginning of his fixteenth Booke of Geographie gives it a greater circuit, adding five and twentie furlongs more to the former compasse, reckoning the same at three hundred fourescore and five furlongs, which makes eight and fortie mile and one furlong, but finds the wall farre under that which Diodore reports and fo doth Curtime measure their thicknesse but at two and thirtie foot, and their height at an hundred cubits, which is also very much severy cubit containing a foot and halfe of the large meafure, though to the whole circuit of the Citie he gives the fame with Szculus, and eight furlongs more. Herodotus findes a greater content than Strabo doth, namely, foure him-

Ared and fourescore furlongs circle; the thicknesse of the wall he measures at fiftie cuhits, and the height at two hundred of the same regall cubit. For entrance it had an hun-Heylat. dred gates of Brasse, with posts and hookes to hang them on of the same mettall: and therefore did the Prophet Efay rightly intitle Babylon, The Princesse and Glory of king. Elay 47.8:130

But when Cyrus had wonne her, he stript her out of her Princely Robes, and made hera flave; dividing not onely all her goodly houses, and her whole Territorie, with all the riches therein contained, among his Souldiers; but bestowing the inhabitants themfelves as bond-flaves upon those that had taken possession of their goods.

Touching the reigne of Cyrus, and the time which he enjoyed in rest and pleasure. I can fay no more of it, than that it is generally agreed by all Chronologers to have lasted only seven yeares: in which time he made such Constitutions as differ little from the ordinances of all wife Kings that are defirous to establish a Royall power to themselves and their posteritie.

6. VI.

The end of Cyrus.

Helast warre, and the end of this great King Cyrus, is diversly written. Herodo. tus and Justine deliver, That after the Conquest of Asia the lesse, Cyrus invaded the Massagetes, a very warlike Nation of the Scythians, governed by Tomyris their Queene : and that in an incounter between the Persians and these Northerne Nomides, Tomyris loft her armie, and her Son Spargapifes that commanded it: In revenge whereof this Queen making new levies of men of War, and following the War against Crrus, in a second battell beat the Persian Armie, and taking Cyrus prisoner, cut off his headfrom his bodie, and cast the same into a boule of bloud, using these words; Thou that hast all thy life time thir sted for bloud, now drinke thy fill, and satiate thy selfe.

Ithould hereby feeme, that Cyrus knowing the strength and multitude of those of fozen Nations, was perswaded to abate their furie by some forcible invasion and depopulation, because in the time of Cyaxares, father to Astrages, those Scythians invaded Media and Afia the leffe, and held the fame in a fervile fubjection eight and twenty

This war which Metasthenes calleth Tomyrique, lasted (faith he) fixe years, and rook end at the end of Cyrus.

But in this particular I beleeve with Viginier, that this Scythian War was rather the famewhich Cyrus made against the Sacians, before the conquest of Lydia, according to Clefias before cited, who calleth Tomyris, Sparetha, though he deliver the successe of that warotherwise than Herodotus doth: The rather (faith Viginier) because Strabo in his ele-Vigorim part Wenth book reciteth. that Cyrus fur prized the Sacians by the same stratagem by which Bib. Justine faith he defeated the son of Tomyris. And the same Ctefias also reporteth, That cied, 15, bill part. the last war which Cyrus made, was against Amorrhaus king of the Derbicians, a Nation (wtherest) of Scythia; whom though he overcame, yet he then received the wound of his death, which he suffered three dayes after.

Strabo also affirmeth, That he was buried in his owne Citie of Pasagardes, which him-strabliss selfhad built, and where his Epitaph was to be read in his time; which is said to have bin this: O vir quicunque es. & undecunque advenis, neque enim te adventurum ignoravi: Ego sum Cyrus qui Persis imperium constitui pusillum hoc terræ quo meum tegitur corpus mihi ne invidias; O thou man who sever thou art or whence sever thou commest; for I was not ignooransthat thou shouldest come: I am Cyrus that founded the Persian Empire, doe not envieuntomethis little earth, with which my bodie is covered.

This Tombe was opened by Alexander, as Qu. Curtius reporteth, either upon hope of Q. cutl. trealure, supposed to have been buried with him, or upon desire to honour his dead bodie with certaine ceremonies; in which there was found an old rotten Target, two seythis Bowes, and a Sword. The Coffin wherein his bodie lay, Alexander caused to be covered with his owne garment, and a Crowne of gold to be fet upon it. Thefe things well confidered, as they give credit to the reports of Xenophon and Zonaras, so they de-zenpeds. rogate much from Herodotus, who leaves his bodie in the hands of Tomyris.

CHAP-3. S.8.

And furely, had Cyrus loft the Armie of Perfia in Scythia, it is not likely, that his fon would fo foone have transported all his remaining forces into Egypt, fo farre off from would to took that Nation then victorious, and bordering Media; neither had that quarter: the Seythian Nation then victorious, and bordering Media; Cambyses beene able in such haste to have undertaken and performed so great a Conquest. Wherefore I rather believe Xenophon, saying, That Cyrus dyed aged and in peace. and that finding in himselfe that he could not long enjoy the world, he called unto him his Nobilitie, with his two sonnes, Cambyses and Smerdis, or after Xenophon, Tanaoxares. and after a long Oration, wherein he affured himselfe, and raught others of the immortalitie of the Soule, and of the punishments and rewards following the good and ill deserving of every man in this life; he exhorted his fons by the strongest arguments he had, to a perpetual concord and agreement. Many other things he uttered, which make it probable, that he received the knowledge of the true God from Daniel, when he governed Susa in Persia; and that Cyrus himselfe had read the Prophecie of Esay, wherein he was expressely named, and by God(for the deliverie of his people) preordained. Whichaet of delivering the Jewes from their Captivitie, and of restoring the holy Temple and Citie of Hierusalem, was in true consideration the noblest work that ever Cyrus performed. For in other actions he was an instrument of Gods power, used for the chastifing of many Nations, & the establishing of a government in those parts of the world, which was not long to continue. But herein he had the grace to be an instrument of Gods goodnesse, anda willing advancer of his Kingdome upon earth; which must last for ever, though heaven is and earth shall perish.

6. VII.

Of Cyrus bis Decree for building the Temple of Godin Jerusalem.

Aving thereforespoken of his great victories, mentioned by sundrie Historians, the glory of all which was a reward of this his fervice done unto him that was Author of them and of all goodnesse: I hold it meet at length to speake of the Decree made in the first of his Raigne, being perhaps the first that ever he made after to his possession of the Babylonian Empire: That the captive Jewes should return eaguing into their owne Territorie, and re-build the House of God in Jerusalem, having nowendured and finished the threescore and ten years captivitie, by the Prophets foretold For the accomplishing whereof, hee gave order to his Treasurers to surnish them with all things necessary and wanting. He also restored unto them five thousand four chundred threescore and nine Vessels of Gold and Silver, wherof Nabuchodonofor, the grandfather of Balthafar had formerly robbed the Temple.

The number of the Jewes which returned out of Chald eaunder their Leader Zonbebel, the fon of Salathiel, and Nephew to King Jeconias, and Jefus or Jofua the fon of Jofudak, were about fifty thousand; where, as soon as they arrived, they built an Altar to the living God, and facrificed thereon, according to their own law, and afterward bethought themselves how to prepare materials for the rebuilding of the Temple.

But no sooner did the Jewes begin to lay any one stone, than the Samaritans and other idolatrous Nations adjoyning, gave all the impediment they could. So did the Governours of those Provinces under Cyrus altogether countenance the disturbers, and inno fort favoured the Jewes, nor the labours nor purposes they had in hand. Andnot onely those which were but Provinciall Lievtenants and other officers of leffe place, but Came byfes himfelfe, who having the charge of the whole Empire, while Cyrus was buffed otherwise, countermanded the building begun. And whereas some Authors make doubt, that whatfoever Camby ses did when himselfe had obtained the Empire, yet during the life of Cyrus there was no fuch impediment or prohibition: They may herein refolve themselves out of Estras, That by the conspiracies of the neighbouring Nations, the building was hindered all the time of King Cyrus life, &c. And therfore it is true, that the Jewes themselves affirm, as it is written in the second of John, That the Temple was 46. years in fetting up, having received fo many hinderances from the first foundation to the second of Darius.

And if we feek the naturall and politique courses which moved Camby sesto withstand his fathers decree, as well while he governed under him, as when him lesse became sold and foveraigne Monarch, we shall find them in that Epistle remembred by Esdras, written by Belemus, Mithridates, and the rest, Presidents and Councellors in Phanicia, whereinthey complaine that the Jewes were evermore rebellious and troublers of Kings 3 that Edux. their City being once built, they would then refuse to pay tribute, and fall from the ohedience of the Empire, as they had formerly done in the times of other kings.

But that which for that present seemed the most forcible impediment, was, that Camby having it in his resolution to invade Egypt, and that it was a common opinion. That the Jewes were descended of those Nations, because they issued thence under Moses. when they conquered Judga; their Citie being once repaired and fortified, they might o returne to their old vomit, and give the fame disturbance to Cambyses Conquest, which they did to Sennacherib, Nabuchodono for, and other Kings of Babylon. For as it is written Ezechic. 290 in Exechiel, Egypt was the confidence of the house of Israel.

But it is to be understood, as Codoman and others have observed, that Artaxerxes, to whom the Counsellors and Governors of Phanicia complained against the Jewes, did nor recede, but succeed Darius Histaspes, as in the fixth and seventh chapters of Eldras it is madeplain: and also that those Governors (whose Epistle sheweth as much) did not withfland the building of the Temple, but the fortifying and encloting of the City, as by thereasons given in the said Epistle, and by the Kings answer, it is evident.

Also in the fixt of Exta, the fourteenth verse, the kings are named in order as they gowemed, and Areaxerxes written after Darius; as: And they built and finished it (to wit the Temple) by the appointment of the God of Ifrael & by the commandement of Cyrus & Danus and Artah shafte Kings of Persia. Lastly, in the seventh of Ezrait is written; Now afurthlethings, in the reigne of Artahshaste King of Perfix : which was as much to fay, as after the finishing of the Temple in Darius time. And therefore Artaxerxes in the second of Eldras is there named by anticipation, not in his owne time and place.

Andthus much concerning the rebuilding of the Citie and Temple of Hierusalem. Whichaction though prospered by the hand of God, was very slowly pursued by the men whom it most concerned, but first set on foot by Cyrus. The other ordinances of Cym, with his forme and manner of government, are to be found in Xenophon. At his to deathhebequeathed the Empire unto his eldest some Cambyses, appointing Smerdis or Tananxares his yonger fonto be Satrapa, or Lievtenant of Media, Armenia, and Cadulia; and then died, after he had reigned (faith Herodotus) one and thirty years, or (according to Justine but thirty.

§. VIII.

Of Cyrus his issue: and whether Atossa were his daughter, or (as some thinke) were the same with Queene Hefter.

Yrus had iffue two fons, Cambyses and Smerdis, with three daughters, Atossa, Meroe, and Artystona: Ctesias addeth to these, Amytis. Atolia and Meroe their brother Camby ses married; Arty stona, Darius Hystaspes obtained; so did hee A-10 , Camby sei being dead : who (as some Writers have supposed) inflamed both her husbands, Darrus, and Xerxes after him, to invade Greece, to bee avenged of the whole Nation for the cruell intent that Aman (whom the old Translation calletha Macadoni-41) had against the Tewes, though the opinion of Tosephus be more probable, who finds Aman to be an Amalekite. But it is hard to be understood, how Atoffa, the daughter of Cynus, should have beene Esther, whose History seemes rather to appertaine to the time of Artaxerxes Longimanus, than of Darius the son of Hystaspes, or of Xerxes. The desire of Atossa to have Greece brought under the yoke of Persia, was party grounded upon the honour which thereby she thought her husband might obtaine, parely upon a feminine humour of gerting many brave Dames, Corinthians, Athenians, and others of that Nation to bee her bond-women. Wherefore I cannot give affent to the opinion of Codoman, who upon the neare found of the two names, Aroffa and Hadaffa, (by the latter of which Efther was also called) makes them to have been one person. For thoughit beetrue that Efter concerning her parentage, a while might beetaken for a great Lady; yet Codomans inference is nothing probable, that she should therefore, and for the great affection which the King bare unto her, be thought the daughter of Cyrus. Certaine it is, that Efther did at length discover her Kindred and Nation; whereby, if Histories could be kept free from this errour, yet the people and especially the Nobility, must needs have understood the truth: who neverthelesse did so well know theparentage of Atoffa, that for her fake, as being daughter of Cyrus, her fon Xerxes was prefer red to the kingdome before his elder brother, against whom also he could have pretended a very weake claime. But of these things more hereafter in fitter place.

6. I.

Of the number and names of the Persian Kings.

F the fucceffors of Cyrus, and the continuance of the Persian Empire, there are many opinions; As that of Metasthenes, who hath numbered the Persian Kings, and their times as followeth.

Darius Medus, and Cyrus joyntly.	2	1
Cyrus alone.	22
Priscus Artanernes.	20	[]
Darius Longimanus.	37	1
Darius Nothus.	19	> yeare
Ataxerxes Mnemon.	55	li .
Artaxerxes Ochus.	26
Arfes, or Arfames.	4
Darius the last, conquered by Alexande	r. 6	jį

To which Philo agreeth; which number of yeares added, make in all an hundred ninetie and one. But in this Catalogue Metasthenes hath left out Cambyses and Xerxes, and names Artaxerxes Affuerus for the immediate fuccessor of Cyrus; in place (faith Mulancton) of Darius the son of Hystashes: for Metasthenes, as Melancton conjectureth, doth not account Camby ses in the Catalogue, because his reigne was consounded with that of Cyrus.

There is a fecond opinion, though ridiculous, of Sedar Olam, who finds but foure Perfian Kings from the beginning to the end of that Empire.

Genebrard, Schubert, and Beroaldus have also a differing account from the Greeks; whom nevertheleffe Eusebius and most of the Latines follow, and sodoth Krentzhim, who hathfully answered, and, as I take it, refuted all the former Authors varying from that account. For in this fort doe the Greekes marshall the Persian Kings with the times of their reignes.

Cyrus in all. Melaniton gives 8 Cambries with the Magi. Cyrus but 29. 36 Darius Hyftaspes. 21 Xerxes. Melantt. but 20. Artaxerxes Longimanus. veares, Darius Nothus. 43 Artaxerxes Mnemon. Melantt. but 40 Artaxerxes Ochus. 23 Melanit.26. Ar fames. Darius the last. Melanel-4

Which numbers put together, make in all two hundred and thirty.

This account (as I have faid) the most Chronologers and the best learned approve. These Persian Princes, being all warranted by the authority of the Scriptures, as Peucer in his historicall Animadversions hath gathered the places; finding first Cyrus in the second of Chronicles, ch. 36. ver. 22,23. EZra. 1. ch. 1. ver. 1. and often elsewhere.

Secondly, Cambyfes in the eleventh of Daniel, who may indeed be well efteemed for one of those three Kings in the second verse named, and so the marginall Commentor aponthe Geneva undestands that place; but, under correction, mistakes the matter greatly, when he faith in the fame note, that Darius Hystaspes was an enemy to the people of God, and stood against them: his great favour and liberality to the Jewes being else-

Thirdly, is Darius Hystaspes found in Ezrathe first, c.4.v.5. who in the fixt verse is alforamed Ahas Juerus.

Fourthly, in the eleventh of Daniel verse the second, Xerxes is plainely foretold and described, and the great warre which he should make against the Greekes by Daniel re-

Fifly, Artaxernes Longimanus in Ezra the fourth, verse seven, who is also called Arthatalta, c.4.l. I. EZr. v. 7. and cap. 7. v. 7.

Sixtly, Darsus Nothus, Ezra cap. 4. verse 24. and cap. 5. verse 6. Nehem. cap. 120

Seventhly, Artaxerxes Mnemon in Nehem. 6.2. v. 1. who was father to Artaxerxes Ochas and Arfames: for Darius the last, he was of another Family, the Line of Cyrus the Great ending in Ochus, who descended from Xerxes the son of Atosa, Cyrus his daughter; and the iffue male of Cyrus failing with his owne fons.

Butto proceed, Eufebius with the Latines, following the Greeks, apply the beginnings and ends of every Persian King with their Acts, to some certaine Olympiad; As the war of Alyages (Cyrus his maternall Grand-father) and Alyastes (Crafus his father) to the nine and fortieth Olympiad; The beginning of Cyrus reigne to the beginning of the five and fifieth Olympiad; The taking of Sardis by Cyrus to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad; Theinvasion of Egypt by Cambyses to the third year of the threescore and third Olympiad, and so of the rest. Which reference with good agreement between severall formes of computation, adde the more credit unto both.

Againe, this historicall demonstration is confirmed by the Astronomical Computati- Prolin Alm. 1.30 onof Pulamie, who refers the death of Alexander the Great, who died the 12.0f No- eq. 8. vember, in the beginning of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad, to the foure hundred and foureand twentieth yeare after Nabonassar. And the Ara of Nabonassar began onthe fixe and twentieth of February: which conferred with the Olympiad, was in the ninth Moneth of the first yeare of the eighth Olympiad; So that whether wee follow the accounts of the Olympiads, as doe the Greeke Historians, or that of Nabonassar with Ptolomie, we shall finde every memorable accident to fall out right with each comto putation.

For Ptolomy reckons the time answerable to two hundred and foure and twenty Julimyears, and an hundred and forty dayes from Nabonassar to the fixteenth of July in the seventh year of Camby ses.

The Greekes, and namely, Diodorus Siculus, place the taking of Egypt by Cambyles in the second or third yeare of the three score and third Olympiad, and the beginning of Cambyfes seventh yeare, in the first of the threescore and fourth Olympiad: which first of the three score and fourth Olympiad runs along with part of the two and twentieth of Nabonasfar. The like agreement is consequently found about the beginning and end Likewise the twentieth of Darins, who succeeded Camby ses, is according to Ptolomie thetwo hundred and fixe and fortieth of Nabonassar, which observing the differences of Nabonassars Ara and the Olympiad, vil eight and twenty yeares) agrees with the third of the three ftore and ninth Olympiad, wherein it is placed by the Greek. In this Josephus agrees with the Greekes throughout, faving that he joyneth Darius Medus, whom Xeno-Hom calleth Cyaxares, with Cyrus in the destruction of Babylon; which is true, and not contrary to the Greeke computation, but may very well frand with it.

Lastly, the disagreements & confused accompts of those that follow the other Catalogue of the Persian kings formerly rehearsed, doth give the greater credit to this of the Greekes, which being constant in it selfe, accordeth also with the computation of other Historians, and Astronomers, and likewise with the holy Scriptures.

§. II.

of Cambyses, and the conquering of Egypt by him.

Ee will therefore according to the truth give the Empire of Persato Camby less the fon of Cyrus, though degenerate in all things, faving the defireto increase the greatnesse of his Empire: wherof he was possest in his Fathers time while Cyrus made war in the North. Cresius with others give him a longer reigne than agreeth with the Grecian accompt before received.

In the fifth yeare of his fole reigne, and in the third yeare of the threefcore and third Olympiad, according to Diodore and Eusebius, he invaded Egypt, and having overthrown the King thereof, Pfammenitieus, he not onely caused him to be slaine, but also did putto death all his kindred and dependants, with the most of his children.

Herodotus and Ctefias give for cause of this war (being no other indeed than the Ambition of Cambyses) that when he sent to Amasis king of Egypt, to have his daughter in marriage, Amasis presented him with Nitetis the daughter of Apries his predecessor, which Cambyfes disdained.

Howsoever it were; true it is, that Cambyses gathered an Armie fit for such an enterprise, and caused the same to march. But before they entred Egypt, Amasis died, and left 20 Pfammeniticus, whom Ctesias called Amyrteus, his successor; who enjoyed Egyprafter his father (according to the best copies of Herodotus) but sixe Moneths, though other Chronologers give him fixe yeares.

But how long soever he held the Crowne, in one battell hee lost it, and was himselfe

It is faid that Cambyfes, following therein the example of Cyrus, did not only sparelie to the conquered King, but that he also trusted him with the government of Egypt, and that upon fome revolt, or suspicion thereof, he caused him to be flaughtered. But the race of this King was not so extirpated, if we may believe Herodotus and Thucydides, butthat heleft a foncalled Inarus, who caused the Egyptians to revolt both from Xerxes and dr-

That Pfarmenitions was at the first entreated gently by Cambyfes, I hold it very inprobable, if it beetrue which is also written of him, That he so much hated Amasisthe King of Egypt, who died before his arrivall, that he caused his body to be drawne out of the grave, and after divers indignities used, commanded the same to be burnt, contrary to the custome both of the Egyptians and Persians. For the Egyptians used to powdertheir dead bodies with falt, and other drugs, to the end the wormes might not devourethen. The * Persians durst not consume them with fire, which they esteemed as a God, and therefore feared to feed it with Carrion.

6. III. The rest of Cambyses his Ads.

Fter this victory obtained in Ezypt, Camby fes fent an Army into Cyprus, and conftrained Eveliber King thereof to acknowledge him, who before held that Iland of the Egyptians.

While Camby (es yet busied himselfe in Egypt, he so much detested the Idolatry of that had untombed Nation, as he caused the images themselves, with the Temples wherein they were worthe carkaste of the carkante of Cains Marins at Thipped, to be torne downe and defaced. This done, he directed a part of his Armie into Lybia, to overturne the Temple of Jupiter Ammon; but the Divell in defence of his Oratorie raised such a Tempest of Sand, wherewith the greatest part of that Country is covered, as the Persians were therewith choked and over-whelmed.

Notwithstanding which misadventure, Herodotus and Sentea report, that disdaining to be refifted, he prepared the rest of his Army, which himself meant to conduct into those parts, but that finding a beginning of those incommodities, which his first-sent troupe had tryed, he changed his purpose. For though conquering Kings have power over men, yet the elements doe not obey them, according to that old English proverbe, Got, sith After the King; Stay, faith the Tide.

After his returne from the attempt of Athiopia, he caused Apis the Egyptian Bull. worshipped by that Nation as God, to be flaine: a deed very commendable, had it proreeded from true zeale, and been executed as in service of him that onely is, and liveth. But soone afterwards, when in a dreame it seemed unto him that Smerdis did sit in the royall throne of Persia (which apparition was verified in Smerdis the Magus) he gave it incharge to his favorite Praxaffes, to murther Smerdis his brother. And having married his own fifters, contrary to the Perfian Lawes, he committed a most causelesse and most derestable murder upon the one of them called Meroe, then by himselfe with child. because she bewailed the death of her brother Smerdis. I finde it written of this Cambyles, Her. 189.90 That because his Predecessors observed religiously the ordinances of their Empire. he affembled his Judges, and enquired of them whether there were any Law among the Profians that did permit the brother to marry his owne fifter: it being his owne intent for todoc. The Judges (who had alwayes either lawes or diffinctions in store to satisfic Kings and times) made answer, That there was not any thing written allowing any such conjunction, but they not with flanding found it in their cultomes, that it was alwaies left to the will of the Persian Kings to do what best pleased themselves; and, so as Nauclerus termes it, invenerunt occasionem: That is as much to fay, as the Judges found a shift to please the King, and to secure themselves. And yet, where it concerned not the Kings private fatisfaction, he caused Sisamous one of his Judges, and perchance one of those which favoured his incestuous match, to be flayed alive, for an unjust judgement given. and the same his hide to be hung up over the judgement seate. After which, best owing the fathers Office on his fon, he willed him to remember that the fame partiality deferved the same punishment.

Among other his crucltics, that which he exercised against the some of his beloved Prixities was very frange and ungrateful. For when he defired to be truly informed by him what the Perlians thought of his conditions, Praxafees answered, That his vertues werefollowed with abundant praise from all men; onely it was by many observed, that hetookemore than usuall delight in the tast of Wine. With which taxation instanted. heused this replication: And are the Persians double-tongued, who also tell mee that I havein all things excelled my father Cyrus? thou Praxalpes shalt then witnesse, whether in this report they have done me right: for if at the first shot I pierce, thy somes heare withan arrow, then is it false that hath been spoken; but if I misse the marke, I am then phased that the fame be accounted true, and my subjects believed. This being spoken, he immediatly directed an arrow towards the innocent child, who falling downe dead with the stroke, Camby ses commanded his body to be opened, and his heart being brochedon the arrow, this monftrous Tyrant greatly rejoycing, shewed it to the Father, with this faying in stead of an Epicaph: Now Praxaspes, thou mail resolve toy selfe, that I have not lost my wits with Wine, but the Persians theirs, who make such report.

Many other barbarous cruelties he exercifed, till at the last, according to the phrase of our Law, he became felon de foy. For when he was informed that Patizites, and smerdis the Magi (Cedrenus writeth them Sphendanes, & Cimerdia) Ministers of his domestical affilies, taling advantage of the great relemblance between Smerdis, the Kings brother, and smerdis the Magus, possess themselves of the Empire he made all haste towards Per-14, and in mounting hastily on horsebacke, his sword discheathing, pierced his owne thigh, where-with deadly wounded, falling anto, an over-late and remedileffe, repentance of the flaughter, which he had executed upon his own brother, he some after gave up his wicked ghost, when he had reigned eight years, accounting therein those seven Mo-neths in which the Magi governed, while he was absent.

In Cambyles the Male Line of Cyrus failed. For he had no iffue either by Atoffa or Me-100: yet Zonaras out of Hierome gives him a daughter called Pantaptes, and a fon called zoncome party Orontes, who being drowned in the river Ophites by Amioch, the same was afterward in memory of the Princes death called Orontes.

Hebuilt the Citie of Babylon in Egypt, in the place where Latopolis was formerly feated and that of Merce in the Hand of Nilus, calling it by the name of his fifter Merce.

True and his two formes being now dead, and the Kingdome in the possession of one of the Mazi, the counterfeit of Smerds, the Princes, or Satrapes, or Provincial Governors of the Empire(to wit, Oranes, Intaphernes, Gobrias, Megabyfus, Afbha. sines, Hidarnes, and Darius, who were all descended from Achamenes the first Persian King) having discovered the fraud of this imposture, joyned their forces together, surprifed and rooted out the Conspirator with his Companions and Assistants. Inwhich action (faith Justine) Intaphernes and Alphatines were flaine: but Herodotus otherwise, 10 that they were onely wounded; for he avoweth that all the feven Princes were prefent at the election following. For the Empire being now without a Governour, these Princes grew into confultation how the same might be ordered from thence-forth. Otanes one of the sevendid nor fancie any election of Kings, but that the Nobilitie and Cities should confederate, and by just lawes defend their liberty in equality, giving divers reasons for his opinion, being as it seemed greatly terrefied by the cruelties of Cambyses; As first, that it was not fafe to give all power to any one, seeing greamesse it selfe, even in good men, doth often infect the minde with many vices, and the liberty and freedome in all things is most apt to infult, and to commit all manner of wicked outrage. Againe, that tyrants do common- 20 ly use the services of wicked men, and favour them most; they usurp upon the lawes of their Country; take other mens wives by force, and destroy whom they please without Megabylus was of another opinion, affirming that the tyranny of a multitude was thrice more intolerable than that of one. For the multitude doe all things without judgement, runne into businesse and affaires with precipitation, like raging and overbearing flouds.

He therefore thought it fafeft to make election of a few, and those of the best, wifest, and most vertuous; because it is ever found, that excellent Counsels are ever had from excellent men.

Darine gave the third judgement, who perswaded the creation of a King, because even among few diuturnity of concord is feldome found, and in great Empires it dothever happen that the discord of many Rulers hath enforc't the election of one Supreme. It were therefore, faith Darius, farre fafer to observe the lawes of our Country, by which Kingly government hath been ordained.

The other foure Princes adhered to Darius, and agreed to continue the fame Imperiall government by God established, and made prosperous. And to avoyd partiality, it was accorded, that the morning following these seven Princes should mount on Horse backe, and on him the kingdome should be conferred, whose Horse after the Sun-rising should first ney or bray. In the evening after this appointment was made, it is faid that 40 Darius consulted with the Master of his Horse Ocharus, who in the Suburbs of the City where the election was refolved of caused the same Horse, whereon in the morning D4rise was mounted sto cover a Mare, who as foon as he came into the fame place, was the first Horse that brayed. Whereupon the other fixe Princes descended from their Horfes, and acknowledged Dariss for their Lord and King.

Plan in the third of his Lawes affirmeth, that in memory of the feven Princes, whereof Daris himsefe was one, that delivered the Empire from the usurparion of the Magie he divided the whole into feven governments; Heredotus faith, into twenty Satrapies.

Hyftaspes accompanyed Cyrus the Great, in the warres against the Seythians, at which time Cyrus being made jealous of Darius by a dreame of his owne, caused him to be sent into Persia, others say to be imprisoned, from whence by the death of Cyrus he was delivered, and made Governour of the Perfian Magi. He afterward followed Cambyfes into Hall of Egyi; he then joyned with the rest of the Princes against the Magi, and either by the neying of his horse, or, as others affirme, by strong hand he obtained the Empire, which hethemore affured to himselfe by taking two of Cyrus Daughters, and as many of his

6. II. Of Darius his Government, and suppressing the rebellion of Babylon.

Arius devised equal lawes whereby his subjects might be governed, the same being formerly promised by Cyrus. He gave accesse to all his subjects, and behaved himselfe so mildly to all men, that many Nations defired and offered themselves to become his Vassals: Only he layd divers payments and taxes on the people, which had not been accustomed in Gyrus time, to the value of fourteenethousand five hundred and threefcore talents, faith Herodotus.

The war which Camby fes made a far off in Egypt, and the contention between the Magiand the Princes of Persia, for the Empire, gave heart to the Babylonians to recover their liberty, and to shake off the Persian yoke; whereof Darins being advertised, he prepared an Army to recover that Citie and State revolted. But finding the same a difficult work, he wied the fervice of Zopirus, who for the love he bare Darius, did cut off his own Exts and Nofe, and with other wounds yet fresh bleeding, he seemed to sye to the Baby lomians for succour sto whom he accused the cruelty of Darius: who for having given him advice to give over the fiege of their City, had in this fort difmembred and deformed him; whereupon the Babylonians gave him that credit, as they trusted him with the difposition and commandement of their greatest forces: which when Zopirus had obtained, after forme finall colourable over-throwes given to the Perfens uponfallies, he deli-Hall vered the Citic into Danius his hands, who had lyen before it twenty mismeths.

Of Darius his favour to the Jewes in building the Temple.

N the second years of Darius, hee gave order that the building of the Temple at Hierusalem should goe on, and commanded that the same should bee finished Lat his owne charge, and out of the revenues of the Crowne. And whereas the Governours of those Provinces which are fituate between Euphrates and the Phaenician and mid-land Sea(whom Elra calleth the Captaines beyond the River) had hindred the worke in Camby (es his time, Darius gave commandement that they should not thence to forth come neare unto Jerusalem, to give any impediment to the building, but that they Thould with-draw themselves, and get them far off till all were finished, and at anend. In the old Latine it is written, Procul recedite ab illis; with-draw your selves far from them; In our English, Beyefar from thence, to wit, from the City and Temple now in building. Healfo made a decree which concerned his owne Subjects, That who sever should thenceforth hinder the setting up of the Temple of God, that his house should betorne downe, and the disturber hanged on a Gallowes made of the timber thereof. Healfo in the same decree maketh invocation to God; That hath caused his Name to dwell there (to) destroy all Kings and People that put their hands to alter, and to destroy this house of God which is in Jerusalem & In foure years after which decree (the Jewes being really fur 10 mished with money and all things necessary from Darius) the Temple was in all finished, to wit, in the beginning of the Spring, in the fixth yeare of Darius Hyft afpes, and in the two and fortieth after their first returne.

of Darius his Scythian Warre.

Free the recovery of Babylon he invaded the Scythians, whoseking Justinecalleth Lauthinus; and faith, that Darius undertooke this warre against him, because herefuled him his daughter in marriage. The better to convoy his Amyirto Scythia, he built abridge of finall Veffels over the River Ifter or Danubius, & gave the custody of the same in charge (among others of Asia the lesse) to the Ionians & Rollans, among whom was Militades, who perswaded the Asian Grecians to breake downethe bridge, to the end Darius might not returne thereby, and if by any other way, thennot without great difficulty; but the same was resisted by Histiaus Prince of Milet, a Citic of Ionia, which Nation being a Colonie of the Greeks, Diodorus calleth Traytors to their Countrey, because they joyned themselves to Darius. Butthe Seythians more elegantly termed them good flaves, for as much as they would not runne away from their Master, but were more mindfull of doing their duties, than of shaking off their bondage, 4 when they were presented with as faire an occasion of liberty as could have been defi--red. For the great Armie of Darius entring the defart Countrey called Beffarabia, found in it neither people to refilt them, nor any fultenance to relieve them. For the Southians were then, as are the Chrim Tartars, their posterity, at this day all Horse-men, using the Bow and Sword. They were not Plough-men, but Grafiers, driving their Heards from one place to another, as opportunity of Pasture led them. Standing Townesthey had none, but used for Housesthe Waggons wherein they carried their wives and children These Waggons they place at every Station in very good order, making Streets and Lanes in the manner of agreat Towne, removeable at their pleasure. Neither hath the Emperour him felfe, called now the great Chrim, any other Citie than fuch as Azora, (as they name it) or Towne of Carts. When as therefore Darius had wearied himfelfe, and wasted his provision in those desolate Regions, wherein he found neither wayes to direct him, victuals to refresh him, nor any houses, fruitfull trees, or living creatures, nor any thing at all, which either he himselfe might make use of, or by destroying it might grieve his enemics; he began to perceive his owne folly, and the danger into which he had brought him. Yet fetting a good face upon a bad game, he fent brave messages -to the Softhism, bidding him to cease his flight, and either to make triall of his valour & fortune in plaine battell : Or, if he acknowledged himselfe the weaker, thento yeeld by faire meanes, and become his Subject, giving him Earth and Water, which the Perhans uled to demand as a figne that all was yeelded unto them. To this challenge the South an returned an Hieroglyphicall answer; sending a Bird, a Frog. a Mouse, and five Arrowes: which dumbe shew Darius interpreting by his owne wish, thought that he did weelde all the Elements wherein those creatures live, and his weapons withall into his hands. But Gobryas, one of the seven Princes, who had flaine the Magi, construed their meaning aright, which was thus; O ye Persians, get ye wings like Birds, or dive under thewater, or creepe into holes in the earth, for else ye shall not escape our arrowes. And this interpretation was soone verified by the Scythians themselves, who assailed the Persian campe, drave the horsemen into the trenches, and vexed the Armie with continual Allarums day and night; were so fearelesse of this great Monarch, and so little regarded him. that within his hearing, and even in his fight, they did not forbeare the pastime of courfing a Hare, which they had started by chance. By this boldnesse of theirs, Darius was fodifcouraged, that he forfooke his Campe by night, making many fires, and leaving all that were fick and weake behinde him, and so with all speed marched away towards the River Ifter. He was pursued hardly by the Scythians, who mist him; yet arriving at the Bridge before him, perswaded the Ionians to depart, affuring them that the Persian king should never more be able to do them either good or harm. Which words had certainly been proved true, had not Hysti aus the Milesian prevailed with his people, to attend the comming of Darius, whom the Scythians did likewise faile to meet, when they returned from Ister to seeke him out.

Arius having thus escaped out of Scythia, determined the invasion of Thrace and Macedon, in which Warre he employed Megabasus, who mastered the Paonians, and transplanted them, and possest Perinthus, Chalcedon, By Zantium, and other places, being also soone after subjected, and added to the Persian Empire by Otanes, the son of Sysamnes, whom Cambyses had excoriated for false judgment. So were Her.15. the Cities of * Selybria, and * Cardia likewise taken in for the Persian, who having now * Americance reduced under his obeyfance the best part of Thrace, did send his Embassadors to A. Civyotthrace mints King of Macedon adjoyning, demanding of him by the Earth and Water, the So-to the South of Conflantinople. versignty over that kingdome. Amintas doubting his owne strength, entertained the a Cardia, a City Emballadors with gentle words, and afterwards invited them to a solemne and magnifi- upon the Chersa centeast; the Persians greatly defired that the Macedonian Ladies might be present: afterward Lyswhich being granted, the Embassadors, who were well filled with wine, and presumed machia. Pro. Paus upon their great neffe and many victories, began to use such embracings, and other lascivious behaviour towards those Noble Ladies, as Alexander the Kings son, great Grandfather to Alexander the Great disdaining the Persians barbarous presumption, befought his father to with-draw himselfe from the assembly, continuing not withstanding all honourable respect towards the Embassadors, whom withall he entreated that the Ladies might refresh themselves for a while; promising their speedy returne. This being obtained, Alexander caused the like number of well-favoured yong men to clothe themselves in the same garments, & to use the same actives which the Ladies had worn at the feast, giving them in charge, That when the Perfans offered to abuse them, they should forthwith transpierce them with their long knives, of which they were provided for that pur-Pole, which was accordingly performed. Charge was soone after given by Darius for a severe revenge of this murder. But Alexander somewhat before the death of Amintas, gavehis fifter Gygea in marriage to Bubaris, a principall Commander of Darius forces on that fide, who perfwading her husband how helpfull the Alliance of Macedon would prove for the invasion of Atties intended, so prevailed, as Alexander escaped that tem-Pell, which threatned to fall upon him very fuddenly; the war of Afia the lefte, called 10nick, falling out at the same time.

CHAP.5.5.6

The first occasion of the War which Darius made upon Greece, with a rehearfall of the govern ment in Athens, whence the quarrell grew.

TOw the better to understand the reason and motives of that great War, which followed soone after, between the Persians and Greeians, it is necessary to make a short repetition of the state of Athens, which Citie endured the hardest and worst brunt of Barius invasion on that side the Sea, with admirable successe. Neitherda I hold it any impertinency to be large in unfolding every circumstance of so great a bush. nesse as gave fire to those wars, which never could be throughly quenched, untill in the 10 ruine of this great Persian Monarchy, Persepolis the capital City of the Empire, was at the request of an Athenian Harlot confumed with a flame, as dreadfull as in the pride of their greatnesse, the Persians had raised in Athens.

Now therefore as out of the former books it may be gathered, how Athens and other parts of Greece, were anciently governed, the fame being already fet downe, though farteringly, & in severall times, among other the Contemporary occurrents of the Fasterne Emperors, and the Kings of Judea; fo I thought it very pertinent in this place to remember againe the two last changes in the State of Athens. As for the Laced amonians, they maintained still their ancient policy under Kings, though these also after some fisteends fcents were bridled by the Ephori. Codrus King of the Athenians, in the former bookes remembred, who willingly died for the fafety of his people, was therefore so honoured by them, as (thinking none worthy to fucceed him) they changed their former government from Monarchicall to Princes for terme of life, of which Medon the Son of Codrus was the first, after whom they were called Medoniide; and of these there were twelve Generations besides Medonito wit.

cennall Governours: the former Princes | garded, by reason of the yearly change.

This Salon being a man of excellent wisedome, gave Lawes to the Asbenians, which were published, according to Gellius, in the three and thirtieth year of Tarquinius Prisess, and were in after Ages derived unto the Romanes, and by the Decem viri (Magistrates in Rome created for that purpose) reduced into twelve Tables, which were the ground of the Romane lawes. But these goodly ordinances of Solon, were in his owne dayes violate ted, and for a while almost quite extinguished. For whereas they were framed unto the practice and maintenance of a popular government; the state of Athens was very soone changed into a Monarchie by Pififtratus the son of Hippocrates: who finding the Citirens distracted into two factions, whereof Megacles & Lycurgus, two Citizens of noble Families, were become the heads, tooke occasion by their contention and infolency to raisea third faction more powerfull than the other two, and more plausible, for that he feemed a Protector of the Citizens in generall. Having by this meanes obtained love and credit, he wounded himselfe, and fained that by malice of his enemies he had like to have been flaine for his love to the good Citizens; he procured a guard for his defence. and with that band of men surprising the State-house, or Cittadell of Athens, he made himselfe Lord of the towne; Hegefistratus being then Governor. But the Citizens, who to inevery change of government had fought to remove themselves further and further from the forme of a Monarchie, could so ill brooke this usurpation of Pisistratus, that he was driven for lack of help, to flye the towne, as foone as Megacles and Lycurgus (joynine their forces) attempted his expulsion. Yet as the building of his tyranny, founded upon the diffention of the Citizens, was ruined by their good agreement; fo was it foone after wel reedified by the new breaking out of the old factions. For when Megacles found the power of Lycurgus to grow greater than his own, he did (as is the usuall practice of the weaker fide) call in the common enemy Pififiratus, to whom he gave his Daughter in marriage; by which alliance the Family of the Alemaonida, wherof Megacles was chief, became very powerfull, yet so, that Pifistratus by their power was made Master both of them and all the rest. But this agreement held not long; the Alemeonida, and especially Megacles being incenfed against Pefestratus for his misdemeanour towards his Wife. Wherefore they practifed with the Souldiers of the Towne; proceeding in their treason Her. 122 fo secretly, and so farre, that Pifistratus upon the first discovery of their intent, perceived Ereina City of no other remedy for his affaires, than to with-draw him felfe to Eretria, where he remaither salled nedeleven yeares. Which time being expired, having hired Souldiers out of many Melaneby Sieparts of Greece, he againe recovered the principality of Athens: after which third obtai- phonus Erotria, parts of Greece, ne again executed the principality of America. after which that obtain Pols.

Herodotus gives Juli pag. 28. the Father and the Son fixe and thirty years; Ariftotle five and thirty. But Thucidides af- Thucidides. 10 firmeth, that he died very old, leaving for his Succeffors, his two Sonnes, Hippias and Hipparchus, who governed the Athenians with fuch moderation, as they rather feemed the Lineall successors of a natural I Prince than of a Tyrant. But in the end, & some three years before Hippias was expelled out of Athens, his brother Hipparchus was murdered by Harmedius and Aristogiton. The cause why and the manner how performed, Thucidides hath written at large. And though Hipparchus were charged with unnaturall luft, after Harmodius, yet Plato in his Dialogue, intituled Hipparchus, doth greatly magnifie him, affirming that he was a Prince of as many eminent vertues as that Age had any, altogether condemning the murderers & authors of that scandall. Hippias fearing that this enterprise upon his brother had more and deeper roots than were apparent, first fought todiscover the further intents of Hermodius and Aristogiton, by a Harlot of theirs called Lemnia: who because she would not reveale her Companions, did cut out her owne tongue. Then did Hippias, the better to strengthen himself, enter into a strait amity with Lamplacus a city Eartides, Tyrant of the City Lampfacus, whom he knew to be greatly favoured by Da. of Mystaupon the Helelpont rius, to whose son Hypoclus he gave one of his Daughters in marriage. But some three Herles years after the death of his brother, doubting I know not what strong practice against Thuistice. 1. himselfe, he began to use the Citizens with great severity, which neither Pifistratus the Father, nor Hippias himselfe had ever exercised, during their usurpation till this time. And therefore the Athenians fearing lest that this disease might rather increase, than diminish in Hippias, they stirred up Cliftines one of the noblest and best able of their City, to practife their delivery: who calling to his affiftance the banished Alemanida, together with an Army of the Laced amonians led by Cleomenes their King, so affrighted Hippias, as by composition he gave over his estate, and the possession of Athens, and from thence * sigum a proimbarking himselfe, took land at * Sigeum, whence he went to Lampsacus in Mysia go-montory oppo-verned by Rantides, who presented him to Darius. He was deprived of his estare, as strends, which Herodotus and Thucidides agree, twenty years before the battell of Marathon: all which Asiling, Animal. time he continued, partly with Eantides, at other times with Artaphernes Lievtenant for cals the premon-Darins.

Darius in Sardis, the Metropolis of Lydia; perswading and practising the enterprise upon Athens, which Darius in the end to his great dishonour undertooke, twenty yeares after Hippias had refigned his estate.

Thus farre I have digreffed from Darius, to the end the Reader may conceive the better the causes and motives of this warre: whereof the hope that Hippias had to be restored red to Athens by the help of Darius, which made him folicite and perswade the Persians to conquer Greece, was one, but not the most urgent.

6. VII.

Of the Ionian Rebellion, which was the principall cause of the warres ensuing betweene Greece and Persia.

Nother, and a firong motive to this expedition, was the Ionick warre, breaking out in Asia about the same time. The Colonies transported out of Greecinto Afia, which occupied the greatest part of the Sea-coast, having enjoyed their liberry about 500 yeares, even from the lonick migration, to the time of Crafas, wereby this Lydian King made Tributaries, and afterwards as parcell of his Dominions, were taken in by Cyrus, and left as hereditary Servants to the Crowne of Persia.

But as it is the custome of Nations halfe conquered (witnesse Ireland) to rebel againe 20 upon every advantage and opportunity: so did the Ionians, and other Grecians, bothin Cyrus his life, and after him, feeke by all meanes possible to free themselves.

At this time they found such men ready to spurre them into Rebellion, as hadby the Persian been given unto them for bridles to hold them in subjection. Every one of those Townes had a Lord to rule it, whom they (abhorring the government of one man) called their Tyrants. These Lords were very true to the Persian, by whose onely might they held the people in subjection. And this their dutifull affection they had well declared, when, Darius being in great extremity, they used all meanes to deliver him and his Armie (that otherwise had been lost) out of the Scythians hand. Of this great piece of fervice Histiaus the tyrant of Miletus expected the chiefe thanks, as having beenchiefe Author of their expecting Darius, when the rest, either perswaded by the Scythians, or carried away with their owne defires, were ready to have abandoned him. But it came foto passe, that Darius being more fearefull of the harme that Histians (being powerfull and crafty) might doe to him in the future, than mindfull of the good which he had already received at his hand, found meanes to carry him along to Sufa, where he detained him with all kinde usage of a friend, yet kept such good espiall upon him, as an enemy, he could not flart away. Histiaus had subtlety enough to discover the kings purpose, which ill agreed with his owne defires. For he thought it more ple afant, and more honourable to rule as Prince in one faire Citie, having a small Territory, than to sit and feast at the great Kingstable, and heare the counsels by which a large Empire was managed; being 40 himselfe an idle beholder, and enjoying with much restraint of liberty, none other pleasures than a private man might bestow upon himselfe.

Wherefore he bethought himselfe of raising of some tumults in the lower Asia, to pacific which, if he might be fent, as one that had great experience and authority in those quarters, it would afterwards be in his power to stay at home, and either satisfie the King with excuses, or deale as occasion shall require. Resolving upon this course, he sent very fecret instructions to Aristagoras his kinsinan, whom he had left his Deputy at Miletus, advising him to stirre up some Rebellion. These directions came seasonably to Aristage-745, who having failed in an enterprise upon the Isle of Naxos, through the false dealing of a Persian his Associate, stood in searce of disgrace, if not of some further ill that might 50 befall him, as one that had wasted the Kings treasures to no good purpose.

Therefore he readily embraced the counfell: and the better to draw the whole Country of Ionia into the same course which he determined to run, he abandoned his tyranny, and did fet Milets at liberty. This plaufible beginning wan unto him the hearts of the Milesians: and his proceeding with other Ionian Tyrants (of whom some he tooke and fold as flaves to their Citizens, others he chased away) caused the whole Nation to be at his command. The Persian Fleet, whereofhe lately had beene Admirall in theen terprise of Naxos, he had surprised in his first breaking out, together with the principall Officers and Captaines, fo that now he thought himselfe able to deale with the great Kings forces, lying thereabout, either by Land or Sea. But likely it was that the power of all Asia would shortly be upon his neck, and crush both him and his affistants to pieccs.unlesse he were able to raise an Armie that might hold the field, which the Ionians alone were in sufficient to performe. Therefore he took a journey to Sparta, where having affayed in vaine with many arguments, and the offer of fiftie Talents, to win to his partie Cleomenes King of the Lacedamonians: he went from thence to Athens, and with hetter successe besought the people to lend him their assistance. The Athenian Embassadours which had beene fent to the Persian Kings Lievtenant in the lower Asia, desiring other not to give countenance to Hippias, now a banished man, and lately their Tyrant. werea while before this returned with ill answers, having found very churlish entertainment. So that the evill which they were to expect in all likelihood from the Persian. madethem willing to begin with him. To which purpose, their consanguinitie with the Inians, and the perswasions of Aristagoras, drew them on a-pace, if perhaps his treasure were not helping. Twentie ships the Athenians furnished for this voyage; to which the Fratrians furnished five more in regard of the ancient kindnesse that had passed between the Ionians and them. With these and their own forces joyned, the Ionians entred the River Caiffres, which falleth into the Sea by Ephefus: by which advantage they furprifed sardis when no enemie was heard of or suspected; informuch, as Artaphernes, who , ruled as Vice-roy in those parts, had no other hope of safetie, than by retraiting himself into the castle, which the Grecians could not force: from whence he beheld the slaughter of the Citizens, and the Citie flaming.

The Perfians, at length, mixt with the Burgers, began to encourage them to defence, and recovered the Market place, strengthened by the river Pattolus, which ranthrough it; and borrowing courage from desparation, they both defended themselves, and chargedtheir enemies; who well advising themselves, made all the haste they could toward the feafide. But Artaphernes having gathered all the strength he could, pursued the Grecians, and found them neere Ephefus; where fetting refolvedly upon them, he flaughteredagreat part of their Armie, the rest saving themselves in Ephelus. In this fight Evalgo cides, Captaine of the Eratrians perished: but his fame and memorie was by that excellent Poet Simonides preserved. After this overthrow, the Athenians, which were beforesentunto Aristagoras and to the Ionians, could by no arguments of theirs, no not by their teares, be perswaded to make any second triall of their fortunes on that side the

Yet the burning of Sardis made a greater noise in the world, than the late good successe which the Persians had in one or two skirmishes, could raise. Wherefore the Ionians bravely proceeding, won a great part of Caria; and fending their Fleet into the Hellespont, got Biz antium and other Townes into their hands. Yea, the Cyprians, lately subdued by Cambyses, began hereupon to take heart; and entring into confederacie with the Ionians, who were able to give them aide by Sea, rebelled against the Perfians.

These newes comming to the care of Darius, filled him with great indignation, and with an extreme hatred of the Athenians, upon whom he vowed to take sharpe revenge. As for the Ionians, his contempt of them, and their knowledge of his power, made him to thinke, that they would not have dared to attempt fuch things, but by the instigation of those, to whom the ignorance of his great might had afforded the courage to pro-Voke him. This was the maine ground of the Warre commenced by Darius, and purfuedby Xerxes against Athens: To which the solicitation of Hippias, before remembred, gave onely some forme and assistance: the businesse, when once it was thus far on foot, being like enough to have proceeded, though he had perished ere it were advanced any

Some other occurrents in this Ionian commotion extended the quarrell of Darius against many of the Ilanders, if not against the whole Nation of the Greekes; for all of them gave to his Rebels free harbour: the Ilanders moreover did helpe to furnish out a Navie of three hundred and fixtie faile against him. These provocations did rather breede in him a defire to abate their pride, than any feare of harme that they were like to doe him. For what they had done at Sardis, was but by surprize. In every fight they were beaten by the Persians, who had not yet lost the fruits of their discipline, wherein CHAP.5. S. 8.

wherein Cyrus had trained them, nor all their ancient Captaines. In one fea-fight by the Isle of Cyprus, the Ionians indeed had the upper hand; but they were Phanicians. Egyptians, and Cilicians, whom they vanquished: neither was that victorie of any use to them; the Cyprians, in whose aide they came, being utterly beaten by the Persian Armie at Land, and reduced into their old subjection. So had the Persians likewife by open warre and faire force overthrowne the Carians in two battels, and reclaimed that Nation; as also they had recovered the Townes upon Hellespont, with fome Eolian and Ionian Cities, when Ariftagoras with his friends quitting Miletu. fledinto Thrace, desirous to seat himselse in Amphipolis, a Colonie of the Athenians. But the Edonians, on whose Territorie belike he landed, overthrew him, & cut his troups to in pieces.

About the same time, Histiam, the first mover of this insurrection, came downe into those quarters; who having undertaken the performance of great matters to Darius, was glad to flye from his Lievtenants, by whom his double dealing was

But this evaluon preserved him not long. For after many vaine attempts that he made. he was taken in fight by the Persians, and hastily beheaded, lest the King should pardon him upon remembrance of old good turnes; as it feems that he would have done, by the buriall which he commanded to be given to his dead bodie that was crucified, and by his heavie taking of his death. Histiaus had fought to put himselse into Miletus; but the Citizens doubting his conditions, chose rather to keepe him out, and make shift for themselves, without his helpe. The strength of their Cirie by land, which had in old time withstood the Lydian Kings, and their good Fleet, which promifed unto them the libertie of an open Sea, emboldened them to trie the uttermost, when very few friends were left upon that Continent to take their part. But their Navie was broken as much by threatnings as by force: many of their companions and fellow-rebels for faking them upon hope of pardon; and many being daunted with the causelesse slight of those that should have affisted them. Neither was it long before the Towne it selfe, being affaulted both by Landand Sea, was taken by force, the Citizens flaine, their wives and children made flaves, and 30 their goods a bootie to the Persians, whom for fixe years space they had put to so much trouble.

§. VIII.

The warre which Darius made upon Greece, with the battell of Marathon, and Darius his death.

His Warre with good fucceffe finished by the Persians, and some attempts made on Europe fide with variable successe: Darius obstinate in the enter-40 prise and Conquest of Greece (though at first hee pretended to make the Warre but against the Athenians and Eritraans, who joyntly assisted the Ionians against him, and burnt Sardis in Lydia) did now by his Embassadours demand an acknowledgement from them all: among whom, fome of them not fo well refolved as the rest, submitted themselves; as the Æginets and others. Against these, the Athenians being inflamed, (by the affiftance of the Lacedamonians) afterdivers Citie or People encounters forc't them to give pledges, and to relinquish the partie of the Persians. refus in significant Cleomenes led the Lacedaminians in this warre, and caused his companion-King Demantus to bee deposed: who thercupon fled to Darius, farrethe more consident of or of Agea, beand Macedon, I victorie, by reason of these discords, alienations, and civill warres among the Greekes, so doenorknow: He therefore gave order to Hippagoras to prepare a Fleete of ships sit to transport his Armie over the Hellespont : the same consisting of an hundred thousand foot, and ten next the enemy thousand horse. The charge inchiefe of his Armie he committed to Datis, accompanied and affifted by Hippias, the fon of Piliftratus, expelled out of Athens twentie yeares bep und than the fore, and by Artaphernes his brother, Governour of Sardis, and the Sea coult of Asia instar off, There is also a the lesse. imbarked themselves in fixe hundred Gallies and other Vessels; and first of all attempted the Islands called Cyclades, which lay in the mid-way between Asia the lesse, and Greece. For (obtaining those places) the Persians had then nothing to hinder the transportation of their forces over the Agean Seasbut on the contrarie they might alwaies both relieve themselves in their passage, and shroud themselves from all sudden tempests and out-

To this end they first possest themselves of Samos; secondly they attempted Naxos : Which Island, the inhabitants despairing of their owne forces, abandoned. So did the people of Delos, of which Apollo was native: Which Island Darius did not only forbear to facke, but recalling the inhabitants, he gave order to beautifie the places and Altars of Sacrifice to Apollo erected. And having recovered these and other Islands, the Persians directed their course for Eretria in Eubaa: for that Citie (as alreadie hath been shewed) in Herod. had affifted the Ionians at the taking and firing of Sardis. In this Island the Perfians took ground, and befreged Eretria very straitly, and after fixe daies affault, partly by force, and in part by the treason of Euphabus and Philagius; they tooke it, sackt it, and burnt it to the ground. Thus far the winds of prosperous fortune filled their sayles. From Eubera the Persians past their Armie into Attica, conducted and guided by Hippias, late Prince of Athens, and marching towards it, they encamped at Marathon, in the way from the Sea. wherethey landed towards Athens.

The Atbenians finding the time arrived, wherein they were to dispute with their own vertues against Fortune, and to cast lots for their libertie, for their wives, their children. and their lives, put them selves in the best order they could to make resistance, and withall fent away with speed to the Lacedamonians for succour, imploying in that Negotiaarion one Phidippides: who passing through Arcadea, encountred in the way a familiar Divell, which he supposed to be Pan, who willed him to assure the Athenians of victorie. promifing that fome one of the gods should be present at the battell, to affift them and defend them against the multitude of their enemies. Phidippides at his reture seeing he could not bring with him any prefent fuccours from Sparts, yet he thought it greatly avaling to bring newes from the gods, and promife of affiftance from Heaven, which no 30 doubt (though the device was formewhat likely to be his owne, yet) it greatly encouraged the multitude and common people, who in all ages have bin more firred up with fond Prophecies and other like superstitious fooleries, than by any just cause or solide reafon.

The Athenians being now left to themselves, with one thousand onely of the Platains (who having beene formerly defended by the Athenians against the Thebans. did in this extremitie with effect their thankefulnesse and gratefull disposition) began todifute. Whether it were most for their advantage to defend the walls of Athens, or to put themselves into the field with such forces as they had, the same confilling of ten thousand Athenians, and one thousand of the Plateans. In the end pandafter great diversitie of opinions, Militades, who perswaded the triall by battell. prevailed.

The Armies being now in view, and within a mile of each other, the Athenians disposed themselves, into three troupes: two wings or hornes, as they terme them, and the bodie of a battell. The Persians when they perceived so small a troupe advancing towards them, thought the Athenians rather disposses of their understandings than possess with the resolution whereof they made shew. So invincible and resistlesse the Persians esteemed their owne numbers to be, and that small troupe of their enemies then in view, rather to be despised than to be fought withall: But in conclusion, the vidoriebeing doubtfully ballanced for a while, sometime the vertue of the Grecians, and so lometimes the number of the Persians prevailed, the Grecians fighting for all that they had, the Persians for that they needed not, these great forces of Darius were disordered and put in rout; the Athenians following their victorie even to the Sea-shore; where the Persians, so many of them as lost not their wits with their courage, saved themselves in their inips.

The Persian Armie consisted of an hundred thousand foot and ten thousand horse; of which there were flaine in the place fixe thousand three hundred, and of the Greclans an hundred fourescore and twelve. For howsoever it came to passe, either by trange visions, which were afterward called Panici terrores, or by some other affright, it feemeth that the invading Armie, after the first encounter, fought with their backs towards their enemie, and lost that number, by Herodorus set down, in their disorderly retrait, or rather in their slat running away. As for Justines report, That two hundred thoufand of the Persian armie were slain, the same hath no appearance nor possibilitie of truth. In this sight Hippias the perswader of the enterprise was slain, suth Justine and Cierro; but Suidas tels us, That he escaped, and died most miserably in Lemnos.

The third Booke of the first part

The greatest honour of this victorie was cast upon Militades, who both perswaded the triall by battell, and behaved himselfe therein answerably to the counsell which hee gave. Themistotes had his sirstreputation in this sight, being but young and of the sirst beard. Those of the Grecians, of mark & commandement, that tell in the first encounter, were Callimachus and Stessleus. It is also said, That Cynegyrus following the Persanto their embarking, laid hands on one of their Gallies, to liave held it from putting off the shore, and having his right handout off, he yet offered to arrest it with his left; of which also being deprived, he took hold of it with his teeth. This encounter happened in the sirst year of the threescore and twelfth Olympiad, about the time of the war made by Conelanus against his sellow-Romans: Alexander the son of Amyntus being then King of Macandon, and Phanippus then Governour of Athens, according to Plutarch, or Hybrides, after Haltearnalleus.

This great fray thus parted, and the Persians returned backe into the lesser Asia, Milliades fought and obtained an imployment against the Handers of Paros, one of the Cycla- 10 des, and passing over his Companies in threescore and ten Gallies, after sixe and twentie dayes assault he brake his thigh; in feeking to enter it by the Temple of Ceres, wherewith himself being made unable, and his companies discouraged, his returned to Athens, where those ungrateful Citizens sorgetting all his services pass, and that of all other themost renowned at the battell of Marathon, did by the perswalion of Xampipus, the father of Periodes (who enviced his same) east him into prison, and set on him a fine of fiftie Talents; where his weak and wounded bodie being not able to endure the one, nor his estate to pay the other, he after a few dayes ended his life.

Which envicof the better fort to each other, with their private Factions, affifted by the unthankfull and witleffe people, brought them, not many yeares after, from a victorious jo and famous Nation, to base subjection and slaverie. Militades left behinde him one so called Cymon, begotten on Hegespila, daughter of Olorus King of Thrace, who (faith Plutareh) was neither inferior to his father in valour, nor to Themistocles in understanding, but exceeded them both in justice and good government.

Now Darins taking greater care how to recover his honour, than forrow for the losse received in Greece, gave order for new levies of men, & all other warlike provisions. But the Egyptians revolting from his obedience (a Kingdome of great strength and revenue) greatly distracted his resolution for the re-invasion of Greece. The dissentional so among his sons, of whom the younger being born after he was king, and by so great a mothers Atossa, dissained to give place to his elder brother, born before Darins obtained the Em 40 pire, greatly xexed him. And lastly, death, who hath no respect of any mans affaires gave end to all his consultations and enterprises, and joyned him to the earth of his ancestors, about a year after the battel of Marathon, & after that he had reigned fixe & thirty years. He less the hind him five sons, namely, Artabasanes, born before he obtained the kingdom, Xerxes who succeeded him, Achamenes Governour of Egypt, Massises and Anabignes.

Of Xerxes.

6. I.

The preparation of Xerxes against Greece.

Erxes received from his father, as hereditarie, a double Warre, one to be made againft the Egyptians, which he finished so speedily, that there is nothing remaining in writing how the same was performed: the other against the Grecians, of which it is hard to judge, whether the preparations were more terrible, or the successe ridiculous. In the consultation for the prosecution of this War, which was chiefely bent against the Athenians, the Princes of Persia were divided in opinion. Mardonius, who had formerly commanded in Thrace and Macedon, under Darius, and had also Hysasses for his grandsather, as Xerxes had, and married Xerxes, his sister ArtoZostres, perswaded by many arguments the European warre. But Artahanus, brother to the late Darius, and uncle to Xerxes, maintained the contrary counsell, laying before Xerxes the lamentable and ridiculous successes of the two late invasions, which Darius had made contrary to his counsell: The one in person upon the Scythians, the other by his Lievtenants upon the Greeks; in each of which Darius less to his enemies both his Armie and his Honour.

Hetherefore befought Xerxes to be right well advised before he did too far imbarke himself in this businesse. For whatsoever undertaking hath deliberate and sound counsell forconductor, though the successe doe not alwaies answer the probability, yet hath Fortune nothing else thereof to vaunt, than the variablenesse of his owne nature, which only the divine Providence, and not any humane power, can constraine.

But so obstinate was the resolution of Xernes in prosecution of his former intent, that Artabanus, whether terrefied by Visions (as it is written of him) or fearing the Kings hatred, which he made knowne to all those that opposed his defire to this Warre (changing opinion and counsell) affished the Grecian Expedition with all the power he had.

After the war of Egypt was ended, four eyears were confumed in describing and gathering an Army for this invasion: which being compounded of all Nations subject to the Pussus Empire, confisted of seventeene hundred thousand foot, and eightie thousand horsemen, besides Chariots, Camels, and other Beasts for Carriage, if we may believe Hundrus: for of this multitude, Trogus sindes the number lesses seven hundred thousand of hand sootmen.

The Commanders of the severall Nations were the Princes of the bloud of Perfia, eitherby marriage in the kings house, or otherwise: for to these were all commandements of this nature given, some few people excepted, who had of their owne Leaders.

The charge of the whole Armie was bestowed on Mardonius, the son of Gobrius by a sister of Darius, to whom were joyned some others of Xerxes his nearest kinned, as Generalls over all; saving that the charge of ten thousand select Persans, called the immortall Regiment (because if any one of the whole number died, or were slaine; there was another presently chosen in his stead) was given to Hydarnes; the eightie thousand horsemen were led by the sons of Darius, who commanded the late Armie of Darius in Greece.

The Fleet of Gallies were 2200 and eight, furnished by the Phanicians, who had Commanders of their owne Nation, and by the Cypriotes, Cilicians, Pamphilians, Lycians, Dorians, Carians, Ionians, Eolians, and Hellesson who were trusted with the furnishing of their owne Vessels, though commanded by the Princes of Persia, as by Ariabignes, the son of Darius, and others. The rest of the Vessels for transportation were three thousand. There were also certaine Gallies surnished by Artemisa, the daughter of Lygdames, Princesse of Halycarnasseus, and the Hands adjoyning, which her selse commanded. Those Gallies by her prepared and surnished, exceeded Mmm 3

Xerxes Armie entertained by Pythius: his cutting off Mount Athos from the Continent his bridge of Boats over the Hellespont: and the discourse betweene him and Artabanus upon the view of the Armic.

Hen this world of an Armie was throughly furnished, he caused all them to tions of which it was compounded, to make their Rendeztoss, and repair at Sardis in Lydia. And when he had affembled to the number of seventeene hundred thousand foot, as he entred the bodie of Celense, he was by one Pythiss the Lydian entertained, who out of his Flocks and Herds of Cattell gave food to Xerxes and his whole Armie. The feast ended, he also presented him with two thousand Talents of she ver, and in Gold four Millions, wanting seven thousand of the Persian Daries, which make so many of our Markes.

The King overcome with the exceeding liberalitic of Pythim, did not only refuse his treasure offred, but commanded that seven thousand Daries should be given him to make up his foure Millions; of which, so many thousands were wanting when he made the 10 present. But soone after, when Pythim befought him to spare one of his sive sons from his attendance into Greece (because himselfe was old), and had none whom he could so well trust as his owns fon) Xerxes most barbarously caused the young man, for whom his father sought exemption, to be sundred into two parts, commanding that the one halfe of his carkasse should be layed on the right, and the other halfe on the less hand of the common way by which the Armic marched.

Two things he commanded to be done before he came to the Sea-side. The one was a passage for Gallies to be cut behinde Mount Athos, making the same (with the halfe Island or Headland, whereon it stood) to be an entire Island, fundring thereby from the Continent of Thrace five Cities, besides the Mountain and the Chersoness or Necke of 30 Land it selfe: a worke of more oftentation than of use, and yet an enterprise of nogreat wonder, the Valley which held it to the Continent having but twelve surlongs (which make about a mile and halfe) to cut through, and the ditch being broad enough only for two Gallies to passe in front. The Cities so severed from the maine, were Dien, Obspace, Acrothoon, Thysus and Cleone.

He also gave order, that a Bridge upon Boats should be made over the Hellesont betwen Abidus and Sessos, the Sea there having a mile of bredth, wanting an eighth part; which after the finishing, was by a Tempest torne assunder and dissevered: wherewish Xerxes being more enraged than discouraged, commanded those to be slaine that were masters of the worke, and caused sixe hundred threescore and source enraged coupled together, thereon to frame a new Bridge; which by the art and industrie of the Phanietans was so well anchored to resist both winds blowing into and from the Euxine Sea, as the same being well boorded and rayled, the whole Armie of seventeenhundred thousand foot, and sourcescore thousand Horse, with all the Moyles and Carriages, past over it into Europe in seven dayes and seven nights, without intermission. This transportation of Armies did Casar afterward use. And Caligula that mad Emperour, in imitation of Xerxes his Bridge, did build the like.

The Bridge finished, and the Armie brought neere to the Sea-side, Xerxes tooke a view of all his Troupes, assembled in the Plains of Abidus, being carried up, and seated on a place over-topping the Landround about it, and the Sea adjoyning: and after he so had gloried in his owne happinesse, to behold and command so many Nations, and so powerfull an Armie and Fleet, he suddenly (notwithstanding) burst out into teares, moved with this contemplation, That in one hundred years there should not any one furvive of that marvellous multitude: the cause of which sudden change of passion when he uttered to Artabanus his Uncle; Artabanus spake to the King to this effect: That which is more lamentable than the dissolution of this great Troupe within that number of yeares by the King remembred, is, That the life it selse which we enjoy is yet more uniferable than the end thereof: for in those few dayes given us in the world, there is no man among all these, nor essewhere, that ever found himselfe so accompanied with happinesse, but that he oftentimes pleased himselfe better with the desire and hope of death, than of living; the incident calamities, diseases, and for rowes where to mankinde is subject, being so many and inevitable, that the shortest life doth oftentimes appear unto us over-long; to avoid all which, there is neither resuge nor rest, but in desired death alone.

With this melancholy discourse, Xerxes being not much pleased, prayed Artabanus not. mover-cast those joyes which they had now in pursuit with sad remembrances. And holding still a doubtfull conceit, that Artabanus utterly condemned the invasion of in Gruce, against which he had formerly given many strong reasons, defired him to deale freely with him, Whether he were returned to his first resolution, that the enterprise of Gruce could not be prosperous? Or whether, according to the change of mind put into him by his late Vision, he was confident of good successe: Artabanus, norwithstanding that he affured himselfe of the Kings resolution to goe on, and dared not by any new arguments to batter the great purpose it selfe, yet he told the King, That there were two things which marvelloufly affrighted him, and which the King should finde, as he seared, tobemost adverse; to wit, the Sea and the Land: The Sea, because it had no where in that part of the world any Port capable of so great a Fleet; insomuch, as if any tempest should arise, all the Continent of Greece could hardly receive them, nor all the Havens on thereofafford them any fafety: and therefore when any fuch shelter shall be wanting unwithem, he prayed him to understand, that in such a case of extremitie, men are lese to the will and disposition of Fortune, and not Fortune to the will and disposition of men. The Land, be fides other incommodities, will be found by fo much the more an enemie, by how much the unsatiate desire of man to obtain more and more thereof, doth lead himforward: for were there no man found to give relistance, yet the want of meanes to feedfuch an Armie, and the Famine, which cannot be prevented, will, without any other violence offered, dif-inable and confume it. By these Arguments Artabanus hoped to have diverted Xerxes, not during perchance to utter what indeed he most feared; to wit, theoverthrow of the Armie it selfe both by Sea and Land, which some after followed. 30 These Cautions were exceeding weightie, if Xerxes his obstinacie had not mis-prised them. For, to invade by Sea upon a perillous Coast, being neither in possession of any Port, nor fuccoured by any partie, may better fit a Prince prefuming on his fortune, than earithed with understanding. Such was the enterprise of Philip the second upon England inthe year 1588. who had belike never heard of this Counsell of Artabanus to Xerxes, or

Now concerning the second point, it is very likely, that Xerxes his Armie, which could not have in it lesse than two millions of Soules, besides his beafts for Service and Carriage, should after a few dayes suffer samine, and using Machiatels words, Mourire surseless, dictorthout a knife. For it was impossible for Greece, being a ragged, strait, and mountainous Countrey, to yeeld food (besides what served themselves) for twentie hundred thousand strangers, whom they never meant to entertaine, but with the sharp-ned points of their weapons, destroying with all what soever they could not well inclose and defend. Nay, if we may believe Herodotus, the Armie of Xerxes, being reviewed at Thermopylæ, consisted of five millions, two hundred eightie three thousand, two hundred twentie men, besides Laundresses, Harlots, and Horses, and was therefore likely to endure a speedie farmine.

The effect of Xerxes his answer was, That it was impossible to provide for all things; and that whosover should enterprise any great matter, if he gave the hearing to all that could be objected of accidentall inconveniences, he should never pursue the same farsother than the dispute and consultation: which is Predecessors, the Persian Kings, had done, they had never growne to that greatnesse, or possess for many Kingdomes and Nations as they now did; and therefore concluded. That great enterprises were never undertaken without great perils. Which resolution of Xerxes was not to be condemned, if any necessitive had enforc't him to that warre. But seeing the many Nations newly conquered, which he alreadie commanded, were more than could be constrained to obedience any longer than the powerfull prosperitie of the Persians endured, and that Greece was separated by the Sea from the rest of Xerxes his Dominions (of whose resolution his Father Daria- had made a deare experience) the fruit of this Warre was answerable to the plantation, and the successe and end agreeable to the weake counsell whereon it was grounded. Furthermore, those millions of men which he transported, and yet in his own judgement not fufficient, (for he gathered in marching on, all the ftrength of Thrace and Macedon) were an argument, that he rather hoped to feare the Greekes by thefame of his numbers, than that he had any confidence in their valour and refolution, whom he conducted. For it is wifely faid of those uncountable multitudes: Non vires habent sed pondus & impedimenta potius sunt quam auxilium; They are great in bulke, but weake in forces, and rather a luggage than an aide.

Befides, as it was impossible to marshal such a world of menin one Armie, so the divers Nations, speaking divers languages, bred the same consustion among the Persian comman-10 ders when they came to fight, as it did to the builders of Babel, when they came to work. Whereas if Xerxes had of his five millions compounded ten Armies of fiftie thousand chosen Souldiers in each, and sent them yearly into Greece well victualled and furnished, he had either prevailed by the fword, or forced them to forfake their territorie, or brought them into obedience by necessitie & famine, which cannot be refisted. But while Xerxes resolved to cut down the banks of Greece, and to let in a sea of men upon them, he was deceived both of his own hopes, and in their hearts whom he imployed, and beaten by the Greeks, both by Land and Sea; yea, he himfelf, conducted by his fear, fled shamefully into Afis. A great part of his Armie was buried in Greece : the remainder whereof. which wintred in Thessale, and led by Mardonius, who perswaded the enterprise, was in 20 the Summer following utterly defeated, and himself flain.

6. III.

Of the fights at Thermopyla and Artemisium.

Free fuch time as Xerxes had transported the Armie over the Hellefont, and landed in Thrace, (leaving the description of his passage alongst that Coast, and how the River of Lissue was drunke dry by his multitudes, and the lake neereto Piffirm by his cattell, with other accidents in his marches towards Greece) I will speake 30 of the encounters he had, and the shamefull and incredible overthrowes which he received. As first at Thermopy la, a narrow passage of halfe an acre of ground, lying between the Mountains which divide Theffalie from Greece, where sometime the Phoeians had raised a wall with gates, which was then for the most part ruined. At this entrance Leonidas, one of the Kings of Sparta, with three hundred Lacedamonians, affifted with one thousand Tegeate and Mantineans, one thousand Arcadians, and other Peloponness ans, to the number of three thousand one hundred in the whole; besides one thousand Phocians, foure hundred Thebans, feven hundred Thespians, and all the forces (such as they were) of the bordering Locrians, defended the passage two whole dayes together against that huge Armie of the Persians. The valour of the Greeks appeared so excellent 40 in this defence, that in the first dayes fight, Xerxes is faid to have three times leaped out of his Throne, fearing the destruction of his Armie by one handfull of those men, whom not long before he hadutterly despised: and when the second dayes attempt upon the Greeks had proved vaine, he was altogether ignorant how to proceede further, and so might have continued, had not a run-agate Grecian taught him a fecret way, by which part of his Armie might ascend the ledg of Mountains, and set upon the backs of those who kept the Straits. But when the most valiant of the Persian Armie had almost inclofed the small forces of the Greeks, then did Leonidas, King of the Lacedamonians, with his three hundred, and feven hundred Thespians, which were all that abode by him, refuse to quit the place which they had undertaken to make good, and with admirable courage of not onely refift that world of men which charged them on all fides; but iffuing out of their strength, made so great a slaughter of their enemies, that they might well be called vanquishers, though all of them were slain upon the place. Xerxes having lost in this last fight, together with twentie thousand other Souldiers and Captains, two of his own brethren, began to doubt what inconvenience might befall him by the vertue of fuch as had not bin present at these battels, with whom he knew that he shortly was to deale. Especially of the Spartans he stood in great searc, whose manhood had appeared single larin this triall, which caused him very carefully to enquire what numbers they could bring into the field. It is reported of Dieneces the Spartan, that when one thought to haveterrefied him by faying, That the flight of the Persian arrowes was so thicke as would hide the fun: he answered thus; It is very good newes: for then shall we fight in the coole shade.

Such notable resolution having as freely been expressed in deeds; as it was uttered in words, caused the Persian to stand ingreat doubt, when he heard that the Citie of Sparnacould arme well-nigh eight thousand men of the like temper, and that the other Lacedamonians, though inferior to those, were very valiant men. Wherefore he asked counfell of Demaratus, a banished King of the Spartans, who had alwayes well advised and in-Articled him in the things of Greece, what course were fittest to be taken in his further proceedings. The opinion of Demaratus was, That all the Land-forces should affemble together to defend the Isthmus, that fireight necke of ground which joyneth Peloponne-Strothe Continent. For which cause he advised, That three hundred ships well manned should be sent unto the Coast of Laconia, to spoile the country, and to hold the Lacodemonians and their neighbours busied at home, whilest Xerxes at his leisure having subdued the rest, might afterward bring his whole power upon them, who remaining definnte of fuccour, would be too weake alone to make refiftance. To this purpose also the fame Demarat his further advised, That the faid Fleet of three hundred ships should feizeupon the Hand then called Cythera, now Cerigo, which lying neare to the Coast of Laconia, might ferve as a fit place of Rendez-vous upon all occasions, either of their own defence, or endamaging the enemie: whereby that ancient speech of Chilon the Laced &monian should be verified, That it were better for his Countriemen to have that Ile drowned in the sea, than stand so inconveniently as for them it did. What effect this countell might have taken, had it bin followed, it is not caffer ogheffe. But a contrarie opinion of Achiemenes brother to King Xerxes was preferred as the fafer. For the Persian fleethad bin forely vexed with a grievous tempert, which continued three whole dayes together, wherein were lost upon the Coast of Magnesia, foure hundred thips of war, befidesother veffels innumerable accordingly as Ariabanus had forefeen, that if any fuch calamitic should overtake them, there would not be found any Harbor wide enough to givethem fuccour. Therfore Achiemenes perswaded his brother not to disperse his fleets forif (faid he) after the loffe of foure hundred flips we shall fend away other three hundredto feek adventures, then will the Greeks be ftrong enough by fea to encounter the relt of the Navie, which holding all together is invincible. To this comfell Xerxes yeelded, hoping that his Land-armie and fleet should each of them stand the other in good flead, whileft both held one courle, and lay not far afunder. But hereinhe was far deceived; for about the fame time that his armie had felt the valour of the Greeks by land; his Navielikewife made a forrowfull proofe of their skill and courage at fea. The Grecians fleetlay at that there at Artemishum in the straits of Eubara, where the Persians thinking toincompasse them, sent two hundred fayle about the Hand to fall upon them behinde, outinga like stratagem to that which their King did practife against Leonidas in a case not milke, but with far different successe. For that narrow channell of the sea which divideth Eubea from the main, was in the same fortheld by a Navie of two hundred three-Greand eleven faile against the huge Persian Armada, as the straits of Thermopyle had formerly bin maintained by Leonidas, til he was circumvented, as this Navie might have bin, but was not. The departure of those two hundred ships that were sent about the Iland, and the cause of their voyage, was too well known in the Persian fleet, and soone chough disclosed to the Greeks, who setting faile by night, met them with a counter-furprile, taking & firthing thirty veffels, inforcing the reft to take the Sea, where being overtaken with foule weather, they were driven upon the rocks and cast all away. Contrario wife, the Navie of the Greeks was increased by the arrivall of fiftie three Arbenia fhips, and one Lemnian, which came to their partie in the last fight. As these new forces encoutaged the one fide. fo the feare of Xerxes his displeasure stirred up the other to redeeme their losse with some notable exploit. Wherefore setting aside their unfortunate policies they resolved in plain fight to repaire their honour, and casting themselves into the form of a Crescent, thought so to inclose the Greeks, who readily did present them battell at Arremi fiam.

The fight endured from noone till night, and ended with equal loffe to both parts. Though more of the Persian ships were sunke and taken, yet the lesser losse feltaltogether CHAP. 6. S.5.

gether as heavie upon the Greekish fleet, which being small could worse beare it. Herein only the Barbarians may seem to have had the worse, that they for sook the place of sight, leaving the wrack and spoils to the enemie, who neverthelesse were fain to abandon presently even the passage which they had undertaken to defend both for that many of their ships were forely crusht in the battel, and especially because they had received advertisement of the death of Leonidas at Thermopylæ. Before they wayed anchors, Themistocles, Generall of the Atherians, engraved upon stone at the watering place an exhortation to the Inians, that either they should revolt unto the Greeks, or standaeutrall; which perswassion, he hoped would either take some place with them, or at the least make them suspected by the Persians.

6. IV. The attempt of Xerxes upon Apollo's Temple: and his taking of Athens.

Hen Xerxes had past the straits of Thermopyla, he wasted the country of the Phocians, & the regions adjoining : as for the inhabitants, they chose rather to flie, & reserve themselves to a day of battel, than to adventure their lives into his hands, upon hope of faving their wealth, by making proffer unto him of their fervice. Part of his armie he fent to spoil the Temple of Delphi, which was exceeding rich by means of many offerings that had bin made by divers Kings and great personages; of in all which riches it was thought that Xerxes had a better Inventorie than of the goods left in his owne Palace. To make relation of a great aftonishment that fell upon the companies which arrived at the Temple to have facked it, and of two Rockes that breaking from the Mount Parna ([166, overwhelmed many of the Barbarians, it were peradvenue fomewhat superstitious. Yet Herodorus, who lived not long after, faith, That the broken Rockes remained even to his memorie in the Temple of Minerva, whither they rowled in their fall. And furely this attempt of Xernes was impious; for feeing he beleeved that Apollo was a god, he should not have dared to entertaine a covetous defire of inriching himself by committing sacriledge upon his Temple. Wherefore it may possibly betrue. that licence to chastise his impietie, in such maner as is reported, was granted unto the di-30 vell, by that Holy One, who faith, Will a man spoile bis gods? and elswhere; Hathan, Nation changed their gods, which yet are no gods? Go to the Iles of Kittim, and behold and fend to Kedar, and take diligent heed, and see whether there be any such things. Now this impiety of Xerxes was the more inexcusable, for that the Per sans alledged the burning of Cybeles Temple by the Athenians, when they fet fire on the Citie of Sardis in Afia, tobethe ground and cause of thewaste which they made in burning of Cities and Temples in Greece. Wheras indeed, in the enterprise against Delphos, this vizzor of holy and zealous revenge falling off, discovered the face of covetous nesses for much the more ugly, by how much the more themselves had professed a detestation of the offence which the Athense ans had committed in that kind by meer mischance.

The remainder of that which Xerxes did, may be expressed briefly thus: He cameto Athens, which finding for saken, be took and burnt the Cittadel and Temple which was therein. The Cittadel indeed was defended awhile by some of more courage than wisedome, who literally interpreting Apollo's Oracle; that Athens should be safe in woodden wall, had fortisted that place with Boords and Palissadoes: too weak to hold out long, though by their desperate valour so well maintained at the first assault, that they might have yeelded it upon tolerable conditions, had they not vainly relied upon the prophecie: whereos (being somewhat obscure) it was wisely done of Themistocles, to make discretion the interpreter, applying rather the words to the present need, than fashioning the business.

How Themistocles the Athenian drew the Greekes to fight at Salamis.

He Athenians had before the comming of Xerxes removed their wives and children into Trazene, Azina, and Salamis, not so highly prizing their houses and lands, as their freedome, and the common libertie of Greece. Neverthelesse, this great orest zeale, which the Athenians did shew for the general good of their Countrie, was iltrequited by the other Greeks, who with much labour were hardly intreated to stay for themat Salamis, whilest they removed their wives and children out of the Citie. But when the Citie of Athens was taken, it was presently resolved upon, that they should forfike the Ile of Salamis, and withdraw the fleet to Isthmus: which necke of land they did purpose to fortiste against the Persians, and so to defend Peloponnesus by land and sea, leaving the rest of Greece as indefensible, to the furie of the enemie. So should the Ilands of Salamis and Agina have been abandoned, and the Families of the Athenians (which werethere bestowed as in places of securitie) have been given over into mercilesse bondage. Against his resolution Themistocles, Admirall of the Athenian Fleer, very Aronely made opposition; but in vaine. For the Peloponnesians were so possessed with feare of lofing their owne, which they would not hazzard, that no perswasions could obtaine of them, to regard the estate of their distressed Friends and Allies. Many remonstrances Themistocles made unto them, to allure them to abide the enemie at Salamb; As first in private unto Eurybiades the Lacedamonian, Admirall of the whole fleet; That the felfe-fame feare which made them for fake those coasts of Greece, upon which they then anchored, would afterward (if it found no checke at the first) cause them alfor diffever the Fleet, and every one of the Confederates to with-draw himselfe to the defence of his owne Citie and Estate: Then to the Councell of War, which Eurybiades no upon this motion did call together (forbearing to object what want of courage might worke in them hereafter;) he shewed that the fight at Isthmus would be in an open Sea, whereas it was more expedient for them, having the fewer ships, to determine the matterinthe streights; and that, befides the safeguard of Agina, Megara, and Salamis, they should by abiding where they then were, sufficiently defend Isthmus, which the Barbarians should not so much as once look upon, if the Greeks obtained victory by sea; which they could not fo well hope for elfwhere, as in that prefent place which gave him fo good advantage. All this would not ferve to retaine the Pelsponnefians, of whom one, unworthie of memorie, upbraided Themistocles with the losse of Athens, blaming Eurybiades for fuffering one to speake in the Councellathat had no Countrie of his own ptoinhabite. Abase and shamefull objection it was, to lay as a reproach that losse, which being voluntarily sustained for the common good, was intrue estimation by so much the more honourable, by how much it was the greater. But this indignitie did exasperate Themistocles, and put into his mouth a replie so sharp, asavailed more than all his former perswasions. He told them all plainely, That the Athenians wanted not a fairer Citiethan any Nation of Greece could boaft of; having well-neare two hundred good shippes of Warre, the better part of the Grecian Fleet, with which it was easie for them to transport their Families and substance into any part of the World, and settle themselves in a more secure habitation, leaving those to shift as well as they might, who in their extremity had refused to stand by them. Herewithall he mentioned a Towne in Italy belonging of old to the State of Athens, of which Towne he said an Oracle had foretold, That the Athenians in processe of time should build it a-new, and there (quoth he) will we plant our felves, leaving unto you a forrowfull remembrance of my words, and of your owne unthankfulnesse. The Peloponnessans hearing thus much began to enterinto better confideration of the Athenians, whose affaires depended not, as they well Perceived, upon so weak termes, that they should be driven to crouch to others; but rather were fuch, as might enforce the rest to yeeld to them, and condescend even to the uttermost of their owne demands.

For the Athenians, when they first embraced that Heroicall resolution of leaving their grounds and houses to fire and ruine, if necessity should ensore them so farre, for the preservation of their liberty; did employ the most of their private wealth, and all the common treasure, in building a great Navie. By these meanes they hoped (which accordingly sell out) that no such calamity should befall them by Land, as might not well becounterpossed by great advantages at Sea: Knowing well that a strong sleet would either procure victory at home, or a secure passage to any other Country. The other States of Greece held it sufficient, if building a few new ships, they did somewhat amend their navie. Wherby it came to passe, that, had they bin vanquished, they could not have expected any other fortune than either present death, or perpetual flavery; neither could they hope to be victorious without the assistance of the Athenians, whose forces by feadid equall all theirs together; the whole confifting of more than three hundred and fourescore bottomes. Wherefore these Peloponnesians beginning to suspect their owner condition, which would have stood upon desperate points, if the sleet of Athens had forsaken them; were soon perswaded, by the greater seare of such a bad event, to forget the lesser, which they had conceived of the Persians: and laying aside their insolent braverie, they yeelded to that most profitable counsell of abiding at Salamis.

§. VI.

How the Persians consulted about giving battell: and how Themistocles by policie held the 10 Greekes to their resolution; with the vistorie at Salamis thereupon ensuing.

TN the meane season the Persians had entred into consultation, whether it were convenient to offer battell to the Greekes, or no. The rest of the Captaines giving fuch advice as they thought would best please the King their Master. had foon agreed upon the fight; but Ariemi sia Queen of Halicarnasseus, who followed Xernes to this warre in person, was of contrarie opinion: Her counsell was, that the King himfelfe directly should march toward Peloponness, whereby it would come to passe, that the Greeke Navie (unable otherwise to continue long at Salamis for want of provision) should presently be differered, and every one seeking to preserve his owne Citie and an goods, they should, being divided, prove unable to result him, who had won so far upon them when they held together. And as the profit will be great in forbearing to give battell; so on the other fide, the danger will be more (faid she) which we shall undergoe, than any need requireth us to adventure upon; and the losse in case it fall upon us greater than the profit of the victorie which we defire. For if we compell the enemies to flie it is more than they would have done, we fitting still: but if they, as better Sea-menthan ours, putus to the worst, the journey to Peloponnesses is utterly dasht, and many that now declare for us, will foon revolt unto the Greekes. Mardonius, whom Xerxes had fentfor that purpose to the Fleet, related unto his Master the common consent of the other Captaines, and withall this disagreeing opinion of Artemisia. The King well pleased with to her advice, yet resolved upon following the more generall, but farre-worse counsell of the reft; which would questionlesse have beene the same which Artemisia gave, had not feare and flatterie made all the Captaines utter that, as out of their owne judgement, which they thought to be most conformable to their Princes determination. So it was indeed that Xerxes had entertained a vaine perswassion of much good, that his owne presence upon the shore to behold the conflict, would worke among the Souldiers. Therefore he encamped upon the Sea-fide, pitching his owne Tent on the mount Ægalaus; which is opposite unto the Isle of Salamis, whence at ease he might safely view all which might happen in that action, having Scribes about him to write downe the acts and behaviour of every Captaine. The neere approach of the Barbarians, toge-40 ther with the newes of that timorous diligence, which their Countrimen shewed in fortifying the Isthmus, and of a Persian Armie, marching a-pace thither; did now againe lo terrefie and amaze the Peloponne sians, that no intreatie, nor contestation would suffice to hold them together. For they thought it meer madnesse to fight for a Country alreadie lost, when they rather should endeavour to save that which remained unconquered; propounding chiefly to themselves what miserie would befall them, if losing the victorie, they should be driven into Salamis, there to be shut up, and besieged round in a poore

Hereupon they resolved forth-with to set saile for Ishmus: which had presently bin done, if the wisedome of Themistocles had not prevented it. For he perceiving what a viso elent fear had stopt up their eares against all good counsell, did practise another course, and forth-with labour to prevent the execution of this unwholesome decree; not suffering the very houre of performance to finde him busic in wrangling alteration. As soon as the Councell brake up, he dispatched secretly a trustie Gentlemant othe Persian Captaines, informing them trustly of the intended slight, and exhorting them to send part of their Navie about the Iland, which incompassing the Greekes, might prevent their escape; giving them withall a salfe hope of his assistance. The Persians no sooner heard than believed these good newes, well knowing that the victorie was their owne affured.

affured, if the Athenian fleet joyned with them; which they might eafily hope confidering what ability their Master had to recompence for so doing, both the Captaines with richrewards, and the People with restitution of their City, and Territories. By these meanes it fell out, that when the Greeks very early in the morning were about to waigh Anchor, they found themselves inclosed round with Persians, who had laboured hard all that night, sending many of their ships about the He of salamis, to charge the enemy in reare, and landing many of their men in the Isle of Pfittalea, which lyeth over against salumis, to fave fuch of their owne, and kill fuch of the Gracian partie, as by any misformue should be cast upon the shore. Thus did meere necessity enforce the Gracians to una dettake the battaile in the Straights of Salamis, where they obtained a memorable vi-Mory, stemming the foremost of their enemies, & chasing the rest, who falling foule one upon another, could neither conveniently fight nor flie. I doe not finde any particular occurrences in this great battaile to be much remarkeable. Sure it is, that the Scribes of xerxes had a wearifome taske of writing downe many difasters that befell the Persian fleet; which ill acquitted it felfe that day, doing no one piece fervice worthy the presence of their King, or the registring of his Notaries. As for the Greekes, they might well feene to have wrought out that victory with equall courage, were it not that the principall honour of that day was ascribed to those of Aegina, and to the Athenians, of whom it is recorded, That when the Barbarians did flie towards Phalerus, where the Landto army of Xerxes lay, the ships of Aegina having possessed the Straights, did sinke or take them, while It the Athenians did valiantly give charge upon those that kept the Sea, and made any countenance of refifting.

S. VII. Of things following after the battatle of Salamis: and of the flight of Xerxes.

Fter this victorie, the Greeks intending by way of Scrutinie, to determine which of the Captaines had best merited of them, in all this great service; every Cap-Tain, being ambitious of that honour, did in the first place write downe his own do name, but in the fecond place, as best deserving next unto himselfe, almost every Suffrage did concur upon Themistocles. Thus private affection yeelded unto vertue, as soone as her owne turne was ferved. The Persian King, as not amazed with this calamity, began to make new preparation for continuance of warre; but in fuch fashion, that they which were best acquainted with his temper, might easily discerne his faint heart through his painted lookes. Especially Mardonius, Author of the warre, beganne to call awary eye upon his Master, fearing left his counsell should be reworded according to the event. Wherefore purposing rather to adventure his life in pursuite of the vithorie, than to cast it away by undergoing his Princes indignation; hee advised the King to leave unto him three hundred thousand men, with which forces hee promised to reduce all Greece under the fubjection of the Perfian Scepter. Herewithall he forgot not to footh Xerxes with many faire words; telling him, That the cowardife of those Egyptians, Phanicians, and Cilicians, with others of the like metall, nothing better than flaves, who had fo ill behaved themfelves in the late Sea-fervice; did not concerne his honour, who had alwayes beene victorious, and had already subdued the better part of Gruce, yea taken Athens it felf, against which the Warre was principally intended. These words found very good acceptance in the Kings care, who prefently betooke himfelfto his journey homewards, making the more hast, for that he understood, how the Greeks hada purpose to faile to Hellesont, and there to breake downe his bridge, and intercept his paffage. True it was that the Greekes had no fuch intent, but rather wished his hasty o departure, knowing that hee would leave his Armie not fo strong, as it should have beene, had he in person remained with it. And for this cause did Eurybiades give counfell, that by no meanes they should attempt the breaking of that bridge, lest necessity should inforce the Persians to take more courage; and rather to fight like men, than dielike beasts. Wherefore Themistocks did, under pretence of friendship, send a false advertisement unto this timorous Prince, advising him to convey himselfe into Asia with all speed, before his bridge were dissolved which counsell Xerxes took very kindly, and hastily followed, as before is shewed. Whether it were so that hee found the bridge whole, and thereby repassed into Asia; or whether it were torne in sunder by tempests, Nnn

and he thereby driven to imbarke himself in some obscure vessell, it is not greatly materiall; though the Greeks dld most willingly imbrace the latter of these reports. Howsover it were, this slight of his did well ease the Country, that was thereby disburdened of that huge throng of people, which, as Locusts, had before overwhelmed it.

6. VIII.

The negotiations betweene Mardonius and the Athenians, as also betweene the Athenians and the Lacedamonians, after the flight of Xerxes.

Ardonius with his three hundred thousand had withdrawne himself into These salie, whence he sent Alexander, the son of Amyntus King of Macedon, as Embassiador to the Athenians, with promise of large amends for all their losses received; and of extending their Territories as farre as their owne defires; allowing them to retain their libertie and lawes, if they would make peace with Xerxes, and assist him in that warre.

The Athenians had now re-entred their city, but not as yet brought backe their wives and children; for as much as they well perceived that the place could not bee fecure, till the Army of Mardonius were broken and defeated. Wherefore the Laced amonians, understanding what faire conditions this Embassadour would propound, were perplexed with very great feare, left he should finde good and ready acceptance. Hereupon, they to likewise very spedily dispatched their Embassadors for Athens, who arriving before the Macedonian had audience, used the best of their perswasion to retain the Athenians firm. They alledged, that neither Xerxes nor Darius had any pretence of Warre against the rest of Greece, but had onely threamed the subversion of Athens, till they and all their Confederates arming themselves in defence of that City, were drawne into the quarrell, wherein the Athenians without much crueltic of injustice could not leave them. Wee know, faid they, that yee have endured great calamities, losing the fruit of the grounds, and being driven to forfake the Towne, the houses thereof bee ruined, and unfit for your habitation; in regard whereof, wee undertake to maintaine as our owne. your wives and children amongst us, as long as the warre shall continue, hoping that po yee, who have alwaies procured libertie to others, will not now goe about to bring all Greece into flavery and bondage. As for the Barbarians, their promises are large, but their words and oathes are of no affurance. It was needlesse to use many arguments to the Athenians, who gave answer to Alexander in presence of the Spartan Embassadors, That whilest the Sunne continued his course, they would be enemies to Xerxes, regarding neither Gold nor any riches, with which hee might feeke to make purchase of their libertie. Concerning the maintenance of their wives and children, it was aburden which they promifed to fustaine themselves, only desiring the Lacedæmonians, that with all fpeed they would cause their Armie to marche, for a sit was not likely, that Mardonius would long fit still in Thessalie, having once received such a peremp-10 torie answer. In this their opinion of Mardonius his readinesse to invade Attica, they found themselves nothing deceived. For hee, as soone as Alexander had returned their obstinate purpose of resistance, did forthwith leade his army towards them, and their City: they having now the second time quitted it, and conveyed themselves into places of more fecurity abroad in the Countrie, where they expected the arrivall of their confederates. From Athens he fent his Agent unto them, with instructions, not only to perswade them to acceptance of the conditions before to them propounded, but with great promises to allure the principall of them to his partie. His hope was, that either the people, wearied with for faking their houses so often, would be desirous to preserve them from fire, &to have those which were already laid waste, re-edified at the Kings charges: Or if this affection took no place with them, but that needs they would relie upon their old confederates, whose succors did very slowly advance forwards, yet perhaps the leaders might be wonne with great rewards, to draw them to this purpose; all which projects, if they should faile, the destruction of Athens would be a good meane to please his Master, King Xerxes, who must thereby needes understand, that Mardonius kept his ground, and feared not to confront the whole power of Greece, in the ftrongest part of their owne Countrie. But his expectation was beguiled in all thefe. For the Athenians fo little regarded his offers, that when one Lycidas, or (as Demosthenes calls him)

Cyrcilus, advised the Senate to accept the conditions, and propounded them to the people; all the Senators & as many as abiding without the Counfaile house, heard what he had faid, immediately fet upon him, and stoned him to death; not examining whether it were feare or mony, that had moved him to utter such a vile sentence. Yea, the women of Athens, in the Ile of Salamis, hearing of his bad counfaile, and bad end, affembling together did enter his house there, and put his wife and children to the like execution. All this bravery notwithstanding, when they perceived the slacknesse of the Peloponnefam in giving them aide, they were faine to betake themselves to Salamis againe, the oldplace of their fecurity. Remaining there, and feeing little forwardnes in those whom it most concerned to assist them, they sent very severe messages to Sparta, complaining of their flacknes, and threatning withall, to take fuch course as might stand best with their OWING good, seeing that the common estate of all was so little regarded. These messengers were at the first entertained with dilatory answers, which every day grew colder, when as the Peloponnesian Wall, builded a-thwart the Isthmus, was almost finished. But as the Lacedemonians waxed careless and dull, so the Athenians hotly pressed them to a quicke resolution, giving them plainly to understand, that if they should hold on in those dilatory courses, it would not be long ere the City of Athens took a new course, that should little please them. All this while the Persian fleet lay upon the coast of Asia, not daring to draw nearer unto Greece, as being now too weak at Sea. Likewise the Greekish Navie contained it selfe within the Harbours upon Europe side; both to doe service where need should require at home; & withall to shunne the danger which might have befallen any part of it, that (being distracted from the rest) had adventured over-farre. So mutual feate preserved in quiet the Ilands lying in the midst of the Aegean Seas. But it was well and leafonably observed by a Counsellor of Sparta, that the Wall upon Isthmus would ferre to little purpose for the defence of Peloponnesus, if once the Athenians gave eare to Mardonius: confidering that many doores would bee opened into that Demie-Iland, as foone as the Enemy should by winning the friendship of Athens, become the Master of the Seas about it. The Laced amonians upon this admonition, making better perufall of their owne dangers, were very carefull to give satisfaction to the Athenian Embassadors who not brooking their delaies, were upon point of taking leave, yea, as it feemed, of renouncing their alliance. Wherefore dispatching away five thousand Spartans in the evening, under conduct of Paulanias; they gave audience the next day to the Embassadors, whose complaints they answered with vehement protestations of their readinesses. deeply swearing that the Army of Sparia was already farre upon the journey, and giving them leave to take up other five thousand Lacedamonians, out of the Region adjoyning, to follow after them.

The Athenians, though distasting such want of gravity, in a matter so important, were neverthelesse contented with the sinall conclusion; & levying the number appointed of Luckamenian Souldiers, made what haste they could to incampe in Attica. The other so Grecians were nothing slacke in sending forth Companies, whose neare approach caused Mardonius to for sake Attica as a rough Country, and therefore of much disadvantage to Hose, wherein consisted the best of his power. Before his departure he burnt the City of Athens, beating downe the Walls of it, and ruining all that had formerly escaped the survey of War.

Twere too long a rehearfall to shew all that happened in many skirmishes between the Greekes and him, in the Country of Baotia, which Mardonius had chosen to bee the seate of that Warre. Much time was spent before the quarrell was decided by the triall of one maine battaile: for both parties did stand upon their guard, each expeding when the other should assaile them.

The army of Mardonius contained about three hundred thousand, which were by him chosenout of Xerxes his Army; to whom were adjoyned the forces of Thebes, Macedony, Thesself, and other parts of Greece, that now siding with the Persian, surnished his Campe with sifty thousand men. Against these the Lacedemonians, Athenians, and their Conferences, had leavied an Army of one hundred and ten thousand, of which forty thousands, had leavied an Army of one hundred and ten thousand, of which forty thousands.

CHAP. 6. S.10.

fand were weightily armed, the rest were only assistants to these forty thousand, being armed more sleightly, as rather to make excursions and give chase, than to sustaine any strong charges.

These two armies having eleven dayes confronted one the other, without performing any memorable piece of service; Mardonius, whose victuals began to saile, resolved any memorable piece of service; Mardonius, whose victuals began to saile, resolved any memorable piece of service; Mardonius, whose victuals began to saile, resolved to begin the fray. The Greekes were promised victory by an Oracle, if they fought in the Land of the Athenians, and in the plaine of Geres & Proserpina, making prayers unto certaine gods, Demi-gods, and Nymphes. But it was hard to finde the certaine place which the Oracle designed. For the plaine of Geres was indeed in the Territory of Athens; but there was also an old Temple of Geres and Proserpina, neare unto the place where they to lay at that time encamped, as likewise the memorials of those Nymphes and Demigods, were in the same place, upon Mount Githaron, and the ground served well for foot-men against horse; onely the Land belonged unto the Platæans, and not unto the Athenians.

Whilest the Greeks were perplexed about the interpretation of this doubtfull Oracle, the Plateans to make all cleere, did freely bestow their land on that side the Towneupon the Athenians.

re-edifie their City, which was ruined in the Peloponnesian wars.

All things being ready for battaile, the Lacedamonian Generall thought it most meet, that the Athenians should stand opposite that day to the Medes & Persians , whom they had formerly vanquished at Marathon; and that he, with his Spartans, should enterraine the Thebans and other Greekes which followed Mardonius , as better acquainted with their fight, and having beaten them often-times before. This being agreed upon, the Athenians changed place with the Laced emonians; which Mardonius understanding (whether fearing the Athenians, of whose valour the Medes & Persians had felt heavie proofe. or defiring to encounter the Spartans, as thinking them the bravest Souldiers in Green he did also change the order of his battaile, and oppose himselfe to Pausanias. All the Greekes might well perceive how the Enemy did shift his wings, and Pausanias thereupon returned to his former Station; which Mardonius noting, did also the like. Soone to whole day was spent in changing to and fro. Some attempt the Persians made that day with their Archers on horse-back, who did so molest the Greeks at their watering place, that they were faine to enter into confultation of retiring; because they could not withour much losse to themselves, and none to the enemy, lye neare to that fountaine which did serve all the Campe. Having therefore concluded among themselves to dislodge; and part of the Army being fent away before day-light: Mardonius perceived their departure in the morning, and thereupon being encouraged by their flight, (which to him feemed to proceed out of meer cowardise) he charged them in the reare with great violence. It may well be recorded as a notable example of patient valour, That the Laceda. monians being over-taken by the enemies horse, & over-whelmed with great flights of Arrowes, did quietly fit still, not making any refistance or defence, till the Sacrifices for victory were happily ended, though many of them were hurt and flaine, and some of especiall marke lost, before any signe of good successe appeared in the entrailes.

But as soone as Pausanias had found in the Sacrifice those tokens, which the superstition of that Age and Country accounted fortunate; he gave the Signall of battaile; and thereupon the Souldiers, who till then did situpon the ground, as was their manner, arose alrogether, and with excellent courage received the charge of the Barbarians, that came thronging upon them without any seare of such notable resistance. The rest of the Greeke Army that was in march, being revoked by Pausanias, came in a-pace to succour the Lacedamonians: only that part of the Army which was led by the Athenians, could not arrive unto the place of the great battaile, because the Thebans, and others Greeks consederated with the Persians, gave them checke by the way. Neverthelesse, the Spartans with other their assistants, did so well acquit themselves, that the Persians were vanquished, and Mardonius with many thousands more slaine in the field; the rest sed into the Campe, which they had fortissed with woodden Walls, and there defended themselves with such courage as desperate necessity inforced them unto, holding out the longer, because the Lacedamonians were not acquainted with the manner of assaulting Fortresses, and Walls. In the meane time the Athenians having sound strong opposition of the Thebanes and Thessalians, did with much labour & courage obtain victory, which having not long pursued, they came to help the Lacedamonians, whom they sound wearly bussed in assaulting the Campe, with more valour than skill. Wherefore they themselves under-took it, & in short space forced a passage through the Wall; at which breach first, and then on all sides, the Greekes entred with such fury, and just defire of vengeance, that of three hundred thousand they are said not to have left three thousand alive, excepting those who fielde away with Artabazus, when as the Persian Army first fell to rout.

If the execution were so great, as is reported, an especiall cause of it was the foolish remait, or rather flight into the Campe. For though it were so, that the place was well To fortified, and the number of those who cast themselves into it greater than any of the Affailants; yet they being of severall Nations and Languages and having lost their Generall with other principall Commanders, it was impossible that they in such a terrour and aftonishment should make good that piece of ground, lying in the heart of an Enemv Country, against an Army of men, farre more valiant than themselves, and enslamed with present victory. Therefore the same wall which for a few houres had preserved their lives, by holding out the enemy, did now impale them, and leave them to the flaughtering fury of unpitifull Victors. Artabazus fled into Thrace, telling the people of Thessaly, and other Countries in his way, that he was sent by Mardonius upon some 20 piece of service: For he well knew, that had they understood any thing of that great difconfiture, all places would have beene hostile unto him, and sought with his ruine to muchase favour of the vanquishers. Therefore making so large marches, that many of his Souldiers being feeble were left behinde and loft, he came to ByZantium, whence he thipped his men over into Asia. Such was the end of the vaine-glorious expedition, undenaken by Xerxes against the Greekes, upon hope of Honour, and Conquest, though foring otherwise, accordingly as Artabazus had fore-seene, and rather worse, for as much as it began the quarrell, which never ended before the ruine of the Persian Empire was effected by that Nation of the Greekes, despised and sought to have beene brought o mo flavery. Hereby it may feeme, that the vision appearing to Xerxes, was from God himselfe, who had formerly disposed of those things, ordaining the subversion of the Persian Monarchie by the Greeks, who thus provoked, entred into greater consideration of their owne strength, and the weaknesse of their Enemies.

§. X.

Thebattaile of Mycale, with a strange accident that fell out in the beginning of it: and examples of the like.

The fame day on which the battaile was fought at Plataa, there was another battaile fought at Mycale, a Promontory, or Head-land in Afia, where the Persian fleet rode.

Leutychides the Spartan, with Xantippus the Athenian, Admirals of the Greeke Navie, atherequest of some Handers & Ionians, did faile into those parts, to deliver the Samians, & procure the Ionians to revolt from the Perfian. Xerxes himselfe at this time lay at Sardis, acity in Lidia, not farre from the Sea-fide, having left threefcore thousand under the command of Tigranes, for defence of Ionia & the Sea-coast. Therfore when Artagnies and libramitres, Admirals of the Perfian fleete, understood that the Greekes bent their course towards themsthey did forth-with draw their ships a ground, fortifying with Pa-Madres & otherwise, as much ground as was needfull for the encamping of all their land & fea-forces. Leutychides at his arrivall, perceiving that they meant to keep within their frength, & resolving to force them out of it, rowed with his gally close aboord the shore, and called upon the Ionians (who more for feare than good will were encamped among the Persians) exhorting them in the Greek tongueto remember liberty, & use the faire oc-Coffon which they now had to recover it. Herein hee did imitate Themistocles, who had done the like at Bubaa, trufting that either these perswasions would prevaile, or if the Persons did happen to understand them, that it would breed some jealousie in them, cauing them to fight in feare of their own companions. It need not feeme strange, that this Nnn 3 very same stratageme, which little or nothing availed Themistocles, die now very happily succeed. For Xerxes being in his full strength, it was a matter of much difficulty, to perswade those inhabitants of Asia to revolt; who now in his declining estate, gaves willing eare to the fiveet found of liberty. The Persians likewise, who in their former bravery, little regarded and lesse feared, any treason to bee contrived by their subjects. were now so wary, that from the Samians which were amongst them, they tooke away their armes; the Milefians whom they did suspect, but would not seem to mistrust, they placed far from them, as it were for defence of the streight passages of Mycale; pretending that these Milesians did best of all others know those places. But these devices little availed them. For the Samians perceiving that they were held as Traitors, took courage to in the heate of the fight, and laying hold upon such weapons as came to hand, affailed the Perfans manfully within the Campe; which example the Ionians prefently followed, being very glad to have found some that durst beginne. It is said that while the Greekes were yet in a march toward the Enemies Campe, a rumour suddenly rannein the Army, that Mardonius was overthrowne in Greece, which (though perhapsir was given out by the Captaines to encourage the Souldiers) was very true. For the battaile of Plates was fought in the morning, and this of Mycale in the evening of the

The like report of that great battaile, wherein Paulus Aemilius overthrew Persus the last King of Macedon, was brought to Rome in foure dayes, as Livie with others do 20 record. And Plutarch hath many other examples of this kinde. As that of the battaile by the River Sagra in Italy, which was heard of the fame day in Peloponnefus: That of the battell against the Tarquinians & the Latines presently noised at Rome: And (which is most remarkable) the victory obtained against Lucius Antonius, who was Rebellio Domitian the Emperour. This Lucius Antonius being Lievtenant of the higher Germanie, had corrupted his Army with gifts and promifes, drawing the barbarous people to follow him, with great hope to make himselse Emperour; which newes much troubling the City of Rome, with feare of a dangerous Warre, it was fodainly reported that Antonius was flaine, and his Army defeated.

Hereupon many did offer facrifice to the gods, and shew all manner of publique joy, 20 as in fuch cases was accustomed. But when better inquiry was made, and the Authour of these tidings could not bee found; the Emperour Domittan betooke himselfe to his journey against the Rebell; and being now with his Army in march, he received advertisement by Poste, of the Victory obtained, and the death of Antonius: whereupon remembring the rumour noised before in Rome, of the selfe-same victory, he found that the report and victory were borne upon one day, though twenty thousand furlongs (which make about five & twenty hundred miles) a-funder. It is truely faid of Plurarch, that this last example gives credit unto many the like. And indeed it were very strange, if among fo many rumours, begotten by forgery or mistakings, & fostered by credulous imagination, there should not bee found (as happens in dreams among many thousand a vaine and frivolous) a few precifely true. Howbeit we may finde, that God himselfe doth sometimes use to terrefie those who presume upon their owne strength, by these light meanes of tumultuous noises, as he raised the siege of Samaria, by causing a found of Horses and Chariots to affright the Aramites; & as he threatned Senacherib, saying: Behold, I will fend a blast upon him, and he shall heare a noise, and returne to his owneland. Wherefore it may well have beene true, that God was pleafed by fuch a meane as this, to animate the Greekes; who (as Herodotus notes) went towards the Enemies with heavie hearts, being in great feare, lest their owne adventure should by no meanes fall out well; considering in what danger they had left their owne Countrey of Great, which was ready to bee subdued by Mardonius whilest they went wandring to seekeouts enemies a-farre-off, upon the coast of Asia. But the same of the battaile fought at Platas being noised among them; every man defired that his own valour in the present fight, might be some help to worke out the full deliverance of Greece. In this alacrity of spirit, they divided themselves into two Battalians, whereof the Athenians led the one, by the way of the plaine, directly towards the enemies Campe; the Laced emenians conducted the other, by the Mountaines and streight passages, to winne the higher ground. The Athenians did first set upon the Campe (ere the Lacedamonians could arrive on the other part) and being desirous to get all the honour of the day to themselves, didso forcibly affault it, that they brake way through the Paliffadoes and Gabions, & made themselves Masters of the place, flaying all that could not save themselves by flight. In this fight the Samians did good fervice as is formerly mentioned.

But the Milesians, who upon the like jealousie, were placed by the Persians on the rops of Mycale, to defend the passages, did now (as if they had bin set of purpose to keep them from running away) put as many to the fword as fell into their hands, letting none escape, except very few, that fled through by pathes. The Lacedamonians that day did little service, for the businesse was dispatched ere they came in: Onely they broke such companies as retired in whole troopes; making them flie dispersed in very much disoro der, whereby the Milesians were enabled to doe the greater execution upon them. This was the last fight of that huge Army leavied against Greece, which was now utterly broken, and had no meanes left to make offenfive Warres of webarbarous qualities of Xerxes: with a transition from the Persian affaires to matters of Greece, which from this time grew more worthy of regard.

Frxes lay at Sardis, not farre from the place of this battaile; but little minde had hee to revenge either this or other his great losses, being wholly given over to the love of his Brothers Wife: with whom hee could not prevaile by intreaty, nor would obtaine his defire by force, because he respected much his Brother her husband: hee thought it best to make a match between his owne Son Darius, and the Daughter of this Woman; hoping by that means to finde occasion of such familiarity as might worke out his defire. But whether it were fo, that the chaltity of the Mother didfill reject him, or the beauty of the Daughter allure him; hee soone after fell in low with his owne Sonnes wife, being a vicious Prince, and as ill able to governe himfelfein peace, as to guide his Army in warre. This young Lady having once defired the King to give her the Garment which hee then wore, being wrought by his owne Wife, go caused the Queen the reby to perceive her husbands conversation with her, which she imputed not for much to the beauty of her Daughther-in-law, as to the cunning of the Mother, against whom thereupon she conceived extreme hatred. Therefore at a Royall feat, wherein the custome was that the King should grant their request, she craved that the Wife of Maffler, her husbands brother, the young Ladies Mother, might be given inroller disposition. The barbarous King, who might either have reformed the abuse of fucha custome, or have deluded the importunate cruelty of his Wife, by threatning her felfe with the like, to what foe ver the should inflict upon the innocent Lady, granted the requelt: & fending for his brother, perfwaded him to put away the Wife which hee had, andtake one of his Daughters in her stead. Hereby it seemes, that hee understood how villainously that poore Lady should be intreated, whom hee knew to bee vertuous, and whom himselfe had loved. Mafiftes refused to put her away; alledging his owne love; her deferving, and their common Children, one of which was married to the Kings Some, as reasons important to move him to keepe her. But in most wicked manner Mirxes reviled him; faying, That hee now should neither keepe the Wife which he had, nor have his Daughter whom he had promifed unto him. Mafistes was much grieved with these words, but much more, when hee returned home, hee found his Wife most butcherly mangled by the Queene Amestris, who had caused her Nose, Lips, Eares, and Tongue to be cut off, and her Brefts in like manner, which were cast unto Dogs. Masistes imaged with this villany; tooke his way with his children; and some Friends; towards [®] Ballria, of which Province he was Governor, intending to rebell & avenge himselfe. But Xtrxes understanding his purpose, caused an Army to be eleavied, which cut him off by the way, putting him and all his Company to the Sword. Such was the Tyrannicall condition of the Persian Government; and such are generally the effects of Luxury, when it is joyned with absolute power.

Yet of xerxes it is noted, that hee was a Prince of much vertue. And therefore Alexthe Great, finding an Image of his over-throwne, and lying upon the ground, faid, That hee doubted, whether in regard of his vertue, hee should againe erect it, or, for the mischiese done by him to Greece, should let it lye. But surely whatsoever his other good qualities were, he was foolish, and was a coward, and consequently mercitesse.

Therefore wee may firmely believe, that the vertue of Cyrus was very great, upon which the foundation of the Persian Empire was so surely laid, that all the wickednesse and vanities of Xerxes, & other worse Princes, could not overthrow it, untill it was broken by a vertuealmost equal to that which did establish it. In wars against the Egyptians, the fortune of Xerxes did continue, as at the first it had been, very good; but against the general estate of Greece, neither he, or any of his posterity, did ever make offensive warre, but received many losses in Asa, to which the last at Myeale served but as an introduction; teaching the Greekes, and especially the Athenians, that the Persian was no to better Souldier at his owne doores, than in a forraine Country: whereof good triall was made forth-with, and much better proofe as soone as the affaires of Athens were quietly settled and assured.

From this time forward I will therefore pursue the Historie of Greece, taking in the matters of Persa, as also the estate of other Countries, collaterally, when the order of time shall present them. True it is, that the Persian estate continued in her greatnesse, many ages following, in such wise that the knowne parts of the World had no other King.

dome, representing the Majesty of a great Empire.

But this greatnesse depended onely upon the riches & power that had formerly been acquired, yeelding few actions or none that were worthy of remembrance, excepting to some Tragedies of the Court, and examples of that excessive Luxury, where-with both it, and all, or the most of Empires that ever were, have been enervated, made unweldy, and (as it were) fattened for the hungry swords of poore and hardy Enemies. Hereby it came to passe, that Xerxes and his successours were faine to defend their Crownes with money and base policies; very seldome or never (unlesse it were with great advantage) daring to adventure the triall of plaine battaile with that little Nation of Greece; which would soone have ruined the foundations laid by Gyrus, had not private malice and jealousse urged every City to envie the height of her neighbours wals, and thereby diverted the swords of the Greekes into their owne bowels, which after the departure of Xerxes began very well, and might better have continued, to hew out the way of consults, on the side of Asia.

Of things that paffed in Greece from the end of the Persian Warre, to the beginning of the Peloponnesian.

6. I.

How Athens was rebuilt and fortified.

64

Frenthat the Medes and Persians had received their last blow, and were utterly beaten at Mycale: Leutychides, who then commanded the Grecian Army, leaving the pursuit of the warre to the Athenians, a slisted by the revolted Iones, returned with the Lacedamonians and other Peloponnessians to Sparta and other places, out of which they had been leavied. The Athenians in the meane while besieged Sessos, a City or the strait of the Hedespons, betweene which and Abodus, Xerxes had lately fastned his Bridge of Boats: where the inhabitants, desperate of secour, did not long dispute the desenve thereof, but quitted it to the Greekes, who entertained themselves the Winter following on that side the Hellesport. In the Spring they drew homeward, and having less their wives and children, since the invasion of Attica, and the abandoning of Attens, in divers Islands, and at TrueZen, they now found them out, and returned with them to their owne places.

And though the most part of all their houses in athens were burneand brokendown, and the walls of the City over-turned, yet they resolved first on their common defence. and to fortifie their City, before they cared to cover themselves, their wives and children, with any private buildings. Whereof the Laced amonians being advertised, and milliking the fortifying of Athens, both in respect that their owne City of Sparta was unwalled, as also because the Athenians were grown more powerfull by Sea, than either themselves, or any other State of Greece, they dispatched messengers to the Athenians to diffwade them; not acknowledging any private mislike or jealousie, but pretending that if the Persians should return to invade Greece a third time, the Athenians being in no better state to defend themselves than heretofore, the same would serve to receive their enemies, and to be made a Seate for the Warre, as Thebes had lately bin. To this the Atheto mians promifed to give them fatisfaction by their own Embaffadors very speedily. But being resolved to goe on with their workes by the advice of Themistocles, they held the Lacedamonians in hope of the contrary, till they had raifed their walls to that height, as they cared not for their mislikes, nor doubted their disturbance; and therefore (to gaine ime) they dispatched Themistocles towards Lacedamon, giving him for excuse, that hee could not deliver the Athenians resolutions, till the arrival of his fellow-Commissioners, who were of purpose retarded. But after a while, the Lacedamonians expectation being converted into jealousie (for by the arrivall of divers persons out of Attica, they were told for certaine, That the walls of Athens were speedily grown up beyond expectation) Themistocles prayed them not to believe reports and vaine rumors, but that they would bee pleased to send some of their owne trusty Citizens to Athens, from whose relation they might resolve themselves, & determine accordingly. Which request being granted, and Commissioners sent, Themistocles dispatched one of his owne, by whom he adviled the Athenians, first to entertaine the Lacedamonians with some such discourse as might retaine them a few daies, and in conclusion to hold them among them, till himself, With other Athenian Embaffadors, then at Sparta, had their liberty alfo to return. Which done, and being also assured by his associates & Aristides, that Athens was already defensible on all parts, Themistocles demanding audience, made the Lacedamonians know, That it was true that the walls of Athens were now raised to that height, as the Atheni-10 ans doubted not the defence of their City; praying the Laced amonians to believe, That whensoever it pleased them to treat with the Athenians, they would know them for such as right well understood what appertained to a Common-weale and their owne fafety, without direction & advice from any other: That they had in the warre of Kernes abandoned their City, and committed themselves to the woodden Walls of their shippes, from the resolution of their owne counsells and courage, and not thereto taught or perfwaded by others : and finally, in all that perillous warre against the Persians they found their owne judgements and the execution thereof in nothing inferiour, or leffe fortunate, than that of any other Nation, State, or Common-weale among the Greekes: And therefore concluded, that they determined to be Masters and Judges of their owne oaffaires, and thought it good reason, that either all the Cities confedered within Greece hould be left open, or elfe that the Walls of Athens should be finished and maintained.

The Lacedamonians finding the time unfit for quarrell, diffembled their mislike, both of the fortifying of Athens, and of the division; and so suffered the Athenians to depart, and received backe from them their owne Embassadors.

The Walls of Athens finished, they also fortified the Port Pyrens, by which they might under covert imbarke themselves upon all occasions.

6. II.

The beginning of the Athenian greatnesse, and prosperous warre made by that State upon the Persian.

He Athenians having settled things in good order at home, prepared thirty Gallies for the pursuit of the warre against the Persians, to which the Lacedemonians added other twenty, and with this Fleet, strengthened by the rest of the Cities of Greece consederated, they set saile for Cyprus, under the conduct of Pausains the Lacedemonian; where, after their landing having possess themselves of many principall places, they imbarked the Army againe, and tooke land in Thrace, recovering from the Persians by force the City Bizantium, now Constantinople: from whence Pausanias, behaving himselfe morelike a Tyrant than a Captaine, especially towards the Ionians lately revolted from Xerxes, was called backe by the Councell of Lacedamon, and not onely accused of many insolent behaviours, but of Intelligence with the Medes, & Treafon against his Countrey. In his stead they imployed Docres, who either gave the same cause of offence; or else the Athemans, who affected the first commandement in that warre, practifed the fouldiers to complaine; though indeede the wife and vertuous behaviour of Aristides, Generall of the Athenian forces, a man of rare & incomparable fincerity, had beene able to make a good Commander feeme ill in comparison of himselfe: & therefore was much more availeable, in rendring those detested, whose vices afforded to little matter of excuse. Howsoever it were, the Lacedamonians being lo lesse wearied of the war, than the Athenians were eager to pursue it, the one obtained their ease, and the other the execution and honour which they defired : for all the Greeks (those of Peloponnefus excepted) willingly subjected themselves to the commandement of the Athensan, which was both the beginning of their greatnesse in that present age, and of their ruine in the next succeeding. For the charge of the warre being now committed unto them, they began to rate the confederated Cities 5 they appointed Receivers and Treasurers, & began to levie mony, according to their discretion, for the maintenance of the generall defence of Greece, & for the recovering of those places on Europe side, in Afia the lesse, and the Hands, from the Persians. This tribute (the first that was ever payed by the Greeki) 10 amounted to foure hundred and threescore Talents; which was raised easily by the honest care of that just man Aristides, to whose discretion all the confederates referred themselves, & no one man found occasion to complaine of him. But as the vertue of A. ristides, & other worthy Citizens, brought unto the Athenians great commodity; to the defire which they conceived of encreasing their commodity, corrupted their vertue, and robbing them of the generall love, which had made them powerfull, abandoned their City to the defence of her treasure, which with her in the next age perished. For it was not long ere these soure hundred and threescore Talents were raised to fixe hundred, nor long after that, ere their covetous tyranny had converted their followers into flaves, and extorted from them yearely thirteene hundred Talents. The Isle of Delos was at 30 the first appointed for the Treasure-house wherein these summes were laid up, and where, at the generall Affembly, the Captaines of those forces, sent by the confederates, were for forme fake called to confultation. But the Athenians, who were stronger by sea than all Greece besides, had lockt up the common treasure in an Island, undertheir owne protection, from whence they might transport it at their pleasure, as afterward

The generall Commander in this Warre was Cimon, the fon of Militades, who first tooke Eiona, upon the River Strimon; then the Isle of Sciros, inhabited by the Dolopes: they mastered the Carifii, and brought into servitude the Naxii, contrary to the form of the confederacy: So did the other the inhabitants of Greece, if at any time they failed of to their contribution, or disobeyed their commandements; taking upon them & usurping a kinde of loveraigne authority over the rest: which they exercised the more assured, because they were now become Lords of the Sea, and could not be refisted. Formany of the confederated Cities and Nations, weary of the warre in their owne persons, and given up altogether to their ease, made choice rather to pay their parts in money, than either in men of warre, or in ships ; leaving the provision of both to the Athenians. Hereby the onegrew weake in all their Sea-defences, and in the exercise of the Warres; the other greatly strengthened their Navie and their experiences, being alwayes amed and imployed in honorable Services, at the cost of those, who having lifted them into their Saddles, were now enforced to become their footmen. Yet was the Tribute-mony, lego vied upon these their confederates, employed so well by the Athenians at the first (asill proceedings are often founded upon good beginnings) that no great cause of repining was given. For they rigged out a great Fleet of Gallies, very well manned, wherewith Cimon the Admirall scouring the Asiaticke Seas, took-in the City of Phaselin; which have wing formerly pretended neutrality, and refused to relieve, or any way affist the Greekes, were enforced to pay ten Talents for a fine, and fo to become followers of the Athenians, paying yearly contribution.

s, paying yearly contribution. From thence hee set saile for the River Eurymedon in Pamphylia, where the Ersian Fleet

Fleet rode, being of fixe hundred fayle, or (according to the most sparing report) three hundred and fifty, and having a great Land-Army, encamped upon the shoare; all which forces having been provided for advancing the Kings affaires in Greece, where utterly defeated in one day, and two hundred ships taken by the Athenians, the rest being broken to pieces, or funk, ere ever they had fwom in the Greekish Seas. Cimon having in one day obtained two great victories, the one by Sea, and the other by Land, was very some presented with a third. For fourescore sayle of Phanicians (who were the best of all Seamen, under the Perfian command) thinking to have joyned themselves with the Fleet before destroyed, arrived upon the same Coast, ignorant of what had passed, and fearing nothing lesse than what ensued. Upon the first notice of their approach, Cimor to weighed anchor, and meeting them at an head-Land, called Hydra, did to amaze them. that they onely fought to run themselves on ground; by which meane preserving few of their men, they lost all their ships. These losses did so breake the courage of the Persian. that omitting all hope of prevailing upon Greece, he condescended to what soever Articlesit pleased the Athenians to propound, granting liberry unto all the Greeks inhabiting Asia and further covenanting, That none of his ships of War should sayle to the Westward of the Isles, called Cyanea and Chelidonia.

This was the most honourable peace that ever the Greek's made; neither did they in effect, after this time, make any war that redounded to the profit or glory of the whole Nation, till such time as under Alexander, they overthrew the empire of Persia; in which ware, sew, or perhaps none of them, had any place of great command, but served altogether under the Macedonians.

5. III. The death of Xerxes by the treason of Artabanus.

Besides these losses, which could not easily have bin repaired, the troubles of the Empire were at this time such; as gave just cause to the Persian of seeking peace upon any termes not altogether intolerable. For Artabanus, the Uncle of Xerxes, perceiving, that the King his Master did easily take small occasions to shed the blood of such, as in kindred or place were neere unto him, began to repose lesse hope of a safetie in remaining faithfull, than of obtaining the Soveraigntie, by destroying a Prince that was so hated for his cruelty, and despited for his cowardise and missortunes. Having conceived this Treason, he found meanes to execute it by Mitriedates an Eunuch, in such close manner, that (as if he himselfe had been innocent) he accused Darius the sonne of Xerxes, and caused him to suffer death as a Parricide. Whether it be true, that by this great wickednesse hee got the Kingdome, and held it seven moneths 50 whether intending the like evill to Artaxerxes the son of Xerxes, he was by him prevented and surprised, were hard to affirme any certainty. But all Writers agree upon this, That taken she was, and with his whole familie put to death by extreme tornients, according to the sentence whereof the truth is more ancient than the Verse.

Rarò antecedentem scelessum Descrit pede pana claudo. Seldome the villaine though, much haste he make, Lame-scoted Vengeance failes to overtake.

The banishment of Themistocles: his flight to Artaxerxes newly reigning in Persia 36 his death.

Reaxerses being established in his Kingdome, and having so compounded with the Ashenians, as the present necessity of his affaires required, began to conceive new hopes of better fortune against the Greeks, than hee or his predecessors had ever hitherto found. For the people of Athens, when the Persians were chasted out of Greece, did so highly value their owne merits in that service, that they not onely thought it suffer themselves to become the Commanders over many Townes and Islands of the Greekes, but even within their owne wals, they would admit none other forme of Government than meerely Democraticals. Herein they were so insolem, that no integritic nor good defert was able to preferve the eftate of any fuch as had borne great office longer than by flattering the rascall multitude, he was contented to frame all his words and deeds to their good liking.

The third Booke of the first part

This their intolerable demeanour much offended Themistocles; who, though informer times he had layed the foundations of his greatnesse upon popularity, yet now prefurning upon his good fervices done to the State, he thought that with great reason they might grant him the liberty to checke their inordinate proceedings. But contrariwile they were so highly offended with his often rehearing the benefits which they had received from him, that they laide upon him the punishment of ofracisme, whereby hee was banished for ten yeers, as a man over-burthensome to the Common-wealth.

Before the time of his returne was halfe expired, a new accusation was brought against him by the Lacedamonians, who charged him of confulting with Paulanias, about berraving the whole Countrey of Greece unto Xerxes. Hereupon Thems stocles, finding no place of fecurity against the malice of two fuch mighty cities, was driven, after many troublefome flights, and dangerous removings, to adventure himself into Persia, where he found Artakerxes newly feeled, & was by him very honourably entertained. But the great hope which Artaxerxes had conceived of advancing his affaires by the counfell and affiltance of Themistocks, proved altogether fruitlesse. For when the Athenians, in favour of Inarm the Lybian, (who infested Egypt, causing it to rebell against the Persian) had sent a Fleer to Sea, landing an Army in Egypt, and scouring those Easterne Seas, to the great hinde- 20 rance of Artaxerxes, & (for ought that I can understand) to the manifest breach of the peace, which to their great honour they had concluded with Xerxes; then did the Kins fend his Letters to Themistocles, requiring him to make good the hopes which hee had given, of affuring the Persian estate against the Greekes.

But whether Themistocles perceived much unlikelinesse of good successe, inleading a great army of dastardly Persians against the warlike people of Greecesor esse (asin favour of his vertue it is more commonly reported) the love of his Country would not permit him to feeke honour by the ruine of it: fure it is, that being appointed by Artaxerxesto undertake the conduct of great forces against the Athenians, he decided the great constit between thankfulnesse to his well deserving Prince, and naturall affection to his ownill-30 deserving people, by finishing his life with a cup of poyson.

How the Athenians, breaking the peace, which to their great honour they had made with the Persian, were shamefully beaten in Egypt.

Hen was Artaxerxes driven to use the service of his owne Captaines in the Egyptian warre, wherein it appeared well, That a just cause is a good desence against a strong enemy. An Athenian Fleet of two hundred faile strong was 40 fent forth under Cimen, to take in the Isle of Cyprus: which conquest feemed easie both to make and to maintaine, the Persian being utterly broken at Sea, and thereby unable to relieve the Island. Now although it were so, that a peace had been concluded, which was likly to have been kept fincerely by the Persian, who had made so good proofe of the Gracian valour, that he was nothing defirous to build any ships of Warre(without which the Greeks could receive no harme from him) whereof if any one should be found fayling towards Greece, the peace was immediatly broken, and if not, his whole estate; yet all the Sea-cost (no finall part of his Dominions) exposed to the wast of an enemy too far overmatching him. Yet whether the Athenians were in doubt, lest the league which in his own worser fortunes he had made with them, hee would break in theirs; and therefore so fought to get fuch affurance into their hands, as might urterly disable him from attempt ting ought against them; or whether the increase of their revenues & power, by adding that rich and great Iland to their Empire, caused them to measure honour by profit; they thought it the wifest way, to take whilest they might, whatsoever they were able to get and hold, and he unable to defend.

The Ile of Cyprus lying in the bottome of the streights betweene Cilicia, Syria and Egypt, is very fitly seated for any Prince of State, that being mighty at Sea, dotheither feeke to enrich himselfe by trade with those Countries, or to infest one or more of them when they are his enemies. And this being the purpose of the Athenians, their Ambition which had already devoured, in conceit, this Iland, was on the fudden well nigh choaked with a greater morfell, to fnatch at which, they let Cyprus alone, which they might eafily have swallowed and digested. For Inarus King of the Lybians, confining Egypt, having found how greatly the Countrey was exhausted by the late warres, and how weakely defended by very flender Persian Garrisons, conceived rightly, that if fuch small forces as the Satrapa or Viceroy could make on the sudden of his owne Guards, or levie out of the ordinary Garrisons, were by him defeated: the naturalls of the Countrey not long fince oppressed by Cambyses, and after a revolt very lately subdued by Xerxes, would soone breake faith with him, who had no other nitle to that Kingdome than a good fword. Further, he perswaded himselfe that the people, unable to defend themselves against the Persian without his assistance, would easiwhedrawne to accept him, the author of their deliverance, for King. Neither did this hopedeceive him. For having taken and cruelly flaine Achamenes the Viceron; divers Cities forthwith declared themselves for him, and proclayming him King, shewed the most of their indeavour for profecution of the Warre. But he confidering his owne weakenesse, and that the meanes of the Egyptians his adherents were not answerable to their desires, perceived well, that to resist the power of Artaxerxes, farre greater forcesthanhis and theirs were to be procured, at what price foever he obtained them. Therefore hearing of the great Athenian fleet, and knowing well the vertue of the Souldiers therein embarqued; he invited the Commanders to share with him the Kingdome of Egypt, as a farre greater reward of their adventure, than fuch an addition as that of Coprus could be to their estate. Whether he or they (if things had wholly forted according to their expectation) would have bin contented with an equall share, and not havefallen out in the partition, were perhaps a divination unnecessary. He was posfessed of the peoples love, they were of most power. But the issue of those affaires was fuchas left them nothing to communicate but misfortunes, which they shared somewhatequally.

Yet had the beginnings of their enterprise very good and hopefull successe: For they entred the Land as far as to Memphis, the principall Citie; and of the Citie it felfe they tooke two parts: to the third part, which was called the White wall, they laid fuch hardfiege, that neither those forces of the Persians, which then were in Egypt, were ftrong enough to remove them; neither could Artaxerxes well devife what means to use for the recovery of that which was loft, or for the preservation of the remainder. The best of his hope was by setting the Lacedamonians upon Athens, to enforce the Athenians to looke homewards to their owne defence. This was the first time that the Persian fought to procure the affiftance of the Greekes one against the other, by stirring them up with gold, to the entertainment of private quarrels, for the good of their common enemy. To this purpose he fent MegabaZus to Sparta with much Treasure; who after great wexpence, finding that the Lacedamonians were nothing forward in employing their whole force against the Athenians, whom in many conflicts of great importance they had found to be their matches, notwithstanding the absence of their Army in Egypt; he thought it his wifest way to imploy the rest of his money and meanes to their reliefe, who had now the space of sixe yeares defended his masters right in Egypt. Therefore hehastily dispatched another of his name, the sonne of Zopyrus, who arriving in Egypt, was first encountred by the revolted people; over whom he obtained victory, which made him master of the Countrey, whilest the Athenians lay busied about Memphis the great Citie.

It cannot be doubted, that long abode in a strange ayre, and want of supply, had much enseebled the Athenians: fure it is, that when Megaba Zus, having reduced the Countrey to obedience, attempted the Citie it selfe, whether his former successe had amended the courage of the Persians, or want of necessaries made the Athenians inferiour to themselves, he chased them out of Memphis, and pursued them so neare, as they were forc't to fortifie themselves in the Isle of Prosopites, where Megabazus, af-Prosopites an I-landbetweene ter eighteene moneths fiege, turning away one part of the River by divers Trenches, the rivers of Tan affaulted the Athenians without impediment of waters, tooke their Gallies, and put ly & Pharmutiaall to the fword, fave a few that faved themselves by flight into Lybia; the same en-outlets of Nilsa grainement had fiftie other Gallies which they fent to the succour of the first two towards Alexhundred andria.

hundred. For those Athenians having heard nothing that their Fleete and Armie was consumed, entred by the branch of Nilus, called Mendesium, and fell una-Islandin the was communited, and the Persian Armie; so as the Persians remouth of Nums, wares among the Phanician Gallies and the Persian Armie; covered all Egypt, but that part held by Amyrteus, and Inarus the King of Lybia, beour-letealled Bustinities, and ing by them taken and hanged. TOtwithstanding these overthrowes in Egypt, yet the Athenians in their homewarres waded through many difficulties, and held the reputation of their forces against the Lacedemonians, Corinthians, and others, rather to their advantage than otherwise. For as they were beaten neare unto Halia by the Corinthians and Epidaurians, so they obtained two great victories soone after; the one over the Pelopon. nesians, neere unto Ceeryphalia; the other over the Aginets, neare unto Agina; where they funke and carried away threescore and ten Gallies of their enemies. Furthermore, 10 they landed their forces on the sudden, and besieged Agina, from whence they could not be moved, notwithstanding that the Corinthians, to divert them, invaded Megara; where, after a great fight, with equall loffe, the Corinthians, whenthey returned againe to fet up their Trophie, as Victors in the former battell, were utterly broken and Haughtered by the Athenian Garrisons and Megarians, to their great loffeand dishonour.

Againe, as the Athenians were discomfitted neare to Tanagra, by the Lacedamonians, who returned from the succour of the Dorians against the Phocians (at which time the Theffalian horfe-men turned from their Allies the Athenians, and fought against them) so about threescore daies after, the Athenians entred Beotia under the conduct of Myroni- 30 des, where beating that Nation, they wan Photis on the gulfe of Otteus, and evened the wals of Tanagra to the ground. Finally, they enforced Agina to render upon most base conditions; as to beat down the walls of their Citie, and to give them hostages for Tribute; the fiege whereof they had continued, notwithstanding all their other brabbles and attempts elsewhere Besides these victories, they sackt and spoiled many places upon the Sea-coast of Peloponnesus, belonging to the Lacedamonians; wan upon the Corinthians, and overthrew the Sicyonians that came to their fuccour. These were the undertakings of the Athenians, and their Allies, during the time of those fix years that a part of their forces made war in Egypt. In the end whereof they attempted Thessalie, perswaded thereunto by Orefles, but were refifted by the king Pharfalus, who had chased Orefles out 40 of his Dominions. They also landed in Sicyonia, and had victory over those that refisted, after which they made truce with the Peloponnesians for five years, and sent Cimon into Cyprus with two hundred ships; but they were againe allured by Amyrteus one of the race of their former Kings, who held the Marish and Wooddie parts of Egypt from the Persians, to whom they fent fixty of their ships. The rest of their Armie failing in their enterprise at Cyprus, and their fortunate and victorious Leader Cimon dying there, as they coasted the Iland, incountred a fleet of the Phanicians and Cilicians, over both which Nations they returned victorious into Greece: as also those returned safe which were fent into Egypt.

of Arraxerxes Longimanus, that he was Ahashuerosh the busband of Queene Hefter.

Hefe Egyptian troubles being ended, the reigne of Artaxerxes continued peaceable; whereof the length is by fome restrained into twenty yeares, but the more and better Authors give him forty, fome allow unto him foure and forty

He was a Prince of much humanity, and noted for many examples of gentleneffe. His Favour was exceeding great to the Jewes; as appeareth by the Histories of Eldras and Nebemias, which fell in his time.

To prove that this was the King who gave countenance and avd to that great worke of building the Temple, it were a needleffe travell; confidering that all the late Divines have taken very much paines to shew that those two Prophets were licensed by him. and succoured in that building, in such fort as appeares in their writings.

This was likewise that King Ahalbuerosh who married Hester. Whereof if it be needfillto give proofe, it may suffice, That Abashuerosh lived in Susa, reigning from India to Ribiotia, and therefore must have been a Persian; That he lived in peace as appeares by to the circumstances of the Historie, and used the counsell of the seven Princes, the authority of which Princes began under Darius the son of Hyslaspes; wherefore he could be neither Cyrus nor Camby fes.

The continual Warres which exercised King Darius the Sonne of Hystalbes, together with the certainty of his marriages with fundry wives, from none of whom hewas divorced, but left his first wife Atoffa, the daughter of Cyrus alive in great honour, the being mother to Xerxes the succeeding King; do manifestly prove that Hefter was not his. Whereunto is added by Philo the Jew, That at the perswassion of Mardoche. us, Jojachim the high Priest the son of Jesua, caused the feast of Purim to be instituted in to memory of that deliverance. Now the time of Jojachim was in the reigne of Artaxerxes at the comming of Efdras and Nehemias : Jesua his father dying about the end of Darius.

The fame continuance of wars, with other his furious and tragicall loves wherewith xerxes did confirme frich little time as he had free from war, are enough to prove, that thestory of Hester pertained not unto the time of Xerxes, who lived but one and twenty weares, whereas the two and thirtieth of Ahafuerus or Artafaftha is expressed by Nehemiss. Againe, it is well knowne that Xerxes in the feventh year of his reigne (wherein this marriage must have bin celebrated) came not neare to Susa. Of the Princes that succeeo ded Artaxerxes Longimanus, to prove that none of them could be Ahalbuerolb, it is enough to fay, that Mardochaus having been carried from Hierafalem captive, with Jechomajoy Nabuchadne Zar, was unlikely to have lived untill their times.

But of this Artaxerxes it is true, that he lived in Sufa, reigned from India to Athiopialived in peace, was contemporary with Jojachim the high Priest, and further he had happily by his Lievtenants reclaymed the rebellious Egyptians in that seventh yeare of his reigne; which good fortune might well give occasion to such a Royall Feast, as is described in the beginning of Hester. This is the summe of the arguments, brought to prove the age of Hesters storic by the learned and diligent Krent Themius, who addes the authorities of Josephus, affirming the same, and of Philo giving to Mardochaus eighteene yeares more than Isaac the Patriarch lived, namely, one hundred fourefore and eighteene yeares in all, which expire in the five and thirtieth yeare of this Anaxerxes, if we suppose him to have been carried away captive, being a Boy of ten yeares old.

9. VIII-Of the troubles in Greece foregoing the Peloponnefian Warre.

D Ut it is fit that we now returne to the affaires of the Greekes, who from this time forward, more vehemently profecuting their civill warres, suffered the Persians for many ages to rest in peace: this Egyptian expedition being come to nought. Some after this, the Lacedamonians undertooke the watre called Sacred, recovered the Temple and Ile of Delphos, and delivered both to the inhabitants; but the Athenians regained the fame, and gave it in charge to the Phocians. In the meane while the banished Rectians re-entred their owne Land, and mastered two of their own Townes posses by the Athenians, which they foone recovered againe from them; but in their returne to-Wards Athens, the Bustians, Eubaans, and Loctions, (Nations oppress by the Athenians) thupon them with such resolution, as the Athenians were in that fight all slaine or taken, whereby the Bwotians recovered their former liberty, restoring to the Athenians their prisoners. The Ilanders of Eubwa tooke such courage upon this, that they revolted wholly from the Athenians, whom when Pericles intended to reconquer, he was advertised that the Megarians (who first left the Lacedamonians, and submitted themselves to tised that the Megarians (who first left the Lacedamonians, and submitted themselves to Athens) being now weary of their yoke, had slaine the Athenians Garrisons, and joyned themselves with the Corinthians, Sicyonians, and Epidaurians. These newes hastened Pericles homeward with all possible speed; but ere he could recover Attica, the Peloponne. sians, led by Plistoanax the son of Pausanias, had invaded it, pillaged & burnt many parts thereof, after whose returne Pericles went on with his first intent, and recovered Eubea. Finally, the Athenians began to treat of peace with the Peloponnesians, and yeelded to deliver up all the places which they held in the Country of Peloponnesis: and this truce was made for thirty years.

The third Booke of the first part

After fixe of these years were expired, the Athenians (savouring the Mylesians against the Samians) invaded Samos by Pericles, and after many repulses, and some great losses, both by Sea and Land, the Citizens were fore't to yeeld themselves upon most lamentable conditions; Namely, to deliver up all their ships, to break downe their own wals, to pay the charge of the war, and to restore whatsoever had been taken by themselves, or by their practice from the Athenians. In the neck of which followed that long and cruell Peloponnesian War, whereof I have gathered this briefe following: the same contention taking beginning fiftie yeares after the slight of Xerxes out of Greece. But because there was no Citie thereof, which either in the beginning of this war, or in the continuance of it, was not drawne into the quarrell; I hold it convenient now at the first to shew briefly the estate of the Countrey at that time, and especially the condition of those two great Cities, Athens and Sparta, upon which all the rest had most dependance.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Peloponnesian Warre.

6. I.

Upon what termes the two principall Cities of Greece, Athens and Sparta, stood at the beginning of the Peloponne sian Warre.

Recce was never united under the government of any one Prince or Estate, untill Philip of Maccdon, and after him Alexander, so brought them rather to a Union and League against the Persians, whereof they were Captains, than into any absolute subjection. For every estate held their own, and were governed by Lawes, farre different, and by their owne Magistrates, notwithstanding the power of the Maccdonians, to whom they did yeeld obedience no otherwise than as to such, who were (persore) their leaders in the Persian war (deemed the Generall quarrellos Greece) and tooke the profit and honour of the victory, to their own use and increase of greatnesse. But the Kings which afterwards reigned in Macedonia, did so farre enlarge their authority, that all Greece was by them brought under such obedience, as differed the from servitude; very sew excepted, who could hardly, sometimes with armed and sometimes with gifts, preserve their liberty; of whom the Laced emonians and Athenia ans were chiefe: which two people deserved best the plague of tyranny, having first wen occasion thereunto by their great ambition, which wearied and weakened all the Country by perpetuall Warre. For untill these two Cities of Atheniand Sparts di stracted all Greece, drawing every State into the quarrell, on the one or other side, and so gave beginning to the Peloponnessan Warre (the effects whereof in true elimation ceased not, before the time that Philip had over-mattered all, sorasmuch as every conclusion of one war afforded henceforth matter of some new distraction of the whole Countrey) the wars, commenced between one Citie of Greece and another, were neither great, nor of long continuance. All controversies were soon decided, either by the authority of the Amphiciones, who were the generall Councell of Greece, or by the power of the Lacedamonians, whose aid was commonly held as good as the affurance of victory.

These Lacedamonians had lived about foure hundred yeares under one forme of Government, when the Pelaponnesian War began. Their education was only to practise seaso of Armes; wherein they so excelled, that a very sew of them were thought equall to very great numbers of any other people. They were poor, and cared not much for wealth; so every one had an equall portion of the common field, which sufficed to maintaine him insuch manner as they used. For bravery they had none, and curious building or apparell they regarded not. Their diet was simple, their seasts and ordinary meales being in common Hals, where all fared alike. They used money of yron, whereof they could not be coverous nor great hoarders. Briefly, they lived topian like, save that they used no other occupation than War, placing all their selicity in the glory of their valour. Hereby it came to passe that in all enterprises, whereof they were partakers, the leading and high command was granted to them, and all Greece followed their conduct. But the Athenians were in all points contrary to this. For they sought wealth, and measured the honours of their victories by the profit; they used mercenary Souldiers in their wars, and exacted to great tribute of their Subjects, which were for the most part Ilanders, compelled to obey

As informe of policy, and in course of life, so in conditions naturall, the difference betweenthese two people was very much. The Athemans were eager and violent, sodaine intheir conclusions, and as hasty in the execution-The Lacedamonians very slow in their deliberations, full of gravity, but very resolute, and such as would in cold bloud perform what the Athenians did usually in flagrant. Wherby it came to passe, that the Lacedemomians had all the Estates of Greece depending upon them, as on men firm and assured, that fought honor & not riches; wheras the Athenians were followed by fuch as obeyed them perforce, being held in streight subjection. But the Signory of the Athenians was nothing 30 large, untill fuch time as the Perfian Xerxes had invaded Greece, pretending only a quarrell to Athens: Forthen the Citizens perceiving well, that the town of Athens could not bedefended against his great Armie of seventeene hundred thousand men, bestowed all their wealth upon a Navic, & (affifted by the other Grecians) overthrew the fleet of Xerxes, whose Land-forces were soone after discomfitted by them, and the Greeks, who all served under conduct of the Spartans. After these victories, the Athenians being now verymighty in fleet, reduced all the Ilands of the Greekish Seas under their obedience 1 impoling upon them a hard tribute, for maintenance (as they pretended) of War against the Pulian; though indeed they imployed their forces chiefly, to the conquest of such Ilands and haven-Townes of their owne Countrimen, as stood out against them. All which was seafily suffered by the Lacedamonians, who were In-landers, and menthat delighted not in expeditions to be made far from home. But afterwards perceiving the power of the Athenians to grow great, they held them in much jealousie, and were very apt to quarrel with them; but much more willing to breed contention between them and other Estates. Wherfore at fuch time as the Thebans would have oppressed the Plateans, when they of Plata repaired to Sparta for fuccour, they found there no other side, than this advice, That they should seek help at Athens. Hereby it was thought, that the Athenians should beintangled in a long and tedious War with their neighbours of Thebes. But it proved otherwise; for their force was now so great, that all such occasions did onely serve to increase their honour and puissance.

§. II.

How Sparta and Athens entredinto Warre.

Evertheless many Estates of Greece were very il-affected to Athers, because that Citie grew very infolent upon sudden prosperity, and maintaining the weaker Townes against the stronger, incroached apace upon their Neighbours, taking their their dependants from them. Especially the Corinthians were much inraged, because the people of the Hand Coregra, their Colonie which had rebelled against them, and given them a great overthrow by Sea, was by the Athenians (who defired to increase their seet them a great overthrow by Sea, was by the Athenians (who defired to increase their seet by adjoyning that of Coregra unto it) taken into protection, and the Corinthians thereby by adjoyning that revenge which else they would have taken. Now howsoever it were impeached of that revenge which else they would have taken. Now howsoever it were so that these dealings of the Athenians were not directly against the conditions of peace for that these dealings of the Athenians were the complaints made at Sparta so vehement, agreed upon among the Greekes, yet were the complaints made at Sparta so vehement, that (though with much adoe) they concluded to redresse, by warre the injuries done to their Allies.

First therefore, seeking religious pretences, they required the Athenians to expiate certaine offences committed against the gods; whereto having for answer, That they themeselves should expiate other the like offences, committed in Sparta, they began to deale felves should expiate other the like offences, committed in Sparta, they began to deale felves should expiate other that the people of some Townes, oppressed by the State of Athens, should be set at liberty; and that a decree made against those of Megara, whereby they should be set at liberty; and that a decree made against those of Megara, whereby they should be reversed. This last point they so carnestly presse, that if they might obtain it, they promised to absist from their purpose of making War.

This they defired, not as a matter of any great importance (for it was a trifle) but only that by feeming to have obtained somewhat, they might preserve their reputation without entring into a war, which threatned them with greater difficulties apparent, than they 10

Were very willing to undergoe.

But the Athenians would yeeld to nothing; for it was their whole defire that all Green should take notice how farre they were from seare of any other Citie. Hereuponthey prepared on both sides very strongly, all that was needfull to the War; whereinthe Lacedamonians were Superiour, both in number and quality, being affisted by most of the Cities in Greece, and having the generall savour, as men that pretended to set aliberty such as were oppressed but the Athenians did as far exceed them in all provisions of money, shipping, engines, and absolute power of command among their Subjects; which they held, and afterward found of greater use in such need, than the willing readinesse of friends, who soone grow weary, and are not easily assemble d.

§. III. The beginning of the Peloponnessan Warre.

Hefirst and second yeares expedition was very grievous to the Citie of Athens. For the Fields were wasted, the Trees cut downe, the Countrey peopledriven to flye, with Wives, Children, and Cattell, into the Towne; whereby a most furious pestilence grew in the Citie, such as before they had never felt, nor heard of. Hereunto was added the revolt of the Mytilenians, in the Ile of Lesbos, & the fiege of Platheir confederated City, which they durft not adventure to raise; besides some small 40 overthrowes received. The Lacedamonians affembling as great forces as they could raife out of Peloponnesus, did in the beginning of Summer enter the Countrey of Aitica, and therein abide, untill victuals began to faile, wasting and destroying all things round about: The Governours of the Athenians would not suffer the people to iffue into the field against them; for they knew the valour of their enemies: but used to send a fleet into Peloponnesus, which wasted as fast all the Sea-coast of their enemies, whilest they were making warre in Attica. So the Peloponnesians being the stronger by Land, wan the Towns of Plates, which wanted rescue; the Athenians likewise being more mighty by Sea, did subdue Mytilene which had rebelled, but could not be succoured from sparta. By these proceedings in that Warre, the Lacedamonians began to perceive how unfit they were to deale with fuch enemies. For after that Attica was throughly wasted, it lay not greatly in their power to doe any offence equall to fuch harme as they themselves might, and did receive. The Confederates began to fet forward very flowly in their expeditions into Atticas, perceiving well that Athens was plentifully relieved with all necessaries, which came by the Sea from the Ilands that were subject unto that Estate; and thereforethese invaders tooke but small pleasure in beholding the Walls of that mighty Citie, or in wasting a forsaken field, which was to them a patterne of the calamities, with which their owne Territory was the whilest afflicted. Wherefore they began to set their care to build a strong Navie, wherein they had little good successe, being easily vanquished by the Athenians, who both had more and better ships, and were so skilfull in Sea-sights, that a few Vessels of theirs durst undertake a great number of the peloponness ans.

§. IIII.

Of the great losse which the Spartans received at Pylus.

Mong other losses which the Spartans had felt by Sea; they received at Pylus a very fore blow, that compelled them to fue for peace. A fleet of Athenian ships bound for Corcyra, wasting in that passage, as their manner was, the coast of Laconia, and all the halfe Ile of Peloponnesus, was by contrary windes detained at Pylus, which is a ragged Promontory, joyning to the maine, by a strange necke of Land. Before it there lies a fmall barren Iland of leffe than two miles compaffe, and within that a creeke, which is a good harbour for ships, the force of weather being borne off by the head-Land and Isle. this Promontorie the Athenians fortified as well as in hastethey might; and what was wanting in their artificiall fortification, was supplyed by the naturall strength and fire of the place. By holding this piece of ground, and haven, they to in reason expected many advantages against their enemies. For the Countrey adjoyning was inhabited by the Messenians, who in ancient times had held very strong and cruell warre with Sparta; and (though quite subdued) they were held in streight subjection; vetwas not the old hatred fo extinguished, that by the neare neighbourhood and affifance of the Athenians, it might not be revived. Furthermore it was thought, that many ill-willers to the Lacedamonians, and as many of their bond-flaves as could escape from them, would repair to Pylus, and from thence madedaily excursions into Laconia, which was not far off: Or if other hopes failed, yet would the benefit of this haven, lying almost in the mid-way betweene them and Coreyra, make them able to furround all Pelopenne-Im, and waste it at their pleasure. The newes of these doings at Pylus drew the Peloponnefians thither in all haste out of Attica, which they had entred a few daies before with their whole Armie: but now they brought not only their Land-forces, but all their Navieto recover this piece, which how bad a neighbour it might prove in time, they well fore-faw, little fearing the grievous loffe at hand, which they there in few daies received. For when they in vain made a generall affault on all fides, both by Sea and Land; finding that small Garrison which the Athenians had left, very resolute in the defence: they occupied the haven, placing foure hundred and twenty choyce men, all of them Citizens of Sparta, in the Iland before mentioned, at each end whereof is a channell that leades into the Port; but so narrow, that onely two ships in front could enter betweene the Isle and Pylus; likewise but seven or eight ships could enter at once by the further channell, between the Iland and the Maine. Having thus taken order to shut up this new Towne by Sea, they sent part of their fleet to fetch wood, and other stuffe, wherewith to fortifie round about, and blocke up the piece on all sides. But in the meane season the Athenian fleet hearing of their danger that were left at Pylus, returned thither, and with great courage entring the haven, did break and fink many of their enemies veffels; took five, and fo inforced the refidue to run themselves a-ground.

Now was the Towne secure, and the Spartans abiding in the Iland as good as lost. Wherefore the Magistrates were sent from Sparta to the campe (as was their custome in great dangers) to advise what were best for the publike safety; who when they did perceive that there was no other way to rescue their Citizens out of the Isle, than by composition with their enemies, they agreed to entreat with the Athenians about peace, taking truce in the meane while with the Captaines at Pylus. The conditions of the truce were, That the Lacedamonians should deliver up all the ships which were in the coast, & that they should attempt nothing against the town, nor the Athenians against the campe: That a certaine quantity of Bread, Wine, and Flesh should be daily carried into the Isle, but that no ships should passe into the Island secretly: That the Athenians should carry the Lacedamonian Embassadors to Athens, there to treat of peace, and should bring them backe, at whose returne the truce should end, which is in the meane time it were broken in any one point, should be held utterly voyd in all: That when the truce was expired, the Athenians should restore the Peloponnesian ships, in as good case as they received them. The Embaffadors comming to Athens, were of opinion, that as they themselves had begun the warre, so might they end it when they pleased. Wherefore they told the Athe. nians how great an honour it was that the Lacedamonians did fue to them for peace, advifing them to make an end of warre, whileft with fuch reputation they might. But they foundall contrary to their expectation: For in stead of concluding upon eventermes, or desiring of meet recompence for losse sustained; the Athenians demanded certain Cities to be restored to them, which had bin taken from them by the Laced emonians long before this warre began, refusing like wise to continue the treaty of peace, unlesse the Sparsans which were in the Isle, were first rendred unto them as prisoners. Thus were 10 the Embassadors returned without effect, at which time the truce being ended, it was defired from the Athenian Captaines, that they should, according to their covenant, restore the ships which had been put into their hands. Whereto answer was made, that the condition of the truce was, That if any one article were broken, all should be held void. now (faid the Athenians) ye have affaulted our Garrisons, and thereby are weacquitted of our promife to restore the ships. This and the like frivolous allegations which they made, were but meere shifts; yet profit so far overweighed honour, that better answer none could be got. Then were the Lacedemonians driven to use many hard meanes, for conveyance of victuals into the Isle; which finally was taken by force, and the men that were in it carried prisoners to Athens, where it was decreed that when the Peloponness. 20 ans next invaded Attica, these prisoners should all be slaine. Whether fearing the death of these men, or with-held by the troubles, which (according to the Athenians hope) fell upon them; the Lacedamonians were fo far from wasting Attica, that they suffered their owne Country to becontinually over-runne, both by the Athenians, who landed on all parts of their coast, and by those which issued out of Pylus; which became the Rendevous of all that were ill-affected unto them.

How the Lacedemonians hardly and to their great disadvantage, obtained a peacethat was 30 not well kept.

Herfore they endeavoured greatly to obtain peace; which the Athenians would not hearken unto. For they were so puffed up with continuance of good successe, that having fent a few bands of men into Sieilie, to hold up a faction there, and make what profit they might of the Sicilians quarrels 3 when afterward they heard that the differences in that Isle were taken away, and their bands returned without either gaine or losse, they banished the Captaines, as if it had been meerely through their default, that the Ile of Sicilie was not conquered; which (besides the longer distance) was in power to offend others, or defend it felfe, no whit inferiour unto Peloponnesus. Yet 40 was this their over-weening much abated shortly after, by some disasters received, especially in Thrace, where in a battell which they loft at Amphipolis, Cleon and Brafidas, Generals of the Athenian and Lacedamonian forces, were both flaine; which two had most bin adversaries to the peace. As the Athenians by their losses were taught moderation; fo the Lacedamonians, who not only felt the like wounds, but through the great Navie which they had received at Pylus, were faine to proceed lamely in the war, against such as, through commodity of their good fleet, had all advantage that could be found in expedition, were fervently defirous to conclude the businesse, ere Fortune by any new favour should revive the insolence, which was at this time well mortified in their Enemies. Neither was it only a confideration of their present estate, that urged them to 50 bring the treaty of peace to a good and speedy effect; but other dangers hanging over their heads, and ready to fall on them, which unlesse they compounded with the Athe mians, they knew not how to avoyd. The estate of Argos, which had ancient enmity with them, was now after a truce of thirty yeares well nigh expired, ready to take the benefit of their present troubles, by joyning with those who alone found them worke enough. Argos was a rich and strong Citie, which though inferiour to Sparta in valour, yet was not so unwarlike, nor held such ill correspondence with the neighbouring Estates, that the Lacedamonians could ever farre prevaile uponit, when they had little elfe to doe.

This was a thing that in the beginning of this Warre had not been regarded. For it was then thought that by wafting the Territory of Athens with fword and fire, the quarrell should early and in short time have been ended, whereby not only the Athenians should have bin brought to good order, but the Corinthians, and others, for whose sike the war was undertaken, have bin so firmly knit to the Lacedamorians, that they should for love of them have abandoned the Argives to their own fortunes. But now the vanity of those hopes appeared, in that the Athenians abounding in ready mony, and means toraise more, were able to secure themselves by a strong fleet, from any great harme that the Peloponness, wanting wherewith to maintaine a Navie-could do unto them; yea, as Masters of the Sea, to weary them out, as in effect already they had done. As for the Consederates to of sparta, they could now endure neither war nor peace; their daily travels, and many losses had so wearied and incensed them. Wherefore the Lacedamorians were glad to use the occasion, which the inclination of their enemies did then afford, of making a finall peace, which with much adoe they procured, as seemed equall and easie; but was indeed impossible to be performed, and therefore all their travell was little effectuall.

The restitution of prisoners and places taken being agreed upon; it fell out by lot, that the Laced amonians should restore first. These had wonne more Townes upon the contipentfrom the Athenians, than the Athenians had from them; but what they had wonne, they had not wonne absolutely. For they had restored some Townes to such of their to Allies, from whom the State of Athens had taken them; some, and those the most, they had fet at liberty (as reason required) which had opened their gates unto them as to their friends and deliverers, and not compelled them to breake in as enemies. Now concerning the Townes which were not in their owne hands, but had bin rendred unto their Confederates, the Spartans found meanes to give fome fatisfaction, by permitting the Athenians to retaine others, which they had gotten in the Warre; as for the rest, they promifed more than afterwards they could performe. The Cities which they had taken intoprotection, could not endure to heare of being abandoned, neither would they by any meanes yeeld themselves into the hands of their old Lords the Athenians, whom they had offended by revolting, notwith franding what foever articles were drawne, and concluded, for their fecurity, and betterance in time to come. This dull performance of conditions on the fide of the Spartans, made the Athenians become as backward in doing those things which on their part were required; so that restoring only the prisoners which they had, they deferred the reft, untill fuchtime as they might receive the full satisfaction, according to the agreement. But before such time as these difficulties brake out into matter of open quarrell, the Lacedamonians entred into a more freight alliance with the Athenians; making a league offensive and defensive with them. Hereunto they were moved by the backwardness of the Argives, who being (as they thought) likely to have fued for peace at their hands, as foone as things were once compounded betweene Athens and Sparta; did shew them selves plainely unwilling to give care to any in such motion. Thinking therefore, that by cutting from Argos all hope of Athenian succour, they flould make fure worke, the Spartans regarded not the affections of other States, whom they had either bound unto them by well-deferving in the late war, or found for touble forme, that their entirity (if perhaps they durft let it appeare) was litthe worse than friendship. It bred great jealousie in all the Cities of Greece, to perceive hich a conjunction betweene two fo powerfull Signiories: especially one clause threatsing every one, that was any thing apt to feare, with a fecret intent that might be harboured in their proud conceits, of Subduing the whole Countrey, and taking each what they could lay hold on. For befides the other articles, it was agreed, That they might by mutual confert adde new conditions or alter the old at their owne pleasures. This impression wrought so strongly in the Corinthians, Thebanes, and other ancient Confederates of Sparta, that the hate which they had borne to the Athenians their professed enemics, was violently throwne upon the Lacedamonians their unjust friends: whereby it came to passe, that they who had lately borne chiefe sway in Greece, might have been abandoned to the discretion of their enemies; as already in effect they were, had the eneand wifely used the advantage. សាសស្រាស្សាលិចម៉ូនេស

Of the negotiations and practices held betweene many States of Greece, by occasion of the Peace that was concluded.

He admiration wherein all Greece held the valour of Sparta as unrefiftable, and able to make way through all impediments, had bin so excessive, that when by some sinister accidents, that Citie was compelled to take and seeke peace, upon termes not founding very honourable, this common opinion was not onely abated, but (as happensufually in things extreme) was changed into much contempt. For it was the never thought that any Lacedemonian would have endured to lay down his weapons.& yeeld himselfe prisoner, nor that any misfortune should have bin so great, as should have drawne that Citie to relieve it selfe orherwise than by force of Armes. But when once it had appeared that many of their Citizens, among whom were some of especiall marke, being overlayed by enemies, in the Iland before Pylus, had rather chosen to live incaptivity, than to die in fight; and that Pylus it felfe, sticking as a thorne in the foot of Laconia, had bred fuch anguish in that Estate, as utterly wearying the accustomed Spar. tan resolution, had made it sit down and seeke to refresh it selfe by dishonourable ease: then did not only the Corinthians and Thebans begin to conceive basely of those men which were vertuous, though unfortunate; but other leffer Cities joyning with thefe in to the same opinion, did cast their eyes upon the rich and great Citie of Argos, of whoseability to doe much, they conceived a strong beliefe, because of long time it had done nothing. Such is the base condition, which through foolish envie is become almost naturall in the greater part of mankind. We curiously fearch into their vices, in whom, had they kept some distance, we should have discerned only the vertues; and comparing injuriously our best parts with their worst, are justly plagued with a false opinion of that good in ftrangers, which we know to be wanting in our felves.

The first that published their dislike of Sparta were the Corinthians, at whose vehement entreaty (though moved rather by envie at the greatnesse of Athens daily encreasing) the Lacedamonians had entred into the present Warre. But these Corinthians did only mur- 30 mure at the peace, alledging as grievances; that fome townes of theirs were left in the Athenians hands. The Mantineans, who during the time of Warre, had procured some part of the Arcadians to become their followers, and for fake their dependancy upon the State of Sparta, did more freely and readily discover themselves; seare of revenge to come, working more effectually than indignation at things already past. The Argives feeling the gale of prosperous fortune that began to fill their failes, prepared themselves to take as much of it as they could stand under; giving for that purpose unto twelve of their Citizens a ful and absolute commission to make alliance between them and any free Cities of Greece (Athens & Sparta excepted) without any further trouble of propounding every particular bufinesse to the multitude. When the gates of Argos were set thus open 49. to all commers; the Mantineans began to lead the way, and many Cities of Peloponnefus following them, entred into this new confederacy; fome incited by private respects, others thinking it the wifest way to doe as the most did. What inconvenience might arise unto them by these courses, the Lacedamonians easily discerned; & therfore fent Embassadors to stop the matter at Corinth, where they well perceived that the mischiefe had bin hatched. These Embassadors found in the Corinthians a very rough disposition, with a gravity expressing the opinion which they had conceived of their prefent advantage over Sparta. They had caused all Cities which had not entred yet into alliance with Argos, to fend their Agents to them, in whose presence they gave audience to the Lacedamonians; the purport of whose Embassie was this: That the Corinthians; 19 without breach of their oath, could not for sake the alliance, which they had long since made with Sparta; and that reason did as well binde them to hold themselves contented with the peace lately made, as religion enforced them to continue in their ancient confederacy, forafmuch as it had bin agreed betweene the Spartans and their affociates, that the consent of the greater part (which had yeelded unto peace with Athens) should bind the leffer number to performe what was concluded, if no divine impediment withflood them. Hereuntothe Corinthians made answer, that the Sparsans had first begun to doe them open wrong, in concluding the warre wherein they had loft many places, without provision of restitution; and that the very clause alledged by the Embassadors, did acquite them from any necessity of subscribing to the late peace, for asmuch as they had sworn unto those people whom they perswaded to rebell against Athens, that they would never abandon them, nor willingly fuffer them to fall againe into the tyrannous hands of the Athenians. Wherefore they held themselves bound both in reason and religionto use all meanes of upholding those, whom by common consent they had taken into protection; for that an oath was no leffe to be accounted a divine impediment, than were pestilence, tempest, or any the like accident, hindring the performance of things undertaken. As for the alliance with Argos, they faid that they would do as they should find cause. Having dismissed the Embassadors with this answer, they made haste to joine othemselves with Argos, and caused other States to do the like; so that Sparta and Athens were in a maner left to themselves, the Thebans and Megarians being also upon the point to have entred into this new confederacy. But as the affections were divers which cauled this hasty confluence of sudden friends to Argos, it so likewise came to passe that the friendship it selfe, such as it was, had much diversity both of sincerity and of continuance. For some there were that hated or feared the Laced amonians as the Mantineans and E-Lant: these did firmly betake themselves to the Argives, in whom they knew the same affection to be inveterate: others did only hate the peace concluded; and these would rather have followed the Spartans than the Argives in war, yet rather the Argives in warthan the Lacedamonians in peace. Of this number were the Corinthians, who knowingthat the Thebans were affected like unto themselves, dealt with them to enter into the lociety of the Argives, as they had done: but the different formes of government.ufedin Thebes and Argos, caused the Thebans to hold rather with Sparta, that was ruled by the principall men, than to incur the danger of innovation, by joyning with fuch as committed the whole rule to the multitude.

This businesse having ill succeeded, the Corintbians began to bethinke themselves of their owne danger, who had not fo much as any truce with Athens, and yet were unprepand for War. They fought therefore to come to forme temporary agreement with the Athenians, and hardly obtained it. For the Athenians, who had dealt with all Greece at onetime, did not greatly care to come to any appointment with one City that had shewedigainst them more stomack than force; but gave them to understand that they might before enough from them, if they would claime the benefit of that alliance, which then had lately made with Sparta & her dependants; yet finally they granted unto these Commissions (which were loth to acknowledge themselves dependants of Sparta) the truce that they defired; but into private confederacie they would not admit them, it being anarticle of the league between them and the Sparsans, That the one should not make peace nor war without the other.

Herein, as in many other passages, may clearly be seene the great advantage which abblute Lords have as well in peace as in War, over fuch as are served by voluntaries. We shall hardly finde any Signiorie, that hath beene so constantly followed as Sparta wasby so many States, and some of them little inferiour to it selfe, being all as free: whereas contrariwise, the Athenians had lately, and by compulsive meanes gotten their Dominion, wherein they demeaned themselves as Tyrants. But in performance of conditions agreed upon, the Athenians were able to make their words good, by excluding any State out of their Confederacy, and giving up fuch places as were agreed upon; of which the Lecedamonians could do neither the one nor the other. For such Townes as their old Allies had gotten by their means in the late War, could not be restored without their consent, which had them in present possession; and particularly the Towne of Panadle, which the Thebans held, could by no means be obtained from them by the Lasedemonians (who earnestly defired it, that by restitution thereof unto the Athenians, as earnestly demanding it, themselves might recover Pylas) unless that they would agree to make a private alliance with Thebes; which thereupon they were constrained to doe, though knowing it to be contrarie to the last agreement between them and Athens

The Lacedamonians having broken one article of the league made between them and the Athenians, that by fo doing they might enable themselves to the performance of another, were shamefully disappointed of their hopes by the Thebans, who did not give up the towne of Panatte, till first they had utterly demolished it, and made it of no worth to the Atbenians. This was fought to have bin excused by the Lacedamonian Embassia-dors, who comming to Athens (whither they had sent home all prisoners that had bin detained at Thebes) hoping with gentle words to salve the matter; saying, That from hence forth no enemie of Athens should nessle in Panaste, for it was destroyed. But these Embassiadors had not to deale with tame fooles. For the Athenians told them in plaine termes, That of three principall conditions agreed upon in their late League, they had not performed any one, but used such base conclusions as shood not with their honour: having made private alliance with the Thebans; having destroyed a Towne that they should have restored; and not having forced their dependants by Warre, to make good the Covenants of the late concluded peace. Hereupon they dismissed the Embassiadors with rough words, meaning with as rough deeds to anger those that

There were at that time both in Athens and Sparta, many that were ill-contented with the peace: among whom were the Ephori, chosen for that yeare, in Sparta, and Alcibiades. a powerfull young Gentleman in Athens. But the Ephori, though defiring to renew the War, yet wished that first they might get from the Athenians as much as was to be rendred to them by Covenant, especially Pylus that had so forely troubled them. Alcibiades. whose Nobility, riches and favour with the people, made him desire War, as the meane whereby himselfe might procure some honourable employment; used all means to set the quarrel on foot, whilest the Athenians had yet both advantage enough, as not having to rendred ought fave their prisoners, and pretence enough to use that advantage of breaking the peace, by reason that the Lacedamonians (though indeed against their wills) had broken all covenants with them. Now the State of Athens had fully determined to retain Pylus, and to performe nothing that the Lased amonians should, and might require, until they had first, without any longer halting, fulfilled all articles wherto they were bound. even to the utmost point. This was enough to make them sweat, who having already done the most that they could, had as yet got nothing in recompence, except the delivery of their Citizens, which were prisoners. But Aleibiades wishing a speedy beginning of open war, fent privily to the Argives, and gave them to understand how fitly the time ferved for them to affociate themselves with Athens, which was enough to give them 30 fecurity against all enemies.

The Argives, upon the first confluence of many Estates unto their society, had embraced great hopes of working wonders, as if they should have had the conduct of all Grene against the Athenians, robbing Sparta of that honour, as having ill used it, and thereby leaving their old enemies in case of much contempt and disabilitie. But these sudden apprehensions of vaine joy, were suddenly changed into as vaine feare; which illagreed with the great opinion that had larely bin conceived of Argos. For when the Thebans had refused their alliance; when the Corinthians had fought security from Athens; and when a false rumour was noy sed abroad, Athens, Thebes and Sparta, were come to a full agreement upon all points of difference; then began the Argives to let fall their crefts, 40 and sue for peace unto the Lacedamonians, who needing it as much as they, or more, yet held their gravity, and were not over-hasty to accept it. At this time, and in this perturbation, the message of Alcibiades came very welcome to the Argives, which were not now consulting how to become the chiefe of all others, but how to save themselves. Wherefore they sent away presently to Athens, their owne Embassadors, accompanied with the Mantineans and Eleans, to make a league offensive and defensive between their Estates and the Atbenians.

Of this businesse the Laced amonians knew not what to thinke: for well they saw, that such a combination tended to their great hurt, and therefore were desirous to prevent it; but to keep the love of the Athenians, the new Ephori thought that more was already so done, than stood with their honour or profit; others held it the wisest way, having done so much, not to sticke upon a little more, but rather by giving sull satisfaction, to retaine the friendship of that State, which was more to be valued than all the rest of Greece. This resolution prevailing, they sent away such of their Citizens as were best affected to the reace, who comming to Athens, with full commission to make an end of all controverses, did earnestly labour in the Councell-house, to make the truth of things appear, saying; that their Consederacy with the Thebans had tended to none other end than the recovery of Panasse: concerning which Towne, or any other businesse, that it much grieved.

ved the Lacedamonians, to fee things fall out in fuch wife as might give to the Athenians cause of displeasure; but that all should be done which in reason might be required for making matters even between them; to which purpose they shewed that themselves had abfolute commission. Wherefore they defired that Pylus might be restored to them, and especially for the present, that the negotiation with the Argives might be called aside. Favourable audience was given to this proposition, the rather, because they which promifedamends, had power to make their words good. But all this fair likelihood of good agreement was dasht on the sudden, by the practice of Alcibiades, who, secretly dealing with the Lacedamonian Embassadors, perswaded them well of his friendship tomig stards their citie, and advised them to take all care that their absolute power to conclude what they pleased in the name of Sparta, might not be knowne to the Commonaltie of Athens, left the infolent multitude should thereupon grow peremptorie and yeeld to nothing, unleffe they could draw them to unreasonable conditions. The Embassadors bekeved him, & fashioned their tale in the assemblie of the people, as he had advised them. Hereupon the same Alcibiades taking presently the advantage, which their double deaing afforded, inveighed openly against them, as men of no sinceritie, that were cometo Athens for no other purpose, than to hinder the people from strengthning themselves with friends, meaning to draw the Argives and their Adherents to their owne alliance, as (contrary to their owne Oath) already they had the Thebans. The people of Athens, whom a pleasing errand would very hardly have satisfied, or brought into a good opinion of the Laced amonians, (whose honest meanings had so ill beene seconded, with good performance) were now so much incensed with the double dealing of the Embassadours, and the strong perswasions of Alcibiades, that little wanted of conduding the league with Argos. Yet for the present so farre did Nicias, an honourable Citizen, and great friend to the peace, prevaile with them, that the businesse was put off, untill he himselfe, with other Embassadours, might fetch a better answer from Sparta.

Itmay also feeme a great wonder, how so poore a tricke of Alcibiades was able to tany a matter of so great importance, when the Sparian Embassadours might have cast the loade upon his owne shoulders, by discovering the truth: But the gravitie which was shally found in the Lacedamonians, hindred them (perhaps) from playing their game handsomely against so nimble a wit; and they might well have beene thought untruste men, had they prosessed themselves such as would say and un-say for their most advantage.

Nitin and his Companions had a fowre message to deliver at Sparta, being peremptorily to require performance of all conditions, and among the rest, that the Lacedemonians should take the paines to re-build Panaele, and should immediately renounce their Alliance made with the Thibans; letting them understand that other wise the A-thenians, without further delay, would enter into consederacie with the Argives, and shirt adherents. The Ephoriat Sparta had no minde to for sake the Thebans, assured stinds to their State; but wrought so hard, that the anger of the Athenians was suffered to breake out what way it could, which to mitigate, they would doe no more, than only (at the request of Nician their honourable friend, who would not seeme to have effected nothing) sware a new to keepe the Articles of the league betweene him and Albans. Immediately therefore upon returne of the Embassadours, a new league was made betweene the Athenians, Argives, Mantineans and Eleans, with very ample provision for holding the same common friends and enemies; wherein, though the Lacedemoscient were passed over with silence, yet was it manifest that the whole intent of this confederacie did bend it selfechiesly against them, as in short while after was proved by effect.

At this time the Lacedamonians were in ill case, who having restored all that they could unto the Athenians, and procured others to doe the like, had themselves recovered nothing of their owne. (prisoners excepted) for default of restoring all that they should. But that which did most of all disable them, was the loss of reputation, which they had not more impaired in the late Warre by missortunes, than in sundrie passes between ethem and the Athenians: to procure and keepe whose Amitie, they had less sundries of their old friends to shift for themselves. Contrariwise, the Athenians by the treatie of peace, had recovered the most part of that which they lost in warre.

all their gettings they had retained; and were strengthened by the accesse of new Confederates.

6. VII.

How the peace betweene Athens and Sparta was ill kept, though not openly broken.

*T was not long ere the Argives and their fellowes had found businesse wherewith to ferthe Athemans on worke, and make use of this conjunction. For, presuming upon the strength of their side, they began to meddle with the Epidaurians, whom it con- 10 cerned the State of Sparta to defend. So, many acts of hostilitie were committed, wherein Athens and Sparea did (as principals) infest each the other, but came in collaterally.

as to the aide of their severall friends.

By these occasions the Corinthians, Baotians, Phocians, Locrians, and other people of Greece, began a-new to range themselves under the Lacedamonians, and follow their enfignes. One victorie which the Lacedamonians obtained by their meer valour in a fer battell, near to Mantinea, against the Argive-fide, helped well to repaire their decayed reputation, though otherwise it yeelded them no great profit. The civill dissention arifing shortly after within Argos it selfe, between the principall Citizens and the Commons, had almost throwne downe the whole frame of the new combination. For the 20 chiefe Citizens getting the upper hand, made a league with Sparta, wherein they proceeded fo farre as to renounce the amitie of the Athenians in expresse words, and forced the Mantineans to the like. But in short space of time the multitude prevailing, reversed all this, and having chased away their ambitious Nobilitie, applied themselves to the Athenians as closely as before.

Besides these uprores in Peloponnesus, many assaies were made to raise up troubles in all parts of Greece, and likewise in Macedon, to the Athenians; whose forces and readinesse for execution, prevented some things, revenged other, and requited all with some prosperous attempts. Finally, the Athenians wanting matter of quarrell, and the Lacedammians growing wearie, they began to be quiet; retaining still that enmitte in their hearts, 30 which they had sufficiently discovered in effects, though not yet breaking out into terms of open Warre.

6. VIII.

The Athenians fending two Fleets to facke Siracufe, are put to flight, and utterly discomfited.

Uring this intermission of open War, the Athenians re-entertained their hopes of ubduing Sieil, whither they fent a Fleet fo mightie as never was fet forthby

Greece in any Age before or after.

This Fleet was very well manned, and furnished with all necessaries to so great an expedition. All which came to nought; partly by the factions in Athens, whence Alcibrades, Author of that voyage, and one of the Generalls of their Fleet, was driven to banish himselfe, for feare of such judgement, as else he was like to have undergone among the incensed people; partly by the invasion which the Lacedamonians made upon Airea, whileft the forces of that State were so far from home. Hereunto was added the aide of the King of Persia, who supplied the Peloponnesians with mony.

Neither was the fuccesse of things in Steelia such, as without help from Athens, could give any likelihood of a good end in that war. For although in the beginning, the enterprise had so well succeeded, that they be fieged Siracuse, the chiefe Citie of all the lland, and one of the fairest Towns, which the Greeks inhabited, obtaining the better in sundrie battels by Land and Sea; yet when the Town was relieved with strong aide from Pelo ponnefus, it came to pass that the Athenians were put to the worse on all sides, in such wise that their Fleet was shut up into the haven of Siracuse, and could not issue out.

As the Athenian a ffairs went very il in Sicil, so did they at home stand upon hard terms, for that the Laced amonians, who had beene formerly accustomed to make wearisome yearly journies into Attiea, which having pilled and forraged, they returned home; did now by counfell of Alcibiades (who feeking revenge upon his own Citizens, was fled untothem) fortifie the Towne of Decelea, which was near to Athens, whence they ceafed not with daily excursions to harry all the Country round about, and some times give alarme unto the City it selfe. In these extremities, the perverse obstinacy of the Athenians was very strange; who leaving at their backs, and at their own dores, an enemy little lesse mighty than themselves, did yet send forth another fleet into Sicil, to invade a people no leffe puiffant, which had never offended them.

It often happens, that a prosperous event makes foolish counsel seem wifer than it was: which came to passe many times among the Athenians, whose vaine conceits Pallas was faid to turne unto the best. But where unfound advice, finding bad proofe, is obstinately pursued, neither Pallas nor Fortune can be justly blamed for a miserable issue. This second Fleet of the Athenians, which better might have ferved to convey home the former that was defeated, after some attempts made to small purpose against the Siracufans, was finally (together with the other part of the Navie, which was there before) quite vanguished & bard up into the haven of Siracuse, wherby the camp of the Athenians, utterly deprived of all benefit by Sea, either for fuccour or departure, was driven to break up, and flye away by land, in which flight they were over-taken, routed and quite overthowne, in such wife that scarce any man escaped.

This mischiefe well deserved fell upon the Athenians, who had wickedly condemned in into exile Sophocles and Pthiodorus Generals, formerly fent into that Ile, pretending that they had taken mony for making peace in Sicil, wheras indeed there was not any means or possibility to have made Warre. Hereby it came to passe, that Nicias, who had the diefe command in this unhappy enterprise, did rather chuse to hazzard the ruine of his Country by the loffe of that Army, wherein confifted little leffe than all the power of Athens; than to adventure his own estate, his life, and his honour upon the tongues of fnameleffe accusers, and the sentence of Judges before his tryall resolved to condemne him, by retiring from Siracufe, when wifedome and necessity required it. For (faid hee) they shall give fentence upon us who know not the reason of our doings, nor would give eare to anythat would speak in our behalfe, but altogether hearken to suspicious and vain rumors that o hall be brought against us; yea these our Souldiers who now are so desirous to returne in safety, will inour danger be well contented to frame their tales to the pleasure of the lewd and insolent

This resolution of Nicias, though it cannot be commended (for it is the part of an honeft and valiant man to do what reason willeth, not what opinion expecteth; and to meafure honour or dishonour by the affurance of his well-informed conscience, rather than by themalicious report & cenfure of others) yet it may be excused; fince he had before his eyes the injustice of his people, and had well understood that a wicked sentence is infinitely worse than a wicked fact as being held a president and pattern whereby oppresfion beginning upon one, is extended as warrantable upon all. Therefore his feare of wrongfull condemnation was fuch, as a constant man could not easily have over-mastered; but when afterwards the Army, having no other expectation of fafety than the faint hope of a fecret flight; he was so terrefied with an Eclipse of the Moon, happening when they were about to diflodge, that he would not confent to have the camp break up till seven and twenty dayes were past. His timerousnesse was even as foolish and ridiculous, as the iffue of it was lamentable. For he should not have thought that the power of the Heavens, and the course of Nature would be as unjust as his Athenians, or might pretend leffe evill to the flothfull, than to fuch as did their best. Neither doe I think that any Astrologer can alledge this Ecclipse, as either a cause or prognostication of that Armies destruction, otherwise than as the folly of men did, by application, turne it to their Owne confusion. Had C. Cassius the Roman, he who slew Julius Casar, imitated this superstition of Nicias, he had surely found the same fortune in a case very like. But when, hee retyring, the broken remainder of Crassus his Army defeated by the Parthian Archers, was advised, upon such an accident as this, to continue where he then was, till the Sunne were past the signe of Scorpio; he made answer that he stood not in such feare of Scorpio, as of Sagittarius. So adventuring ratherto abide the frowning of the Heavens, than the nearer danger of Enemies upon earth, he made such a safe and honourable retrait, as did both shew his noble resolution, and give a faire example to that good rule.

-Sapiens dominabitur astris.

Thus we fee that God, who ordinarily workes by a concatenation of meanes, deprives the Governous of understanding, when he intends evill to the multitude; and that the wickednesse of unjust men is the readic meane to weaken the vertue of those who might have done them good.

6. IX.

Of the troubles whereinto the State of Athens fell, after the great losse of the Fleet, and Armie in Sicilia.

He losse of this Armie was the ruine of the Athenian Dominion, and may be well accounted a very little leffe calamitie to that Estate, than was the subversion of the walls, when the Citie about feven yeares after was taken by Lyfander. For now began the subjects of the Athenian Estate to rebell, of whom, some they reduced under their obedience, others held out; fome for feare of greater inconvenience were set at libertie, promising only to be their good friends, as formerly they had been their Subjects; others having a kinde of libertie offered by the Athensans, were not therewith contented, but obtained a true and perfect libertie by force. Among these troubles it fell outvery unfeasonably, that the principall men of Athens, being wearied 20 with the peoples infolencie, tooke upon them to change the forme of that Effate, and bring the government into the hands of a few. To which purpose conspiring with the Captains which were abroad, they caused them to set up the forme of an Aristocratie in the Townes of their Confederates; and in the meanetime, fome that were most likely to with stand this innovation, being slaine at Athens, the Commonaltie were so dismaid, that none durst speake against the Conspirators, whose number they knewnor, butevery man was affraid of his neighbour, left he should be a member of the league. In this generall fear the Maje flie of Athens was usurped by foure hundred men, who observing in shew the ancient form of proceeding, did cause all matters to be propounded unto the people, and concluded upon by the greater part of voices: but the things propounded were onely fuch as were first allowed in private among themselves; neither had the Commonaltie any other libertie, than onely to approve and give confent: forwholoever prefumed any further, was quickly dispatched out of the way, and no inquirie made of the murther. By these meanes were many Decrees made, all tending to the establishment of this new authoritie, which neverthelesse endured not long. For the Fleet and Armie which then was in the Isle of Samos, did altogether detest these dealings of the foure hundred usurpers, and held them as Enemies; whereupon they revoked Alcibiades out of banishment, and by his affistance procured that the supplies which the Persian King had promised to the Lacedamonians, were by Tissaphernes his Lievtenant, made unprofitable, through the flow and bad performance. Alcibiades had 40 at the first beene very well entertained in Sparta, whilest his service done unto that State was not growne to be the object of envie. But when it appeared that in Counsell and good performance he fo far excelled all the Lacedemonians, that all their good fucceffe was ascribed to his wit and valour, then were all the principall Citizens wearie of his vertue; especially Agis one of their Kings, whose wife had so far yeelded her selfeto the love of this Athenian, that among her inward friends the could not forbeare to call her young child by his name. Hereupon order was taken, that Alcibiades should be killed out of the way. But he discovering the Spartan trecherie, conveyed himselfe unto Tif-Saphernes, whom he so bewitched with his great beautie, sweet conversation, and sound wit, that he soone became the Master of that barbarous Vice-royes affections, who had 50 free power to dispose the great Kings Treasures and Forces in those parts. Then began he toadvise Tissaphernes, not so far forth to affist the Laced amonians, that they should quite overthrow the State of Athens, but rather to helpethe weaker fide, and letthem one confume another, whereby all should fall at length into the hands of the Persan. By this counsell he made way to other practices, wherein by strength of his reputation (as the onely Favourite of so great a Potentate) he played his owne game, procuring his restitution. At length his banishment being repealed by the Armie, but not by the Citizens (who then were oppressed by the source hundred) hee laboured greatly to reconcile the Souldiers to the Governours; or at least to divert their heat another way, and turne it upon the common Enemie. Some of the foure hundred approved his motion, as being wearie of the tyranny wherof they were partakers, partly because they saw it could not long endure, and partly for that themselves, being lesse regarded by the rest of their companions, than ftood with their good liking, fought to acquit themselves of itas honeftly as they might. But the most of that Faction laboured to obtain peace of the Laced amontans, defiring chiefly to maintain both their own authoritie & the greatnesse of their citie, if they might: but if this could not be, they did rather wish to preserve their own power, or faftie at least, than the good Estate of the Common-wealth. Therefore they made fundrie overtures of peace to the Lacedamonians, desiring to compound in as good termes as they might, and affirming that they were fitter to be trufted than the wavering multitude; especially considering that the Citie of sparta was governed by an Ariffocratie, to which form they had now reduced Athens. All these passages between the four hundred (or the most and chiefe of them) and the Lacedamonians, were kept as fecreasmight be. For the Citie of Athens, hoping, without any great cause, to repair their loss, was not inclined to make composition, from which upon juster ground the Enemie was much more averse, trusting well that the discord of the Athenians (not unknowne abroad)might yeeld some faire opportunitie to the destruction of it selfe, which in effect (though not then presently) came to passe. And upon this hope king Agis did sometimes bring his forces from Decelea to Athens, where doing no good, he received fome small loss. Likewise the Navie of Peloponnesus made shew of attempting the Citie, but seeing bolikelihood of fuccesse, they bent their course from thence to other places, where they obtained victories, which in the better fortune of the Athenians might more lightly have binregarded, than in this their decayed estate. Yet it seems, without any disparagement to their wisedom, they should rather have forborn to present unto the Citie, or to the countries near adjoyning, any terror of the war. For the diffention within the wals might foonhave done more good than could be received from the fleet or armie without, which indeed gave occasion to set the Citizens at unity, though it lasted not very long. The four hundred, by means of these troubles, were fainto resign their authority, which they could 30 not now hold, when the people, having taken arms to repell forraign Enemies, would not laythem down, till they had freed themselves, from such as oppressed the State at home. Yet was not this alteration of government a full restitution of the soveraign command unto the people, or whole bodie of the Citie, but only to five thousand; which company the four hundred (when their authoritie began) had pretended to take unto them as affistants:herein seeming to do little wrong or none to the commonalty, who seldom assembledingreater number. But now when the highest power was come indeed into the hands of fo many, it was foon agreed, that Alcibiades & his companions should be recalled from exile, and that the army at Sames should be requested to undertake the government: which was forthwith reformed according to the Souldiers defire.

6. X.

How Alcibiades won many important victories for the Atheniaus; was recalled from exile; made their Generall, and again deposed.

His establishment of things in the Citie, was accompanied with some good successed in the wars. For the Lacedamonians were about the same time overthrown at Sea, in a great battell, by the Athenian Fleet, which had remained at Samos, to which Altebiades afterwards joyning such forces as he could raise, obtained many victor ites. Before the Towne of Abydms, his arrivall with eighteen ships, gave the honour of a great battell to the Athenians; he overthrew and utterly destroyed the seet of the Lacedamonians, commanded by Mindarus; took the Towns of Cyzions and Perinthus, made the Selymbrians ransome their Citie, and fortisted Chryspolis. Hercupon letters were sent to Sparta, which the Athenians intercepting, found to contain the distressed the Atmie, what to doe.

Shorthy after this, Alcibiades overthrew the Lacedemonians in fight by land at Chalcedon, took Selymbria, befieged & won By Zantium, now called Constantinople, which even in those dayes was a goodly, rich & very strong Citie. Hereupon he returned home with very great welcome, and was made high admirall of all the Navie.

But this his honour continued not long; for it was taken from him, and he driven tobanish himselse again, only because his Lievtenant, contrarie to the expresse command of Alcibiades, fighting with the enemies in his absence, had lost a great part of the Fleet.

The second banishment of Alcibiades was to the Athenians more harmful than the first. and the loffe which thereupon they received, was (though more heavie to them, yet) leffe to be pittied of others, than that which enfued upon his former exile. For whereas at the first, he had sought revenge upon his own Citie, now, as inured to adversitie, he rather pittied their furie, who in time of fuch danger had cast out him that should have repaired to their weak estate, than sought by procuring or beholding the calamitie of his people, to comfort himselfe after injurie received. Before they, who were instituted in the place of Alcibiades, arrived at the Fleet, he presented battel to Lysander the Lacedamonian Admirall, who was not so confident upon his former victorie, as to undertake Alcibiades himfelfe, bringing ships more in number (not with standing the former losse of fifteen) than his enemies had, and better ordered than they had bin under his Lievtenant. But when thedecree of the people was published in the Navie, then did Alcibiades with-draw himselfe to a Town upon Hellestons, called Bizanthe, where he had built a Castle.

The battell at Arginufa, and condemnation of the victorious Athenian Captaines by the

Fter this time, the Ashenians receiving many losses and discomfitures, wereditven to flye into the Haven of Mytelene, where they were straitly besieged both by Land and Sea. For the raising of this siege necessitie inforced them to manall their vellels, and to put the uttermost of their forces into the hazzard of one battel. This battell was fought at Arginufa, where Callicraditas, Admirall of the Lacedamonians, lofing the honour of the day, preserved his own reputation by dying valiantly in the fight. 30 It might well have bin expected, that the ten Captains, who joyntly had command in chiefe over the Athenian fleet, should for that good daies service, and so happy a victory, have received great honor of their Citizens. But contrariwife, they were forthwithcalled home, and accused, as if wilfully they had suffered many of the Citizens, whose ships were broken and funk, to be cast away, when by appointing some Vessels to take them up, they might have faved them from being drowned. Hereto the Captains readily made avery just answer, That they pursuing the victorie, had left part of the fleet, under sufficient men, to fave those that were wrackt; which if it were not well accomplished it was, because a tempest arising about the end of the fight, had hindred the performance of that, and other their intendments. This excuse availed not: For a sew of fellow was brought 40 forth, who faid, That he himselfe escaping in a meal-tub, had bin intreated by those who were in perill of drowning, to defire of the people revenge of their deaths upon the Captains. It was very ftrange, that upon fuch an accusation maintained with so slender evidence, men that had well deserved of their Countrie should be overthrown. But their enemies had so incensed the rascall multitude, that no man durst absolve them, save onely Socrates the wife and vertuous Philosopher, whose voice in this judgement was not regarded. Sixe of them were put to death, of whom one had hardly escaped drowning, and was with much a-doe relieved by other veffels in the storme : but the Caprains which ere absent escaped; for when the furie of the people was overpast, this judgement was reversed, and the accusers called into question for having deceived and perverted the ci-50 tizens. Thus the Athenians went about to free themselves from the infamie of injustice; but the divine Justice was not a-fleep, nor would be so deluded.

& XII.

The battell at Agos-Potamos, wherein the whole State of Athens was ruined; with the end of

He Peloponnesian fleet under Lysander, the year next following, having scowred the Agean Seas, entred Hellespont, where (landing fouldiers) it befreged and took the town of Lampsacus. Hereupon all the navie of Athens, being an hundred and fourscore faile, made thither in haste, but finding Lampfacus taken before their comming, they put in at seffor, where having refreshed themselves, they sailed to the river called &-10 gos. Potamos, which is (as we might name it) Goat's-Brook, or the river of the Goat; being on the continent opposite to Lampsacus: and there they cast Anchors, not one whole league off from Lysander, who rode at Lampfacus in the harbor. The next day after their arrival they presented fight unto the Peloponnesians, who refused it, whereupon the Athenians returned again to Agos-Potamo; & thus they continued five daies, braving every day the Enemie, and returning to their own harbor when it drew towards evening.

The Castle of Alcibiades was not far from the Navie, and his power in those places was such as might have greatly availed his countrimen, if they could have made use of it. For he had waged mercenaries, & making war in his own name upon some people of the Thraidans, had gathered much wealth, & obtained much reputation among them. He perceiving the disorderly course of the Atheman Commanders, repaired unto them, & shewed whar great inconvenience might grow, if they did not foon fore-fee and prevent it. For they lay in a rode subject to every weather, neither near enough to any town where they might furnish themaselves with necessaries, nor so far off as had bin more expedient. Sellos washenext Market-town, thither both Souldiers and Mariners reforted, flocking away from the Navie every day, as foon as they were returned from braving the Enemie, Therefore Alcibiades willed them either to lie at Seffes, which was not far off, or at least to confider how neare their Enemie was, whose feare proceeded rather from obedience to their Generall, than from any cowardise. This admonition was so far despised, that p fomeof the Commanders willed him to meddle with his own matters, and to remember that his authoritie was out of date. Had it not bin for these opprobrious words, he could (ashe told his familiars) have compelled the Laced emonians, either to fight upon unequal terms, or utterly to quit their fleet. And like enough it was that he might so have done by transporting the light-armed I bracians, his confederates, and others his Followers, over the Streights, who affaulting the Peloponnesians by Land, would either have compelled themto put to Sea, or else to leave their ships to the mercie of the Athenians. But finding their acceptance of his good counsell no better than hath bin rehearled, he left them to their fortune, which how evill it would be he did prognosticate.

Lyfander all this while defending him selfe by the advantage of his Haven, was not wareleffe in looking into the demeanour of the Atherians. When they departed, his manerwas to fend forth some of his swiftest Vessels after them, who observing their dofestilated unto him what they had feene. Therefore understanding in what carelesse fallion they romed up and down the country; he kept all his men a-boord after their departure, and the fift day gave especial charge to his Scouts, that when they perceived the Athenians dif-imbarking, as their custome was, and walking towards Sestos, they should, forthwith returne, and hang up a brazen shield in the Prow, as a token for him to weigh

The Scouts performed their charge, and Lifunder being in a readinesse, made all speed that strength of Oares could give, to Agos-Potamos, where he found very few of his enesomies aboord their ships, nor many near them, and all ingreat consuston upon the newes of Infomuch that the greatest industrie which the Athenians then shewed, was in the escape of eight or nine ships, which knowing how much that losse imported, gave over Athens as desperate; and made a long flight into the Ile of Cyprus; all the rest were taken, and such of the Souldiers as came in to the rescue cut in pieces. Thus was the war which had lasted seven and twentie years, with variable successe concluded in one houre, and the glorie of Athens in such wise eclipsed, that she never afterward shone in her persect light, Immediately upon this victorie, Lyfander, having taken such Townes as readily did yeeldupon the first fame of his exploit, set faile for Athens, and joyning his forces with those of Azis & Paufanias, Kings of Sparta, summoned the Citie; which finding too stubborne to yeeld, and too strong to be won on the sudden, he put forth again to Sea, & rather by terrour than violence, compelling all the Ilands, and fuch Towns of the Ionians as had formerly held of the Atherians, to submitthemselves to Sparta, he did thereby cut off all provision of victuals, and other necessaries, from the citie, and inforced the people by meere famine to yeeld to these conditions: That the long walls, leading from the Towne to the Port, should be throwne downe; That all Cities subject to their Estate, should be set a libertie; That the Athenians should be Masters only of their own Territories, and the fields adjoyning to their Town, And that they should keep no more than 10 twelve Ships; That they should hold as Friends or Enemies, the same, whom the Lace. damonians did, and follow the Lacedamonians as Leaders in the wars.

These Articles being agreed upon, the wals were throwne down with great rejoycing of those who had borndispleasure to Athens; and not without some consultation of defroying the Citie, and laying waste the Land about it. Which advice, although it was not entertained, yet were thirtie Governors, or rather cruell Tyrants, appointed overthe people, who recompenced their former insolencie and injustice over their Captaines by oppreffing them with all base and intolerable slaverie. The only finall hope then remaining to the Athenians, was, that Alcibiades might perhaps repaire what their owne follie had ruined. But the thirtie Tyrants perceiving this, 20 advertised the Lacedemonians thereof, who contrived, and (as now domineering inev-rie quarter) soon effected his sudden death.

Such end had the Pelopownesian war. After which the Laced amonians abusing the reputation, and great power, which therin they had obtained, grew very odious to Great, and by combination of many Cities against them, were dispossed of their high authoritie, even in that very age, in which they had subdued Athens. The greatest foil that they took was of the Thebans led by Epaminondas, under whom Philip of Macedon, father to Alix. ander the Great, had the best of his education. By these Thebans, the Citie of Sparta (befides other great losses received) was fundrie times in danger of being taken. But these haughtie attempts of the Thebans came finally to nothing; for the feverall Estates & Sig- 30 nories of Greece, were grown to jealous one of anothers greatnesse, that the Lacedaminians, Athenians, Argives & Thebans, which were the mightiest, affociating themselves with the weaker partie, did to counterpoize the stronger, that no one Citie could extend thelimits of her jurisdiction so far as might make her terrible to her neighbours. And thus all parts of the countrie remained rather evenly ballanced, than well agreeing, till fuch time as Philip, and after him Alexander, Kings of Macedon, (whose forefathers hadbin dependants, and followers, yea almost meere Vassals to the Estates of Athens and Sparta found means, by making use of their factions, to bring them all into servitude, from which they never could be free, till the Romans presenting them with a shew of libertie, didthemfelves indeed become their Mafters.

CHAP. IX.

Of matters concurring with the Peloponnefian Warre, or Thortly following it.

How the affaires of Persia stood in these times.

Uring the times of this Peloponne sian War, and those other lesseexpe ditions foregoing it, Artaxerxes Longimanus, having peaceably enjoyed a long reign over the Persians, left it by his death either to Derius, who was called Darius Nothus, or the Bastard, whom the Greek Historians (lightly passing over Xerxes the second, and Segdiams, 25 usurpers, and for their short reign little to be regarded) place next unto them, or to xerxes the second; who, and his brother Segdianus after him (seeming to have bin the fons of Heffer)held the Kingdome but one year between them, the younger fucceeding his elder brother. It is not my purpose (as I have said before) to pursue the hiflorie of the Persians from henceforth, by rehearfall of all the particulars, otherwise than as they shall be incident to the affaires of Greece. It may therefore suffice to say, That xerxes the second, being a vicious Prince, did perish after a moneth or two, if not by surfeir, then by the trecherie of his riotous brother Sogdianus. Likewise of Sogdianus it is found, that being as ill as his brother, and more cruell, he flew unjustly Bagera zus a principall Eunuch, and would have done as much to his brother Dartus the Bastard, had not hefore-seen it, and by raising a stronger army than this hated King Sogdianus could leato vie, seized at once upon the King and Kingdome. Darins having flain his brother, held the Empire nineteene yeares. Amyrtaus of Sais an Egyptian rebelled against him, and having partly flain, partly chased out of the Land the Persian Garrisons, allied himselfe fo firmly with the Greeks, that by their aide he maintained the Kingdome, and deliveredit over to his posteritie, who (notwithstanding the furie of their civill Wars) maintained it against the Persian, all the dayes of this Dariss, and of his son Artaxerxes Mnemon. Likewise Amorges, a Subject of his owne and of the Royall bloud, being Lievrenant of Caria, rebelled against him; confederating himselfe with the Athenians. But the great calamitie, before spoken of, which fell upon the Athenians in Sicil, having putnew life into the Spartans, and given courage to the Handers and others, subject to the State of 20 Ashens, to shake off the yoke of their long continued bondage : It fell out well for Darius, that the Lacedamonians being destitute of mony, wherewith to defray the charge of agreat navie, without which it was impossible to advance the war against the state of Atheus, that remained powerfull by fea, were driven to crave his affiftance, which he grantedunto them, first upon what conditions best pleased himselfe, though afterwards the Anicles of the league betweene him and them were fet downe in more precise termes 5 wherein it was concluded, That he and they should make war joyntly upon the Athenia ans, and upon all that should rebell from either of them, and (which was highly to the Kings honour and profit) that all the Cities of Afia, which had formerly bin his, or his Predecessiours, should returne to his obedience. By this Treatie, and the war ensuing (of 30 which I have alreadie spoken) he recovered all that his grandfather and father had lost in Afia Likewise by affistance of the Lacedamonians, he got Amorges a-live into his hands who was taken in the citie of Jasus; the Athenians wanting either force or courage to succour him. Nevertheleffe Egypt still held out against himsthe cause whereof cannot be the imploiment of the Persian forces on the parts of Greece: for he abounded in men, of whom heladenough for all occasions, but they wanted manhood, which caused him to fight with gold; which effected for him by Souldiers of other nations, and his naturall enemies, what the valour of his own Subjects was infufficient to perform. Daring had in marriage Parylatis his owne fister, who bare unto him (besides other children) Artaxerxes called Mnemon, that is to fay, the Mindful, or the Rememberer, who succeeded him in the kingdom; and Cyrus the younger, a Prince of fingular vertue, and accounted by all that knew him, the most excellent man that ever Persia bred after Cyrus the Great. But the old King Darius, intending to leave unto his elder son Artaxerxes the inheritance of that great Empire, did cast a jealous eye upon the doings of young Cyrm, who being Lievtenant of the lower Afia, took more upon him than befitted a Subject: for which cause his father sent for him, with intent to have taken some very sharpe course with him, had not his owne death prevented the comming of his younger son, and placed the elder in his Throne. Of the war between these brothren, and summarily of Artaxerxes, we shall have occasion to speake somewhat in more convenient place.

6. II. How thethirtie Tyrants got their Dominion in Athens.

Hold it in this place very convenient to shew the proceedings of the Greekes, after the subversion of the walls of Athens, which gave end to that warre called the Pelopunne fian warre, but could not free the unhappie Countrey of Greece from civill broiles. The thirtie Governours, commonly called the thirtie Tyrants of Athens, were chosen at the first by the people to compile a body of their law, and make a collection of fuchancient Statutes, as were meet to be put in practice: the condition of the Citiestanding as it did in that so sudden alteration. To this charge was annexed the supreme authoritie, either as a recompence of their labours, or because the necessitie of the times did thoritie, either as a recompence of their labours, or because the necessitie of the times did for require it, wherein the Law being uncertain, it was fit that such men should give judgment in particular causes, to whose judgement the Lawes themselves, by which the Citie was to be ordered, were become subject. But these thirtie, having so great power in their hands, were more carefull to hold it, than to deserve it, by faithfull execution of that which was committed to them in trust. Therefore apprehending such troublesome fellowes, as were odious to the Cirie, though not punishable therefore by law, they condemned them to death; which pro-10 ceeding was by all men highly approved, who confidered their lewd conditions, but did not withall bethinke themselves, how easie a thing it would be unto these thirtie men, to take away the lives of Innocents, by calling them perturbers of the peace, or what elle they lifted, when condemnation without true trialland proofe had beene once well allowed. Having thus plaufibly entred into a wicked course of government, they thought it best to fortifie themselves with a sure guard, ere they brake out into those disorders, which they must needs commit for the establishing of their authoritie. Wherefore difpatching two of their own companie to Sparta, they informed the Laced amonians, that it was the full intent of the thirtie, to keep the Citic free from all rebellious motions: to which purpose it behaved them to cut off such as were seditious; and therefore desired 20 the Lacedamonians to send them a Garrison, which they promised at their owne cost to maintaine. This motion was well approved, and a Guard fent, the Captaine of which was fo well entertained by the thirtie, that none of their middeeds could want his high commendations at Sparta. Hereupon the Tyrants began to take heart, and looking no moreafter base and detested persons, invaded the principall men of the Citie, sending armed men from house to house, who drew out such as were of great reputation, and likely, or able to make any head against this wicked forme of government: whereby there was fuch effusion of bloud, as to Theramenes (one of the thirtie) seemed very horrible, and unable to escape vengeance. His dislike of their proceedings being openly discovered, caused his fellowes to bethink themselves, and provide for their owne securitie, and his 30 destruction, lest he should make himselfe a Captaine of the discontented (which wereal most the whole Citie) and redeem his own peace with their ruine. Wherefore they sele-Eted three thousand of the Citizens, whom they thought meetest, and gave unto them fome part of publike authoritie, the refl they difarmed; and having thus increased their own frength, and weakned their opposites, they began a-fresh to shed the bloud, not only of their private enemies, but of fuch whose mony, or goods, might inrich them, & enable them for the paiment of their guard. And to this purpose they concluded, that every one of them should name one man, upon whose goods he should seize, putting the owner to death. But when T beramenes uttered his detestation of so wicked intent; then did critim, who of all the thirtie was most tyrannicall accuse him to the Councell, as a trecherous so man, & (wheras one main priviledge of the three thousand was, that none of them should fuffer death at the appointment of the thirtie, but have the accustomed triall)he took upon him to ftrike out of that number the name of Theramenes, & fo reduced him under the triall & sentence of that order. It was well alledged by Theramenes, that his name was not more easie to be blotted out of the catalogue, than any other mans; upon which consider ration, he advised them all to conceive no otherwise of his case, than as of their own, who were liable to the same form of proceeding : but every man choosing rather to preserve his own life by filence, than presently to draw upon himselfe the danger, which as yet concerned him little, and perhaps would never come near him; the Tyrants interpreting filence as confent, condemned him forthwith, and compelled him to drink poylon.

6. III.

The Conspiracie against the thirtie Tyrants, and their deposing.

Free the death of Theramenes, the thirtie began to use such outrage, as excelled their former villanies. For, having three thousand (as they thought) firme unto them, they robbed all others without feare or shame, despoiling them of lands and and goods, and caused them to flie into banishment, for safeguard of their lives. This flight of the citizens procured their libertie, and the general good of the citie. For the banished citizens, who were fled to Thebes, entred into confultation, and refolved to hazzard their lives in fetting free the citie of Athens. The very thought of fuch a practice had bin treafon at home, which had no other danger abroad, than might be found in the execution. Seventie men, or thereabout, were the first undertakers, who with their Captain Thrasy hulus took Phyla, a place of strength in the Territorie of Athens. No sooner did the thirtie heare of their exploit, than feek means to prevent further danger; affembling the three thousand, and their Lacedamonian guard, with which force they attempted Phyla, but were with some losse of their men repelled. Finding the place too strong to be taken by affault, they intended to befiege it; which purpose came to nought by means of snow that fell, and other stormie weather, against which they had not made provision. Retiring therefore to the citie, which above all they were to make good, they left the most of their guard, and two companies of Horse, to wearie out them which lay in Phyla, with a flying fiege. But it was not long ere the followers of Thrafybulus were increased from feventie to seven hundred, which adventured to give charge upon those guards, of whom they cut off above an hundred and twentie. These small, but prosperous beginnings, addedmore to the number of those in Phyla, who now with a thousand mengot entrance into Piraus, the suburbe of Athens, lying on the Port. Before their comming the thirtie , a had refolved to fortifie the Towne of Eleusine, to their owneuse, whereinto they might make an easie retrait, and save themselves from any sudden perill. It may well seeme flrange, that whereas their barbarous maner of government had brought them into fuch danger, they were so far from seeking to obtain emens good will, that contrari wise, to affire themselves of Eleusine, they got all of the place who could beare armes into their hands by a traine, and wickedly (though under form of Justice) murthered them all. But, Saleribus tutum per scelera est ster, the mischieses which they had alreadie done were fuch, as left them no hope of going backward, nor any other apparent likelihood of faltic, than by extending their crueltie unto all, feeing few or none were left, whom they could trust. When Thrasybulus and his fellowes, who as yet were termed conspiorators, had taken the Piramothen were the three thou fand armed againe by the Tyrants, and brought to affault it; but in this enterprise Thrafybulus had the better, & repelled his enemies, of whom though there were flain to the number of seventie only, yet the victoriesemed the greater, because Critias, and one other of the thirtie, perished in that fight. The death of Criticas, and the stout defence of Piraus, together with some exhortations used by Thrasybulus to the Citizens, wrought such effect, that the thirtie were deposed. Nevertheleffe there were fo many of the three thousand, who having communicated with the thirtie in their misdeeds, feared to be called to a sharpe account, that no peace, nor quiet form of government could be established. For Embassadors were sent to Sparta, who craving aide against Thrasybulus and his followers, had favourable audience, and a power fent to their affiltance, both by land and fea, under the conduct of Lylander, & his Brother; whom Paulanias the Spartan King did follow, raising an Armie of the Cities confederate with the Laced amonians. And here appeared first the jealousie, wherein some people held the State of Sparta. The Bavtians and Corinthians, who in the late warshad bin the most bitter enemies to Athens, refused to follow Pausanias in this expedition; alledging that it stood not with their oathes, to make war against that people, who had not hitherto broken any one article of the league : but fearing indeed, left the Laced emonians should annexe the Territorie of Athens to their own Demains. It is not to be doubted, that Pausanias took this answer in good part. For it was not his purpose to destroy those against whom he went, but only to crosse the proceedings of Lyfander, whom he envied. Therefore having in fome finallskir mishes against them of Thrasybulus his party, made a shew of war, finally wrought such means, that althings were compounded quietly: the thirtie men, and fuch others, as were like to give cause of tumults, being lent to Sparta. The remainder of that tyrannicall faction, having withdrawn themselves to Eleufine, were shortly after found to attempt some innovation, whereupon the whole Citie rifing against them, took their Captains, as they were comming to Parlie, and slew them: which done, to avoid further inconvenience, alaw was made, that all injuries past should be forgotten, and no man called into question for wrongs committed. By which order, wisely made, and carefully observed, the Citie returned to her former quietnesse. CHAP.

Of the expedition of Cyrus the younger.

5. I. The grounds of Cyrus his attempt against his brother.

nians. To this request, being generall, the Laced amonians gave a surable answer, commanding their Admiral to perform unto Cyrus all service that he should require of him. If Cyrus had plainly discovered himself, and the Laced amonians bent their whole power to his affiftance, very like it is, that either the kingdom of Perfia should have 20 bin the recompence of his deferts; or that he perishing in battell, as after he did, the subversion of that Empire had forthwith ensued. But it pleased God, rather to shew unto the Greeks the waies, which under the Macedonian Enfigns, the victorious foot-steps of their posteritie should measure; and opening unto them the riches, and withall the weaknesse of the Persian, to kindle in them both defire and hope of that conquest, which he reserved to another generation; than to give into their hands that mightie kingdom, whose houre was not yet come. The love which Pary (atis the Queen-mother of Per fia bare unto Cyrus her younger fon, being feconded by the earnest favour of the people, and readie desires of many principall men, had moved this young Prince, in his fathers old age, to afpireafter the fuccession. But being sent for by his Father (as hath before bin shewed) whose mea- 30 ning was to curb this ambitious youth; he found his elder brother Artaxerxes established fo furely by the old kings favour, that it were not fafe to attempt any means of displanting him by whose disfavour himself might easily lose the place of a Vice-roy, which held in Afia the leffe, and hardly be able to maintain his own life. The neerest neighbour to Cyrus of all the kings Deputies in the lower Asia, was Tissaphernes, a man compounded of cowardife, trechery, craft, and all vices which accustomably branch out of these. This man accompanied Cyrus to his Father, using by the way all faire shewes of friendship, 45 to a Prince, for whom it might well be thought, that Queen Pary (at is, had obtained the inheritance of that mighty Empire. And it was very true, that Pary latis had used the best ofher endeavour to that purpose, alledging that (which informer ages had bin much available to 40 Xerxes, in the like disceptation with his elder brother) Artaxerxes was born whilest his father was a private man, but Cyrus, when he was a crowned king. All which not fufficing; when the most that could be obtained for Cyrus, was the pardon of some presumptions demeanour, and confirmation of his place in Lydia, and the parts adjoyning: then did this Tiffaphernes discover his nature, and accuse his friend Cyrus to the new King Artaxerxes, of a dangerous treason intended against his person. Upon this accusation, whether true or falfe, very eafily beleeved, Cyrus was arrested, and by the most vehement intreatie of his Mother very hardly delivered, and fent backe into his owne Province.

6. II.

The preparations of Cyrus, and his first entrie into the War.

He forme of government which the Persian Lievtenants used in their severall Provinces, was in many points almost Regall. For they made war and peace, as they thought it meet, not only for the Kings behoose, but for their owne reputation; usually indeed with the Kings enemies, yet sometimes one with another: which was the more easily tolerated, because their owne heads were held onely at the Kings pleafure, which caused them to frame all their doings to his will, what soever it were, or they could conjecture it to be. Cyrus therefore being fetled in Lydia, began to confider with himselfe, the interest that he had in the Kingdome; the small assurance of his brothers love, held only by his Mothers intercession; the difgrace endured by his late imprisonment; and the meanes which he had by love of his own people, and that good neighbourhood of the Lacedamonians, whom he had bound unto him, to obtaine the Crowne for himselfe. Neither was it expedient that he should long sit idle, as waiting rill occasion should present it selse: but rather enterprise somewhat whilest yet his Mother lived, who could procure a good interpretation to all his actions, if they were no worse than onely questionable. Hereupon hee first began to quarrell with Tisaphernes. and feized upon many Townes of his jurisdiction, annexing them to his own Province. which displeased not Areaxerxes at all, who (besides that he was of condition somewhat simple) being truely paid by Cyrus the accustomable Tributes out of those places, was well contented to fee his brothers hot spirit exercised in private quarrels. But Tissapher. nes, whose base conditions were hared, & cowardize despised, although he durst not adventure to take armes against Cyrus, yet perceiving that the Milesians were about to give un themselves into the hands of that young Prince, as many other townes of the Idmans had done, thought by terrour to preferve his reputation, and keepe the towne in hisown hands. Wherefore he flew many, and many he banished, who flying to Cyrus, were gently entertained, as bringing faire occasion to take armes, which was no small part of his defire. In levying Souldiers he used great policie; for he tooke not only the men of his own Province, or of the Countries adjoyning, whose lives were ready at his will; but fecretly he furnished some Gracian Captaines with money, who being very goodmen of warre, entertained Souldiers therewith, some of them warring in Thrace, others in Thessale, others elsewhere in Greece; but all of them ready to crosse the Seas, at the first call of Cyrus, till which time they had secret instructions to prolong their severall warres, that the Souldiers might be held in continuall exercise, and ready in armes upon the sudden. Cyrus having sent a power of men to besiege Miletus, forthwith summoned these bands of the Greekes, who very readily came over to his affiltance, being to thirteene thousand very firme Souldiers, and able to make head (which is almost incredible) against the whole power of Areaxerxes. With this Army, and that which he had levied before, he could very eafily have forced Miletus, and chased away Tiffaphernes out of Asia the lesse: but his purpose was not so to lose time in small matters, that was to bee imployed in the accomplishment of higher designes. Pretending therefore that the Pilidians, a people of Asia the leffe, not subject to the Persian, had invaded his Territorie, hee raised the fiege of Miletus, and with all speede marched Eastward, leaving Tissaphernes much amazed, who had no leifure to rejoyce that Cyrus had left him to himselfe, when he considered, that so great an Army, and so strong, was never levied against the Rovers of Pisidia, but rather against the great King his Master. For which cause taking a band of five hundred horse, he posted away to carry tidings to the Court of this great preparation.

6. III.

How Cyrus tooke his journey into the higher Asia, and came up close to his Brother.

He tumult which his comming brought was very great, and great the exclamations of the Queen Statira, against Parysatis, the Queen-Mother, whom she called the Author and occasioner of the war. But whilest the King in great feare was arming the high Countries in his defence, the danger hasted upon him very fast. For Cyrus made great marches, having his number much increased, by the repaire of his Countrimen, though most strengthned by the accesse of seven hundred Greekes, & of other source hundred of the same Nation, who revolted unto him from the King. How tertible the Greeks were to the Barbarians, he found by triall in a Muster, which to please the Queen of Cilicia, who had brought him aide) he made in Phrygia; where the Greeks by his direction making offer of a charge upon the rest of his Army, which contained a hundred thousand men, the whole Campe (not perceiving that this was but a bravery) sted amaine, the victuallers & baggagers for saking their cabbins, & running all away for very feare. This was to Cyrus a joy sul spectacle, who knew very well, that his brother was followed by men of the same temper, and the more unlikely to make resistance, because they were prest to the warre against their will and dispositions, whereas his Armie was drawne along by meere affection and good will. Nevertheleffehe found it a very hard matter to perswade the Greekes to passe the River of Euphrates. For the very length of the way which they had troden, wearied them with the conceit of the tedious returne. Therefore he was driven, being yet in Cilicia, to feeke excuses, telling them, that Abrocomas, one of the Kings principall Captaines, & his own great enemy, lay by the River, against whom he requested them to affish him. By such devices, and excessive promise of reward, he brought them to Euphrates; where some of the Greekes considering, That who so passed the River first, should have the most thankes, and might safely returne if the rest should to refuse to follow them; they entred the Foords, whereby were all finally perswaded to do as fome had begun: and being allured by great hopes, they refolved to feeke out dr. taxerxes, wherefoever he was to be found. The King in the meane time having raifed an army of nine hundred thousand men, was not so confident upon this huge multitude. 28 to adventure them in triall of a plaine battaile. Abrocomas, who with three hundred thoufand men had under-taken to make good the Streights of Syria, which were very narrow, and fortified with a strong wall, and other defences of nature and art, which made the place to feeme impregnable, had quitted the passage, and retired himselfe toward the Kings forces, not daring to looke Cyrus in the face, who despairing to finde any way by Land, had procured the Laced amonian fleet, by the benefit whereof to have transported 20 his Army. I doe not finde that this cowardife of Abrocomas, or his Souldiers, who arrived not at the Campe, till five dayes were past after the battaile, received either DUnishment, or disgrace; for they, toward whom he with-drew himselfe, were all made of the fame metall.

Therefore Artaxerxes was upon the point of retiring to the uttermost bounds of his Kingdom, untill by Teribazus, one of his Captaines, he was perswaded not to abandon so many goodly Provinces to the enemy, who would thereby have gathered addition of strength, and (which in the sharpe disputation of Title to a Kingdome is most available) would have grown superior in reputation. By such advice, the King resolved upon meeting with his brother, who now began to be secure, being fully perswaded that Artax-30 erxes would never dare to abide him in the field. For the King having cast up a Trench of almost fortie miles in length, about thirty foot broad, and eighteene foot deepe, intended there to have encamped: but his courage failing him, he abandoned that place, thinking nothing so safe, as to be farre distant from his enemies.

§. IIII. The battaile betweene Cyrus and Artaxerxes.

THe Armie of Cyrus having overcome many difficulties of evill waves, and fearcitie of victualls, was much encouraged by perceiving this great feare of Artax- to erxes; and being past this trench, marched carelessy in great disorder, having bestowed their Armes in Carts, and upon Beasts of carriage; when on the suddenone of their Vaunt-currors, brought newes of the Kings approach. Hereupon with great tumult they armed themselves, & had ranged their battailes in good order upon the side of the river Euphrates, where they waited for the comming of their enemies, whom they faw not till it was after-noone. But when they faw the cloud of dust raised by the seete of that huge multitude, which the King drew after him, & perceived by their neere approach how well they were marshalled, comming on very orderly in silence, whereas it had bin expected, that rushing violently with loud clamours, they should have spentall their force upon the first brunt 3 and when it appeared that the fronts of the two Armies 5 were so unequal in distent, being all embattailed in one body and square, that Gyrin taking his place (as was the Persian manner) in the middest of his own, did not with the corner, and utmost point thereof, reach to the halfe breadth of Artaxerxes his bat taile, who carried a front proportionable to his number, exceeding nine times that of Cyrus: then did the Greeks begin to diffrust their owne manhood, which was not accur stomed to make proofe of it selfe, upon such excessive oddes. It was almost incredible, that so great an Armie should be so easily chased. Neverthelesse, it quickly appeared, that these Persians, having learned (contrary to their custome) to give charge upon their enemies with filence, had not learned (for it was contrary to their nature) to receive a strong charge with courage. Upon the very first offer of on-set, made by the Greekes, all that beaftly rabble of cowards fled amaine, without abiding the stroke, or staying till they were within reach of a Dart. The Chariots armed with hookes and fithes (whereof Artaxerxes had two hundred, and Cyrus not twenty) did small hurt that day, because the drivers of them leaping downe, fled away on foot. This base demeanour of his enemies gave so much confidence to Cyrus and his Followers, that such as were about him forth-with adored him as King. And certainely, the Title had bin affured unto him that day, had not he fought how to declare himselfe worthy of it, ere yet he had obtainedit. For, perceiving that Artaxerxes, who found that part of the field which lay before him voide, was about to encompasse the Greekes, and to set upon them in the reare, he advanced with fixe hundred Horse, and gave so valiant a charge upon a squadron of fixe thousand, which lay before the King, that he brake it, slaying the Captaine thereof Arragerses, with his owne hands, and putting all the rest to slight. Hereupon his whole company of fixe hundred, very few excepted, began to follow the chase, leaving Cyrus tooillattended, who perceiving where the King flood introupe, uncertaine whether to fight, or leave the field, could not containe himselse, but said; I see the man: and prefently with a small handfull of men about him ran upon his brother, whom he strake through the Curace, & wounded in the breaft. Having given this stroake, which was his alalt, he received immediatly the fatall blow, which gave period at once to his ambition and life, being wounded under the eye with a dart, throwne by a base fellow, wherewith aftonied, he fell dead from his horse, or so hurt, that it was unpossible to have recovered him, though all which were with him, did their best for his safetie; not caring afterwards for their own lives, when once they perceived that Gyrus their Mafter was flane. Artaxerxes caused the head and right hand of his brother to be forthwith stricken off, and shewed to his people, who now pursuing them, fled apace, calling upon the name of Cyrns, and desiring him to pardon them. But when this great accident had breathed new courage into the Kings troupes, and utterly difmaied fuch Persian Captaines, as were now, even in their owne eyes, no better than rebels; it was not long ere the Campe of Cyrus was taken, being quite abandoned; from whence Artaxerxes makingall speede, arrived quickly at the quarter of the Greeks, which was about three miles from the place where Cyrus fell. There hee met with Tiffaphernes, who having made way through the battaile of the Greeks, was ready now to joyne with his Master in spoilingtheir Tents. Had not the newes, which Artaxerxes brought with him of his brothers death, bin sufficient to countervaile all disasters received, the exploit of Tiffaphernes in breaking through the Greekes would have yeelded little comfort. For Tiffaphernes had not flaine any one man of the Greekes, but contrariwife, when he gave upon them, they opening their battaile, drave him with great flanghter through them, in fuch wife, that he rather escaped as out of an hard passage, than forced his way through the o squadron of the Greekes. Hereof the King being informed by him, and that the Greeks, as Masters of the field, gave chase to all that came in their fight; they ranged their Companies into good order, and followed after these Greekes, intending to set upon them in the reare. But these good Souldiers perceiving the Kings approach, turned their faces, and made head against him; who not intending to seeke honour with danger of his life, wheeled about and fled, being purfued unto a certaine Village, that lay under a Hill, on the top whereof hee made a ftand, rather in a bravery, than with purpose to attempt upon these bold sellowes any further. For he knew well that his brothers death had fecured his estate, whom hee would seeme to have slaine with his owne hand, thinking that fact alone sufficient to give reputation to his valour; and this reputation he thought that hee might now preferve well enough, fliewing a manly looke halfe a mile off. On the top of this Hill therefore hee advanced his Standard, a golden Eagle diplated on the top of a Speare. This enligne might have encouraged his people, had not some of the Greekes espied it, who not meaning that he should abide so neere them, with all their power marched toward him. The King discovering their approach, fled upon the spurre; so that none remained in the place of battaile, save onely the Greekes, who had loft that day not one man, nor taken any other harme, than that one of them was hurt with an arrow. Much they wondred that they heard no newes of Cyrus, but thinking that he was pursuing the Army, they thought it was sittest for thems

S. V.

The hard estate of the Greekes after the fight; and how Attaxerxes in vaine sought to have made them yield unto him.

T was now about the fetting of the Sunne, and they bringing home darke night with them, found their Campe spoiled, little or nothing being left that might to Flerve for food: fo that wanting victuals to fatisfie their hunger, they refreshed their weary bodies with fleepe. In the mean feafon Artaxerxes returning to his Campe, which he entred by Torch-light, could not enjoy the pleasure of his good fortune entire. because he perceived that the basenesse of his people, and weakenesse of his Empire, was now plainely discovered to the Greekes: which gave him affurance, that if any of these who had beheld the shamefull demeanor of his Army, should live to carry tidings home, it would not belong, ere with greater forces they disputed with him for his whole Signory. Wherefore he refolved, to try all meanes, whereby he might bring them to defittle ction, and not let one escape to carry tidings of that which he had seene to which purpose he sent them a brave message the next morning; charging them to deliver up their 10 Armes, and come to his Gates, to awaite there upon his Mercie. It feemes that he was in good hope to have found their high courages broken, upon report of his brothers death: but he was greatly deceived in that thought. For the Greekes being advertised that morning from Ariano, a principall Commander under Cyrus, that his Master being slaine, he had retired himselfe to the place of their last encamping, about eight miles from them, whence intending to returne into Ionia, his meaning was to dislodge the next day, awaiting for them follong if they would joyne with him, but refolving to stay no longer: they fent answer backe to Arious, that having beaten the King out of the field, and finding none that durst refist them, they would place Ariaus himselfe in the Kings Throw, if he would joyne with them, and pursue the victory. Before they received any reply to ... this answer, the Messengers of Artaxerxes arrived at the Campe, whose errand seemed? to the Captaines very infolent: One told them, that it was not for the Vanquilhersto yeelde their Weapons; another, that he would dye ere he yeelded to fuch a motion; a third asked, whether the King, as having the victory, required their Weapons; if so, why did he not fetch them: or, whether he defired them in way of friendship; for then would they first know, with what courtesie he meant to requite their kindnesse. To this question Phalinus a Gracian, waiting upon Tiffaphernes, answered; That the King having flaine Cyrus, knew no man that could pretend any Title to his Kingdom, in the middeft whereof hee held them fast enclosed with great Rivers, being able to bring against them such numbers of men, as they wanted ftrength to kill if they would hold up their throats; for an which cause he accounted them his prisoners. These words, to them, who knew themselves to bee free, were nothing pleasant. Therefore, one told Phalinus that having nothing left, but their Armes and Valour, whilest they kept their Armes, their Valour would bee ferviceable; but should they yeelde them, it was to bee doubted, that their bodies would not long remaine their owne. Hereat Phabinus laughed, faying; This young mandid seeme a Philosopher, and made a pretty speech; but that his deepe speculation shewed his wits to be very shallow, if hee thought with his Armes and Valour to prevaile against the great King. It seemes that Phalinus being a Courtier, and imployed in a bulinesse of importance, thought himselse too profound a States-man, to be chekt in his Embassage by a bookish discourser. But his wisedome herein failed him. 50 For what soever he himselfe was (of whom no more is knowne than that he brought an unhonest message to his own Countrimen, perswading them basely to surrender their Weapons, and Lives, to the mercilesse Barbarians) this young Scholler by him despiled, was that great Xenophon, who, when all the principall Commanders were surprised by treachery of the Persians, being a private Gentleman, and having never seene the warres before, under-tooke the conduct of the Army, which he brought fafe into Greece, freeing it from all those, and from greater dangers than Phalinus could propound. Some there were who promised to be faithfull to the King, as they had bin to Cyrus, offering their service in Egypt, where they thought Artaxeres might have use of them. But the small answer was, That without Weapons they could neither doe the King good as Friends, nor desend themselves from him as Enemies. Hereupon Phalinus delivered the Kings surther pleasure, which was to grant them Truce, whilest they abode where they then were, denouncing Warre if they stirred thence; Whereunto he required their answer. Clearchus the Generall told him, they liked it. How (saith Phalinus) must I understand you? As choosing peace if we stay, or otherwise war, said Clearchus. But whether warre or peace; quoth this politique Embassadour? To whom Clearchus (not willing to acquaint him with their purpose,) Let our doings tell you; and so dismissed him, no wisfer than hee came. All that day the Greekes were saine to seed upon their Horses, Asses, and other Beasts, which they rosted with arrowes, darts, and woodden targets.

§. VI. How the Greekes began to returne home-wards.

throwne away by the Enemies.

T night they took their way towards Arieus, to whom they came at mid-nights being for faken by foure hundred foot, and forty horse, all Thracians, who fled A over to the King, by whom how they were entertained, I doe not finde. Like o enough it is that they were cut in pieces; for had they bin kindly used, it may well bee thought that some of them should have accompanied Tessaphernes, & served as Stales to draw in the rest. Ari aus being of too base a temper, and birth, to thinke upon seeking the Kingdome for himselfe, with such affistance as might have given it unto Cyrus, was very well pleased to make covenant with them for mutuall affistance unto the last: Whereunto both parts having fworn, he advised them to take another way homeward, which should becomewhat longer, yet forer and fitter to relieve them with victualls, than that by which they came. The next day, having made a wearifome march, and tyred the Souldiers, they found the Kings Army which had coasted them, lodged in certain Villages, where they purposed themselves to have encamped: towards which Clearchus made dito reflly because he would not seeme by declining them to shew feare, or weakenesse. That the Kings men were contented to remove, and give place to their betters, it cannot be trange to any that hath confidered their former behaviour; Nor strange, that the Gracians, being weary and hungry, and lying among enemies in an unknown Country, should beevery fearefull: but it is almost past beliefe, that the noise which was heard of these pooremen, calling one to another tumultuoufly, as the present condition inforced them to doe, should make the Persians flie out of their Campe, and so affright the great King, that instead of demanding their Arms, he should crave peace of them. The next day vey early, came messengers from Artaxerxes, desiring free accesse for Embassadors, to entreat of peace. Were it not that fuch particulars do best open the quality of the persons, o by whom things were managed, I should hold it fitter, to run over the generall passages of those times, than to dwell among circumstances. But surely it is a point very remarkeable, That when Clearchus had willed the Messengers to bid the King prepare for battaile, because the Greeks (as he said) wanting whereupon to dine, could not endure to heare of truce till their bellies were full; Artaxerxes diffembling the dignity, was contented fweetly to swallow down this pill, sending them guides, who conducted them to aplace where was plenty of victuals to relieve them.

§. VII. How Tiffaphernes, under colour of peace, betrayed all the Captaint of the Greekes.

Itherto the Greekes, relying upon their own vertue, had rather advanced their affaires, than brought themselves into any straights or termes of disadvantage. But now came unto them the subtile Foxe Tisaphernes, who circumventing the Chiefe Commanders by fine sleights, did mischievously entrappe them, to the extremedanger of the Army. He told them, that his Province, lying neere unto Greece, had caused him greatly to desire, that their deliverance might be wrought by his procurement; knowing well that in time to come, both they, & their Countrimen at home, would not bee unthankefull for such a benefit. Herewithall he forgot not to rehearse the great service that he had done to his Master, being the first that advertised him of C. rus his intent, and having not onely brought him a good strength of men, but in the day of barraile shewed his face to the Greekes, when all others turned their backes: that he together with the King, did enter their Campe, and gave chase to the Barbarians than food on the part of Cyrus. All this (quoth he) did I alledge to the King, entreating that he would give me leave to conduct you fafe into Greece; in which fuite I have good hope to speede, if you will send a milde answer to him, who hath willed me to aske you, for what cause we have borne Armes against him. The Captaines hearing this, were contented to give gentle words, which Tiffaphernes relating to the King, procured (though very hardly, as he faid) that peace should be granted: the conditions whereof were; That they to should passe freely through all the Kings Dominions, paying for that they tooke, and committing no spoile: yet that it should be lawfull for them to take victuals by force, in any place that refused to affoord them an open Market. Hereupon both parties having fworne, the League was concluded, and Tiffaphernes returning to the King to take leave. and end all businesse, came unto them againe after twenty dayes, and then they set forward. This interim of twenty dayes, which Tiffaphernes did spend at the Court, mini. fired great occasion of mistrust to his new Confederates. For besides his long absence. which alone sufficed to breede doubt, the Brethren, and Kindred of Ariam, repairing daily to him, and other Persians to his Souldiers, did worke him and them so with affirance of pardon, and other allurements, that he daily grew more strange to the Greeks 20 than formerly he had bin. This caused many to advise Clearchus, rather to passe forward as well as he might, than to relye upon covenants, and fit still whilest the Kinglav. ed fnares to entrappe them. But he on the contrary perswaded them, to rest contented whileft they were well, and not to cast themselves againe into those difficulties, out of which they were newly freed by the late Treatie; reciting withall their own wants, and the Kings meanes, but especially the Oathes mutually given and taken, wherewith hee faw no reason why the enemie should have clogged himselfe if hee meant mischiefe, having power enough to do them harme by a faire and open Warre.

Tiffaphernes was a very honourable man (if honour may be valued by greatnesse and place in Court) which caused his Oath to be the more esteemed; for as much as no in- 30 forcement, or base respect, was like to have drawne it from him. But his falshoodwas fuch, both in fubftance and in fucceffe, as may firly expound that faying, which proceed ded from the fountaine of Truth, I hate a rich man a lyer. A lye may finde excuse when it growes out of feare: for that passion hath his originall from weakenesse. But when Power, which is a Character of the Almighty, shall be made the supporter of untruth, the falshood is most abominable; for the offender, like proud Lucifer, advancing his own strength against the divine Justice, doth committhat sinne with an high hand, which commonly produceth lamentable effects, and is followed with fure vengeance. It was not long ereTiffaphernes found means to destroy all the Captaines, whom he subtlely got into his power by a traine; making the Generall Clearchus himself the meane to draw in 40 all the rest. The businesse was contrived thus: Having travailed some dayes together in fuch wife, that the Persians did not encampe with the Greeks, who were very jealous of the great familiarity, appearing betweene Tiffaphernes, & Ariaus; Clearchus thought it convenient to roote out of Tiffaphernes his braines all causes of distrust, whereof many had grown in that short time. To which purpose obtaining private conference withhim, he rehearfed the oath of Confederacie, which had past betwene them, shewing how religiously he would keepe it; and repeating the benefits, which the Greekes did receive by the helpe of Tissaphernes, he promised that their love should appeare to him not unstuitfull, if he would make use of their service against the Mysians or Pisidians, who were accustomed to infest his Province; or against the Egoptians, who were then Rebells 1050 the great King. For which cause hee defired him, that whereas all divine and human respects had linked them together, hee would not give place to any close acculation or fulpirion, whereby might grow fudden inconvenience to either of them, upon no just ground. The faithlesse Persian was very much delighted with this speech, which miniftred faire occasion to the execution of his purpose. Therefore hee told Clearchus, that all this was by him wifely confidered, wishing him further to call to minde how many wayes hee could have used to bring them to consustion, without perill to himselfe, especially by burning the country, through which they were to passe, whereby they mult needs have perished by meere famine. For which cause he said that it had bin great folly, to seeke by perjurie, odious to God and Man, the destruction of such as were already in his hands. But the truth was, that his owne love to them had moved him to worke their fafetie, not onely for those ends which Clearches had recounted, of pleasures that might redound to himselfe, and the King, by their assistance: but for that hee might by their friendship, hope to obtaine what Cyrus had mist. Finally, he invited the credulous Genrleman to Supper, and fent him away fo well affured of his good will, that he promifed tobring all the Captaines with him to the same place, where, in presence of them all, Tillaphernes likewise promised to tell openly, which of them had by secret information 10 fought to raise diffension betweene them. Clearchus himselfe being thus deceived, with great importunity drew all the chiefe Commanders, and many of the inferiour Leaders, to repaire with him to the Campe of Tillaphernes, whither followed them about two hundred of the common Souldiers, as it had bin to some common Faire. But being there arrived, Clearchus with other the five principall Coronels, were called into the Tent, the rest staying without, where they had not waited long ere a signe was given, upon which they within were apprehended, and the residue slaine. Forth-with certainebands of Persian Horsemen scoured the field, killing as many Greeks as they met, and riding up the very Campe of the Gracians, who wondred much at the turnult, whereof they knew not the cause, till one, escaping sorely wounded, informed them 20 of all that had bin done. Hereupon the Greekes tooke Armes in hafte, thinking that the enemy would forthwith have affailed their Campe. Anonthey might perceive the Embaffadours of Tisfaphernes, among whom were his own brother, and Ariaus, followed with three hundred Horse, who called for the principall men in the Army, saying, that they brought a message from the King, which Arians delivered to this effect: That Clearchus having broken his faith, and the league made, was justly rewarded with death; that Menon and Proxenus, two other of the five Coronels, for detecting his treacherie, were highly honoured: & finally, that the King required them to furrender their Arms, which were due to him, as having belonged unto his fervant Cyrus. When fome altercationhad followed upon this meffage, Xenophon told the Embaffadors, that if Clearchus 30 had in such fort offended, it was well that hee was in such fort punished: but he willed them to fend backe Menon and Proxenus, whom they had fo greatly honoured, that by them, as by common friends to both Nations, the Greekes might be advised how to answerthe Persian. Hereunto the Embassadours knew not how to frame any reply, and therefore departed without speaking one word more. Clearchus, & the other soure were fentto Artaxerxes, by whose commandement their heads were stricken off. I hold it not amisse to prevent the order of time, annexing to this persidiousnesses of Tissaphernes, the reward which he afterward received. He faw his Province wasted by the Greeks, against whom receiving from his Master convenient aid of men and mony, he did so ill manage his affaires, that neither subtiltie, nor perjury (to which he failed not to have recourse) oavailed him; finally, the King was jealous of his cunning head, and fent a new Lievtenantinto those parts, who tooke it from his shoulders. Such was the recompence of his treacherie, which made him so mistrusted at home, that the service which he could not doe, he was thought upon private ends to neglect; & fo hated abroad, that he knew not which way to flie from the stroke, all the world being shut against him. But now let us teturne to the prosperity, wherein he triumphed without great cause, having betrayedbraver menthan himselfe, and intending to bring the like mischiese upon the whole Armie.

6. VIII.

How Xenophon heartened the Greekes, and in despitat of Tissaphernes went off safely.

Reat was the heavinesse of the Souldiers, being now left destitute of Leaders; and no lesse their searce of the evill hanging over their heads, which they knew not well how to avoide. Among the rest, Xenophon, whose learning supplied his want of experience, finding the deepe sadnesse of the whole Army to be such as hindred them from taking any course of preventing the danger at hand, began to advise the under-officers of Proxenus his companies, whose familiar friend he had been to bethinke themselves of some meane, whereby their safety might be wrought, and the Souldiers encouraged: setting before their eyes whatsoever might serve for to give them hope, and above all, perswading them in no wise to yeeld to the mercy of their barbarous enemics.

Hereupon they defired him to take upon him the charge of that Regiment; and so together with him, the same night calling up such as were remaining of any account, they made choice of the fittest men to staceed in the places of those who were slain, or taken. This being done, and order fet downe for disburdening the Armie of all superfluous impediments, they eafily comforted themselves for the losse of Tissaphernes his assistance, 10 hoping to take victualls by force better cheape than he had bin wont to fell them; To which purpose they intended to take up their lodging two or three miles further, among fome plentifull Villages, and fo to proceed, marching towards the heads of those great Rivers, which lay in their way, and to passe them where they were foordable. Many attempts were made upon them by Tissaphernes, whom they, serving all on foot, were not able to requite for the harme which they received by the Persian Archers, who shot at a farther distance than the Greeks could reach. For this cause did Xenophon provide flings. wherewith hee over-reached the enemy; and finding fome Horses fit for service, that were imployed among the carriages, he set men upon them; training likewise his Archers to shoot compasse, who had bin accustomed to the point blanke. By these means 20 did he bear off the Persians who assailed him; and sometimes gave them chase with that band of fiftie Horse, which being well backt with a firm bodie of footmen, and seconded with troups of the light-armed-shot and slingers, compelled the enemie to liea-loof. Tif. saphernes not daring to come to handie-gripes with these resolute men, did possessente tops of mountains, and places of advantage, by which they were to passe. But finally, when their valour made way through all fuch difficulties, he betook himselfe to that course, which was indeed the surest of burning the Countrie. With great forrow didthe Greeks behold the Villages on fire and thereby all hope of victuals cut off. Some advited to defend the Country, as granted by the enemie himselse to be theirs; others to make more fires, if so perhaps the Persians might be ashamed to doe that which was the defire 20 of fuch as made paffage in hostile maner; But these were faint comforts. The best counsel was, that being neare unto the Carduchi, a people enemie to the Persian, they should enterinto their Country, passing over some high mountains which lay betweenthem. This course they followed, which could not have availed them, if Ti saphernes had begun fooner to cut off their victuals, rather than to feek to force, or to circumvent them by his fine wit.

The difficulties which the Greeke Armie found in passing through the Land of the Care duchi.

Ntringupon the Land of the Carduchi, they were encountred with many difficulties of wayes, but much more afflicted by the fierce inhabitants, who, accurite momental properties against the huge Armics of the Persian, were no way inferiour to the Greekes in daring, but onely in the Art of Warre. They were very light of foot, skilfull Archers, and used the Sling well; which weapons in that mountainous Countrey were of muchuse against these poore travellers, afflicting them in seven dayes which they spent in that passage, farre more than all the power of the great King had done. Between the Territorie of these Carduchi, and the parts of Armenia consining them, ranne Centrites a great River, upon which the Greeks refres to she themselves one day, rejoycing that they had so well escaped these dangers, and hoping that the remainder would prove casse. But the next morning they saw certaine troupes of Horse, that lay to forbid their passage. These were levied by the Kings deputies in those parts; Tisaphernes and his Companies having taken their way towards some strong they saw towards some testing and deepe, so that it was not possible for such as wouldenter it, to make resistance against those which kept the opposite bankes. To increase these dangers, the Carduchi, following upon them, lay on the side of a Mountaine, within less than a mile of the water. But it was their good hap to discover a Foord, by which the greater number of them passing over, did easily chase away the Subjects of the Persian, and then sending backe themost expedite men, gave succour to the Reare-ward, against which the Carduchi being sleightly armed, could not on plaine ground make resistance hand to hand. These Carduchi seem to have inhabited the Mountaines of Niphates, which upon the River of Cyrus in Media; wherein he differs much from Xenophon, whose relation being grounded upon his own knowledge, doth best in this case deserve credit. Of the River Centries (as of many other Rivers, Townes, and Places, mentioned by Xenophon) will not labour to make a conjecture, which may endure the severity of a Critics only of this last, I thinke it the same which falleth into Tygris, not much above Artasizara, springing out of Niphates, and running by the Towne of Sardeva in Gordené, a Province of Armenia the Great, wherein the Greekes having passed Centrites did arrive.

How Teribazus Governour of Armenia, seeking to entrap the Greekes with termes of fained place, was disappointed and shamefully beaten.

He Army finding in Armenia good provision, marched without any disturbance about fifty or threescore miles to the heads of the River Tygrin, and passing over them, travailed as farre further without refiftance, till they were encountred by Turba at the River Teleboa, which Xenophon commends as a goodly water, though fmall, but Psolomy and others omit it. Teriba Zus governed that Country for the Persian, Ewasingreat favour with Artaxerxes, whose Court may feem to have bin a Schoole, wherethe Art of falshood was taught as wisedom. He desired peace of the Greeks, which was made upon this condition, that they should take what they pleased, but not burne downe the Townes and Villages in their way. As foone as he had made this league, he leavied an Army, and befetting the Streights of certaine Mountaines which they were o topasse, hoped well to make such benefit of their security, as might give him the commendation of being no leffe craftily dishonest than Tissaphernes. Yet his cunning failed of fuccesse. For a great snow fell, which caused the Greekes to make many fires, and scatterthemselves abroad in the Villages. Teriba Zus also made many fires, and some of his menwandred about feeking reliefe. By the fires he was discovered, and by a Souldier of his that was taken prisoner, the whole plot was revealed. Hereupon the Greekes, taking this captive with them for a guide, fought him out; & comming upon his Campe, did fo affright him, that before the whole Army could arrive there, the shout which was rasted by the Vaunt-currors, chased him away. They tooke his Pavilion, wherein (besides many flaves, that were Artificers of voluptuousnesses) very rich furniture was left by the ottacherous coward, who returned no more to challenge it. From hence the Army went Northward, and passing Euphrates, not far below the springs thereof, travailed with much difficulty through deepe frow, being followed aloofe by the enemy, who durst not approach them, but did cut off fuch as they found straggling behinde. The Inhabitans of the Country, through which they marched, had their wintering houses under ground, wherein was found great plentie of victualls, and of cattaile, which likewife did winter in the same Cellars with the owners. Having refreshed themselves in those parts, & taken sufficient ease after the miserable journey, which had consumed many of them with extreme cold; they departed, leading with them many bond-flaves & taking away (befides other Horses and Cattaile) some Colts that were bred up for the great King.

6. XI.

The passage of the Army to Trabizonde, through the Countries bordering apon the River of Phasis, and other obscure Nations.

So without impediment they came to the River Phass, neere whereunto the people called Phasiani Tacchi, and Chalybes were seated. These Nations joyned together, and occupying the tops of a ledge of Mountaines, which the Greeker were to passe, made countenance of warre: but some companies being sent by night to feize upon a place of equall height to that whereon the enemies lay, making good the piece of ground which they had taken, secured the ascent of the rest; which caused these people to flye, every one retiring to the defence of his owne. The first upon whose Countrie the Greekes did enter were the Tacchi, who convaying all their provision of victuals into strong holds, brought the Army into much want, untill with hard labour one place was forced, wherein great store of cattaile were taken; the people, to avoide captivity, threw themselves head-long downe the rockes, the very women throwing down first their own children, and then casting themselves upon them. Here was taken a great bootie of Cattaile, which served to feed them, travailing through the land of the Chalybes, of whom they got nothing but stroakes. The Chalybes were a very stout Nation, well armed at all points, and exceeding fierce. They encountred the Greekes hand to hand, killing as many as they tooke prisoners, and cutting off their heads, which they carried away, finging and dancing, to the great griefe of their companions living; who were glad, when after feven dayes journey they escaped from those continuall skirmisses, wherewith they had bin vexed by these Barbarians. Hence travailing through agood corne-Countrie, inhabited by an obscure Nation called the Scythini, they came to a rich Towne, the Lord whereof, and of the Region adjoyning, used them friendly. and promifed to guide them to a Mountaine, whence they might discover the Euxine Sea. From Gymnia (which was the name of his Towne) he led them through the Territorie of his enemies, defiring them to waste it with sword and fire. After five dayes march, they came to a Mountaine called Teches, being (as I thinke) a part of the Mountaines called Moschiei, whence their guide shewed them the Sea; towards which they bent their course : and passing friendly through the Region of the Macrones, (with whom by meanes of an interpreter, found among themselves, who borne in that place hadbin fold into Greece, they made a good peace) they arrived in the Land of Colchos, wherein "Trabisond, a stands the Citic of "Trabisond, called then TrapeZou, a Colonic of the Greekes. The Colony of the Colchi entertaining them with hostility, were required with the like; for the Armicha-Greeter, fituate ving now good leifure to repose themselves among their friends the Trape Zuntians, did in the bottome of the Euxine fpoile the Countrie thirty dayes together, forbearing onely the Borderers upon Trabi- 30 zonde, at the Citizens request.

How the Army began at Trabizond to provide a Fleet, wherewith to returne home by Sea: how it came into the Territorie of Synope, and there prosequated the same purpose.

Aving now found an Haven Towne, the Souldiers were defirous to take shipping, & change their tedious Land-journies into an easie Navigation. To which purpose Cherisophus a Laced amonian, one of the principall Commanders, promised by meanes of Anaxibius the Lacedamonian Admirall, who was his friend, that he la would provide Vessells to embarke them. Having thus concluded, they likewise tooke order for the staying of such ships as should passe that way, meaning to use them for their navigation. Lest all this provision should bee found insufficient for the transportation of the whole Army, Xenophon perswaded the Cities adjoyning to cleare the wayes, and make an eafie paffage for them by Land; whereunto the Souldiers were utterly unwilling to give eare, being defirous to returne by Sea: but the Countrie fearing what inconvenience might grow by their long stay, did readily condescend to Xenophons request. Two ships they borrowed of the Trapezuntians, which they manned and sent to Sea: the one of them failed directly into Greece, for faking their Companions, who had put them in trust to bring ships into the Port of Trabiz onde: the other tooke Merchants and se paffengers, whose goods were fafely kept for the owners, but the Veffels were stayed to increase the fleet. After long aboade, when victuals began to faile, by reason that all the Land of the Colchi, neere unto the Campe was already quite wasted, they were faint to embarke their ficke men, with the women, children, and fuch of the baggage as might best be spared, in those few ships which they had already provided. The rest of the Armietooketheir way by Land to Cerasus, a Greeke Towne, where the fleet likewise arrived. Here the Army being mustered, was found to consist of eight thousand & fixehundredmen. From hence they passed through the Country of the * Mosquaei, who were divided into factions. The stronger partie, despising their friendship, caused them to iovne them with the weaker, whom they left Masters of all.

The next place of their abode was b Cotyora, a Greeke Towne likewife, & a Colonie of the Synopians, as TrapeZus and Cerafus were; but the entertainment which here they b Cotyona a Port the Synopians. found was very churlish, having neither an open Market afforded to them, nor the sicke same Regions men that were among them admitted into any house. Hereupon the Souldiers entred the Towne by force, and (committing no outrage) bestowed those which were sicke in convenient lodgings, taking into their own hands the custody of the Gates. Provision for the Army they made by strong hand, partly out of the Territory of the Paphlagoni-10 ans, partly out of the Lands belonging to the Towne. These newes were unwelcome to · Sinope, whence Embassadours were sent to the Camp, who complaining of these dealings, & threatning to joyne with the Paphlagonians, if redreffe could not otherwise be e single a Porehad, were roundly answered by Xenophon, That meere necessity had enforced the Army Townein Leucototeach those of Coryora good manners in so bad a methode : letting them know, that he of the Mylesians. feared not to deale with them & the Paphlagonian at once; though perhaps the Paphlaronian would be glad to take Sinope it felfe, to which, if cause were given, they would lendaffistance. Upon this answere the Embassadors grew better advised, promising all friendship that the State of Sinope could shew, and commanding the Towne of Coiyera torelieve the Souldiers as well as they might. Further, they promifed to affift them with 20 hipping, letting them understand how difficult the passage by Land would prove, in regard of the many & great Rivers, as Thermodon, Iris, Halys, and Parthenius, which croffedtheir way. This good counfaile, and the faire promises accompanying it, were kindly accepted by the Army, which well perceived, that the City of Sinope would spare for no cost, to be freed from such a neighbourhood. It was therfore decreed that they would passe the rest of the way by Sea; provided that if there should want such number of Vessels as might serve to imbarke every one of them, then would they not put from the of dissention which arose in the Armie; and how it was embarked.

Therto the danger of enemies, and miseries of weather and wants, had kept the companie in firme unity; which now beganne to dissolve and to thaw, by the neighbouring aire of Greece, warming their heads with private respects to their severall ends and purposes. Whilest they, who were sent as Agents from the Campe, remained at Sinope; Xenophon confidering the strength and valour of his men, & the opportunity of the coast whereon they lay, thought it would be an honourable worke to builda City inthose parts, which were soone like to prove great and wealthie, in regard both of their owne puissance, and of the great repaire of the Greekes into that quarter. For this cause he made sacrifice, according to the superstition of his time and Countrie, divining of his successe by the entrailes of beasts. The Sooth-sayer whom he imployed had received a great reward of Cyrus, for conjecturing aright, that Artaxerxes would not give battaile in ten dayes: he therefore, having preserved his money carefully, was desirous to be foone at home, that he might freely enjoy his gettings. By him the purpose of Xenophon was divulged, which was interpreted according to the diversitie of mens opinions; some approving the motion, but the greater part rejecting it. They of Sinope and Heraclea, being informed of this consultation, were fore a fraid, left the povertie of the Souldiers, who had not wherewith to maintaine themselves at home, should give successe to the project. Which to prevent, they promised to supply the Army with a fufficient fleet, and likewise offered mony to some of the Captaines, who thereupon undertooke to give the Souldiers pay, if they would presently set saile for Greece. One of these Captaines being a banished man, desired them to follow him into Trees; another offered to leade them into Cherronefus. Xenophon, who defired only the common good, was pleased greatly with these propositions, and professed openly that he would have them to set forward, & hold together in any case, punishing him as a traitor that should for fake the Armie, before such time as they were arrived at their journies end. Silanus the Sooth-fayer, who had uttered Xenophons purpose, was hereby staied from out-running his fellowes, and driven to abide with his wealth among poore men, longer than stood with his good liking. Also the other Captaines were much troubled and affraid when they perceived, that ships were prepared sufficient for their Navigation, but that the money promised to them, and by them to the Souldiers, came not. For the people of Sinope, and Heraclea, knowing that the Armie was now refolved for the voyage, and that Xenophon, whom they feared, had perfwaded them to this resolution, thought it the wifest way to furnish them with a Navie whilest they were in good readinesse, to depart, but to keep the mony to themselves. The Captaines therfore, who being disappoint ted by these townes, found themselves in great danger of their men, whom they had deceived with faire hopes, repented much of their faire offers, & fignifying as much to X. nophon, prayed him to make proposition to the Armie, of taking the ships, & sayling to 10 Phalis, where they might feize upon Lands, and plant themselves in such wise as should stand best with their good liking. But finding him cold in the businesse, they began to worke the principall of their own followers, hoping by them to draw in all the reft. These newes becomming publike, bred a suspition of Xenophon, as if he had won the rest of the Captaines to his purpose, and meant now to carry the Army quite another way from their own home. Wherfore affembling the Companies, he gave them fatisfaction. and withall complained of some disorders, which he caused them to redresse. A generall inquifition was likewife made of offences committed fince the death of Cyrus; which be ing punished, all things were in quiet. Shortly after came Embassadours from Corplas Lord of the Paphlagoneans, who fending presents, defired peace of the Greeks: the Embaf- 20 fadours were friendly entertained, and peace concluded, which needed not to have bin fought, for that the Greeks, having now their fleet in a readines, did foon weigh Anchors. Se fet faile for Harmene the Port of Sinope, whither Cherifophus came, bringing withhim a few Gallies from the Admiral Anaxibins, who promifed to give the Army pay as foon as they came into the parts of Greece.

S. XIV.

Another great dissension and distraction of the Army. How the mutiners were beauth by the Barbarians, and rescued by Xenophon.

THe neceret that they approached to Greece, the greater was their defire to make provision for themselves, that they might not returne home emptie-handed. Wherefore truffing well that if the charge of the Armie were absolutely committed to one fufficient man, he might the more conveniently procure the good of them all, they determined to make Xenophon fole Commander of all; in whose favour as well the Captaines as the common Souldiers were very earnest and violent. But he, either fearing to displease the Lacedemonians, who were jealous of him already (being incensed by that fugitive who for fooke the army at Trabizond, flying with one of their two ships) or moved by some tokens appearing to him in the entrails that threatned ill successeto his government, procured with vehement contention, that this honour was laid upon 40 Cherifophus a Lacedamonian. It feemes that Xenophon, confidering the vexation incident to the conduct of a voluntary Army, wanting pay, did wifely in yeelding to fuch tokens as forbad him to accept it : especially, knowing so well their defire, which was, by right or by wrong, to get wealth wherfoever it might be found, without all regard of friend or foe. Cherisophus had bin Generall but fixe or sevendayes, when hee was deposed, for having bin unwilling to rob the Towne of Heraclea, which had fent presents to the Campe, and bin very beneficiall unto them in lending ships for their transportation-Two daies they had failed by the coast of Asia, when being past those great rivers, which would have given impediment to their journey by Land, they touched at Heraclea, where confulting how to take their way onwards, whether by Land or Sea; one seditious man 50 began to put them in minde of feeking to get for what for themselves; telling them that all their provision would bee spent in three dayes, and that being now come out of the enemies Country, victualls and other necessaries could not bee had without money; for which cause he gave advice to send messengers into the Towne of Heraclea, giving the Citizensto understand what their wants were, and demanding of them three thousand pieces of money, called Cyricens, which fumme amounteth to two thousand and five hundred pound sterling, or thereabout. This motion was greatly applauded, and the fum raised to ten thousand Cy licens at least : which to require, they thought Cherisophus, as being Generall, the fittest man; others had more defire to fend Xenophon: but in vain. for they both refused it, and renounced the action as dishonest. Lest therefore either of these should faile in managing the businesse which agreed not with his disposition, others of more impudency and leffe discretion were sent; who in such wise delivered their infolentmessage, that the Citizenstaking time to deliberate upon their request, brought what they could out of the fields into the Towne, and shutting the Gates, did forthwith manthe Wals. When the Souldiers perceived themselves to be disappointed of their ravenous purpose, they fell to mutiny, saying, That their Leaders had betrayed them: andbeing for the more part of them Arcadians and Achæans, they for fook immediately cherilophus and Xenophon, chusing new Leaders out of their owne number. Above to fourethousand and five hundred they were, all heavily armed, who electing ten Captains, failed into the Port of Calphas, which is in the mid-way between Heraclea & Byzantium, with purpose to assaile the Bythinians on the sudden. With Cherisophus there abodetwo thousand and one hundred, of whom one thousand and source hundred were amed weightily: Xenophon had two thousand foot, three hundred whereof were lightly amed, and forty horse; which small band had done good service already, and could not have bin spared now. Cherisophus had agreed with Chander Governour of By zantium to meethim at the mouth of the River Calphas, whither Cleander promised to bring some Gallies to convey him over into Greece; for which cause he tooke his way thither by 20 Land leaving to Xenophon fuch shipping as he had, who passing some part of the way by Sealanded upon the confines of Heraclea, & Thracia Affattica, intending to make a cut through the mid-land Country to the Propont. The Mutiners who had landed at Calphas by night, with purpose to take spoiles in Bythinia, divided themselves into ten Companies, every Captaine leading his owne Regiment into some Village, five or fixe miles from the Sea; in the greater Townes were two Regiments quartered : and so was that part of the Country fur prised on the sudden, and sacked all at one time. The place of Rendevous was an high piece of Ground, where fome of them arrived, finding no diffurbance; others, not without much trouble and danger; two Companies were broken and 30 defeated only eight men escaped, the rest were all put to the sword. For the Thracians which had flips at first out of the Souldiers hands, did raise the Country, and finding the Greekes loaden with booty, took the advantage of their diforder, cutting in pieces those two Regiments: which done, they attempted the rest, encompassing the hil wheron they encamped. One great advantage the Thracians had, that being all light armed, they could at pleasure make retrait from these Arcadians & Achæans: who wanting the affishance of horse, & having neither Archers nor Slingers among them, were driven to stand meerly upon their defence, bearing off with greater danger, & many wounds received, the Darts & Arrowes of the Barbarians, till finally they were driven from their watering place. & enforced to crave parley. Whatfoever the Articles of composition were, the Thracians yeelded to all; but pledges for affurance they would give none, without which the Greeks to well knew, that all promises of such people, especially so incensed, were nothing worth. In the mean time Xenophon holding his way quietly through the In-land Region, did enquire of some Travellers, whether they knew ought of any Grecian Army, passing along those parts: & receiving by them true information of the desperate case into which these Gallants had foolishly throwne themselves, he marched directly towards the place where they lay, taking with him for guides, them who gave him the intelligence. His horse-men he sent before to discover, & to scowre the waies; the light armed foot-men tookethe hill tops on either hand, all of them fetting fire on whatfoever they found combustible: wherby the whole Country seemed to be on a light stame, to the great terrour of the enemies, who thought that some huge Army had approached. That night he o encamped on a hill, within five mile of the Arcadians, encreasing still the number of his fires, which he caused hastily to be quenched soon after Supper. The enemies perceiving this, thought certainly that he would have fallen upon them in the darke, which caused them in all haste to distodge. Early in the next morning Xenophon comming thither in very good order, to have given battell, found that his device, to affright the Thracians, had taken full effect; but he marvelled that the Greeks were also departed, concerning whom helearned by enquiry, that they removed at break of day, & perceived by fignes that they had taken the way to the Port of Calphas, in which journey he overtooke them. They embraced him and his, with great foy: confessing that they themselves had thought the same which the enemies did, looking that he should have come by night. wherein finding themselves deceived, they were affraid lest he had for saken them, and therefore hastened away to overtake him, and joyn with him. So they arrived at the Haven of Calpas, where it was decreed, That who foever from thenceforth made any morion to dif-joyne the Army, should suffer death.

§. XV.

Of divers pieces of service done by Xcnophon; and how the Army returned into Greece. The occasions of the War between the Lacedamonians and the Persians.

"He Haven of Calpas lay under a goodly head-land, that was very firong, and a-lo bounding with all kinde of Graine and Fruits, except Olives. There was also Timber for building and shipping, and a very convenient Sea for a great City. All which commodities that might have allured the Souldiers to flay there, and to plant, caused them to haste away, fearing left Xenophon should finde some device to have fertled himselse and them in that place. For the greater part of them had good meanes to live at home; neither did they so much for hope of gaine follow Cyrus in that War. as in regard of his Honour, and the love which they bare unto him: the poorer fort were fuch as left their Parents, Wives, and Children, to whom (though failing of the riches which they had hoped to purchase) they were now desirous to returne. But whether it to were fo that Xenophon found advantage by their owne superstition, to make them stay, which they greatly suspected; or whether the signes appearing in the entrails, did indeed forbid their departure: so long they were inforced to abide in the place till victuale failed; neither would the Captaines leade them forth to forrage the Country, untill the Sacrifices should promise good successe. Cherisophus was dead of an Ague, and his Thips were gone, being returned to the Heracleans, of whom they were borrowed. His followers were joyned to the rest of the Armie, which the greater it was, the more provision it needed, and the sooner felt want. For which cause, he that was chosen Coronell into the place of Cherisophus, would needs adventure to gratiste the Souldiers with the spoile of some Villages that stood near at hand; in which enterprise he found ill successe, 30 the whole Country lying in wait to entrap him, and an Army of Horse being sent by Pharnaba Zus the Satrapa, or Vice-roy of Phrygia, to the affiftance of these Bythinian Thracians, which troups falling upon the Greeks that were scattered abroad in seeking booty, flew five hundred of them, ... chased the rest to a certaine Mountainethere by. The newes of this overthrow comming to Xenophon, he led forth a part of the Army to the rescue of those that survived and brought them safe to the Campe; upon which the Bythinians made an offer that night, and breaking a Corps du garde, flew fome, pursuing the rest to the very Tents. This new courage of the enemy, together with the present condition of the Army, so disheartened and unfurnished of necessaries, caused the Greeks to remove their Camp to a place of more frength; which having intrenched, and com- 40 mitted to the defence of fuch as were least able to endure travell, Xenophon with the firmest and best able men went forth, both to bury those which were lately slaine, andto abate the pride of the Thracians, and their affiftants. In this journey his demeanour was very honourable. For having given buriall to the dead, the Enemy was discovered, lying on the tops of the hils adjoyning, to whom (notwith standing that the way was very rough and troublesome, so that some thought it a matter of too great danger, to leave at their backs a wood scarce passeable) he marched directly, telling his men plainly, that he had rather follow the enemy with halfe the number, than turn his back to them with twice as many; & letting them further know, that if they did not charge the Barbarians, he would not faile with the greater resolution to pursue them, from whom if they could so fafely retire to the camp, yet what should they do there, wanting victuals to sustain them in the place, and ships to carry them away . Wherefore he willed them rather to fight well that day, having eaten their dinners, than another day fafting; and not to regard the uneafier eturne, which might ferve to stay Cowards from running away, but to wish unto the Enemy a faire and easie way, by which he might slye from them These perswasions were followed with so valiant execution, that both Persians and Bythinians being chased out of the field, abandoned the Countrey forthwith, 100 moving their Families, and leaving all that could not fuddenly be conveighed away, to the discretion of the Greekes, who at good leasure gathered the Harvest of these bad Neighbours fields. This was the last fight which they had on the side of Asia. For they were not only suffered quietly to enjoy the spoyle of the Country, but when the opiniongrew common in those parts, that it was the intent of Xenophon to planta Colony on the Port of Calpas, Embassadors were sent from the Neighbour people, to desire friendship, and make offer of their best assistance. But the Souldiers had no minde to flay. Wherefore entring further into Bythinia, they tooke a great booty, which they carried away unto Chry lopolis, a city near unto Chalcedon, where they fold it. Pharnaba(w, Lievtenant in Phrygia to Artaxerxes, did greatly feare, left their long stay in that Countrey might breed in them a defire to visite his Province, where they might have o found great wealth, and little power to guard it. Therefore he fent to the Lacedemonian Admirall, entreating him with much instance and large promises to wast them over into Europe; to whom Anaxibius the Admirall condescending, promised to give the Souldiers pay, as soon as they arrived at Byzantium. So were they carried out of Asia at the intreaty of the Persian, who in the height of his pride had thought them so surely imprisoned with mighty Rivers, that he not onely denyed to permit their quiet departure, but willed them to furrender their Armes into his hands, and so to yeeld their lives to his discretion. How discourteously they were intreated by Anaxibius, and how to requite his injurious dealings, they seized upon Byzantium, which by Xenophons perto swaffon they forbare to facke; I hold it superfluous to relate. For the residue of their doings appertain little to the generall course of things. But this expedition, as in all ages iwas glorious, so did it both discover the secrets of Asia, and stirre up the Greekes to thinke upon greater enterprises, than ever their forefathers had undertaken. Likewise it was the only remarkeable action which the time afforded. For the Roman Warres did hitherto extend no further than to the next neighbouring Townes of Italy; and in Greece all things were quiet, the Lacedæmonians ruling infolently, but without difturbance. True it is, that the seedes of the Warre shortly following, which the Lacedamonians made upon Artaxerxes, were already fowne, before these companies returned out of the high Countryes of Asia. For the Townes of Ionia which had fided with young Cyrus against Tissaphernes, if not against the great King, prepared to rebell; which they thought fafer, than to fall into the hands of Tissaphernes, who was now appointed Lievtenant, both of his old Province, and of all that had belonged to Cyrus. Wherefore the Ionians befought the Lacedæmonians to fend them ayd, whereby to recover their liberty; and obtained their request. For a power was sent over, under conduct of Thimbro a Spartan, who bestowed his men in such Towns as had already revolted, to secure the Cities andtheir Fields, but not to make any offensive War.

CHAP. XI.

Of the affaires of Greece, whilest they were managed by the Lacedamonians.

Howihe Lacedamonians tooke courage by example of Xenophons Army, to make Warre upon Artaxerxes.

taxerxes tooke their favour shewed unto his brother, and yet were timerous in beginning an open war against him, thinking it sufficient to take all care that no advantage might slip, which could serve to strengthen their Estate, by finding the Persian works beyond the T feems that the Lacedæmonians did well perceive in how ill part Arthen their Estate, by finding the Pertian worke beyond the when Xenophons Army had revealed the basenesse of those effemitate Assatiques, and rehearsed the many victories which they themselves had gotten, apontermes of extreme disadvantage; then was all Greece filled with defire of undertiking upon this huge unwieldy Empire, thinking it no hard matter for the joyntforces forces of that whole Nation, to hew out the way to Sufa, whereof one handfull had opened the paffage to Babylon; and further, finding no power that was able to give them refistance, in all that long journy of foure and thirty thousand two hundred and fifty five furlongs, spent in going and returning, which make of English miles about four thousand two hundred fourescore and one, a very painfull march of one yeare and three moneths. Neverthelesse, the civil distraction wherewith Greece was miserably torn, and especially that hot fire of the Theban war, which, kindled with Perfiangold, brake forth fuddenly into a great flame, drew back out of Asia the power of the Lacedæmonians, to thede. fence of their owne Estate; leaving it questionable, whether Azesilaus having both the fame and far greater forces, could have wrought proportionable effects. Sure it is, that to in the whole space of two yeares, which he spent in Asia, his deeds procured more commendation of magnanimity and faire behaviour, than of four courage, and great, or profitable atchievements. For how highly foever it pleased Xenophon, who was his friend, and follower in this, and in other wars, to extoll his vertue; his exploits being only a few incursions into the Countries lying neare the Sea, carrying no proportion to Xenophons owne journy, which I know not whether any Age hath paralleled: the famous retrait of Conon the Briton with fixe thousand men from Aquileia, to his own Countrey, through all the breadth of Italy, and length of France, in despite of the Emperour Thee. dosius, being rather like it than equall. But of Agesilam and his wars in Asia and Greece, we shall speake more in due place.

The third Booke of the first part

§. II. The prosperous beginnings of the warre in Asia.

Himbro receiving Xenophons men, began to take in Townes, and to entertaine all such as were willing to revolt from the Persian, who were many, and some of them such, as had beene highly beholding to the King; who seeme to have had no other cause of discontent, than that they were to live under the government of Tissaphernes, whom all others did as vehemently hate, as the King his Master didlove him. The managing of the warre begun by Thimbro, was for his oppressions taken out 30 of his hands, and committed to Dercyllidus a Spartan, who behaved himselfe as agood man of War, and a wise Commander. For whereas the rule of the low-Countries of Asia was divided between Pharnaba vas and Tissaphernes, who did ill agree, Pharnaba vas divided between Pharnaba vas and Tissaphernes, who did ill agree, Pharnaba vas being the worthier man, but the other by his Princes savour the greater, and having the chiese command in those Wars against the Greekes; Dercyllidus, who did beare a private hatred to Pharnaba vas (knowing well that Tissaphernes was of a mischievous nature, and would not be forry to see his Corrivall throughly beaten, though to the Kings losse an appointment with Tissaphernes, and forthwith entred Æolis, which was under the jurisdiction of Pharnaba vas, which Province in few dayes, he brought into his owner power.

That Countrey of Æolis had about the same time suffered a violent alteration, which gave easie successe to the attempts of Dercyllidas. Zenis a Dardanian had bin Deputy to Pharnaba Zus in those parts; after whose death his wife Mania procured his Office, wherin she behaved herselfe so well, that she not only was beloved of the people under her government: but enlarged her Territory, by the conquest of certaine Townesadjoyning; and fundry times gave affiftance to Pharnaba Jus in his Wars against the Mysians, and Persians. For shee had in pay some Companies of Greeks, whose valour by her good usage, did her great service. But somewhat before the arrivall of Dercyllidas inthose parts, a Sonne-in-law of hers, called Midias, whom she trusted and loved much, being blinded with ambition, found meanes to stifle her, and kill her sonne of seventeene yeares old; which done, he seized upon two of her principall Townes, wherein her treasure lay, hoping to have beene admitted into possession of her whole estate. Being denyedentrance by her Souldiers that layin Garrison, he sent Messengers with presents to Pharnaba Zus, defiring him to make him Governour in the place of Mania. His prefents were not onely rejected by Pharnabazus, but revenge of his foule treason threatned, whereby the wicked villaine was driven into termes of almost utter desperation. Inthe meane time came Dercy lidas, to whom the Townes of Mania, that held against Midias, did quickly open their Gates. One onely Towne flood out foure dayes (against the will of the Citizens, who were covetous of liberty) the Governour striving in vaine to have kept it to the use of PharnabaZus. Now remained only two Cities, Gergethe and Scepsis, which the Traytor held, who fearing all men, as being loved of none, sent Embassadours to Dercyllidas, desiring leave to speake with him, and pledges for his security: upon the delivery of which, he issued out of Scepsis, and comming into the Camp, made offer to joyne with the Greekes upon such conditions as might feeme reasonable. But he was plainly told by Dereillidas, that other condition there was none, than to fee the Cirizens freely at liberty. And prefently upon these words they marched toward Sceplis. When Midias perceived that it was in vaine to strive against the Army, and the Towns-men, who were all of one minde; he quietly went along with Dercyllidus, who to remaining but a few houres in the City, did a facrifice to Minerva, & then leading away the Garrison of Midias, he left the City free, and departed toward Gergethe. Midias didnot for fake his Company, but followed him, earneftly intreating that he might be fuffered to retaine Gergethe: but comming to the Gates, he was bidden to command his Souldiers that they should be opened; for (quoth Dercyllidas) I must here likewise doe a facrifice to Minerva. The Traytor not daring to make deniall, caused his Mercenaries to open the Gates, whereby Dercyllidas, taking possession of the place, tendred pay to the Garrison, who did not refuse to serve under his Ensignes. This done, all the goods of Mania were seized upon, as belonging to one that had been subject to Phar-20 nabal us, who was enemy to the Greekes: and so the murderous wretch was sent away naked, not knowing in what part of the World he might finde any place to hide his detefted head. Dercylledas having in eight dayes taken nine Cities, purposed for the ease ofhis Confederates to winter in Bythinia, to which end he tooke Truce with Pharmaba-(815, who had not any defire of Warre. That Winter, and the Summer enfuing, the truce being recontinued, held; in which time, befides the wasting of Bythinia, the neck of Land joining Cherronea to the Main, was fortified, being foure or five miles in breadth; by which meanes eleven Towns, with much good Land belonging to them, were freed from the incursions of the wilde Thracians, and made fit and able to victuall the Camp. Likewise the Citie of Atarne was taken, which was of great strength, and very well stored with provision. After this, Dercyllidas had command from Sparta, to divert the Warreinto Caria, where was the feate of Tiffaphernes; for that hereby it was thought not uneafie to recover all the Towns of Ionia; Pharax the Admirall of the fleet (which was a yearely office) being appointed to joyne with him. Though it was manifest that Tissapharnes had neglected Pharnaba Zus in time of necessity, yet was he not in his owne danger requited with the like. For PharnabaZus having respect to the Kings service, cametoassist his private enemy Tissaphernes, and so passing into Caria, they thrust Garrifons into all places of strength; which done, they marched towards Ionia, hoping to finde the Townes ill manned for relistance. As these Persians were desirous to keeper the Warre from their owne dores, fo was Dercyllidas willing to free his Confederates the lonians from the spoile and danger of the War, by transferring it into Caria. For which cause he passed the River of Meander, and not looking to have been so soon encountred, marched carelesly through the Country: when on the very sudden the whole Army of Tisspharnes and Pharnaba Zus was discovered, confishing of Persians, Carians, and some Mercenary Greekes, who were all marshalled in very good order to present battell. The oddes was too apparent, both in numbers of men, and in readinesse, as also in advantage of ground : for the Persian had a great multitude of Horse, the Greeke very sew and feeble, being to fight in an open plaine. Therefore all the Ionians, together with the llanders and others, of fuch places as bordered upon the Kings Dominions, did eitherbetake themselves to present slight; or abiding a while for shame, did plainly discover by their lookes, that they meant not to be more bold than wife. Onely Der-'yllidas with his Peloponnesians regarding their honour, prepared to endure the fight: which must needs have brought them to destruction, if the counsell of Pharnaba Zus had been followed, who per ceiving the opportunity of so great a victory, was not willing to let it slip. But Tissaphernes, who naturally was a coward, seeing that countenance of refiliance was made, began to confider what strange defence the Souldiers of Xeno-Mon had shewed, and thinking that all the Greekes were of the like resolution, held it the wisest way to crave parley; the conclusion of which was, That a Truce should be made, to last until Tiffaphernes might receive answer from the King, & Dercyllidas from Rrra Sparta₂

poling

Sparta, concerning the demands propounded in the Treaty; which were on the one part, That all the Greeks in Asia might enjoy their owne liberty and lawes; but contrarivise on the other side, That the Lacedæmonians should depart Asia, and leave the Townsto the Kings pleasure. This Treaty was of none effect; only it served to free the Greekes from the present danger, and to gaine time unto Tisaphernes, who defired to avoide the War by procrassination, which he durst not adventure to finish by tryall of a battell.

6. III.

How the Lacedamonians took revenge upon the Eleans for old displeasure. The discontents of the Corinthians and Thebans, conceived against the State of Sparta.

TN the meane feason the Lacedæmonians, who found none able to withstand them in Greece, began to call the Eleans to accompt for fome difgraces recei-Leved by them during the late Warres, when leafure was wanting to the requitall of fuch petty injuries. These Eleans being Presidents of the Olympiaque games. had set a fine upon the City of Sparta, for Non-payment of which, they forbad them to come to the folemnity; and publiquely whipt one of them that was of note, for prefuming to contend against their decree. Likewise they hindred Agis King of Spar- 10 ta, from doing facrifice to Jupiter; and in all points used great contempt toward the Spartans, who now had no bufineffe that could hinder them from taking revenge and therefore sent a peremptory message to the Eleans, commanding them to set at liberty the Cities which they held in subjection. This was the usuall pretence which they made the ground of all their Wars: though little they cared for the liberty of such Townes. which they caused afterwards to become followers, and little better than meere Vasials of the Lacedæmonians. In their late Wars with Athens, the strong op position which they found, caused this goodly Title of liberty to work very slowly but having now to doe with a State of great spirit and small force, it gave present successe to their desires. Two years together they fent an Amy into the Countrey of the Eleans: the first yeare 30 an Earth-quake (held in those times a prodigious figne, and which did alwayes forbid the profecution of any enterprise in hand) caused them to retire: the second yeare, all the Townes of the Eleans did hastily revolt, and the City it selfe was driven to submisfion; consenting both to suffer their old subjects freely to enjoy their liberty, and to have her owne Walls throwne downe. Only the Prefidentship of the Olympian games was left unto them, which it was not to be doubted that they would in time comming use modestly, finding themselves to stand at the mercy of Sparta. In this expedition all the Greeks were affiftant to the Lacedæmonians, excepting the Corinthians and Bosotians, whose and having bin of as much importance in the late Peloponnesian War, as the force of Sparta it felfe, they could not fmother their diflike of their unequal divisi-4 on following the victory; which gave to Sparta the command of all Greece; to Thebes and Corinth, onely fecurity against Athens, but such a security as was worse than the danger. For when the equal greatnesse of two mighty Estates did counterpoise each the other, it was in the power of these Neutrall Common-weals to adhere to either, as the condition of their affaires required; but when to revenge injuries, they had by mortall hatred profecuted the Warre to extremity, leaving the one City naked of power and friends, the other mightily increased in both; it was then (if not necessary to obey the greatnesse which themselves had made, yet) foolish and dangerous to provoke it. Neverthelesse, it was not the purpose of the Spartans to take occasion of any quarrell, which they could not finish at pleasure, till such time as they had by victory or compofition made some good end with the Persian, toward whom they bent all their care and forces.

The passage of Agesilaus into Asia. His Warre with Tissapherness. How Tissapherness was put to death; and the Warre diverted into another Province, through persivasion and gifts of Tithraustes his successour. How carelesse the Persian Lieutenants were of the Kings good.

Gesilaus newly made King of Sparta, was desirous to have the honour of the victory, which not without cause, he expected upon those of Asia; and therefore Drocuring a great Army to join with that of Dyrollidas, he took his way in great nompe to Aulis in Bocotia, a Haven lying opposite to the Iland of Euboca; in which place Agamemnon (leading the power of all Greece to the war against Troy, many Ages hefore) had imbarked his men. In imitation of Agamemnon, he meant also to doe facrifice in Aulis, which the Thebans, Lords of that Country, would not permit, but faying, that the performance of fuch ceremonies in that place, belonged unto their Officers: they were fo unable to conceale their malice, that fending fome Companies of horse, they threw downe his facrifice from the Altar. It was not then convenient time for A. gesslaus to entangle himselfe and his Country in a new Warre; therefore waiting better opportunity of revenge, he quietly swallowed the contumely, and followed his maine intendment. Having landed his men at Epheius, he was entertained by Tissaphernes with a Treaty of peace, wherein Agefilaus peremptorily requiring that the Persian should reflore to liberty all the Greek Townes in Asia, was promised that the King, being first informed of his demand, should fend answer to his good liking, if he would in the meane while make Truce. Truce was therefore made, which Tiffaphernes had fought, only to wintime of making provision for the War, and getting supply of men and money from Artaxerxes; whilest Agefilaus was busie in settling the estates of his confederate cities on that fide of the Sea. The end of this long vacation from war was at the comming downer of these forces which Artaxerxes had sent: at what time Agefilaus received a plain mesfage from Tiffaphernes, that either he must forthwith depart out of Asia, or make good hisabode by strong hand. Agesilaus returning word, that hee was glad to heare that his enemies had by perjury deserved vengeance from heaven, prepared to invade them; and fending word to all the Towns which lay betweene him and Caria, that they should provide victuals & other necessaries for his Army, did easily make Tissaphernes beleeve, that his intent was to invade that Province wherein Tistaphernes dwelt, and which was unfit for Horse, in which part of his forces the Persian had most considence. Therefore Tissaphernes bestowing all his Companies of soot in Caria, entred with his horse into the plains of Meander, hoping thereby to stop the passage of a heavie soot-army, not suffering them to passe into that Country which was fittest for their service. But the Greeks left him waiting there in vaine, and marched directly into Phrygia, where they tooke figreat spoile without resistance, till such time as the Horse-men of Pharnaba qus met him, who in a small skirmish having the better of the Greeks, were the occasion that Agesilaus returned to Ephesus. Although in this last fight only twelve men were lost, yet Agesilans perceiving by that tryall how hard it would be to prevaile, and hold the mastery of the field, without a greater strength of Horse, tooke all possible care to increase that part of his forces. By which meanes having enabled himselfe, whilest winter lasted, he entred upon the Country of Tiffaphernes, as soone as the season of the yeare would permit, and not only took a great booty, but finding the Horse-men of Tisaphernes in the plaine of Meander, without affiftance of their infantery, he gave them battell, and had a great victory, taking their campe, in which he found great riches. The blame of this losse fell so heavie upon Tissaphernes, who either upon cowardise had absented himselfe from the battell, or following some other businesse, was then at Sardis. For which cause his Mafter having him in distrust, and thinking that peace might bethe sooner had, which he much defired, if the man, so odious to the whole Nation of the Greekes, were taken out of the way; he sent into those parts Tithraustes a Persian, to cut off the head of Tissapherand succeed him in the government. Such was the end of this base and cowardly Politician, who little caring to offend Heaven, when by perjury he could advance his Purpoles on Earth, failed at the last through too much over-weening of his owne wifedome, even in that part of cunning wherein he thought himselfe most perfect; for supCHAP.II.S.5.

pofing, that by his great skill in fubtile nogotiation he should one way or other circum. vent the Greeks, and make them wearie of Asia; he did not seeke to finish the war, and according to his Masters wish, bring all things speedily to quiet, but rather to tempo. rize, till he might finde some opportunitie of making such end as best might stand with the Kings honour and his owne. Wherein it feemes that he much mistooke his Princes disposition, who though he had highly rewarded him for the aide which he did bring in his time of danger, yet would he much more gladly have taken it, if he could have found fuch meanes whereby the danger it felfe might have beene avoided: as not loving to have warre, whileft by any conditions (honourable or not) he might obtain peace. And this appeared well by the course which Tithraustes took at his first possession of the low-Countries. For he fent Embassadors to Agestland, in very friendly fort, letting him know. that the man who had been Author of the warre, was now taken out of the way; and that it was the Kings pleasure to let the Greekes enjoy their owne lawes and libertie.upon condition, that they should pay him the tribute accustomed, and the Armie beforthwith dismissed. The answer to this proposition, was by Agestlaw referred to the Councell of Sparta; in the meane season he was content to transferre the war into the Province of Pharmaba ?us, at the request of Tithraustes, who bought his departure with thirtie Talents.

The third Booke of the first part

This was a strange maner of Warre, both on the offensive and on the defensive part. For Agefilans having entertained great hopes of vanquishing the great King, was content to ted to forbear his severall Provinces, at the entreatie of the Lievtenants: and those Lievtenans being employed by the King to maintaine his Estates against all enemies (wherein if they failed, they knew that their heads might eafily be taken from their shoulders) were little offended at any losse that fell on their next Neighbour-Princes, which were subject like wise to the same Crowne of Persia, so long as their owne government could be preserved free from waste and danger. The cause of this disorder on the Persian side, I can ascribe to nothing so deservedly, as to the corrupted estate of the Court, wherein Eunuches, Concubines, and ministers of pleasure, were able by partiall construction to countenance, or difgrace, the actions of fuch as had the managing of things abroad; and to that foolish manner of the Kings (which was so usuall that it might be called arule) to 19 reward or punish the Provinciall Governour, according to the benefit or losse, which the Countrie, given in charge unto each of them, received, during the time of his rule. Whereby it came to passe, that as every one was desirous to make his owne Territorie yeeld a large increase to the Kings treasure; so no man was carefull to assist his borderers, if losse or danger might thereby grow to himself & his; but fate still as an idle beholder, when perhaps by joyning their forces, it had not bin uneafie to recompence the spoile of one Countrie, by conquering another, or defending a third from far greater miseries.

The War and Treatie betweene Agesilaus and Pharnabazus.

Gestlaus having thus compounded with Tithraustes, entred Phrygia, burning and wasting the Country without resistance. He tooke the Palace of Pharnaba Jus, and by his Lievtenant drave him out of his Campe. These actions, together with his honourable behaviour, which added much to their luftre, were more glorious than profitable. For he did not win Cities and Places of strength, which might have encreafed his power, and given affurance to the rest of his proceedings: but purchased fame and high reputation, by which he drew unto him some that were discontented and flood upon bad termes with the great King; whom he loft againe as eafily, by meanes 19 of some sleight injury done to them by his under-Captaines. Pharnaba Zus did notenclose himselfe in any Towne, for feare of being besieged, but kept the field, lying as neare as he could fafely to the enemies, with whom it was not his purpose to fight, but to make fome good end by composition, which he found not uneasse to doe. For the pleasures, by him formerly done to the State of Sparta, in the times of their most necessity, had been fo great, that when he (obtaining parley) did fet before their eyes his bounty towards them, and his love which had been fuch, that befides many other hazzards of his person, he had for the rescue of their fleet when it was driven to run a-shore at Abydus, adventured to ride into the Seas as far as he could finde any ground, and fight on horsebacke against the Athenians) together with his faith which had never beene violated in word or deed: they knew not how to excuse their ingratitude, otherwise than by telling him. That having War with his Master, they were inforced against their will, to offend him. Agestlaus did make a faire offer to him, that if he would revolt from the King to them, they would maintaine him against the Persian, and establish him free Prince of the Country wherein he was at that time onely Deputy to Artaxerxes. But Pharnaba. Zustoldhim plainly, That if the King his Master did put him in trust to make war against them, he would not faile to doe the best that he could as their enemy; if the charge were taken out of his hand, and he commanded to obey another, he would then shift side, and hetake himselfe to their alliance. The issue of this parley was, That the Armie should no longer abide in Phrygia, nor againe returne into it, whilest employment could be found elewhere. The excuse made by Agesilaus, and the withdrawing of hisforces out of those narts, were not sufficient to appeale Pharnaba Zus, whom he had not invaded for want of more necessary businesse elsewhere; but because his Country would yeeld great booty. and for the hire of thirty Talents. By this means the Lacedæmonians changed an honourable Friend into a hor Enemy, who afterwards requited their unthankefulnesse with full revenge.

6. VI.

The great commotions raised in Greece by the Thebans and others, that were hiredwith gold from the Persian.

The meane while Tithraustes, perceiving that Agesilaus meant nothing lesse thantoreturne into Greece, and let Artaxerxes rest quietly in Asia, tooke a wise Lourse, whereby the Citie of Sparta was not onely driven to looke to her owne, and give over her great hopes of subverting the Empire, but was beaten out of all that had been gotten by many late victories, and faw her Dominion restrained unto the narrow bounds of her owne Territory. He fent into Greece fifty talents of filver to be imoploied in raifing war against the Lacædeinonians; which treafure was by the subtle pradice of him that was put in trust with it, in such wise dispersed among the principall men ofthe Thebans, Argives and Corinthians, that all those Estates having formerly born secret hate to that of Sparta, were now defirous of nothing so much, as of open war. And lest this great heate of the incensed multitude should, for want of present exercise, begin to faint and vanish away in idle words, occasion was found out to thrust the Lacedæmonians into Armes, that they themselves might seem Authors of the quarrell. Some land there was in the tenure of the Locrians, to which the Thebans had in former time layd claim; but the Phocians either having the better title, or finding the greater favour, had it adjudged unto them, and received yearly mony for it. This mony the Locrians were eiother hired or perswaded to pay now to the Thebans, who readily accepted it. The Phocians not meaning so to lose their Rent, made a distresse by strong hand, recovering a great deale more than their own, which the Thebans (as in protection of their new Te-Mants) requited with an invasion made upon Phocis, wasting that Country in the maner of open war. Such were the beginnings of professed hostility betwen Thebes & Sparta, & the first breaking out of their close enmity, that had long time, though hardly, bin concealed. For when the Phocian Embassadors came to Sparta, complaining of the violence done by the Thebans, & requesting succour, they had very favourable audience, & ready consent to their suit; it being the manner of the Lacedæmonians to deferre the acknowledgment of injuries received, until occasion of revenge were offered, & then to discover to their indignation in cold bloud. At this time they had very good opportunity to worke their owne wils, having no other war to disturbe them in Greece, and hearing out of Asia nonews that could offend or trouble them. Wherefore they fent Lysander to raise all the Countries about Phocis, and with such forces as he could levie, to attend the comming of Paulanias King of Sparta (for Sparta, as hath bin shewed before, had two Kings) who should follow him with the strength of Peloponnesus. Lysander did as he was appointed, & being of great reputation in those parts, he drew the Orchomenians to revolt from Thebes. Pausanias likewise raised all Peloponnesus, except the Corinthians (who refufed to affift him in that enterprise) meaning to joyn with Lyfander, & make a speedy end of the war. The confideration of fo great a danger, approaching fo fwiftly, caused the Thebans to seeke what helpe they could abroad, for as much as their own strength was far too little to make refistance against such mightie preparations. It was not unknown to them, that many followers of the Lacedamonians were otherwise affected in heart than they durst utter in countenance; but the good wishes of such people were little 2. vaileable, confidering that the most which could be expected from them, was, that they should doe as little hurt as they could by which maner of tergiversation, the Corinthiant did at that present cast themselves into the displeasure of the Spartans, to the no great benefit of Thebes. Wherefore it was thought the fafest course, to procure the affistance of some Estate that might presently declare it selfe on their side, which would cause to many others to follow the example, and make their partie strong. To this end they sent Embassadours to Athens, excusing old offences, as either not committed by publike allowance, or done in time of the generall warre, and recompenced with friendshiplately showne in their refusall of affishing Pausanias, when he came in behalfe of the thirtie Tyrants against the good Citizens of Athens. In regard of which, and for their owne Honour fake, they requested them of aide in the present warre, offering to doe the best that they could for the restoring of Athens to her former estate and dignitie. Thrasybulm and his Friends, who persecuted by the thirtie, had been well entertained at Thebes, procured now the Citie to make a large requitall of the courtefie which they had received. For it was decreed, that the State of Athens should not only refuse to aide the Lacede. to monians in this Warre; but that it should affist the Thebans, and engage it selfe in their cause. Whilest Paulanias lay still, waiting the arrivall of his Confederates; Lysander being defirous to doe somewhat that might advance the businesse in hand, came to Haliantwo, where though Pausanias did not meet him, as had been apppointed, yet heattempted the Towne, and was flaine in fight by the Thebans, who came hastily to the refer. As this victorie did incourage the Thebans, so the comming of Paulaniae with his great Armie did againe amaze them, with presentation of extreme danger; but their spirits were foon revived by the strong succour which was brought from Athens, in consideration of which, and of the late battell, Paufanias durft not hazzard a new fight with them, but receiving the bodies of those that were flaine, by composition, departed out of their Territorie; for which, either cowardise or indiscretion, he was at his return to Sparte condemned as a Traitor, and driven to flie into Tegea, where he ended his daies in banihment.

6. VII.

How Agefilaus was called out of Asiato help his Country. A victory of the Spartans. Conon the Athenian, assisted by Pharmabazus, overcomes the Lacedamonian Fleet; recoversthe mastery of the Seas, and rebuilds the walls of Athens.

His good fucceffe, and the confederacy made with Athens, gave fuch reputation to the Thebans, that the Argives, Corinthians, Eubœans, Locrians, and Acamanes, did forthwith fide with them, and raifing a strong Army, determined to give battell to the Laced monians as neare as they might, to their own dores; Confe dering that the force of Sparta it selfe was not great, but grew more and more by the adjunction of their Confederates. The Magistrates of Sparta perceiving the danger, sent for Agefilaus, who readily obeyed them, and promifing his friends in Afia to return speedily to their affistance, passed the Streights of Hellespont into Europe. In the mean time the Cities of the new league had given battell to the Lacedamonians, & the remainder of their Affociates; but with ill successe. For when the right wing of each part had got ten the better hand, the Argives & Thebans returning from the chase in some disorder, were broken & defeated by the Lacedæmonians, who meeting them ingood order, won from them the Honour which they had gotten by forcing the left wing of the Lacedz monians, and made the victory of that day entirely their own. The reporters of this battell meeting Agefilaus at Amphipolis, were by him fent over into Afia, wherein it is not likely that they brought much comfort unto his friend, who had fince his departure feen the Sparran Fleet beaten, and Lyfander the Admirall flaine. The fame man, whole endeavour had brought the Athenians into order by advancing the Sea-forces of the Lacedamonians with money, and all manner of supplies, was now the occasion that the power of Athens grew strong at Sea, when the Citie was dispoyled of her old reputation, & searcely able to maintain an Army by Land for her defence. PharnabaZus considering how much it imported the king his Master, to have the Greeks divided into such satisfies as might utterly disable them from undertaking abroad, thought it the safest way to seeke peace by intreaty and commemoration of old benefits, at their hands, who unprovoked, had fold his love for thirty Talents. To which purpose he furnished Conon the Lysander at Agos-Potamos; giving him the command of a great Navie, wherewith he required the losse received at Agos-Potamos, by repaying the Lacedamonians with the ging with him, partly as the liberality of PharnabaZus, partly as the fruit of his victory Conon sailed to Athens, bring with him, partly as the liberality of PharnabaZus, partly as the fruit of his victory of the Signiory which they had lost.

6. VIII.

of fundry small wittories gotten on each part. The Lacedamonians lose all in Asia; the Athenians recover some part of their old Dominion.

TEvertheleffe, the Lacedæmonians, by many victories at Land, maintained for fome years the honour of their Estate, endangered very greatly by this losse at Sea. For Agesilaus obtained the better with his horse-men from the Thessalians, who were accounted the best riders in Greece. He wasted Boeotia, and fought a great battellat Coronea against the Thebans and their Allies, whom he overthrew; and by his Marshall Gylis forraged the Country of Locris: which done, he returned home. The gain of these victories was not great, & the reputation of them was, by many losles, much defaced. For the Thebans did in the battell of Coronea vanquish the Orchoomenians, who stood opposite unto them, and retired unbroken to Mount Helicon, opening way perforce when Agefilans charged them in the returne from the purfuite. Likewile Gylis was flaine with a great part of his Army by the Locrians; and some other exploits by the Lacedemonians performed against the Corinthians, were repayed with equall daminage received in the parts adjoyning; many Towns being eafily taken, and as ealily recovered. The variety of which enterfeats was fuch, that the Thebans them selves were drawne by the loffe of the haven of Corinth, to fue for peace, but could not get audience, till fuch time as the newes came of agreat victory obtained by Iphicrates, Generall of the Athenian forces at Lechæum; whereupon the Theban Embaffadors being fent for, and willed to doe their meffage, required only in scorne, to have a safe conduct given them, that they might enter into Corinth. From this time forward the War was amade for a while only by incursions, wherein the Acharans, Confederates of Sparta, selt most losse, their whole State being endangered by the Acarnanians, who held with the contrary fide, untill Agefilaus repayed these invaders with equall, or greater calamities, brought upon their owne Lands, which did so afflict the Acarnanes, that they were drivento sue for peace. But the affaires at Sea were of most consequence, upon which the successed for when the Townes of Asia perceived that the Lacedæmohans were not only intangled in an hard War at home, but almost disabled to passe the Seas, having lost their Fleet at Cnidus; they soon gave eare to Pharnaba Zus, who promifolio allow that they should use their own lawes, if they would expell the Spartan Go-Venours. Only the City of Abydus did stand firm, wherein Dercyllidas lay, who did his best to contain all the Townes about Hellespont, in the Alliance of the Lacedæmonians 3 which he could not do, because the Athenian Fleet under Thrasphulus, took in Byzantium, Chalcedon, and other places thereabout, reducing the Ile of Lesbos to their ancitotacknowledgement of Athens.

6. IX'.

The base conditions offered unto the Persian by the Laced emonian. Of fundry fights and other paffages in the Warre. The peace of Antalcidas.

Bout this time the Spartans began to perceive how uneaffea thing it would be to maintaine the War against men as good as themselves, assisted with the treafures of Persia: wherefore they craved peace of Artaxerxes, most basely offering not only to renounce the Greeks inhabiting Afia, and to leave them to the Kingsdis fposition, but withall to set the Ilanders and every Town in Greece, as well the littleas the great, at full and absolute liberty, whereby they said that all the principall Estates of their Country would be so weakened, that no one, nor all of them should be able to slir against the great King. And sure it was, that the power of the Country being sobroken and rent into many finall pieces, could neither have disquieted the Persian, by an offensive War, nor have made any good defence against him, but would have left it casie for him in continuance of time to have taken the Cities one after another, till he had made himselfe Master of all. The Spartans were not ignorant of this, but were so carried with envie, that perceiving how the dominion of the Seas was like to return to Athens, they chose rather to give all from themselves and others, and make all a-like weak, than to permit that any of their owne Nation should grow stronger than themselves, whose 10 lately had commanded all. Yet this great offer was not at the first accepted, both inregard that the other Estates of Greece, who had in the Kings behalfe joyned togetheragainst the Lacedemonians, did by their severall Embassadors oppose themselves unto its and for that it was thought fafeft for Artaxerxes rather to weaken the Lacedamonians yet more, than by interpoling himselfe to bring friends and foes on the sudden to anequality. Especially Struthas, whom Artaxerxes had fent as his Lievtenant into the low-Countries, did feek to repay the harme done by Agestlaus in those parts: which his intent appearing plaine, and all hope of the peace being thereby cut off, Thimbro was fent into Asia to make Warre upon Struthas; and others were appointed to other places, whereby the War being scattered about, all the Iles and Townes on the firme Land, 10 grew almost to the manner of Pyracy and Robbery, affording many skirmishes, but few great actions worthy of remembrance. Thimbro was flain by Struthas, & in his place Diphridas was fent, who demeaned himselfe more warily. Dercylidas was removed from his charge at Abydus, because he had not impeached Thraspbulus in his enterprises about Hellespont; Anaxibius, who succeeded him, was surprised & flain in a skirmish by lphicrates the Athenian. Thrafybulus departing from Lesbos toward Rhodes, was flane by the way at Aspendus. The City of Rhodes had long before joyned with the Lacedamonians, who erected there (as was their manner) an Aristocratic, or the Government of a few the principall Citizens; wheras contrariwise the Athenians were accustomed to put the Soveraignty into the hands of the people, each of them seeking to affure themselves, by erecting in the town of their Confederates a government like unto their own: which doing (where more especiall cause did not hinder) caused the Nobility to favour Sparta, and the Commons to encline to Athens. The people of Ægina roved upon the coaft of Attica, which caused the Athenians to land an Army in Ægina, and befiege their Towne: but this siege being raised by the assistance of the Lacedæmonian sleet, the Ilanders began a-new to molest Attica, which caused the Athenians to man their ships again, that returned beaten, having loft foure of thirteen. The loffe of these ships was soon recompenfed by a victory which Chabrias the Athenian Generall had in Ægina, whereupon the I landers were faine to keep home, and leave to the Athenians the Seas free. It may well feeme strange that the Citie of Athens, having but newly raised her wals; having notby any fortunate and important battell secured her estate from dangers by land, but only depending upon the affiftance of fuch Confederates, as carried unto different ends, had of ten discovered themselves irresolute in the common cause; would send a sleet and an army to Cyprus, in defence of Evagoras, when the mastry of the Seas was so ill assured, that an Iland lying in the cie of Pyracus, had ability to vexe the coast of Attica. But as the over-weening of that City did cause it usually to embrace more than it could compasse; forhe infolency and shamelesse injustice of the people, had now bred in the chief Commanders, a desire to keepe themselves far out of sight, and to seek employments at such distance as might secure them from the eies of the envious, and from publike judgments out of which few or none escaped. For which cause Timotheus did passe away much part of his time in the Ile of Lesbos; Iphicrates in I brace; and Chabrias now did carry away into Cyprus a greater force than his Countrie could well have spared with which he returned not when the businesse in Cyprus came to an end, but sought new adventures in Expt; whereby arose neither thankes to himselfe, nor profit to his Cirie, though honour both to him and it. The Athenians being thus carelesse of things at hand, had a noable blow given unto them, shortly after that Chabrias was gone to Cyprus, even within their owne Haven. For Teleutras, a Laced emonian, being made Governour of Azina, conceived a strong hope of surprizing the Navie of Athens, as it lay in Piraus; thinking a-right that it was an harder matter to encounter with ten ships prepared for the fight. than with twentie lying in harbour, whose Mariners were asleep in their Cabbins, or drinking in Tavernes. Wherefore he failed by night into the mouth of the Port, which entring at the breake of day, he found (according to his expectation) most of the men onshore, and few or none left aboord to make resistance: by which meanes he rooke many ships laden with merchandizes, many sisher-men, passengers, and other Vessels, allo three or foure Gallies; having funke or broken, and made unferviceable, as many of therest as the time would suffer. About this time Pharnaba Zus, the Lievtenant of Phrygia, had one of the Kings daughters given to him in marriage, with whom he lived a-10 bout the Court; and many officers that favoured the Lacedamonians were placed in the lower Asia; by whose assistance the Fleet of Sparta grew victorious about Hedesport; in fuch wife, that perhaps they should not have needed the peace, which they themselves procured by Antalvidas, from the great King, the conditions whereof were fuch as are mentioned before, giving freedome to all the Cities of Greece, and dividing the Countrie into as many severall States as were pettie Boroughes in it. Thus Artaxerxes having bought his owne peace with money, did likewise by his money become Arbitrator and decider of Controversies between the Greeks, disposing of their businesse in such wifeas stood best with his own good. The Tenor of Artaxerxes his decree was, That all Asia and Cyprus should be his own; the Iles of Lemnos, Imbrus, and Scirus be subject to 30 Albens; all other Greeke Towns, as well the little as the great, be fet at libertie; and that wholoever should refuse this peace, upon them the approvers of it should make war, the King assisting them by Land and Sea, with men, and ships, and treasure. The Athenians were so discouraged by their losses at Sea; the Lacedamonians by revolt of their confederates, and the necessitie of maintaining many Garrisons, for which they wanted mony; and other States by the miferies of the war, whereof they faw no end; that all(excepting the Thebans) did consent unto these Articles. This was called the peace of Antalcidas: whereof the Laced amonians taking upon themselves the execution, did not only compell the Argives to depart out of Corinth (which under pretence of defending they held by Garrisons, lately thrust into it, not as Patrons, but as Lords) and the Thebans to leave Ba-40 mia free, of which Province Thebes had alwaies held the government the Thebans themselves being also comprehended under the name of the Baotians; but caused the Mantineans to throw down their own Citie, and to dwell in villages: alledging that they had formerly bin accustomed so to doe, though purposing indeed to chastise them, as having binill affected to Sparta in the late War. By these courses the Laced amonians did hope that all the smaltowns in Greece would, when occasion should require it, willingly follow them in their wars, as Authors of their libertie; and that the great Cities having lost all their dependants, would be unable to make opposition.

6. X.

The war which the Lacedamonians made upon Olynthus. They take Thebesby treason; and Olynthus by famine.

THilest these wars, which ended without either victorie or profit, consumed the riches and power of Greese, the Citie of Olynthus in Thrace was grown so mightie, that she did not only command her neighbour Towns, but was allobecome terrible to places farre removed, and to Sparta it selfe. Great part of Macidenia, together with Pella, the principall Citie of that Kingdome, was taken by the Olynthians; 118

Olanthians, who following the usuall pretence of the Lacedamomans, to fet at libertythe places over which King Amyntas did tyrannize, had almost now driven him out of his Dominions, and taken all to themselves. The Citizens of Acanthus and of Apollonia he. ing nearest unto the danger of those incroaching neighbours, acquainted the Lacede. monians with their feare, affirming that this Dominion of the Olynthians would be too strong for all Greece, if continuance of time should give it reputation, which onely in wanted: wherefore they requested affistance, but in such termes as did found of compul. fion, protesting that either they must warre upon Object unto her. and fight in her defence. Hereupon was made a hastie levie of men, two thousand he. ing prefently fent away, with promife to be seconded by a greater Army. Whilest these two thousand gave such beginning to the warre, as agreed with their small number, the body of the Army following them, surprized the Cittadell of Thebes, which was betrain ed into the hand of Phabidas the Laced amonian, by some of the Magistrates, who sought to strengthen their faction by the flavery of their Country. The Thebans were ill affe. cted to Sparta, but had not in any one point violated the peace lately made between them. which caused the Lacedamonians to doubt whether this act of Phabidas were more wor. thy of reward or of punishment. In conclusion, profit so farre over-weighed honestic. that the deed was approved, many principall Citizens of Thebes condemned to death many driven into banishment, and the Traitors rewarded with the government of thecitiel by whose authoritie, and the force of the Garrison, the Thebans were compelled to 10 ferve the Lacedamonians, in all, and more than all that they could require. This accesse of power having strengthened the Lacedamonians, caused them to entertain the greater forces about Olynthus, which (not with standing the losse of one great battell, and some other difasters) they compelled at length by famine to render it selfe unto their obedience.

6. X I.

How the Thebans recovered their libertie, driving out the Lacedamonian Garrison.

Fter this Olynihian Warre, which endured almost three yeares, it seemed that no Estate in Greece was able to make head against that of Sparta: but it was not long ere the Thebans found a meanes to shake off their yoake, and gave both example and meanes to others to doe the like. One of the banisht men found by conference with a Scribe of the Theban Magistrates, comming to Athens, that the tyrannie wherewith his Countrie was oppressed, pleased him no better than it did those who for seareofit were fled from home. Whereupon a plot was laid betweene thefe two, that some found very good fuccesse, being managed thus. Seven of the banished men for soke Athens privily, and entred by night into the fields of Thebes; where spending the next day fecretly, they came late in the evening to the Gates like husband-men returned from worke, and fo passed undiscovered unto the house of Charon, whom Phyllidas the Scribe 40 had drawne into the conspiracie. The day following, a solemne feast being then held in the Citie, Phyllidas promifed the Governours, who were infolent and luftful men, that he would conveigh unto them that night the most beautifull Dames of the Towne, with whom they should take their pleasure. Having cheared them with such hope, and pleasie of good wine, he told them when the time of performance (which they urged) came, that hee could not make good his promise, unlesse they would dismisse their followers, because the Gentlewomen, who attended without the Chamber, would not endure that any of the servants should see their faces. Upon this occasion the attendants were dilmissed, and the Conspirators, attired like Ladies and their Maides, brought into the place; who taking advantage of the Governours loofe behaviour, flew them all up-50 on the fudden with Daggers, which they brought hidden under their garments. Then presently casting off their disguise, they went to other places, where seigning themfelves to come to the Governours upon businesse, they got admittance, and likewise flew those which were of the Lacedamonian faction. By the like device they brake into the prison, slew the Goaler, & set at liberty such as they thought meet; and being followed by these desperatemen, proclaimed libertie, making the death of the Tyrants known. The Captaine of the Castle hearing the sudden Proclamation, thought the Rebels to be stronger than indeed they were: the Citizens contrariwise mistrusted, that it was a practice to discover such as would be forward upon occasion of revolting. But as soon as day-light revealed the plaine truth, all the people took armes and befreged the Castle, fending halfily to Athens for succour. The Garrison also sent for aide unto the Towns adjoyning, whence a few broken troupes comming to the rescue, were deseated on the way by the horse-men of Thebes. On the other side the banished Thebans did not only make speed to assist their Countrimen, but procured some Athenians to joyn with them. and thereby came fo strong into the Citie, that the Castle was yeelded, more through fearethan any necessitie, upon condition that the Souldiers might quietly depart with their Armes; for which composition the Captaineat his returne to Sparta was put to death. When the newes of the doings at Thebes, and the successe arrived at Sparta, an Armie was raised forth-with, and allthings prepared as earnestly for the recovering of that Citie, as if some part of their ancient inheritance had bin taken from the Laced amonians. and not a town perfidiously usurped by them, restored to her own libertie. Cleombrotus, one of the Kings, was fent on this expedition, who having wearied his followers with a rollfome Winters journie, returned home without any good or harm done; leaving Sphodrias, with part of his Armie, at Thefpies, to infest the Thebans : who doing them some displeasures, made large amends by a foolish attempt upon the Haven of Asbens, which filling to take, he wasted the countrie adjoyning, and drave away Cattell, causing by this outrage the Ashenians to enter with all their power into the war, out of which they were he hefore very carefully feeking how they might possibly with-draw themselves.

CHAP-12. S.I. of the History of the World.

CHAP. XII.

Of the flourishing estate of Thebes, from the battell of Leuctra, to the battell of Mantinæa.

How Thebes and Athens joyned together against Sparta. How the Athenians made peace for themselves, and others, out of which the Thebans were excluded. The battell of Leuctra, and beginning of the I heban greatneffe.

He Lacedamonians were men of great resolution, and of much gravitie in all their proceedings; but one dishonourable rule they held, That all respects withstanding the commodity of Sparta were to be neglected; the practice of which doctrine, even by the best and wisest of them, did greatly blemish that Estate: but when it was put in execution by infufficient over-weening men, it feldom failed to bring upon them in stead of profit unjustly expected, both shame and losse. And so it befell them in these enterprises of Phabidas, upon the Castle of Thebes, and Sphodrias upon the Pireus. For, how foever Agefilaus did spoyle the Countrie about Thebes, in which he ipent two Summers, yet the diligence of the Thebans repaired all, who by the good fucceffe of some attempts, grew stronger than they were at the first.

The Athenians likewise began to looke abroad, sayling to the Isle of Coreyra, where they ordered things at their pleasure, and having in some fights at Sea prevailed, began, Winthe Peloponnesian Warre, to surround Peloponnesia with a Navie; afflicting so the Lacedamonians, that had not the Thebans by their insolencie wearied their friends, and caused them to seeke for peace, it had bin very likely that the end of this warre, should have soone come to a good end, which neverthelesse, being prosequuted by the Thebans (who opposed at once both these two great Estates) lest the Citic of Sparta as much dejected, as the beginning found it proud and tyrannous. But the Askenians perceiving how Thebes encroached every day upon her weake Neighbours, not sparing fuch as had bin dependants upon Athens, and finding themselves, whilest engaged in fuch a war, unable to relieve their complaining friends, resolved to settle the affaires of Greece, Greece, by renewing that form of peace which Antalcidas had brought from the Persian. Wherefore they fent Messengers to Thebes, peremptorily signifying, That it was their intent to finish the War, to which purpose they willed the Thebans to send Embassdors along with them to Sparta; who readily condescended, fearing otherwise that they should be left out of the Treatie of peace: which came to passe, being so wrought by the courageous wisdome of Epaminondas, who understood far better than his Countrimen what was to be feared or hoped. In this Treatie the Lacedamonians and Athenians die foon agree; but when the Thebans offered to sweare to the Articles in the name of the Bastians; Azefilans required them to swear in their own name, and to leave the Bastians free, whom they had lately reduced under their obedience. Whereunto Epaminondas, made answer, That the Citie of Sparta should give example to Thebes by setting the Laconians free; for that the Signorie of Baotia did by as good right appertain to the Thebans as that of Laconia to the Spartans. This was well and truely spoken; but was heard with no parience: For Agefilaus bearing a vehement harred unto those of Thebes, by whom he was drawn back out of Afia into Greece, and disappointed of all the glory which he had hoped to atchieve by the Persian war, did now passionately urge that point of setting the Baotians at libertie; & finding it as obstinately refused, he dasht the name of the Thebans out of the league. At the fame time Cleombrotus the other King of Sparta, lay in Phocis. who received command from the Governours of Sparta forthwith to enter upon the Land of the Thebans with all his power; which he did, and was there flain at Leudra, and 20 with him the flower of his Armie. This battell of Leuttra, being one of the most famous that ever were fought between the Greeks, was not so notable for any circumstance foregoing it, or for the managing of the fight it felf, as for the death of the King, and many citizens of Sparta, but especially, for that after this battell (between which and the conclufion of the general peace there passed but twenty daies) the Lacedamonians were neverable to recover the ftrength and reputation which had formerly made them redoubted far and near; whereas contrariwise the Thebans, whose greatest ambition had informer times confined it selfe unto the little Region of Baotia, did now begin to undertake the leading & command of many people & estates, in such wise, that soon after they brought an Armie of threescore and ten thousand strong unto the Gates of Sparta. So muchdoe 30 the afflictions of an hard war, valiantly endured, advance the affairs of the diffressed, and guide them into the way of conquest, by stiffening that resolution with a manly temper, which wealth and ease had through luxurie, retchlesnesse, and many other vices or vanities, made rustie and effeminate.

6. II.

How the Athenians took upon them to maintain the peace of Greece. New troubleshence arifing. Epiminondas invadeth and wasteth the Territorie of Lacedamon.

He Athenians refusing to take advantage of this overthrow fallen upon their 40 old Enemies, and new Confederates the Lacedamonians; did nevertheleffe finely give them to understand, that their Dominion was expired, and therefore their pride might well be laid away. For taking upon themselves the maintenance of the peace lately concluded, which Agesilans (perhaps of purpose to make benefit of quarrels that might arise) had left unperfect, they assembled the Deputies of all the Estates confederated at Athens; where the generall libertie of all Towns, as well small as great, was ratified under the stile of the Athenians, and their Associates. Hereupon began fresh garboiles. The Mantineans, claiming power by this decree to order their affairs at their own pleasure, did(as it were) in despight of the Spartans, who had enforced them to raze their Town, re-edifie it, and allie themselves with such of the Arcadians as stood worst 50 affected to Sparta. The Arcadians, a strong Nation, consisting of many Cities, were diftracted with factions; some defiring to hold good correspondency with the Laced emonians; some to weaken and keep them low; yet all pretending other ends. The Lacedamonians durst not give impeachment to the Mantinaans, nor take upon them to correct their ill-willers among the Arcadians, till fuch time as the factions brake out into violence, and each part called-in forraine help. Then was an Armie sent from Sparta, as it were indefence of the people of Tegea, against the Mantineans, but indeed against them both. Agefilam had the leading of it, but effected nothing. The Thebans had by this time subdued the Phocians, and were become head of the Locrians, Acarnanians, Eubaans, and many others; with the power of which Countries they entred Peloponness in favour of the Arcadians, who had, upon expectation of their comming, abstained from giving battell to Agesilans. The Armie of the Spartans being dismissed, and Epaminondas joy ned with the Arcadians; the Region of Laconia was invaded and spoiled: a thing so strange, that no Oracle could have found beliefe if any had foretold it. Almost 600. yeares were spent, fince the Dorians, under the posteritie of Hercules, had seized upon Laconia, in all which time the found of an enemies trumpet was not heard in that Countrie. Ten yeares were not fully past, fince all Greece was at the devotion of the Spartans: but now the Region 10 which neither Xerxes with his huge Armie could once looke upon, nor the mightie forces of Athens, and other enemie-States had dared to fet foot on, faving by stealth, was all onalight fire, the very smoake whereof the women of Sparta were ashamed to behold. All which indignitie notwithstanding, the Laced amonians did not issue out of Sparta to fight, but fought how to preserve the Town, setting at libertie as many of their Heilotes or Slaves as were willing to beare Arms in defence of the State, and somewhat pitifully entreated the Athenians to give them succour. From Corinth and some towns of Peloponnelluthey received speedie affistance; the Athenians came forward more flowly, so that Enaminondas returned without battell, having re-builded the Citie of Messene, and peopledit a-new by calling home the ancient inhabitants, whom the Laced amonians many ages before had chased away to other Countries, possessing their Territories themselves.

§. III.

The Composition betweene Athens and Sparta for command in warre against the Thebans 3 who agains invade and spoyle Peloponness. The unfortunate presumption of the Arcadians.

His journey therefore utterly defaced the reputation of the Spartans, in such wise, that they did no longer demand the conduct of the Armie, which was to be raised, nor any manner of precedence: but sending Embassadours from Spar-, ta, and from all the Cities which held league with it, unto Athens, they offered to yeeld the Admiraltie to the Athenians, requesting that they themselves might be Generals by Land. This had beeene a composition well agreeing with the situation and qualitie of thosetwo Cities; but it was rejected, because the Mariners and others that were to be imployed at Sea, were men of no marke or estimation, in regard of those companies of horseand foot, whereof the Land-Armie was compounded, who being all Gentlemen or Citizens of Athens, were to have served under the Lacedamonians. Wherefore it was agreed that the Authoritie should be divided by time, the Athenians ruling five daies, the Lacid emonians other five, and so successively that each of them should have command of all, both by Land and by Sea. It is manifest, that in this conclusion vaine ambition was none regarded than the common profit; which must of necessitie be very slowly advanced, where confultation, refolution, and performance are so often to change hands. This appeared by a second invasion of Peloponnesw, wherein the Thebans found their enemies founable to impeach them, that having fortified Islbmus from Sea to Sea, as in former times they had done against Xerxes, they were driven out of their strength by Epaminondas, who forraged the Countrie without refistance. But as the Articles of this league betweene Athens and Sparta did, by dividing the conduct in fuch manner, disable the focitie, and make it insufficient to those ends for which it was concluded; so the example ofit wrought their good, by filling the enemies heads with the like vanitie. For the Arcadians confidering their owne numbers which they brought into the field, and having o found by many trials that their people were not inferiour to others in strength of bodie, in courage, or in good Souldiership, thought it good reason that they should in like manner thare the government, with their friends the Thebans; and not alwaies continue followers of others, by increasing whose greatnesse they should strengthen their owne yoke. Hereupon they began to demeane themselves very insolently, whereby they grew hatefull to their Neighbours, and suspected of the Thebans in an ill time. For, a motion of generall peace having bin made (which tooke not effect, because the Citie of Messene was not abandoned to the Lacedamonians) the next enterprise of the Spartans and their friends was upon these Areadians, who relying too much upon their own worth, were overthrown in a great battell, their calamitie being as pleafing to their Confederates, as to their Enemics.

§. IV.

The great growth of the ThebanEstate. Embassages of the Greeks to the Persian, with the reasons why he most favoured the Thebans. Troubles in the Persian Empire. The fruitlesse is such that Embassages.

He Thebans especially rejoyced at the Arcadians misfortune, considering, that without their aide, the successe of all enterprises proved soill; whereas they themselves had by their owne power accomplished very well whatsoever they tooke in hand, and were become not onely victorious over the Lacedamonians, but patrons over the The Salonians, and moderators of the great quarrels that had rifen in Macedonia; where compounding the differences about that Kingdome, as pleased them best-they carried Philip the son of Amyntas, and father of Alexander the Great, as an Hostage unto Thebes. Having therefore obtained such reputation, that little seemed wanting to make them absolute Commanders of all Greece, they sought meanes of alliance with the Persian King, to whom they sent Embassadour the great and famous Captain Pelopidas, whose reputation drew Artaxerxes to grant unto the Thebans all that they defired; whereof two especiall points were, That Messene should remaine free from the Lacedamonians, and that the Athenians should forbeare to send their ships of warre to Sea; only the latter of these two was somwhat qualified with reference to further advice. The other States of Greece did also send their Embassadours at the same time, of whom sew or none received much contentment. For the king having found by long experience, how farre it concerned him to mantaine a fure partie in Greece, did upon many weightie confiderations refolve to binde the Thebans firmely unto him; justly expecting, that their greatnesse should be onthat side his owne securitie. The Athenians had beene ancient enemics to his Crowne; and having turned the profit of their victories upon the Persian to the purchase of a great Estate in Greece, maintained their Signorie in such puissant manner, that (fundrie grievous misfortunes notwithstanding) they had endured aterrible 30 warre, wherein the Lacedamonians being followed by most of the Greeks, and supplied with treasure, and all forts of aide by Darius Nothus; were not able to vanquish them, till their owne indifcretion brought them on their knees. The Laced amonians being victorious over Athens, had no fooner established their Dominion at home, than they undertooke the conquest of Asia, from which though by the commotion raised in Greece with Persian gold, they were called backe, yet having renewed their power, and settled things in Greece, it was not unlikely, that they should upon the next advantage have pursued the same enterprise, had not they beene empeached by this Theban Warre. But the Thebans contrariwise had alwayes discovered a good affection to the Crown of Perfia. They had fided with Xerxes in his invafion of Greece; with Darius and the La- 40 cedamonians against Athens: And finally, having offered much contumelieto Agesidans when he put to Sea, they drew him home by making warre on the Confederates of Sparta. Besides all these their good deservings, they were no Sea-men, and therefore unlikely to looke abroad; whereupon if perchance they should have any defire, yet were they disabled by the want of good haven townes; which they could not seize upon without open breach of that peace, whereof they intended to become the Executors, giving libertie to all Cities that had at any time been free. Wherefore Artaxerxes did wholly condescend unto the requests of Pelopidas, as farre forth as he might, without giving open defiance to the rest of Greece; and by that meane he purchased his owne quiet, being never afterward molested by that Nation in the lower Asa. The ills meanes which the Greekes had to disturbe Artaxerxes, was very beneficiall to the Estate of Persa shortly after these times, in that great rebellion of all the Maritimate Provinces. For had then the affaires of Greece beene lo composed, that any one Citie might without empeachment of the rest have transported an Armie to affist the revolting Satrapa, or Vice-royes of Caria, Phrygia, Lydia, Mysia, Lycia, Pisidia, Pamphilia, Cilicia, Syria, & Phamicia; humane reason can hardly find the means, by which the Empire could have been preserved from that ruine, which the divine Counsell had deferred unto the dayes of Alexander. But this great conspiracie of so many large and wealthie Provinces, wanting a firme body of good and hardy Souldiers, was in short space discussed, and vanished like a mist, without effect: these effeminate Assatiques wearied quickly with the travels and dangers incident to War, for faking the common cause, and each man striving to be the first, that by treason to his company should both redeeme the former treason to his Prince, and purchase withall his own promotion with encrease of riches. Of this commotion, which in course of time followed some actions not as yet related, I have rather chosen to make short mention in this place, than hereafter to interrupt the Narration of things more important; but for that it was like a fudden ftorme, rashly commenced, idlely followed, and foolishly layd downe, having made a great noy se without effect, and having small reference to any other action regardable; as also because in the whole reigne 10 of Artaxerxes, from the Warre of Cyrus to the invasion of Egypt, I find nothing (this infurrection, and a fruitlesse journey against the Cadusians excepted) worthy of any mention much leffe of digression from the course of the businesse in Greece. All, or the most of his time passed away so quietly, that he enjoyed the pleasures which an Empire so great and wealthy could affoord unto fo absolute a Lord, with little disturbance. The troubles which he found were only or chiefly Domesticall; growing out of the hatred which Parilatis the Queen-Mother bare unto his wife Statira, and to fuch as had been the greatest enemies to her fonne Cyrus, or gloried in his death: upon whom, when by poyfon and mischievous practices she had fatisfied her feminine appetite of revenge, thenceforth she wholly applyed her felfe to the Kings disposition, cherishing in him the lewd defire of marrying his own Daughter, and filling him with the perswasion, which Princes not endued with an especiall grace, doe readily entertain: That his owne will was the supreme law of his fubjects, & the rule by which all things were to be measured and adjudged to begood or evill. In this imaginary happineffe Pelopidas, and the other Embaffadors of greet, both found & left him but left him by fo much more affured than they found him. by how much the conclusion of his Treaty with them, being altogether to his owneadvantage, did seeme to promise, if not the perpetuity, a long endurance of the same felicityto him & his or (at the leaft) a full fecurity of danger from Greece, whence only could any danger be feared. But such foundations of eternity layd by mortall men in this tran-30 fitory world, like the Tower of Babel, are either shaken from heaven, or made vaine and emprofitable, ere the frame can be raifed to full height, by confusion of tongues among the builders. Hereof was found a good example in the Thebans, & other Estates of Greece that had fent Embaffadors to the Persian. For whereas it had been concluded, that all Townes, as well the little as the great, should be fet at liberty, and the Thebans made Proteffors of this common peace, who thereby should become the Judges of all controverfles that might arife, and Leaders in War of all that would enter into this Confederacy; the Kings letters being folemnly published at Thebes, in the presence of Embassadors, drawne thither from all parts of Greece; when an oath was required for observation of the forme of peace therein set downe, a dilatory answer was made by the Embassadors, 40 who faid, that they were fent to heare the articles, notto fweare unto them. Hereby the Thebans were driven to fend unto each of the Cities to require the Oath; But in vaine. For when the Corinthians had boldly refused it, saying, that they did not need it; others took courage by their example to doe the like, disappointing the Thebans of their glorious hopes, to whom this negotiation with Artaxerxes gave neither addition nor confirmation of greatnesse, but left them as it found them to relye upon their own swords.

§. V.

10 How all Greece was divided between the Athenians and Lacedemonians on the one side, and Thebans on the other. Of the great tumults rising in Arcadia.

He condition of things in Greece at that time did stand thus. Athens and Sparta, which in former times had commanded all that Nation, and each upon envie of the others greatnessed drawne all their followers into a cruell intestine Warre, by which the whole Countrie, and especially the Estate of these two Cities, was brought very low, did now conjoin their forces against the Thebans, who sought to make themselves Lords of all. The Eleans, Corinthians, & Achaians, followed the party of these ancient governing Cities; either for the old reputation of them, & benefits received, or in the little of the diflike of those, who by strong hand were readie to become Rulers, to which authoritie they could not fuddenly afpire without fome injurie and much envie. The Citie of Thebes abounding with men, whom necessitie had made warlike, and many victories in few years had filled with great spirits; and being so mightie in dependants, that she had reduced all the continent of Greece without Peloponnessus (the Region of Attica, and very little part befide excepted) under fuch acknowledgement, as wanted not much of meere Vaffallage, did hope to bring all Peloponness to the like obedience, wherein alreadie the had fet good footing by her conjunction with the States of Argos, and of Arcadia. The Argives had beene alwayes bad Neighbours to the Spartans, to whom they thought themselves in ancient Nobilitie Superiours, but were farre under them in valour, having beene often beaten out of the field by them, and put indanger of lofingall: which caused them to suspect and envie nothing more than the greatnesse and honour of Sparta, taking truce with her when she was at rest, and had leasure to bend her whole force against them; but firmely joyning with her enemies whensoever they found her entangled in a difficult warre. As the Argives were, in hatred of Sparta, fure friends of Thebes, fo the Arcadians, transported with a great opinion of their owne worthingse had formerly renounced and provoked against them their old Confederates & Leaders. the Laced amonians, and were now become very doubtfull adherents to the Thebans. In which regard it was thought convenient by Epaminondas, and the State of Thebes, to fend an Armie into Peloponue fus, before such time as these wavering friends should fall fur-20 ther off and become either Neutrall, or, which was to be feared, open enemies. And furely great cause there was to suspect the worst of them, considering that without consent of the Thebans, they had made peace with Athens; which was very strange, and seemed no leffe to the Athenians themselves, who holding a firme league with Sparta at the same time when the Arcadian's treated with them, did nevertheleffe accept this new Confede. racie, not relinquishing the old because they found that how soever these Arcadians were enemies to the Laced amonians, they should hereby be drawn som what further from their alliance with Thebes, which without them was unlikely to invade Peloponness with a ftrong Armie. But this did rather haften, than by any meanes ftay the comming of Epsminondas; who finding the way fomewhat more cleare for him (because the Citie of Co. 20 rinth, which lay upon the Isthmus, and had been adverse to Thebes, was now, by miseries of this grievous warre, driven to become Neutrall) tooke occasion hereby, and by fome diforders among the Arcadians, to vifit Peleponnesus with an Armie, confishing of all the power of Thebes. A great turnult had rifen in Arcadia about confecrated money, which many principall men among them had laid hands on, under pretence of imploying it to publike uses. In compounding the differences growne upon this occasion, such as had least will to render account of the mony which had come into their hands, procured the Captaine of some Theban Souldiers, lying in Tegea, to take prisoners many of their Countrimen, as people defirous of innovation. This was done: but the up-roare thereby caused was so great, that the prisoners were forth-with enlarged, and the Area-40 dians, who had in great numbers taken Armes, with much a-doe scarce pacified. When complaint of the Captaines proceedings came to Thebes, Epaminondas turned all the blame upon them, who had made the peace with Athens, letting them know, that he would be shortly among them, to judge of their fidelitie, by the assistance which they should give him, in that war which he intended to make in Peloponnefus. These Lordly words did greatly amaze the Arcadians; who needing not the aide of so mighty a power as he drew along with him, did vehemently suspect that great preparation to be made against themselves. Hereupon such of them as had before sought means to settle the affairs of their Countrie, by drawing things to some good conclusion of peace, did now forthwith fend to Athens for help, and withall dispatched some of the principall among them 50 as Embassadours to Sparta, by whom they offered themselves to the common defence of Peloponnesus, now readie to be invaded. This Embassage brought much comfort to the Lacedamonians, who feared nothing more than the comming of Epaminondas, against whom they well knew, that all their forces, and best provisions, would be no more than very hardly fufficient. Forbearing therefore to dispute about prerogatives, they (who had beene accustomed unto such a supremacie, as they would in no wife communicate with the powerfull Citie of Athens, till other hope of fecuring their owne estate could not be thought upon) did now very gently yeeld to the Arcadians, that the command of the Armie in chiefe, should be given, for the time, to that Citiein whose Territorie it lay.

§. VI.

A terrible invasion of Peloponnesus by Epaminondas.

Ertaine it is, that the condition of things did at that time require a very firm confent, and uniform care of the common fafetie. For, befide the great forces raised out of the other parts of Greece, the Argives and Messenians prepared with all their frength to joyn with Epaminondas; who having lien a while at Nemes, to intercept the Athenians, received their intelligence, that the Armie comming from Athens would passe by Sea, whereupon he dislodged, and came to Tegea, which Citie, and the most of all Ar. cadia besides, forthwith declared themselves his. The common opinion was, that the first attempt of the Thebans, would be upon fuch of the Arcadians as had revolted; which caufed the Lacedamonian Captaines to fortifie Mantinea with all diligence, and to fend for Agesslam to Sparta, that he bringing with him all that small force of able men which remained in the Towne, they might be strong enough to abide Epaminondas there. But Epaminondas held so good espiall upon his Enemies, that had not an unknowne fellow no brought hasty advertisement of his purpose to Azesilans, who was then well onward in theway to Mantinaa, the Citie of Sparta had fuddenly bin taken. For thither with all speed and secrecie did the Thebans march, who had surely carried the Citie, notwith standing any defence that could have bin made by that handfull of men remaining within it; but that Age filam in all flying haste got into it with his companies, whom the Armie of his Confederates followed thither to the rescue as fast as it was able. The arrival of the Lacedamonians and their friends, as it cut off all hope from Epaminondas of taking Sparta, foit presented him with a faire advantage upon Mantinea. It was the time of Harvest, which made it very likely, that the Mantineans, finding the war to be carried from their wals into another quarter, would use the commodity of that vacation, by fetching in their o corn, and turning out their cattell into the fields, whilest no enemie was neere that might empeach them. Wherefore he turned away from Spartato Mantinaa, sending his horsemen before him, to seize upon all that might be found without the Citie. The Mantineans (according to the expectation of Epaminondas) were scattered abroad in the country, far more intent upon their harvest businesse, than upon the war, whereof they were secure, as thinking themselves out of distance. By which presumption it sell out, that great numbers of them, and all their Cattell, being unable to recover the Town, were in a desperate case; and the town it selse in no great likelihood of holding out, when the enemie should have taken all their provision of victuals, with somany of the people as had not over-deerly bin redeemed, by that Cities returning to focietie with Thebes. But at the o fametime, the Athenians comming to the succour of their Confederates, whom they thought to have found at Mantinea, were very earnestly entreated by the Citizens to refine their goods, & people, from the danger whereinto they were fallen, if it were posfible by any courageous adventure to deliver those who otherwise were given as lost. The Thebans were knowne at that time to be the best Souldiers of all the Greeks, and the commendation of good horsemanship had alwaies bin given to the Thessalians, as exceling in that qualitie all other Nations, yet the regard of honour fo wrought upon the Athenians, that for the reputation of their Citie, which had entred into this war upon no necessitie of her own, but only in defire of relieving her distressed friends, they issued forth of Mantin &a, not abiding fo long as to refresh themselves, or their horses with meats and giving a lustie charge upon the enemie, who as bravely received them, after a long & hot fight, they remained mafters of the field, giving by this victorie a fafe and eafie retrait to all that were without the walls. The whole power of the Baotians arrived in the place soon after this battell, whom the Laced emonians and their assistants were not far

6. VII.

The great battell of Mantinea. The honourable death of Epaminondas, with his commendation.

Paminondas confidering that his Commission was almost now expired, and that his attempts of surprizing Sparts and Mantinea having failed, the impression of rerrour which his name had wrought in the Peloponnesians, would soon vanish, unless by some notable act he should abate their courage in their first growth, & leave some memorable character of his expedition; refolved to give them battell, whereby he reafonably hoped both to settle the doubtfull affections of his own Associats, and to leave the Spartans as weak in spirit and abilitie, as he found them, if not wholly to bring them into subjection. Having therefore warned his men to prepare for that battell, wherein vi-Crorie should be rewarded with Lordship of all Greece; and finding the alacritic of his Souldiers to be such as promised the accomplishment of his own defire; he made shew of declining the enemie, and intrenching himselfe in a place of more advantage, that so by taking from them all expectation of fighting that day, he might allay the heat of their valour, and afterward strike their senses with amazement, when he should come upon them unexpected. This opinion deceived him not. For with very much tumult, as in fo great and fudden a danger, the enemie ran to Arms, necessitie enforcing their resolution, and the 20 consequence of that dayes service urging them to doe as well as they might. The Theban Armie confisted of thirtie thousand foot, and three thousand horse; the Lacedamenians and their friends were short of this number, both in horse and in foot, by a third part. The Mantin aans (because the war was in their Countrie) stood in the right wing, and with them the Lacedemonians: the Athenians had the left wing; the Acheans, Eleans, and others of leffe account, filled the bodie of the Armie. The Thebans stood in the left wing of their own battell, opposite to the Lacedamonians, having by them the Arcadians, the Eubwans, Locrians, Sicyonians, Messenians, and Thessalians with others, compounding the main battell; the Argives held the right wing; the horse-men on each part were placed in the flanks, only a troupe of the Eleans were in reare. Before the footmen 20 could joyn, the encounter of the horse on both sides was very rough, wherein finally the Thebans prevailed, notwithstanding the valiant refistance of the Athenians: who not yeelding to the enemie either in courage or skill, were overlayd with numbers, and so beaten upon by Thessalian slings, that they were driven to forsake the place, and leave their infanterie naked. But this retrait was the leffe difgracefull, because they kept themfelves together, and did not fall back upon their owne foot-men; but finding the Thebas horse to have given them over, and withall discovering some Companies of soot, which had bin sent about by Epaminondas, to charge their battell in the reare, they brake upon them, routed them, and hewed them all in pieces. In the mean season the battell of the Athenians had not only to doe with the Argives, but was hardly pressed by the Theban 40 Horsemen, in such wise that it began to open, and was ready to turn back, when the Elean squadron of Horse came up to the reliefe of it, and restored all on that part. With farre greater violence did the Laced amonians and Thebans meet, these contending for Dominion, the other for the maintenance of their ancient honour; fo that equal courage and equall losse on both sides made the hope and appearance of victorie to either equally doubtfull: unlesse perhaps the Lacedamonians being very firmeabiders, might seeme the more likely to prevaile, as having borne the first brunt and furie of the on-set, which was not hitherto remitted; and being framed by discipline, as it wereby Nature, to excell in patience, whereof the Thebans, by practice of a few yeares, cannot be thought to have gotten a habite fo fure and general I. But Epaminondas perceiving the 5 obstinate stiffenesse of the Enemies to be such, as neither the bad successe of their owne horse, nor all the force of the Bæotian Armie, could abate so farre, as to make them give one foot of ground: taking a choice companie of the most able men, whom he cast into the forme of a Wedge, or Diamond, by the advantage of that figure against a square dron, and by his owne exceeding vertue, accompanied with the great strength and refolution of them which followed him, did open their ranckes, and cleave the whole battell in despight of all resistance. Thus was the honour of that day won by the Thebans, who may justly be faid to have carried the victorie, seeing that they remained Malters of the ground whereon the battell was fought, having driven the Enemie to lodge farther off. For that which was alledged by the Athenians, as a token that the victorie was partto theirs, the flaughter of those Mercenaries upon whom they lighted by chance in their own flight, finding them behind their Armie, and the retaining of their dead bodies; it was accremonie regardable only among the Greeks, and ferved meerly for oftentation, shewinothat by the fight they had obtained somewhat, which the enemie could not get from them otherwise than by request. But the Thebans arrived at the generall immediate end of battell; none daring to abide them in the field: whereof a manifest confession is expresfedfrom them, who forfake the place which they had chosen or accepted, as indifferent fortriall of their abilitie and prowesse. This was the last worke of the incomparable yerthe of Epaminondas, who being in the head of that Warlike troupe of men, which broke the Lacedamonian efquadron, and forced it to give back in difaray, was furioufly charged on the sudden, by a desperate Companie of the Spartans, who all at once threw their Darts at him alone; whereby receiving many wounds, henevertheleffe with a fingular courage maintained the fight, using against the enemies many of their Darts, which he drew out of his owne bodie; till at length by a Spartan, called Anticrates, he received fo violenta Broke with a Dart, that the wood of it brake, leaving the yron and a peece of the trunchion in his breast. Hereupon he sunk down, and was soon conveyed out of the fight by his friends; having by his fall somewhat animated the Spartans (who fain would have got his bodie, but much more inflamed with revengefull indignation, the Thebans who raging at this heavie mischance, did with great slaughter compell their disordered enemies to leave the field; though long they followed northe chase, being wearied more with the sadnesse of this disaster, than with all the travell of the day. Epaminondas being brought into his Tent, was told by the Physicians, that when the head of the Dart should bedrawn out of his bodie, he must needs dye. Hearing this he called for his shield, which to have lost, was held a great dishonour: It was brought unto him. He bad them tell him which part had the victorie; answer was made, that the Baotians had won the field. Then faidhe, It is faire time for me to dye; and withall fent for Iolidas and Diophantes, two principall men of War, that were both flain; which being told him, He advised the Thebans to make peace, whileft with advantage they might, for that they had none left that was able to discharge the office of a General. Herewithall he willed, that the head of the weapon should be drawn out of his body, comforting his friends that lamented his death, and want of iffue, by telling them, that the victories of Leudra and Mantinaa were two faire daughters, in whom his memorie should live.

CHAP.12. S.7. of the History of the World.

Sodied Epaminondas, the worthiest man that ever was bred in that Nation of Greece, andhardly to be matched in any Age or Countrie: for he equalled all others in the feverall vertues, which in each of them were fingular. His Justice and Sinceritie, his Temperance, Wisedome, and high Magnanimitie, were no way inferior to his Militarie vertue; in every part whereof he so excelled, that he could not properly be called a Ware,a Valiant, a Politique, a Bountifull, or an industrious, and a Provident Captaine. Neither was his private Conversation unanswerable to those high parts, which gave him praiseabroad. For he was Grave, and yet very Affable and Courteous; resolute in publque businesse, but in his owne particular easie, and of much mildenesse: a lover of his People, bearing with mens infirmities, wittie and pleasant in speech, far from insolence, Master of his own affections, and furnished with all qualities that might win and keepe love. To these graces were added great abilitie of bodie, much Eloquence, and very deep mowledge in all parts of Philosophie and Learning, wherewith his minde being enlightened, rested not in the sweetnesse of Contemplation, but brake forth into such effects as gave unto Thebes, which had ever-more bin an underling, a dreadfull reputation among all people adjoyning, and the highest command in Greece.

6. VIII.

Of the peace concluded in Greece after the battell of Mantinea. The voyage of Agesilaus into Egypt. His death, and qualities; with an examination of the comparison made betweene him and Pompey the Roman.

His battell of Mantinea was the greatest that had ever beene fought in that Countrie between the Naturals; and the last. For at Marathon, and Plataa, the populous Armies of the barbarous Nations gave rather a great fame, than hard triall to the Grecian valour; neither were the practice of Armes and Art Militarie, fo perfect in the beginnings of the Peloponnesian Warre, as long continuance and daily exercise had now made them. The times following produced no actions of worth or moment, those excepted which were undertaken against forraine enemies, proving for the most part unfortunate. But in this last fight all Greece was interessed, which never had more able Souldiers, and brave Commanders, nor ever contended for victorie with great ter care of the successe, or more obstinate resolution. All which not with standing the if. fue being such as hath bin related, it was found best for every particular Estate, that generall peace should be established, every one retaining what he presently had, and none being forced to depend upon another. The Messerians were by name comprised in this new league; which caused the Lacedamonians not to enter into it. Their standing out, hindred not the rest from proceeding to conclusion, considering that Sparta was nowton weake to offend her Neighbours, and therefore might well be allowed to shew thatanger in ceremonies, which had no power to declare it felfe in execution. This peace, as it gave fome breath and refreshing to all the Countrey, so to the Cities of Albus and Sparta it afforded leafure to feeke after wealth by forraine employment in Egypt, whis ther Agesilans was sent with some small forces to assist, or indeed, as a Mercenarie to ferve under Tachos King of Egypt in his warre upon Syria. Chabrias the Athenian, who had before commanded under Acoris King of Egypt, went now as a voluntarie, with fuch forces as he could raife, by entreatie, and offer of good pay, to the fame fervice. These Egyptian Kings descended from Amyrtaus of Sais, who rebelled against Darius to Nothus, having retained the Countrey, notwithstanding all intestine differtions, and forraine invalions, during three Generations of their owne race, were fo well acquainted with the valour of the Greekes, that by their helpe (eafily procured with gold) they conceived great hope, not onely to affure themselves, but to become Lords of the Provinces adjoyning, which were held by the Persian. What the issue of this great enterprise might have been, had it not fallen by Domesticall rebellion, it is uncertaine. But yery likely it is, that the rebellion it felfe had foon come to nothing if Agefilass had not proved a false Traitor, joyning with Nettanebus, who rose against his Prince, and helping the Rebell with that Armie which the mony of Tachos had waged. This falshood Agefilans excused, astending to the good of his own Country, though it seeme rather, that 40 he grudged because the King tooke upon himselfe the conduct of the Armie, using his fervice onely as Lievtenant, who had made full account of being appointed the Generall. How foever it came to passe, Tachos being shamefully betrayed by them, in whom he had reposed his chiefe confidence, fled unto the Persian, who upon his submission gave him gentle entertainment; and Nettanebus (who feemes to have beene the Nephew of Tachos) reigned in his stead. At the same time the Citizens of Mendes had set up another King; to whom all, or most of the Egyptians yeelded their obedience. But Agefilaus fighting with him in places of advantage, prevailed fo far, that he left Netlanebus in quiet possession of the Kingdome; who in recompence of his treason to the former King Tachos, and good service done to himselfe, rewarded him with two hun-5 dred and thirtie Talents of filver, with which bootie failing homewards, hedied by the way. He was a Prince very temperate, and valiant, and a good Leader in Warre, free from covetousnesse, and not reproached with any blemish of lust; which praises are the leffe admirable in him, for that the discipline of Sparts was such as did endue every one of the Citizens (not carried away by the violent streame of an ill nature) with all, or the chiefe of these good qualities. He was neverthelesse very arrogant, perverse, unjust and vaine-glorious, measuring all things by his owne will, and obstinately profecuting those courses, whose ends were beyond hope. The expedition of Xenophon had filled him with an opinion, that by his hand the Empire of Persia should be overthrown; with which conceit being transported, and finding his proceedings interrupted by the Thebans and their Allies, he did ever after bear such hatred unto Thebes, as compelled that Estate by meere necessitie to grow war-like, and able, to the utter dishonour of Sparta and the irrepairable losse of all her former greatness. The commendations given to him by Xenothe his good friend, have caused Plutarch to lay his name in the ballance against Pompey the Great; whose actions (the solemne gravitie of carriage excepted) are very disproporrionable. Yet we may truely fay, That as Pompey made great warres under fundry Climates and in all the Provinces of the Roman Empire, exceeding in the multitude of implayments all that were before him; fo Agefiland had at one time or other some quarrell with every Towne in Greece, had made a Warre in Asia, and meddled in the businesse of the Egyptians, in which varietie he went beyond all his Predecessours: yet not winning and Countries, as Pompey did many, but obtaining large wages, which Pompey never moke. Hereinalso they were very like; Each of them was the last great Captain which his Nation brought forth in time of libertie, and each of them ruined the libertie of his Countrie by his owne Lordly wilfulnesse. We may therefore well say, Similia magis omnia quam paria; The refemblance was neerer than the equalitie. Indeed the freedome of Rome was lost with Pompey, falling into the hands of Cafar, whom he had inforced to take Armes; yet the Roman Empire stood, the form of Government onely being changed: But the libertie of Greece, or of Sparsa it felfe, was not forfeited unto the Thebans, whom Agefilans had compelled to enter into a victorious Warre; yet the Signiorie, and ancient renowne of being wounded in this Theban warre, and after much bloud loft, ill healed by the peace ensuing, did very soon, upon the death of Agesilam, give up the ghost, and the Lordship of the whole Countrie was seized by Philip King of Macedon, whose actions are now on foot, and more to be regarded than the Contemporarie passages of things, in any other Nation.

Sparta was prefently loft; and the freedome of all Greece

CHAP. I.

Of Philip the father of Alexander the Great, King of Macedon.

%. I.
What Kings reigned in Macedon before Philip.

Against Xerxes, the greatest Monarch of that part of the world, they defended their libertie, with as happy successe as ever Nation had, and with no lesse honour, than hath ever bin acquiredby deeds of Arms. And having had a triall and experience, more than fortunate, against those nations, they so little regarded what might come from them, who had so often forfeited the reputation of their forces, as what soever could be spared from their own distraction at home, they transported over the Hellespont, as sufficient, to entertaine and busie them withall.

But, as it commonly falleth out with every man of mark in the world, that they underfall, and perish by the hands and harmes which they least feare; so fared it at this time with the Greeks. For of Philip of Macedon (of whom we are now to speake) they had so little regard, as they grew even then more violent in devouring each other, when the fastgrowing greatnesse of such a Neighbour-King, should, in regard of their owne safeties, have ferved them for a strong argument of union and accord. But the glorie of their Perfian victories, wherewith they were pampred and made proud, taught them to neglect all Nations but themselves, and the rather to value at little the power and purposes of the Macedonians, because those Kings and States, which fate nearer them than they did, had in the time of Amyntas, the father of Philip, so much weakned them, and won upon them, that they were not (as the Grecians persivaded themselves) in any one age, likely to recover their owne, much leffe to worke any wonders against their borderers. And, indeed, it was not in their Philosophie to consider, That all great alterations are stormelike, fudden, and violent; and that it is then over-late to repaire the decayed and broken banks, when great rivers are once fwollen, fast-running, and inraged. No, the Greeker did rather imploy themselves, in breaking downe those defences which stood betweene them and this inundation, than feek to rampire and re-enforce their owne fields, which by the Levell of reason they might have found to have lien under it. It was therefore well concluded by Orofius: Gracia Civitates imperare singula cupiunt, imperium omnes Orofilacia. verdiderunt; The Cities of Greece loft their command by striving each of them to command

The Kingdome of Macedon, so called of Macedon, the sonne of Ofiris, or, as other Authorsaffirme, of Jupiter and Athra, is the next Region towards the North which bordereth Greece; It hath to the East, the Agean Sea; it is bounded on the North and North-west, by the Thracians and Illyrians; and on the South and South-west, by Thes-

Their Kings were of the familie of Temenus of the race of Hercules, and by nation Argives; who are listed as followerh. About some fixe yeares after the translation of the Affirian Empire, Arbaces then governing Media, Caranus of Argos, commanded by an Oracle, to lead a Colonie into Macedon, departed thence with many people, and as he was marching through that Countrie, the weather being raynie and tempessuous, heespieda great herd of Goats, which fled the storme as fast as they could, hasting them to their knowne place of covert. Whereupon Caranus, calling to minde, that he had also Paul Dion. by another Oraclebin directed, to follow the first troupe of beasts, that should either chast theop. lead him, or flie before him; He purfued these Goats to the Gates of Edessa, and being undiscovered by the Inhabitants, by reason of the darknesse of the aire, he entred their Citie without refultance, and possess it. Soone after this, by the overthrow of ciffew, Ca-Emploin Chro. ranus became Lord of the rest of Macedon, and held it eight and twentie years. Comme succeeded Caranus, and reigned twelve years. Tyrimas followed Canus, and ruled eight and twentie yeares.

Perdiceas the first, the fon of Tyrimas, governed one and fiftie yeares: a Prince, for his great valour, and many other vertues, much renowned. Solinus, Plinie, Justine, Eusebius, Solera. Thophilus Antiochenus, and others, affirm, that he appointed a place of burial for himself, Plin. 146.10. and for all the Kings of Macedon his Successors, at Aga: assuring them, that the Kingdome should fo long continue in his Line and Race, as they continued to lay up their bodies in that Sepulchre; wherein it is faid, that because Alexander the Great failed, therefor the posteritie of the Temenida failed in him: a thing rather devised after the effect, as Iconceive, than foretold by Perdiccas.

Argam succeeded unto Perdiccas, and ruled eight and twentie years.

Philip the first, his successor, reigned eight and twentie years.

Europus followed Philip, and governed fixe and twentie yeares: in whose infancie the fullyrians invaded Macedon, and having obtained a great victorie, they purfued the fame, to the great danger of that State. Whereupon the Macedonians, gathering new forces, and resolving either to recover their former losse, or to lose at once both their Kingdom and their King, they carryed him with them in his cradle into the field, and returned victorious; for they were either confident that their Nation could not be beaten (their King being present) or rather they perswaded themselves that there was no man so void Eight. Fusion. Ofhonour and compassion, as to abandon their natural Lord, being an infant, and no American The. way (but by the hands of his fervants) able to defend himselfe from destruction. The monda of his like is reported by Aimonius of Clotarius the son of Fredegunda.

Alcetas succeeded Æropus, and ruled nine and twentie years. Amyntas the first succeeded Alcetas, and reigned fiftie yeares; He lived at such time 45 Darius Histaspes, after his unprosperous returne out of Scythia, sent Megabazus with an Armie into Europe, who in Xerxes name required Amyntas to acknowledge him for his Supreme Lord, by yeelding unto him Earth and Water. But his Embassadours, as fortie years. He did not only appeale the wrath of Merabazm, for the flaughter of the Persian Embassadours, by giving Gyg au his Sister, to Bubares of the bloud of Persia bur by that match he grew fo great in Xerxes grace, as he obtained all that Region between the Mountains of Olympus and Hemus, to be united to the Kingdome of Macedon. Yer could not these benefits buy his affection from the Greeks. For Xerxes being returned into Afia, and Mardonius made Generall of the Perfian Armie; Alexander acquainted the creeks with all his intenes and purposes against them. He had three sons, Perdicas Alcetas and Philip.

Perdicess the second, the sonne of Alexander, lived in the time of the Poloponnesian war, and reigned in all eight and twentie years. The wars which he made were not much to remarkeable: the Storie of them is found here and there by pieces in Thucydides his first fixe Books. He left behind him two fons; Perdiccas, who was very young; and Arche lass, who was base borne.

Perdice as the third, being delivered to the custodie and care of Archelam, was at feven years of age cast into a Well and drowned by his false Guardian: who excusing this false to Cleopatra the mother of the young King, faid, That the childein following a Goofe hastily, fell thereinto by misadventure. But Archelam stayed not here : for having thus dispatched his brother, he slew both his Unle Alcetas the son of Alexander the Rich. and Alexander the fon of this Alcetas, his Coulin Germain, and enjoyed the Kingdome of Macedon himselfe foure and twentie yeares.

This Archelaus, of whom both Plate and Ariftotle makemention, though he made himselfe King by wicked murder, yet he performed many things greatly to the profit of his Nation. It is faid, That he fought by all means to draw Socrates unto him, and that he greatly loved and honoured Eurypides the Tragedian. He had two fons, Archelau and Orestes.

Archelaw the second succeeded his father, and having reigned seven years, he was slain in hunting, either by chance, or of purpose by Crataus.

Orester his younger sonne was committed to the education of Aropus, of the royall bloud of Macedon, & had the same measure which Archelaus had measured to his Puvil: for Alrepse murthered him and usurped the Kingdome, which he held some fixe years: 20 the fame who denied passage to Agefilam King of Sparta, who defired after his returne from the Alian expedition, to palle by the way of Macedon into Greece.

Diod Polyen. Plut.in Demet.

This U furper left three fons, Paufanias, Argans, and Alexander. Paufanias succeeded his father Aropus, and having reigned one years, he was driven out by Amuntas the fon of Philip, the lon of the first Perdicear, the fon of Alexander the Rich; which Philip was then preserved, when Archelaus the Bastard slew his brother Perdiccas, his uncle Alcetas, and his fon Alexander. This Amyntas reigned (though very unquietly) four and twentie years: for he was not only infelted by Paulanias, asifted by the Thracian; and by his brother Argam; incouraged by the Illyrians; and by the faid Argam, for two years dispossest of Macedon: but on the other side, the Olynthians, his Neighbours near 40 the Agean Sea, made themselves for a while Masters of Pella, the chiefe Citie of Ma-

Amyntas the second had by his wife Eurydise the Illyrian, three sonnes; Alexander the second, Perdiceas the third, and Philip the second, Father of Alexander the Great: and one Daughter called Euryone or Exione. He had also by his fecond Wife Gygan, three Sons; Archelam, Argam, and Menelam, afterward flaine by their brother Philip-He had more by a Concubine, Ptolomie furnamed Alorites, of the Citie Alorm, wherein he was borne.

Alexander the second reigned not much above one yeare, in which time he was invaded by Paufanias, the sonne of Aropus, but defended by Iphicrates the Athenian, while 50 he was at that time about Amphipolis. He was also constrained (for the payment of a great fum of mony) to leave his youngest brother Philip in Hostage with the Illyrians, who had subjected his father Amyntas to the payment of tribute. After this, Alexander being invited by the Alevada against Alexander the tyrant of Pheres in Thessalie, having redeemed his brother Philips to draw the Thebans to his assistance, entred into Confederacie with Pelopidas, being at that time in the same Countrie, with whom hee also left Philp with divers other principall persons, for the gage of his promises to Felopidas. But Eurydice his mother falling in love with her Son-in-law, who had married her Daughter Euryone or Exione, practifed the death of Alexander her fon, with a purpose to conferre the Kingdome on her Paramour, which Ptolomy Alorites did put in execution: by means whereof he held Macedon for three years, but was foon after flain by Perdicess the brother of Alexander. Diodore hath it otherwise of Philip being made pledg; DiodL15. 6 16. and faith, That Amontas his father delivered him for hostage to the Illyrians, by whom he was conveyed to Thebes, there to be kept: others report that Philip (while his father was yet living) was first ingaged to the Thebans, and delivered for hostage a second time by Alexander his brother.

perdiccas the third, after he had flain Alorites his base brother, governed Macedon 10 five years, and was then flain in a battel against the Illyrians, according to Diodorus; but Justine affirmeth that he perished by the practice of Eurydice his mother, as Alexander Just 7.

6. II.

The beginning of Philips reigne: and how he delivered Macedon from the troubles wherein hee found it intangled.

Hilip the second, the youngest son of Amyntas by Eurydice, having bin instructed in all knowledge requifite unto the government of a Kingdom, in that excellent education which he had under Epaminondas, making an escape from Thebes, retur-Diodlise. ned into Macedon, in the first year of the hundred and fifth Olympiad, which was after the building of Rome three hundred fourfcore and thirteen years: and finding the many enemies and dangers wherewith the Kingdome was invironed, he took on him, not as a King (for Perdiceas left a fon, though but an infant) but as the Protector of his Nephew, and Commander of the menof war. Yet his fruitfull ambition foon over-grew his modestie, and he was eafily perswaded by the people to accept both the title of King, and withall, the absolute rule of the Kingdome. And to say the truth, the necessitie of the State of Macedon at that time required a King both prudent and active. For befides the incurfions to of the Illyrians and Pannonians, the King of Thrace did fet up in opposition Pausanias; the Athenians, Arg aui; sons of the late Usurper Æropus: each of these labouring to place in Macedon a King of their own election. These heavie burdens when Philip could not wellbear, he bought off the weightieft by mony, and by faire promifes unloaded himfelf offomany of the rest, as he ran under the remainder happily enough. For not with standingthat his brother Perdiccas had his death accompanied with four thousand Macedonians, befide those that were wounded and taken prisoners; & that the Pannonians were destroying all before them in Macedon; and that the Athenians with a Fleet by Sea, and three thousand Souldiers by Land under Mantias, did beat upon him on all fides & quarters of his Countrie: yet after he had practifed the men of war of Pannonia, and corrupted them with gifts; and had also bought the King of Thrace from Pausanias, he forthwith made head against the Athenians his stiffest enemies; and, for the first, he prevented their recoverie of Amphipolis, a Citie on the frontier of Macedon: and did then purfue Argam the fon of Eropus, set against him by the Athenians, and followed him so hard at the heeles, in his retrait from Ages, that he forced him to abide the battell: which Arg and loft, having the greatest part of his Armie slaine in the place. Those of the Athemans, and others which remained unbroken, tooke the advantage of a strong peece of ground at hand, which though they could not long defend, yet avoiding thereby the present surie of the Souldiers, they obtained of the vanquishers life and libertie to returne into Attica. Whereupon a peace was concluded between him and the Athenians ofor that prefent, and for this clemencie he was greatly renowned and honoured by all the Greekes.

The good successe which Philip had in many enterprises.

Now had Philip leafure to looke Northward, and to attend the Illyrians and $P \times n$ -nians, his irreconcileable enemies and borderers: both which he invaded with fo prosperous successe, as he slew Bardillis, King of the Illyrians, with seventhousand of his Nation, and thereby recovered all those places which the Illyrians held in Macedon. and withall upon the death of the King of Pannonia, he pierc't that Country, and after? maine victory obtained, he enforc't them to pay him tribute. This was no sooner done than(without staying to take longer breath) he hasted speedily towards Lariffa, upon the river Peneus in Thesaly, of which Town he soone made himselfe master; and thereby he got good footing in that Country, whereof he made use in time following. Now although he resolved either to subdue the Thessalians, or to make them his owne against all others, because the horse-men of that Country were the best, and most feared in that part of Europe; yet hethought it most for his safety to close up the entrances out of Thrace, lest while he invaded Thessaly and Greece towards the South, those ample Nations, lying towards the North, should either withdraw him, or over-run Macedon, as in former times. He therefore attempted Amphipolis, seated on the famous river of Stri. mon, which parteth Thrace from Macedon, and won it. He also recovered Pydna; and (to the North of Amphipolis) the City of Crenides (sometime Datus) and called it after his name Philippi: to the people whereof Saint Paulafterward directed one of his Epifiles. This place, wherein Philippi stood, is very rich in mines of gold, out of which, greatly to the advancement of Philips affaires, he drew yearly a thousand talents, which make fixe hundred thousand French Crownes.

And that he might with the more ease disburden the Thracian shores of the Athenian Garrifons, to which he had given a great blow by the taking in of Amphipolis, he entred 20 into league with his fathers malicious enemies, the Olynthians; whom the better to faften unto him, he gave them the City of Pydna with the territory, meaning nothing leffe than that they should enjoy it, or their own Estate, many years.

Now that he might by degrees win ground upon the Greekes, he tooke the faire occasion to deliver the City of Pheres in The saly, from the tyrants Lycophron and Tiliohanus: who, after they had conspired with Thebe the wife of Alexander, who usurped upon the liberty of that State, they themselves (Alexander being murdered) held it also by the fame strong hand and oppression that Alexander did, till by the affistance of Philipthey were beaten out, and Pheres restored to her former liberty. Which act of Philip did for 20 ever after falten the Theffalians unto him, and, to his exceeding great advantage, binde them to his fervice.

6. IV.

Of the Phocian War which first drew Philip into Greece.

Bout this time, to wit, in the fecond yeare of the hundred and fixth Olympiad, eight yeares after the battell of Mantinea, and about the eighth yeare of Artaxberxes Ochus, began that War, called Sacred. Now, as all occasions concurre to- 40 wards the execution of eternall providence, and of every great alteration in the World, there is some preceding preparation, though not at the first easily discerned; so did this revengefull harred by the Thebans, The falians, and Locreans, conceived against the Phocians, not only teach Philip how he might with halfe a hand wrest the sword out of their fingers; but the Greekes themselves, beating downe their owne defences, to give himan easie passage; and beating themselves, to give him victory without perill, left nothing unperformed towards their owne flavery, faving the title and imposition. Of this War the Thebans (made over-proud by their victory at Leuteres) were the inflamers. For at the Councell of the Amphyttiones, or of the generall Estates of Greece, in which at that time, they swayed most, they caused both the Lacedemonians and Phocians to be con- so demned in greater fummes of money than they could well beare; the one for furprizing the Castle of Cadmea in the time of peace, the other for ploughing up a piece of ground belonging to the Temple of Delphos. The Phocians being refolved not to obey this Ediet, were fecretly fet on and encouraged by the Lacedemonians; and for refufall were exposed as Sacrilegers, and accursed to all their neighbour-Nations, for whom it was then lawfull to invade, and destroy them at their pleasures.

The Phocians perswaded thereunto by Philomelus, a Captaine of their owne, cast the fame dice of hazzard that Cafar after many Ages following did; but had not the fame chance. Yet they dealt well enough with all the enemies of their owne Nation. And the better to beare out an ungracious quarrell, of which there was left no hope of comnosition, they resolved to sacke the Temple it selfe. For seeing that for the ploughing of ancece of Apollo's ground, they had so much offended their Neighbour-God, and their Neighbour-Nations, as worse could not befall them than alreadie was intended; they resolved to take the gold with the ground, and either to perish for all, or to prevaile against all that had commission to call them to account. The treasure which they tooke out of the Temple in the beginning of the Warre, was ten thousand talents, which in those dayes served them to wage a great many men; and such was their successe in the beoinning of the war, as they won three great battels against the Thebans, Thessalians and Locrians; but being beaten in the fourth, their Leader Philomelus cast himself headlong over the Rocks.

In the meane while the Cities of Chersonesus, both to defend themselves against their badneighbour Philip, who encroached upon them, and to draw others into their quarrell, rendred themselves to the Athenians. Philip prepareth to get them into his hands, andatthe siege of Mechane lost one of his eyes. It is faid, That he that shot him, did purposely direct his arrow towards him, and that it was written on the shaft thereof: After Philippo; After to Philip: for fo he was called that gave him the wound. tie he evened with the foile.

The Tyrant Lycophron before mentioned, while Philip was bufied on the border of Thrace, and the Theffalians ingaged in the holy war, entred Theffalie with new forces, being affisted by Onomarchus, Commander of the Phocian Armie, in place of Philomelm. For hereby the Phocians hoped so to entertaine the Thessalians at home, asthey hould not find leafure to invade them. Hereupon was Philip the second time called into Thessalie; but both the Thessalians and Macedonians (Philip being present) were utterly overthrowne by Onomarchus, and great numbers of both Nations lost. From The falle, O nomarchus drew speedily towards Bæotia, and with the same victorious Armic brake the forces of the Bootians, and took from them their Citie of Coronea. But Philip, impatient of his late misadventure, after he had re-enforced his Armie, returned with all speed into Thessalie, there to find agains the honour which he lately lost: and was the second time encountred by Onomarchus, who brought into the field twentie thousand foot, and five hundred horse. All this great preparation sufficed not; for Onomarchus was by Philip surmounted, both in numbers and in good fortune, his Armie overturned, fixe thousand slaine, and three thousand taken: of which number himselse beingone, was among others hanged by Philip. Those that fled, were in part received by the Athenian Gallies, which failed along ft the coast, commanded by Chares; but the greatest number of those that tooke the Sea, were therein devoured ere they recovered them. Lycophron was now againe driven out of Theffalie, and Pheres made free as be-

Of the Olynthian war. The ambitions practices of Philip.

Rom hence Philip resolved to invade Phocis it selfe, but the Athenians did not favour his entrance into those parts; and therefore with the helpe of the Lacedemonians, they retrencht his passage at the Streits of Thermopylis. Wheremonhe returned into Macedon, and after the taking of Micyberne, Torone, and other Towns, he quarrelled with the Olynthians, whom not long before he had wooed to his alliance, and bought his peace of them. For the Olynthians were very strong, and had evermore both braved and beaten the Macedonians. It is faid, that Philip having put to death Archelam his halfe brother (for Amyntus had three fons by Eurydice the Mother of Philip, and three other fons by Grg ea: but Philips elder brothers by the same Motherbeing dead, he determined to rid himself also of the rest) the two yonger held themselves within Olynthus; and that the receiving of them by the Olynthians was the cause of the war, Justine affirmeth. But just quarrels are ballanced by just Princes, for to this Justine. King all things were lawfull that might ferve his turnsall his affections, and passions, how divers foever in other men, were in his ambition swallowed up, and thereinto converted.

CHAP. I.S. 7.8.

For he neither forbare the murder of his owne brothers, the breach of faith, the buying of other mens fidelitie: he efteemed no place ftrong where his Affe loaden with gold might enter; nor any Citie or State unconquerable, where a few of the greatest, to be made greater, could lose the sense of other mens forrow and subjection. And because he thought it vain to practife the winning of Olynthus, till he had inclosed all the power they had within their owne Walls, he entred their Territorie, and by the advantage of a well-compounded and trained Armie, he gave them two overthrowes ere he fate down before the Citie it selfe: which done, he bought Euthicrates and Lasthenes from their people, and from the service of their Countrie and common-weale, by whose treason he entred the Towne, flew his brothers therein, fackt it, and fold the inhabitants for 10 flaves by the drumme. By the spoile of this place he greatly enriched himselfe, and had treasure sufficient to buy-in other Cities withall, which he daily did. For so was he advifed by the Oracle in the beginning of his undertaking, That he should make his affaults with filver speares: Whereupon Horace well and truely faid,

Har carm.Od.16.

By gifts the Macedon clave Gates afunder, And Kings envying his estate brought under.

And it is true that he won more by corruption and fraud, than he did by force. For as he had in all the principall Cities of Greece his fecret workers (which way of Conquest was well followed by Philip the second of Spain:) So when in the contention between the Competitors, for the Kingdome of Thrace, he was chosen the Arbitrator, he came not to the Councell accompanied with Pietic and Justice, but with a powerfull Armie, and having beaten and flain both Kings, gave fentence for himselfe, and made the Kingdome his owne.

6. VI.

How Philip ended the Phocian warre.

He war still continued between the Phocians and the Associates of the holy war: the Barotians, finding themselves unable to subfift without some present aid, sent unto Philip for fuccour, who willingly yeelded to their necessities, & sent them fuch a proportion of men, as were neither fufficient to mafter their enemies, nor to affure themselves; but yet to enable them to continue the war, and to waste the strength of Greece. They also sent to Artaxerxes Ochus for supply of treasure, who lent them thirty talents, which makes a hundred and fourescore thousand crownes: but when with these supplies they had still the worst against the Phocians, who held from them three of the strongest Cities within Baotia it selfe, they then besought Philip of Macedon that hee would affift them in person, to whom they would give an entrance into their Territoric, and in all things obey his Commandements in war.

Now had \bar{P} hilip what he longed for; for he knew himselfe in state to give the law to both, & fo quitting all his other purposes towards the North, he marched with a speedy pace towards Baotia, where being arrived, Phallechus who commanded the Phocian Armie, fearing to shocke with this victorious King, made his owne peace, and withdrew himselfe with a Regiment of eight thousand Souldiers into Peloponnesus, leaving the Phocians to the mercie of the Conqueror; and for conclusion he had the glorie of that war called Sacred, which the Grecians with fo many mutuall flaughters had continued for ten years; and, besides the glorie, he possess himselse of Orchomene, Coronea, and Corfia, in the Countrie of the Bastians, who invited him to be victorious over themselves. He brought the Phocians into fervitude, and wasted their Cities, and gave them but their Villages to inhabite, referving unto himselfe the yearely tribute of threescore talents, which make fixe and thirtie thousand French Crowns. He also hereby (besides the same of pietie for service of the gods) obtained the same double voice in the Councell of the Amphyttiones

Amphytiones which the Phocians had, with the superintendencie of the Pythian games, forfeited by the Corinthians, by being partakers in the Phocian facriledge.

6. VII.

How Philip with ill successe attempted upon Perinthus, Byzantium, and the Scythians.

Parmenio, slaughtered many thousands of the Illyrians and Dardarians, and brought the Thracians to pay him the tenth part of all their revenues. But his next enterprise against the Perinthians stayed his furie. Perinthus was a Citie of Thrace, seated inon Propontis, in the mid-way between Seftos and Byzantium, a place of great strength, and a people resolved to desend their libertie against Philip, where the Athenians incouaged and affifted them. Philip fate downe before it with a puissant Armie, made many fire breaches, gave many furious affaults, built many over-topping and commanding Towers about it. But he was repelled with equall violence. For whereas Philip thought by his continuall affaults to wearie them, and waste both their men and munition, they were supplied, not only from the Persian with menand mony, and succoursed from Bya zantium, which stood upon the same sea-coast, but they were relieved from Athens, Chio, and Rhodes, by the conduction of Phocion, with whatfoever was wanting to their necessisie. But because those of Byzantium, by reason of their neighbourhood, and easie passage by water, gave them often and readie helpe; Philip removed the one halfe of his Armie, and befreged it, leaving fifteene thousand foot before Perinthus, to force it if they could: Butto be short, he failed in both attempts, (as all Princes commonly doe that undertake diversenterprises at one time) and returned into Macedon with no lesse dishonour than loge: whereupon he made an overture of peace with the Athenians, and greatly defired intowhich though Fhocian perswaded them in all he could, and that by the occasion offeredthey might greatly advantage their conditions; yet Demosthenes with his eloquence to prevailed in the refusal. In the mean while, Philip having digested his late affront, and supplied his expence, by the taking of an hundred three score and ten Merchants ships, he gatherednew forces, and being accompanied with his fon Alexander, led them into Seythia; but he was also unprosperous in that enterprise: For the Triballi, a people of Ma-Ja, fet on him in his return, wounded him, and tooke from him the greatest part of the spoiles which he had gathered.

6. VIII.

How Philip overthrowing the Greekes in the battell of Charonaa, was chosen Captaine-Generall of Greece. The death of Philip.

Mong these Northern Nations (part of which he supprest, and part quieted) he spent some eight yeares; and in the ninth yeare, after the end of the holy Warre, he was by his great advantage invited againe by the Grecians to their affiftance. For the Citizens of Amphissa having disobeyed the decree of the Amphystiones, in which Philip had a double voice, and who by reason that the Thebans and Locrians gave commenance and aide to the Amphissionians, the rest were not of themselves able to constraine them, they befought Philip to come in person to their assistance. Now you must thinke that Philip was not long in resolving upon this enterprise; hee needed no odrawing on, whom nothing could keepe backe; nor other diffwafion than a mastring power could hold thence. He therefore commanded his Armie forthwith to march; the fame being compounded of thirtie thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse; and with as much expedition as could be made, he entred Phocis, won Platea, and brought into Subjectionall that Region.

Therest, and especially the Athenians, although they had good cause to sear that a great Part of this florme would fall on themselves, yet were they disswaded by Demosthenes from accepting such reasonable conditions of peace as Philip offered, and rather made hoice (having drawnethe Thebans to joyne with them) to leave the enjoying of their estates and their freedome to the chance of one battell, than to hold it either by composition, or by the grace of Philip. But this their Oratours eloquence cost them deare. It is true, that he could far more eafily minde them of the vertue of their Ancestors, than make them fuchas they were. He might repeat unto them (with words moving paffion) the wonders they wrought at Marathon, but he could not transforme the Macedonians into Persians, nor draw from the dead, a Militades, an Aristides, a Themistoles, ora Cimen, or any of those famous Commanders, whose great vertues they had payed with the greatest ingratitude that ever Nation did. A Phocion they had, but by the strength of a contrary faction he was at this time in difgrace, and not imployed in fo much as when the Armies of Philip and the Confederates incountred, although some thousand of the to Athenians did abide the killing, and the like number well-near of the Thebans died with them; yet the want of the worthy men on that fide to hold up the rest, and to draw them on, and the many choice Captains of the Macedonians, incouraged by a King of a growing fortune, as it gave to Philip fo thining a victory, that Alexander by the light thereof found his way (in despight of all the Nations interjacent) into Persia, India, and Egypt; fo it cut to the ground, and gave end and date to all the Grecian glory: Yea their liberty (faith Curtius) with their large Dominion won with fo many difficulties, continued for fo many Ages, and so often defended against the greatest Kings, was now lost in amoment, and for ever loft.

Now this advited King (never paffionate to his disadvantage) to the end he might ob- 20 taine the Soveraignty over all Greece, and be acknowledged for their Captain-General against the Persians, without any further hazzardor trouble, was content to let gothose Athenians that were taken at this battell of Cheronaa, as he also forbare to attemptany thing against their Citie: but in Thebes (which lately by the vertue of Epaminondas triumphed over the rest) he lodged a Garrison of Macedonians. And being soon after (according unto the long defire which he had nourished of this Soveraignty) by the generall States at Corinth, stiled the first Commander of all the Grecians, and contribution of men and mony granted himshe compounded an Army of great strength, and under the Commandement of Attalus and Parmenie, transported the same over the Hellespont into Asia, to begin the War. Of his enterprise against Persia, he sought the successes to the Oracle at Delphos, from whence he received fuch another convertible riddle, as Crafus did when he attempted Cyrus, and was in like fort mistaken in the exposition.

But as it is hard to discerne and withstand the flatteries of our owne appetites, sodid Philips ambitious desire to invade Persia, abuse his judgement, so farre, that the death, wherewith himselse was threatned, he understood to be delivered of his enemy, whom he intended presently to invade. Before his purposed departure into Asia, he prepared for the marriage of his Daughter Cleopatra, with Alexander King of Epirus; to which feast and pastimes thereat appointed, he invited all his Friends and Allies, with the principall persons of the Grecian Cities, from whom he received much honour and many rich presents: but this was indeed the feast of his Funerall. For having refused to doe 40 justice to one Pausanias, a Gentleman of his Guard, whom Attalus (greatly favouredby Philip) had first made drunk, and then left to be carnally abused by divers base persons, this Paufanias grew into so great a detestation of the Kings partiality in so souleafact, as when Philip was passing towards the Theater, he drew a sword from under his long garment and wounded him to death, when he had lived fixe and forty years, and reigned five and twenty. Justine reports it, that Olympias incouraged Pausanias to murder the King her husband, which after his death she boldly avowed, by the honour she did unto Paulanias, in crowning his dead body, in confecrating his fword unto Apollo, by building for him a monument, and other like Graces.

6. I X.

What good foundations of Alexanders greatnesse were laid by Philip. Of his laudable qualities and issue.

Ow although he were then taken from the World, when he had mastredall opposition on that side of the Sea, and had scene the fruits of his hopes, and labours, changing colour towards ripenesse and perfection; yet hee was herein happy that he lived to fee his fon Alexander at mans estate, and had him selfe bin ancie-witnesse of his resolution and singular valour in this last battell.

The foundation of whose future greatnesse he had laid so soundly for him, with so plaine a patterne of the buildings which himselfe meant to erect, as the performance and finishing was farre more easie to Alexander, though more glorious than the beginning's unto Philip, though lesse famous. For, besides the recovery of Macedon it selfe, in competition between him and the fonnes of Aropus, the one affifted by the Thracians, the other by the Athenians, and befides the regaining of many places poffest by the Illyrians, the crushing of all those Northern Kings his Neighbours, the over-throw of Olynthus, a State that despised the power of his Father, the many Maritimate Cities taken, ofgreat strength and ancient freedome, and the subjection of that famous Nation of Greece, which for so many ages had defended it selfe against the greatest Kings of the World, and won upon them; He left unto his sonne, and had bred up for him so many choice Commanders, as the most of them, both for their valour and judgement in the Warre, were no leffe worthy of Crownes, than himfelfe was that ware a Crowne: For it was faid of Parmenio (whom Alexander, ungratefull to fogreat vertue, impioufly murthered) That Parmenio had performed many things challenging eternal fame, without the King; but the King without Parmenio never did any thing worthy of renowne: as for the rest of his Captaines, though content to obey the Sonne of such a Father, yet and did they not after Alexanders death endure to acknowledge any man Superiour to them-

Of this Prince it is hard to judge, whether his ambition had taught him the exercise of more vices, than Nature and his excellent education had enriched him with vertues. For besides that he was Valiant, Wise, Learned, and Master of his Affections, he had this savourof Piety, that he rather laboured to fatifie those that were grieved, than to suppresse them. Whereof (among many other) we finde a good example in his dealing with Areadion and Nicanor; whom, when for their evill speech of Philip, his familiars perswaded him to put to death; he answered them, That first it ought to be considered, whether the fault were in them that gave him ill language, or in himselfe: Secondly, that it was in every mans own power to be well spoken of : and this was shortly proved, for after Philiprelieved their necessities, there were none within his Kingdome that did him more honour than they did. Wherupon he told those that had perswaded him to use violence; that he was a better Physitian for evill speech than they were.

His Epistles to Alexander his son are remembred by Cicero and Gellius; and by Dion and Cicosts. Chysoftome exceedingly commended. His Stratagems are gathered by Polyanus and Dimade Regel Eintinus, his wife fayings by Plutarch. And albeit he held Macedon as in his owne right, all the time of his reign, yet was he not the true and next Heirethereof; for Amyntas the fonof his brother Perdiceas (of whom he had the Protection during his infancy) had the ight. This Amyntas he married to his daughter Cyna, who had by him a daughter calpled Eurydice, who was married to Philips base son Aridaus, her Uncle by the Mothers fide: both which Olympias, Philips first Wife, and Mother to Alexander the Great, pur to death; Arideus by extreme torments: Eurydice she strangled.

Philip had by this Olympias, the daughter of Neoptolemus, King of the Molosfians (of the race of Achilles) Alexander the Great, and Cleopatra. Cleopatra was married to her Uncle Alexander, King of Epirus, and was after her brother Alexanders death flaine at Sardis, by the commandement of Antigonus.

By Audata, an Illyrian, his fecond Wife, he had Cyna, married as is shewed before. By Nicasipolis, the Sister of Jason, Tyrant of Pheres, he had The salonica, whom Cassando, after he had taken Pidna, married ; but she was afterward by her father-in-law Antijopater put to death.

By Cleopatra the Neece of Attalus, he had Caranus, whom others call Philip: him 0 - Athentises. Impias, the Mother of Alexander the Great, caused to be rosted to death in a copper Instal. Pan Others lay this murder to Alexander himself. By the same Cleopatra he had likewise adaughter called Europa, whom Olympias also murdered arthe Mothers breast,

By Phila and Meda he had no iffue.

He had also two Concubines, Arsinoe, whom after he had gotten with childe, he marriedto an obscure man, called Lagus, who bare Ptolomie King of Egypt, called the Some of Lagus, but effected the Son of Philip: by Philinna, his fecond Concubines a publike Dancer, he had Aridaus, of whom we shall have much occasion to speake hereafter.

CHAP.II.

Of ALEXANDER the Great.

6. I.

A briefe rehearfall of Alexanders doings, before he invaded Asia.

Lexander, afterward called the Great, succeeded unto Philip his Father; being a Prince no lesse valiant by Nature, than by Education, well instructed, and inriched in all sorts of Learning and good Arts. He began his reigne over the Macedonians soure hundred and seventeen years after Rome was built, and after his own birth twenty years. The strange dreams of Philip his father, and that one of the gods in 20 the shape of a Snake, begat him on Olympias his Mother, I omitas foolish tales; but that the Temple of Diana (a work the most magnificent of the world) was burnt upon the day of his birth, and that fo strange an accident was accompanied with the newes of three feverall victories, obtained by the Macedonians, it was very remarkable, and might with the reason of those times be interpreted for ominous, and foreshewing the great things by Alexander afterward performed. Upon the change of the King, the Neighbour-Nations, whom Philip had opprest, beganto consult about therecoverie of their former libertie, and to adventure it by force of arms. Alexanders young years gave them hope of prevailing, and his suspected severitie increased couragein those, who could better resolve to die, than to live savishly. But Alexander gave no time , to those swelling humours, which might speedily have endangered the health of his Estate. For after revenge taken upon the Conspirators against his Father, whom he slew upon his Tombe, and the celebration of his Funerals, he first fastened unto him his own nation, by freeing them from all exactions & bodily flavery, other than their fervice in his Wars; and used such Kingly austeritie towards those that contemned his young years, and fuch clemencie to the rest that perswaded themselves of the crueltie of his disposition, as all affections being paffed at home, he made a prefent journie into Peloponnesus, and fo well exercised his spirits among them, as by the Councell of the States of Greece, he was according to the great defire of his heart, elected Captain-Generall against the Par-Gans, upon which war Philip had not only resolved, (who had obtained the same title of Generall Commander) but had transported under the leading of Parmenie and Attalm, a part of his Armie, to recover some places on Asia-side, for the safe descent of the rest.

This enterprise against the Persian occupied all Alexanders affections; those fair marks of Riches, Honour, and large Dominion, he now shot at both sleeping and waking: all other thoughts & imaginations were either grievous or hateful. But a contrary wind atfeth; for he receiveth advertisement that the Athenians, Thebans, and Lacedamonians, had united themselves against him, and, by affistance from the Persian, hoped for the recoverie of their former freedome. Hereto they were perswaded by Demost henes, himselfe being thereto perswaded by the gold of Persia: the devise he used was more subtile than profitable; for hee caused it to bee bruited that Alexander was flaine in a battailea-s gainst the Triballes, and brought into the affembly a companion whom hee had corrupted to affirme, that himselse was present, and wounded in the battaile. There is indeeda certaine Doctrine of Policy (as Policie is now a-daies defined by falshood and knaverie) that devised rumors and lies, if they serve the turn but for a day or two, are greatly available. It is true that common people are fometimes mockt by them, as Souldiers are by false alarums in the Wars; but in all that I have observed, I have found the successe as ridiculous as the invention. For as those that finde themselves at one time abused by such like bruits, doe at other times neglect their duties; when they are upon true reports, and in occasions perillous, simmoned to affemble; so doe all men in generall condemne the Venters of such trumpery, and for them, seare upon necessary occasions to entertaine the truth it selfe. This labour unlooked for, and losse of time, was not onely very grievous to Alexander, but by turning his sword from the ignoble and effeminate Persians, against which he had directed it, towards the manly & famous Gracians, of whose affistance he not endure to strive against the winde, shall hardly attaine the Port which he purposeth doth the weakest children to betwaile them.

Hetherefore made such expedition towards these Revolters, as that himselfe, with the Army that followed him, brought them the first newes of his preparation. Hereup-that fainted, seeking by their Embassadours to pacifie the King, and to be received again pardon the Grecians. Wise menare not easily drawnessom great purposes by sight accarassancy easily be taken off, neither hath any King ever brought to effect any great the same certaine end.

And having now quieted his borderers towards the South, he refolved to affure those Nations which lay on the North-fide of Macedon, to wit, the Thracians, Triballes, Peones, Gues, Agrians, and other falvage people, which had greatly vexed with incurfions, not onely other of his Predeceffours, but even Philip his Father : with all which, after divers weithrowes given them, he made peace, or else brought them into subjection. Notwithfanding this good successe, hee could not yet finde the way out of Europe. There is nothing more naturall to man than liberty; the Greekes had enjoyed it over-long, and loft it too late to forget it; they therefore shake off the yoke once againe. The Thebans, who had in their Citadella Garrison of a thousand Macedons, attempt to force it; Alexander hastneth to their fuccour, and presents himselfe with thirty thousand foot, all old fouldiers, & three thousand horse, before the City, & gave the Inhabitants some daies to prolive, being even heart-ficke with the defire of paffing into Afia. So unwilling , indeed, hewasto draw bloud of the Gracians, by whom he hoped to ferve himselfe elsewhere, that he offered the Thebans remission, if they would only deliver into his hands Phanix and Prothytes, the stirrers up of the Rebellion. But they, opposing the mounting fortune of Alexander, (which bare all refistance before it, like the breaking in of the Ocean Sea) in Head of fuch an answer, as men besieged and abandoned should have made, demanded Philosas and Antipater to be delivered unto them; as if Thebes alone, then layed in the ballance of Fortune with the Kingdome of Macedon, and many other Provin-03, could either have evened the scale or swaied it. Therefore in the end they petified in their obstinacy. For while the Thebans oppose the Army assailant, they parecharged at the backe by the Macedonian Garrison, their City taken and razed to the ground, fixe thousand slaine, and thirty thousand sold for slaves, at the price of four hundred and forty talents. This the King did to the terrour of the other Gracian

Many arguments were used by Cleadas one of the prisoners, to perswade Alexander to forbeare the destruction of Thebes. He prayed the King to beleeve that they were rather misseled by giving hasty creditto salse reports, than any way malicious; for being perswaded of Alexanders death, they rebelled but against his successour. He also before the King to remember, that his father Philip had his education in that City, yea that his Ancestour Hercules was borne therein: but all perswasions were fruitles; the times wherein offences are committed doe greatly aggravate them. Yet for the honour hebate to learning, he pardoned all of the race of Pindarus the Poet, and spared, and set at liberty Timoclea, the sister of Theagenes, who died in desence of the liberty of Greece spins this father Philip. This noble woman being taken by a Thracian, and by him ratible threatned to take her life unlesse she would consess her treasure: she led that Thracian to a Well, and told him that she had therein cast it: and when the Thracian to looke into the Well, she suddenly thrust him into the mouth thereof, and stoescaped and fled unto them for succour, Alexander would not grant them peace, butupon condition to deliver into his hands both their Orators which perswaded this second revolt, and their Captaines; yet in the end it being a torment unto him to retard the enterprise of Persia, he was content that the Orators should remaine, and accepted of the banishment of the Captaines; wherein he was exceeding ill advised, had nothis fortune, or rather the providence of God, made all the resistance against him unprofitable: for these good Leaders of the Gracians betooke themselves to the service of the Persian, whom after a few dayes he invaded.

6. II. How Alexander passing into Asia, fought with the Persians upon the River of Granicus.

Hen all was now quieted at home, Alexander, committing to the trust of Antipater both Greece and Macedon, in the first of the Spring did passe the Hellespont, and being ready to distimbarke, he threw a Dart towards the Asian shore, as a token of defiance, commanding his Souldiers not to make any wastein their own Territorie, or to burne, or deface those buildings which themselves were presently, and in the suture to possess. He landed his Armie, consisting of two and thirty thousand foot, and five thousand horse, all old Souldiers, neere unto Troy, where he of sered a solemne facrisice upon Achilles Tombe, his maternall Ancestor.

But before he left his own coast, hee put to death without any offence given him, all his Mother-in-lawes Kinsmen, whom Philip his Father had greatly advanced, not sparing such of his own as he suspected. Healso took with him many of his tributary Princes, of whose sidelity he doubted; thinking by unjust cruelty to affure all things, both in the present & suture. Yet the end of all fell out contrary to the policy which his Ambition had commended unto him, though agreeing very well with the justice of God; for all that he had planted, was soon after withered, & rooted up; those, whom he most trusted, were the most traiterous; his mother, friends, and children, fell by such another mercilesse sword as his owne, and all manner of consusion followed his dead body to sthe grave, and left him there.

When the knowledge of Alexanders landing on Asia side was brought to Daviss, he so much scorned the Armie of Macedon, and had so contemptible an opinion of Alexander himselse, as having stiled him his servant on a letter which he wrote unto him, reprehending his disloyaltie and audacitie (for Daviss intitled himselse King of Kings, & the Kinsman of the gods) he gave order withall to his Lievtenants of the lesser Asia, that they should take Alexander alive, whip him with rods, and then convey him to his presence that they should sinke his ships, and send the Macedons taken prisoners beyond the Red-Sea; belike into Aethiopia, or some other unhealthfull part of Affrica.

In this fortdid this glorious King, confident in the glittering, but heartleffe, multimde which he commanded, dispose of the already-vanquished Macedonians: But the illdeftinies of men beare them to the ground, by what strong confidence soever armed. The great numbers which he gathered together and brought in one heape into the field, gave rather an exceeding advantage to his enemies, than any discouragement at all. For befides that they were men utterly unacquainted with dangers, men who by the name and countenance of their King were wont to prevaile against those of lesse courage than themselves, men that took more care how to embroider with gold and silver their upper garments, as if they attended the invation but of the Sunne-beames, than they did to arme themselves with yron and steele against the sharpe pikes, swords and darts of the hardie Macedonians; I fay, befides all these, even the opinion they had of their own numbers, of which every one in particular hoped that it would not fall to his turne to fight, filled every of them with the care of their owne fafetie, without any intent at all to harzard any thing but their owne breath, and that of their horses, in running away. The Macedonians, as they came to fight, and thereby to enrich themselves with the gold and jewels of Persia, both which they needed; so the Persians, who expected nothing in that Warre but blowes and wounds, which they needed not, obeyed the King who had power to constraine them in assembling themselves for his service; but their owne feares and cowardife, which in time of danger had most power over them, they onely then obeyed, when their rebellion against so servile a passion did justly and violently require it. For, saith Vegetius: Quemadmodum bene exercitatus miles pralium capit, ita formidat indoctus; nam sciendum est in pugna usum amplius prodesse quam vires; As the well-practifed Souldier desires to come to battaile, so the raw one feares it: for we must understand, that in fight it more availes to have beene accustomed unto the like, than only to have rud Arength. What manner of men the Perfians were, Alexander discovered in the first encounter, before which time it is said, by those that write his story, that is was hard to judge, whether his daring to undertake the conquest of an Empire so well peopled, with a handfull of men, or the successe he had, were more to be wondred at. For at the River of Granick, which severeth the Territory of Troy from Propontis, the Persians fought to stop his passage, taking the higher ground and banke of the River to defend, which Alexander was forced (as it were) to clime up unto, and scale from the Level of the water. Great refistance (faith Curtius) was made by the Persians, yet in the end Alexander prevailed. But it feemes to me, that the victory then gotten was exceeding eafie, and that the twenty thousand Persian foot-men, said to be slaine, were rather kill'd in the backe, in running away, than hurt in the bosomes by refisting. For had those twenty thousand foot, and two hundred and fiftie horsemen, or after Plutarch, two thousand and five hundred horse-men, dyed with their faces towards the Macedonians, Alexander could not have bought their lives at so small a rate, as with the losse of soure and thirty of all forts of his own. And if it were also true, that Plutarch doth report, how Alexander encountred two of the Persian Commanders, Spithridates and Rhasaces, and that the Puffanhorse-men fought with great furie, though in the end scattered; and lastly, how those Gracians in Darius his pay, holding themselves in one body upon a piece of ground of advantage, did (after mercy was refused them) fight it our to the last; how dothit then resemble truth, that such resistance having beene made, yet of Alexanders Army there fell but twelve Foot-men, and two and twenty Horsemen?

§. III. A digression concerning the defence of hard passages. Of things following the battaile of Granicke.

He winning of this passage did greatly encourage the Macedonians, and brought fuch terrour upon all those of the lesser Asia, as he obtained all the Kingdomes thereof without a blow, some one or two Townes excepted. For in all invasions, where the Nations invaded have once beene beaten upon a great advantage of the place, as in defence of Rivers, Streights, and Mountaines, they will soone have perswaded themselves, that such an enemy upon equall termes and even ground, can hardly berefisted. It was therefore Machiavels counsell, That he which resolveth to desend a passage, should with his ablest force oppose the Assailant. And to say truth, few Regions of any great circuit are so well fenced, that Armies of such force as may be thought suffident to conquer them, can be debarred all entrance, by the naturall difficultie of the wayes. One passage or other is commonly left unguarded: if all be defended, then must the forces of the Country bee diffracted; and yet lightly some one place will bee found that is defended every weakely. How often have the dipes given way to Armies, breaking into Italy? Yea, where shall we find that ever they kept out an invader? Yet are they fuch as (to speake briefly) afflict with all difficulties those that travaile overthem; but they give no security to those that Ive behinde them: for they are of too large extent. The townes of Lombardy perswaded themselves that they might enjoy their quiet, when the Warlike Nation of the Switzers had undertaken to hinder Francis the French King from descending into the Dutchy of Milan: but whilest these Patrons of Milan, whom their own dwelling in those Mountaines had made fittest of all other for such a service, were busied in custody of the Alpes ; Francis appeared in Lombardy, to so much the greater terrour of the Inhabitans, by how much the leffe they had expected his arrivall. What shall wee say of those Mountaines, which locke up whole Regions in fich fort, as they leave but one gate open. The Streights, or (as they were called) the gates of Taurus in Cilicia, and those of Thermopyla, have seldome beene attempted, Pethaps because they were thought impregnable : but how feldome (if ever) have they beene attempted in vaine : Xerxes, and long after him, the Romans, forced the entrance of VVV 2 Thermopyle:

CHAP. 2. 5.7.

Thermopyle: Cyrus the yonger, & after him Alexander, found the Gates of Cilicia Wide open show strongly soever they had bin locked and barred, yet were those Countries open enough to a fleet that should enter on the backe-side. The defence of Rivers how hard a thing it is, we finde examples in all histories that beare good witnesse. The deepeft have many Foords; the swiftest and broadest may bee passed by Boates, in case it be found a matter of difficulty to make a bridge. Hee that hath men enow to defend all the length of his owne banke, hath also enow to beate his enemy; and may therefore doe better to let him come over, to his loffe, than by striving in vaine to hinder the Dafe fage, as a matter tending to his owne disadvantage, fill the heads of his Souldiers with an opinion, that they are in ill case, having their meanes of safeguard taken from them, by the skill or valour of fuch as are too good for them. Certainely, if a River were fufficient defence against an Army, the Isle of Mona, now called Anglesey, which is divided from North-Wales by an arme of the Sea, had beene fafe enough against the Romans. invading it under conduct of Julius Agricola. But he wanting, and not meaning to frend the time in making veffels to transport his forces, did affay the foords. Whereby he fo amazed the enemies attending for ships and such like provision by Sea, that surely beleeving nothing could behard or invincible to men, which came so minded to Warre, they humbly intreated for peace, and yeelded the Iland. Yet the Britaines were men from enough, the Persians were very dastards.

It was therefore wifely done of Alexander, to passe the River of Granick in face of the reenmy; not marching higher to seeke an easier way, nor labouring to convey his men over it by some safer meanes. For, having beaten them upon their owne ground, he did thereby cut off no lesse of their reputation, than of their strength, leaving no hope of sic.

cour to the partakers and followers of such unable Protectors.

Soone after this victory he recovered Sardis, Ephefus, the Cities of the Trallians and Magnefia, which were rendred unto him. The inhabitants of which, with the people of the Countrie, hee received with great grace, suffering them to be governed by their owne lawes. For he observed it well; Novum Imperium inchoantibus utilis elemente sum is it is commodious unto such as lay the foundations of a new Soveraignty, to bave the sum of being mercifull. He then by Parmenio wan Miletus, & by force mastred Halicarnassum, which because it resisted obstinately, hee razed to the ground. From whence he ented into Caria, where Ada the Queene, who had beene cast out of all that she held (except the City of Alinda) by Darius his Lievtenants, presented her selfe unto him, and adopted him her son and successour; which Alexander accepted in so gracious part, as helest the whole Kingdome to her disposing. He then entred into Lycia, and Pamphylia, & obtained all the Sea coasts, and subjecting unto him Pssidia, he directed himselfe towards Darius (who was said to be advanced towards him with a marvellous Army) by the way of Phrygia: For all the Province of Asia the lesse, bordering upon the Sea, his sirst vidory layed under his feet.

While he gave order for the government and fetling of Lycia, and Pamphylia, they fent Cleander to raife some new Captaines in Peloponnesus, and marching towards the North, he entred Celenas seated on the River Meander, which was abandoned unto him, the Castle onely holding out, which also after forty dayes was given up: for so long time he gave them to attend succour from Darius. From Celenas he past on through Phrygia towards the Euxine Sea, till he came to a city called Gordium, the Regall seats, in former times, of King Midas. In this City it was that he found the Gordian-knot, which when he knew not how to undoe, he cut it assures with his sword. For there was an arcient prophecie did promise to him that could untie it, the Lordship of all Asia, where upon Alexander, not respecting the manner how, so it were done, assumed to himself the fulfilling of the prophecie, by hewing it in pieces.

But before he turned from this part of Afia the leffe towards the east, he tooke care to cleare the Sea-coast on his backe, and to thrust the Persians out of the Ilands of Leibs, Chio, and Coos: the charge whereof he committed unto two of his Captaines, giving them such order as hethought to bee most convenient for that service; and delivering unto them sifty Talents to desiral the charge; and with all out of his first spoyle gotten, he sent threescore Talents more to Anipater his Lievtenant in Greece and Main. From Celenas he removed to Ancira, now called Angueri, standing on the same siver of Sangarius, which runneth through Gordium: there hee mustered his Army, and then entred Paphlagonia, whose people submitted themselves unto him, and obtained freedome of tribute: where he left Catus Governor with one Regiment of Macedonians lately arrived.

Here he understood of the death of Memnon, Darius Lievtenant, which heartned him greatly to passe on towards him; for of this only Captaine he had more respect than of all the multitude by Darius affembled, and of all the Commanders he had befides. For fomuch hath the spirit of some one man excelled, as it hath undertaken and effected the alteration of the greatest States and Common-weales, the erection of Monarchies, the conquest of Kingdomes and Empires, guided handfulls of men against multitudes of equallbodily strength, contrived victories beyond all hope and discourse of reason, convented the fearefull passions of his owne followers into magnanimity, and the valour of his enemies into cowardize; fuch spirits have bin stirred up in fundry Ages of the world, and in divers parts thereof, to crect and cast downe againe, to establish and to dedroy, and to bring all things, Perfons and States, to the same certaine ends, which the infinite Spirit of the Universall, piercing, moving, and governing all things, hath ordained. Certainely the things that this King did, were marvellous, and would hardly have bin undertaken by any man else : and though his Father had determined to have invaded the leffer Afa, it is like enough that he would have contented himselfe with some panthereof, and not have discovered the River of Indus: as this man did. The swife course of victory, wherewith he ran over so large a portion of the World, in so short a foace, may justly be imputed unto this, that he was never encountred by an equall spirit. concurring with equall power against him. Hereby it came to passe that his actions beinglimited by no greater opposition, than defart places, and the meerelength of tedious journies could make, were like the Colossus of Rhodes, not so much to be admired for the workmanship, though therein also praise-worthy, as for the huge bulke. For certainly thethings performed by Xenophon, discover as brave a spirit as Alexanders, and working moleffe exquisitely, though the effects were leffe materiall, as were also the forces and power of command, by which it wrought. But he that would finde the exact patterne of anoble Commander, must looke upon such as Epaminondas, that encountring worthy Captaines, and those better followed than themselves, have by their singular vertue over-topped their valiant enemies, and still prevailed over those, that would not have yeelded one foor to any other. Such as these are, doe seldome live to obtaine great Empires. For it is a worke of more labour and longer time, to master the equal forces of onehardie & well-ordered State, than to tread down and utterly fubdue a multitude of servile Nations, compounding the body of a groffe unweildie Empire. Wherefore these Parvo Potentes, men that with little have done much upon enemies of like ability, are to be regarded as choise examples of worth; but great Conquerours, to be rather admired for the substance of their actions, than the exquisite managing : exactnesse and greatnesse concurring fo seldome, that I can find no instance of both in one, save onely that brave Roman, Cæfar.

Having thus farre digreffed, it is now time that we returne unto our Easterne Conqueror; who is travailing hastily towards Cilicia, with a defire to recover the Streights thereof before Darius should arrive there. But first making a dispatch into Greece, he sent to those cities, in which he reposed most trust, some of the Persian Targets which he had recovered in his first battaile; upon which, by certaine inscriptions, he made them partikers of his victory. Herein he well advised himselfe; for he that doth not as well impart of the honour which he gaines in the Warres, as he doth of the spoiles, shall never belong followed of those of the better fort. For men which are either well borne or well bred, and have more of wealth than of reputation, do as often satisfie themselves with the purchase of glory, as the weake in fortune, and strong in courage, doe with the gaine ofgold and filver.

The Governour of Cilicia hearing of Alexanders comming on, left fome Companies to keepe the Streights, which were indeede very defencible; and withall, as Curtius noteth, hee began overlate to prife and put in execution the Counfell of Memnon: who in the beginning of the Warres advised him to waste all the provisions for Men and Horse, that could not be lodged in strong places, & alwaies to give ground to the Invader, till he found some such notable advantage as might affuredly promise him the obtaining of victory. For the sury of an invading Army is best broken, by delayes, change of diet, and want, eating sometimes too little, and sometimes too much, sometimes reposing themselves in beds, and more oftner on the cold ground. These and the like suddaine alterations bring many diseases upon all nations out of their own Countries. Therefore if Darius had kept the Macedonians but a while from meat and sleepe, &, refusing to give or take battaile, had wearied them with his light horse, as the Parthians afterward did the Romans, he might perchance have saved his owne life, and his estate. For it was one of the greatest incouragements given by Alexander, to the Macedonians, in the third and last fatall battaile, that they were to fight with all the strength of Persia at once.

Xerxes, when he invaded Greece & fought abroad, in being beaten, loft only his men; but Darius being invaded by the Greekes, & fighting at home, by being beaten, loft his to Kingdom. Pericles though the Lacedamonians burnt all in Attica to the Gates of Athens, yet could not be drawne to hazzard a battaile: for the invaded ought evermore to fight upon the advantage of time and place. Because wee reade Histories to inform our understanding by the examples therein found, wee will give fome instances of those that have perished by adventuring in their owne Countries, to charge an invading Armie. The Romans, by fighting with Hannibal, were brought to the brinke of their destruction.

Pompey was well advised for a while, when he gave Casar ground, but when by the importunity of his Captaines he adventured to fight at Pharsalia, he lost the battaile, lost the freedome of Rome, and his owne life.

Rerdinand, in the Conquest of Naples, would needs fight a battaile with the French to his confusion, though it was told him by a man of sound judgement, that those Counsels which promise surery in all things, are honourable enough.

The Constable of France made frustrate the mighty preparation of Charles the Fist, when he invaded Provence, by wasting the Countrie, & forbearing to fight; so did the Duke of Alva wearie the French in Naples, and dissolve the boosterous Army of the Prince of Orange in the low-Countries.

The Leigers, contrarie to the advice of their Generall, would needs fight a battaile with the Bourgonians, invading their Country, and could not be perfwaded to linger the time, and fray their advantage; but they lost eight and twenty thousand upon the place. 39 Philip of Valois setupon King Edward at Chessie; and King John (when the English were well-neere tired out, and would in short time by an orderly pursuit have beene wasted to nothing) constrained the black Prince with great sury, neere Poitiers, to joyne battaile with him: But all men know what lamentable successe these two French Kings sound. Charles the fift of France made another kind of Fabian-Warfare; & though the English burnt and wasted many places, yet this King held his resolution to sorbeare blowes, and followed his advice, which told him, That the English could never gethis inheritance by smoake; and it is reported by Belloy and Herrault, that King Edward was wont to say of this Charles, that he wan from him the Dutchy of Guyen without ever putting on his Armour.

But where God hath a purpose to destroy, wise men grow short-lived, and the charge of things is committed unto such as either cannot see what is for their good, or know not how to put in execution any sound advice. The course which Memnon had propounded, must in all appearence of reason have brought the Macedonian to a great perplexity, and made him stand still a while at the Streights of Cilicia, doubting whether it were more shamefull to return, or dangerous to proceede. For, had Cappadocia & Paphlagenia bin wasted whilest Alexander was farre off; and the Streights of Cilicia been defended by Arsenes, Governor of that Province, with the best of his forces; hunger would not have suffered the enemy, to stay the triall of all meanes that might be thought upon, of forcing that passage: or if the place could not have bin maintained, yet might Cilicia, stat better leisure have bin so throughly spoiled, that the heart of his Army should have beene broken, by seeking our miseries by painfull travaile.

But Arfenes leaving a small number to defend the Streights, tooke the best of his Armie with him, to waste & spoile the Country; or rather, as may seeme, to finde himself some worke, by pretence of which he might honestly run further away from Alexander. Hee should rather have adventured his person incustody of the Streights, whereby he might perhaps have saved the Province; and in the meane time, all that was in the fields, would have beene conveighed into strong Townes. So should his Army, if it were driven from the place of advantage, have found good entertainement within walled Cities, and himfelfe with his horse-men have had the lesse worke in destroying that little which was less abroad. Handling the matter as hedid, he gave the Gilicians cause to wish for Alexanders comming, and as great cause to the Keepers of the passage not to hinder it. For cowards are wise in apprehending all formes of danger. These Guardians of the Streights, hearing that Arsens made all haste to joyne himselfe with Darins, burning downe all as he went, like one despairing of the desence, began to grow circumspect, and nothinke that surely their Generall, who gave as lost the Countrie behinde their backes, but to dull the Macedonian swords. Wherefore, not affecting to die for their Prince and Countrie (which honour they saw that Arsens himselfe could well forbeare) they specify without labour got both the entrance of Cilicia, abandoned by the cowardise of his Enemies, and the whole Province that had beene alienated from the Persian side by their indiscretion.

§. IIII.

of the unwarlike Army levied by Darius against Alexander. The unadvised courses which Darius tooke in this expedition. He is vanquished at Issus, where his Mother, Wise, and Children are made prisoners: Of some things following the battaile of Issus.

Nthe meane season Darius approched; who (as Curtius reports) had compounded an Army of more than two hundred and ninety thousand Souldiers, out of divers Nations; Justine musters them at three hundred thousand Foot, and a hundred thousand Horse; Plut arch at fixe hundred thousand.

Themanner of his comming on, as Curtius describes it, was rather like a masker than a man of Warre, and like one that tooke more care to fet out his glory and riches, than to provide for his own fafety, perswading himselfe, as it seemed, to beat Alexander with pompe and fumptuous Pageants. For, before the Armie there was carried the holy fire. which the Persians worshipped, attended by their Priests, and after them three hundred and threescore and five young-men, answering the number of the dayes of the yeare, cowredwith Scarlet ; then the Chariot of Jupiter drawne with white Horses , with their Riders cloathed in the same colour, with rods of gold in their hands; And after it, the Horse of the Sunne: Next after these follow ten sumptuous Chariots, in-layed and garnisht with filver and gold; & then the Vantguard of their horse, compounded of twelve swerall Nations, which the better to avoid confusion, did hardly understand each others language; and these marshalled in the head of the rest, being beaten, might serve very filly to disorder all that followed them: in the taile of these Horses the Regiment of foot marched, with the Persians called immortall, because if any died, the number was prelarly supplied: & these were armed with chaines of gold, & their coates with the same metall imbroidered, whereof the fleeves were garnished with pearle; baites, either to catch the hungry Macedonians withall, or to perswade them that it were great incivility to cutand to deface such glorious garments. But is was well said: Sumptuose indutus wiles, se virtute superiorem aliis non existimet, cum in praliis oporteat fortitudine animi, & Mn vestimentis muniri, quoniam hostes vestibus non debellantur; Let no man thinke that he exceedeth those in valour, whom he exceedeth in gay garments; for it is by men armed with suitude of minde, and not by the apparell they put on, that enemies are beaten. And it was Pichance from the Roman Papyrius that this advice wasborrowed, who when he fought against the Sammites in that farall battaile, wherein they all sware either to prevaile or dy, thirty thousand of them having apparelled themselves in white garments, with high crefts and great plumes of feathers, bade the Roman Souldiers to lay afide all feare : Non emm cristas vulnera facere, & per piela atque aurata scuta transire Romanum pilum; For the plumed crefts would wound no body, and the Romane pile would bore holes in painted and silded Ibiglds.

To fecond this Court-like company, fifteene thousand were appointed more rich and glittering than the former, but apparelled like Women (belike to breed the more terrour) & these were honoured with the Title of the Kings Kinsmen. Then came Darius himselfe.

himselfe, the Gentle-men of his Guard-robe, riding before his Chariot, which was sunported with the gods of his Nation, cast and cut in pure gold; these the Macedonians did not ferve, but they ferved their turnes of these, by changing their massie-bodies into thin portable and currant coyne. The head of this Chariot was fet with precious stones. with two little golden Idols, covered with an open-winged-Eagle of the fame metall. The hinder part being raised high whereon Darrus sate, had a covering of inestimable val lue. This Chariot of the King was followed withten thousand Horse-men, their Lances plated with filver, and their heads guilt; which they meant not to imbrue in the Ma. cedemonian bloud, for feare of marring their beauty. Hee had for the proper Guard of his owne person, two hundred of the bloud Royall; bloud too Royall and precious to be spile by any valorous adventure, (I am of opinion that two hundred sturdy fellowes, 10 like the Smitzers, would have done him more fervice) and these were backt with thirty thousand foot-men, after whom againe were led foure hundred spare horses for the King, which if he had meant to have used, he would have marshalled somewhat nearer

The fourth Booke of the first part

Now followed the Reareward, the same being led by Sifigambis the Kings Mother. and by his wife, drawn in glorious Chariots, followed by a great traine of Ladies their attendants on horse-backe, with fifteene Wagons of the Kings children, and the wives of the Nobility, waited on by two hundred and fiftie Concubines, and a world of Nurfes and Eunuchs, most sumptuously apparrelled. By which it should seeme that Darins 10 thought that the Macedonians had bin Comedians or Tumblers; for this troope was far fitter to behold those sports than to bee present at battailes. Betweene these and a company of flight-armed flaves, with a world of Vallets, was the Kings treasure, charged on fixe hundred Mules, and three hundred Camels, brought, as it proved, to pay the Ma. cedenians. In this fort came the May-game-King into the field, incumbred with a most unnecessary traine of Strumpets, attended with troupes of divers Nations, speaking divers languages, and for their numbers impossible to bee marshalled; and for the most part so effeminate, and so rich in gold and in garments, as the same could nor but have encouraged the nakedit Nation of the world against them. We finde it in daily experience, that all discourse of magnanimity, of Nationall Vertue, of Religion, of Liberty, and 10 whatsoever else hath bin wont to move and incourage vertuous men, hath no forceat all with the common-Souldier, in comparison of spoile and riches. The rich ships are boorded upon all disadvantages, the rich Townes are furiously assaulted, and the plentifull Countries willingly invaded. Our English nation have attempted many places in the Indies, and run upon the Spaniards head-long, in hope of their Royals of plate, and Pistolets; which, had they bin put to it upon the like disadvantages in Ireland, or in any poore Country, they would have turned their Peeces and Pikes against their Commanders, contesting that they had bin brought without reason to the Butchery and slaughter. It is true that the warre is made willingly, and for the most part with good successe, that is ordained against the richest Nations; for as the needle are alwayes adventurous, so plentie is wont to shunne perill, and men that have well to live, do rather studie how to live well, I meane wealthily, than care to die (as they call it) honourably. Car où il n'y 4 rien a gaigner que des coups, volontiers il n'y va pas. No man makes haste to the market, where there is nothing to be bought but blowes.

Now if Alexander had beheld this preparation before his confultation with his Sooth faiers, he would have fatisfied himselfe by the out-sides of the Persians, and never have looked into the intrailes of Beasts for successe. For leaving the description of this second battell (which is indeed no-where well described, neither for the confusion & hastie nutming away of the Afians could it be) we have enough by the flaughter that was made of them, & by the few that fell of the Macedonians, to informe us what manner of refiltance was made. For if it be true that threescore thousand Persian footmen were slaine in this battaile, with ten thousand of their horsemen: Or (as Curtim faith) an hundred thousand footmen, with the same number of horsemen, and besides this slaughter, forty thousand taken prisoners, while of Alexanders Armie there miscarried but two hundred & fourtscore of all forts, of which numbers Arrianus & other Historians cut off almost the one halfe: I doe verily beleeve, that this small number rather died with the over-travaile& paines-taking in killing their enemies, than by any strokes received from them. And furely if the Persian Nation (at this time degenerate & the basest of the World) had had any favour remaining of the ancient valour of their fore-fathers; they would never have fold fo good cheape, and at fo vile a price, the Mother, the Wife, the Daughters, and other the Kings children; had their owne honour been evalued by them at nothing; and the Kings suferie and his estate at lesse. Darius by this time found it true, that Charidenus abanished Gracian of Athens had told him, when he made a view of his Army about Es. bylan, to wit, That the multitude which he had affembled of divers Nations, richly attired, but poorely armed, would be found more terrible to the Inhabitants of the countrey, whom in passing by they would devoure, than to the Macedonians, whom they meant to affaile; who being all old and obedient Souldiers, imbattailed in groffe squadrons, which they call their Phalanx, well covered with Armour for defence, and furnifled with weapons for offence of great advantage, would make fo little accompt of his delicate Persians, loving their ease and their palar, being withall ill armed and worse disoplined, as except it would please him to entertain (having so great aboundance of treafireto do it withall) a sufficient number of the same Gracians, and so to encounter the Macedonians with men of equall courage, he would repent him overlate, as taught by the

But this discourse was so unpleasing to Darius (who had bin accustomed to nothing so much as to his owne praises, and to nothing so little as to heare truth;) as he commanded that this poore Gracian should bee presently slaine: who while he was a fundring in the Tormentors hand, used this speech to the King, That Alexander, against whom he hadgiven this good counsell, should affuredly revenge his death, and lay deserved punilment upon Darius for despising his advice.

It was the faying of a Wile man: Desperata ejus Principis salus est scujus aures ita formate sunt sut aspera que utilia, nec quicquam nisi jucundum accipiat; Than Princes safetie is inadesperate case, whose eares judge all that is profitable to be too sharpe, and will entertaine nothing that is unpleasant.

For liberty in counsell is the life and essence of counsell; Libertas consilir est ejus vita, & effentia, qua erepta confilium evanescit.

Darius did likewise value at nothing the advice given him by the Gracian Souldiers that ferved him, who intreated him not to fight in the Streights: But had they beene Counsellers and directors in that Warre, as they were underlings and communded by others, they had with the helpe of a good troupe of horse-men bin able to have opposed theflay of Alexander, without any affiftance of the Persian foot-men. For when Darius was overthrowne with all his cowardly and confused rabble, those Gracians, under their Captaine Amyntas, held firme, & marched away in order, indefpight of the vanquishers. Old Souldiers are not eafily difinayed: we reade in Histories ancient and moderne, what brave retraits have bin made by them, though the rest of the Army in which they have served, hath bin broken.

At the battaile of Ravenna, where the Imperialls were beaten by the French, a squaodron of spaniards, old Souldiers, came off unbroken & undifinayed, whom when Gafton de Foix, Duke of Nemours, and Nephew to Lewis the twelfth, charged, as holding the victory not entire by their escape, hee was over-turned and slaine in the place. For it is truely faid of those men, who, by being acquainted with dangers, fear them not, That, Neglecto periculo imminentis mali opus ipsum quantumvis difficile aggrediuntur; They goe about the businesse it selfe, how hard soever it be not standing to consider of the danger, which the mischiefe hanging over their heads, may bring : and as truely of those that know the warres but by hearc-fay; Quod valentes funt & prevalentes ame pericula, in ipsis tamen poiculis discedunt; They have ability enough, and to spare, till dangers appeare; but when perillindeed comes, they get them gone.

These Gracians also that made the retrait, advised Darius to retire his Army into the plaine of Mesopotamia, to the end that Alexander being entred into those large fields and great Champions, hee might have invironed the Macedonians on all fides with his multitude; and withall they counselled him to divide that his huge Army into parts, not committing the whole to one stroke of Fortune, whereby he might have fought many battailes, and have brought no greater numbers at once than might have been well marshalled & conducted. But this counsell was so contrary to the cowardly affections of the Persians, as they perswaded Darius to inviton the Gracians which gave the advice, and to cut them in pieces as Traitors. The infinite wisedome of God dothnot work alwayes by one and the same way, but very often in the alteration of Kingdomes and Estates by taking understanding from the Governours, so as they can neither give not discerne of Counsels. For Darius that would needs fight with Alexander upon a streightned piece of ground, neere unto the City of Iss, where he could bring no more hands to fight than Alexander could, (who by the advice of Parmenio staied there, as in a place of best advantage) was utterly overthrown, his Treasure lost, his Wife, Mother, and Children (whom the Gracians his followers had perswaded him to leave in Babylon, or elsewhere) taken prisoners, and all their traine of Ladies spoiled of their rich Garments, Jewels, and Honour. It is true, that both the Queeno, with her Daughters, who had the good hap to be brought to Alexanders presence, were entertained with all respect due unto their birth, 10 their Honours preserved, and their Jewels and rich Garments restored unto them; and though Darrus Wife was a most beautifull Lady, and his Daughters of excellent forme. yet Alexander mastred his affections towards them all: only it is reported out of Aristobulus the Historian, that he imbraced the wife of the valiant Memnon, her Husband larely dead, who was taken flying from Damascus by Parmenio, at which time the Daughters of Ochus, who reigned before Darius, and the Wives and Children of all the Nobility of Persia in effect, fell into captivity; at which time also Darius Treasure (not lost at Is was seized, amounting to fixe thousand and two hundred talents of coine, and of Bullion five hundred talents, with a world of riches besides.

Darius himselfe leauing his brother dead, with divers other of his chiefe Captaines, 201

(casting the Crowne from his head) hardly escaped.

After this overthrow given unto Darius, all Phanicia (the City of Tyre excepted)was yeelded to Alexander, of which Parmenio was made Governour.

Aradus, Zidon, and Biblos, maritimate Cities of great importance, of which one strato was King (but hated of the people) acknowledged Alexander. Good fortune followed him so fast that it trod on his heeles; for Antigonus, Alexanders Lievtenant in Asathe lesse, overthrew the Cappadocians, Paphlagonuns, & others lately revolted; Aristodenus, Darius Admiral, had his Fleet partly taken, & in part drowned by the Macedonians newly levied; the Lacedamonians that warred against Antipater were beaten, soure thousand those Greeks which made the retrait at the last battaile, for saking both the party of Darius & of Alexander, & led by Amyntus into Egypt, to hold it for themselves, were buried there; for the time was not yet come to divide Kingdomes.

Alexander to honour Epheftien, whom he loved most, gave him power to dispose of the Kingdome of Ziden. A man of a most poore estate, that laboured to sustain his life being of the Royall bloud, was commended by the people unto him, who changed his Spade into a Scepter, so as he was beheld both a Beggar and a King in one and the same houre.

It was a good defire of this new King, when speaking to Alexander, he wisht thathe could beare his prosperity with the same moderation, & quietnesse of heart, that he had done his adversity; but ill done of Alexander, in that he would not performe in himselfe that which he commended in another mans desire: for it was a signe that he did but at 44 company, and could not governe his felicity.

While he made some stay in those parts, he received a letter from Darius, importing the ransome of his Wife, his Mother, and his Children, with some other conditions of peace, but such as rather became a Conqueror, than one that had now been twice shamefully beaten, not vouch safing, in his direction, to stile Alexander King. It is true, that the Romans, after that they had received an overthrow by Fyrrhus, returned him a more scorne sull answer upon the offer of peace, than they did before the triall of his force. But as their fortunes were then in the Spring, so that of Darius had already cast lease; the one a resolved, well armed and disciplined Nation, the other cowardly and effeminate.

Alexander disdained the offers of Darius, and sent him word that he not onely directed this letter to a King, but to the King of Darius himselfe.

§. V.

How Alexander besieged and wan the Citie of Tyre.

Lexander comming neere to the City of Tyre, received from them the present of a golden Crowne, with great store of victuals, and other presents, which he tooke very thankefully, returning them answer, That he desired to offer a sacrifice

facrifice to Hercules, the Protector of their Citie, from whom he was descended But the Trians like not his companie within their Walls, but tell him that the Temple of Hercules was feated in the old City adjoyning, now abandoned and desolate. To bee short, Alexander resolved to enter it by force: and though it were a place in all mens opinion impregnable, because the Iland whereon it was built, was eight hundred furlongs from the Maine, yet with the labour of many hands, having great store of stone from the old Tyre, and timber sufficient from Lybanus, hee filled the passage of the Scabetweene the fland and the Maine, which being more than once carried away by the strength of the Seaupon a storme of winde, somtime by the Tyrians fired, and sometime torne asunder, vet with the helpe of his Navie which arrived (during the fiege) from Cyprus, he overcame all difficulties and prevailed, after he had spent seven moneths in that attempt. The Tyrians in the beginning of the fiege had barbaroufly drowned the messengers sent by Alexander, perswading them to render the City, in respect whereof, & of the great losse of time and men, he put eight thousand to the fword, and caused two thousand of those, that escaped the first fury, to bee hanged on Crosses on the Sea-shore, and reserved for flaves (faith Diodore) thirteene thousand; Arrianus reckons them at thirty thousand. Anian: Many more had died, had not the Zidonians, that served Alexander, conveyed great numbers away by shipping unto their owne Citie.

Happy it was for Apollo that the Towne was taken: for one of the Tyrians having Julin. lib. 18. deamt, that this god meant to for fake the City, they bound him fast with a golden chaine to the Idoll of Hercules; but Alexander, like a gracious Prince, loosened him againe.

It is true, that it was a notable enterprife & a difficult, but great things are made greater. For Nabuchodono for had taken it before, and filled up the channell, that lay between the lland and the Maine.

The government of this Territory he gave to Philotas, the Sonne of Parmenio; Cilicia, he committed to Socrates, and Andromachus Lievtenant under Parmenio; Ephestion had charge of the Fleet, and was directed to finde Alexander at GaZa towards Egypt.

§. VI.

How Darius offered conditions of peace to Alexander. Alexander wins GaZa; and deales graciously with the Jewes.

In the meane while Darius sends againe to Alexander, sets before him all the difficulties of passing on towards the East, and layeth the losse of the last battaile to the streightness of the place: he hoped to terresse him by threatning to encompasse him inthe plaine Countries, he bids him to consider, how impossible it was to passe the Rivers of Euphrates, Tigris, Araxes, and the rest, with all such other searefull things: for he that was now filled with nothing but seare, had arguments enow of that nature to present an other. All the Kingdomes betweene the River of Alys, and the Hellesson, he offered him in Dower with his beloved daughter. But Alexander answered, That he offered him nothing but his owne, and that which victory and his own vertue had possess him of; That he was to give conditions, and not to receive any, & that he having passed the Sea it selfe, disdained to thinke of resistance in transporting himselse over Rivers. It is said, that Parmenie, who was now old and full of honour and riches, told the King, That were he Alexander, hee would accept of Darius his offers; to which Alexander answered, That so would he, if he were Parmenie.

But he goes ontowards Egypt, and comming before GaZa, Getù a faithfull servant to Darius, shuts the Gate against him, & desends the Towne with an obstinate resolution, at the siege wherof Alexander received a wound in the shoulder, which was dangerous, and ablow on his legge with a stone. Hee found better men in this place than he did at the former battailes, for he lest so many of his Macedonians buried in the sands of GaZa, that he was forc't to send for a new supply into Greece. Here it was that Alexander sinst began to change condition, & to exercise cruelty. For after that he had entred GaZa by assault, & taken Betic, (whom Josephus calleth Babemess) that was weakened with many wounds, and who never gave ground to the Assaulants, he bored holes through his seete, and caused him to be drawne about the street, whiles he was as yet alive; who being as valiant a man as himselfe, discanded to aske him either life or remission of his torments.

And

And what had he to countenance this his tyrannie, but the imitation of his Ancestor Achilles, who did the like to Hettor? It is true, that cruelty hath alwayes somewhat to cover her deformity.

Lib.11.cap. ult.

From GaZa (faith Josephus) heled his Army towards Jerufalem, a City, for the antiquity and great fame thereof, well knowne unto him while he lay before Tyre; He had fent for some supply thither, which Jaddus the high Priest, being subject and sworners Darius, had refused him. The Jewes therefore fearing his revenge, and unable to refist. committed the care of their estates and safetie to Jaddus, who, being taught by God, issued out of the City covered with his Pontificall Robes, to wit, an upper garment of purple, embroidered with gold, with his Miter, and the plate of gold wherein the name of no God was written, the Priests and Levites in their rich ornaments, & the people in white garments, in a manner fo unufuall, flately and grave, as Alexander greatly admired it. Jose phus reports it, that he fell to the ground before the high Priest, as reverencing the name of God, and that Parmenio reprehended him for it. How soever it was, I am of opinion, that he became so confident in his enterprise, and so assured of the successe after the prophecie of Daniel had been read unto him, wherein he faw himselfe, and the conquest of Persia so directly pointed at, as nothing thence-forth could discourage him or scare him. He confessed to Parmenio (faith Josephus) that in Dio a City of Macedon, when his mind laboured the conquest of Asia, he faw in his sleepe such a person as Jaddus, and so apparelled professing one and the same God; by whom he was incouraged to pursue the purpose he had in hand, with affurance of victory. This apparition, formerly apprehended only by the light of his fantasie, he now beheld with his bodily eyes, wherewith he was fo exceedingly pleased and imboldened, as contrary to the practice of the Phanicians. (who hoped to have fackt and destroyed Jerusalem) he gave the Jewes all, and morethan they defired, both of liberty and immunity, with permission to live under their owne lawes, and to exercise and injoy their owne Religion.

6. VII.

Alexander winnes Egypt: and makes a journie to the Temple of Hammon.

Rom Jerusalem Alexander turned againe towards Egypt, and entred it, where Darius his Lievtenant, Aslaces, received him, and delivered into his handthe City of Memphis, with eight hundred talents of treasure, and all other the Kings riches. By this we see that the King of Persia, who had more of affection than of judgement, gave to the valiantest man he had but the command of one City, and to the veriest coward the government of all Egypt. When he had set things in order in Egypt, he began to travaile after God-head, towards Jupiter Hammon; fo foolish had prosperity made him. He wasto passe over the dangerous and drie sands, where, when the water which he brought on his Camels backe was fpent, he could not but have perished, had 40 not a marvellous showre of raine fallen upon him, when his Army was in extreme defpaire. All men that know Egypt, and have written thereof, affirme, That it never raines there: but the purposes of the Almighty God are secret, & he bringeth to passe what it pleaseth him; for it is also said, That when he had lost his way in those vast desarts, that a flight of Crowes flew before the army; who making fafter wing when they werefollowed, and fluttering flowly when the Army was cast backe, guided them over those pathlesse sands to Jupiters Temple.

Arrianus from the report of Piolomy, the sonne of Lague, faies, That he was led by two Dragons; both which reports may be a-like true. But many of those wonders and things prodigious, are fained by thosethat have writtenthe Storie of Alexander; as, That 5 an Eagle lay hovering directly over his head at the battell of Isu; That a Swallow flew about his head when he slept, and could not be feared from him, till it had wakened him at Halicarnasseus, fore-shewing the treason of Aeropus, practised by Darius to have slaine him; That from the yron barres of which the Tyrians made their defensive engines, when Alexander besieged them, there fell drops of bloud; and that the like drops were found in a loafe of bread, broken by a Macedonian Souldier, at the same time; That a Turfe of earth fell on his shoulder, when he lay before Gaza, out of which there slew ? Bird into the aire. The Spaniards in the conquest of the West Indies have many such nretty tales; telling how they have been affifted in battell by the presence of our Lady. by Angels riding on white horfes, with the like Romish miracles, which I think themfelves do hardly beleeve. The strangest thing that I have read of in this kind being certainly true, was, That the night before the battell at Novara, all the Dogs which followedthe French Army, ran from them to the Switzers, leaping and fawning upon them, as if they had been bred and fed by them all their lives, and in the morning following, Trivally and Tremouille, Generals for Lewis the twelfth, were by these imperial Switzers utterly broken and put to ruine.

The place of this Idoll of Jupiter Hammon is ill described by Curtius, for he bounds it no by the Arabian Troglodites on the South, between whom & the Territory of Hammon, the Region Thebais, or the superiour Egypt, with the Mountains of Lybia, & the River of Nilus, are interjacent; and on the North he joyns it to a Nation called Naffamones, who bordering the Sea-shore, live (saith he) upon the spoyles of shipwrack: whereas the remple or grove of this Idoll hath no Sea neare it by two hundred miles and more, being found on the South part of Lybia; these Nassamones being due West from it, in the Piol. As. Tab. 3.

South part of Marmarica.

CHAP.2. S.8.

When Alexander came neare the place, he fent some of his Parasites before him to practifethe Priests attending the Oracle, That their answer might be given in all things, agreeable to his mad ambition; who affected the title of Jupiters fon. And so he was fablued, son of Jupiter, by the Divels Prophet, whether prepared before to flatter him, or rather (as some think) defective in the Greek tongue; For whereas he meant to say O padien, he faid o pai dies; that is, o Son of Jupiter, in ftead of O deare Son: for which Grammaicall errour he was richly rewarded, and a rumour presently spred, that the great Jupiter had acknowledged Alexander for his owne.

Hehadheard that Perfeus and Hercules had formerly confulted with this Oracle, The one when he was imployed against Gorgon, The other against Anteus and Busirus; and seeingthese menhad derived themselves from the gods, why might not hee ? By this it feens, that he hoped to make his followers and the world fools, though indeed he made himselfe one, by thinking to cover from the worlds knowledge his vanities and vices; and the better to confirme his followers in the beliefe of his Deity, he had practifed the Prefis to give answer to such as consulted with the Oracle; that it should be pleasing to Jupiter to honour Alexander as his Son.

Who this Ammon was, and how represented, either by a Bosse carried in a Boat, or by CHELIDA aRamsor a Rams head, I fee that many wife men have troubled themselves to finde out; butas Arrianus speaks of Dionysius, or Liber Pater (who lived faith S. Augustine, in Mosume) Ea quæ de diis veteres fabulis suis conscripsere, non sunt nimium curiose pervesti-84nda We must not over-curiously scarchinto the fables which the Antients have written of Butthis is certaine and notable, that after the Gospel beganne to be preached in the World, the Divell in this and all other Idols became speechlesse. For, that this Hammon was neglected in the time of Tiberius Cafar, and in the time of Trajan altogether forgotten, Strabo and Plutarch witnesse.

There is found neare his Temple a Fountaine called Fons folis (though Ptolomy in his third Affrican Table fets it farther off) that at mid-night is as hot as boyling water, and at Noone as cold as any yee: to which I cannot but give credit, because I have heard of some other Wels of like nature, and because it is reported by S. Augustine, by Diodore Hondoins, Pliny, Mela, Solinus, Arrianus, Curtius, and others; and indeed our Bathesin England are much warmer in the night than in the day.

How Alexander marching against Darius, was opposed very unskilfully by the Enemy.

Rom the Temple of Hammon hereturned to Memphis, where among many other learned men, he heard the Philosopher Pfammones, who, belike understanding that he affected the title of Jupiters Son, told him that God was the Father-King of all meningenerall; and refining the pride of this haughty King, brought him to fay, That God was the Father of all mortali men, but that he acknowledged none for his children lave good men.

Curt.L.4.

He gave the charge of the severall Provinces of Egypt to severall Governours, following the rule of his Master Aristotle, That a great Dominion (hould not be continued in the hands of any one: whom therein the Romane Emperors also followed, not daring to commit the government of Egypt to any of their Senators, but to men of meaner rank and degree. He then gave order for the founding of Alexandria upon the Wester-most branch of Nilus. And having now fetled (as he could) the estate of Egypt, with the kingdomes of the lesser Asia, Phoenicia and Syria, (which being but the pawns of Darius his ill fortune, one happy victory would readily have redeemed) he led his Army towards Euphrates, which passage though the same was committed to MaZeus to defend, yet was ruphrates, which parage resistance past it. From thence he marched towards to it abandoned, and Alexander without resistance past it. From thence he marched towards to Tigris, a river for the swiftnesse therof called by the Persians, The Arrow. Here, as Curtius, and Reason it selfe tels us, might Darius easily have repelled the invading Macedonian: for the violent course of the streame was such, as it drave before it many weighty stones, and those that moved nor, but lay in the bottome, were so round & well polished by continual rolling, that no man was able to fight on fo flippery a footing, nor the Macedonian foot-mento wade the river, otherwise than by joyning their hands, and enterlacing their armes together, making one weighty and entire body to refift the fwift paffage and furious race of the streame. Besides this notable help, the Channell was so deep towards the Easterne shore, where Darius should have made head, as the soot-men were enforc't to lift their Bowes, and Arrowes, and Darts over their heads to keepe them 19 from being moistned, and made unserviceable by the Waters. But it was truely and understandingly said of Homer,

The fourth Booke of the first part

Talis est hominum terrestrium mens, Qualem quotidie ducit pater virorumq; Deorumq;.

The mindes of men are ever so affected, As by Gods will they daily are directed.

And it cannot be denied, that as all Estates of the world, by the surfeit of mis-government have been subject to many grievous, and sometimes mortall diseases: So had the sempire of Persia at this time brought it selfe into a burning and consuming Feaver, and thereby become frantick and without understanding, foreshewing manifestly the dissolution and death thereof.

But Alexander hath now recovered the Eastern shores of Tigris, without any other difficulty, than that of the nature of the place; where Mazem (who had charge to defend the Passage both of Euphrates and it) presented himselfe to the Macedonians, followed with certaine companies of Horse-men, as if with uneven forces he durst have charged them on even ground, when as with a multitude farre exceeding them, he for sook the advantage which no valour of his enemies could easily have overcome. But it is commonly seene, that seasfull and cowardly men do ever follow those wayes and counsels, whereof the opportunity is already lost.

It is true that he set all provisions a fire wherewith the Macedonians might serve themselves over Tigris, thinking thereby greatly to have distressed them; but the execution of good counsell is fruitlesse, when unseasonable. For now was Alexander so well furnished with carriages, as nothing was wanting to the competency of the Army which he conducted. Those things also which he sought to waste, Alexander being now in sight, were by his Horse-men saved and recovered. This Mazeum might have done some slayes before at good leasure; or at this time with so great a strength of Horse-men, as the Macedonians durst not have pursued them, leaving the strength of their soot out of sight and far behind.

5. IX.
Thenew provisions of Darius. Accidents foregoing the battell of Arbela.

Arius, upon Alexanders first returne out of Egypt, had affembled all the forces, which those Regions next him could furnish, and now also were the Arians Scythians, Indians, and other Nations arrived; Nations (faith Curtins) that is ther served to make up the names of men, than to make resistance. Arrians hat number numbred them with their Leaders; and finds of foot-men of all forts ten hundred thoufand, and of horse foure hundred thousand, besides armed Chariots, and some sew Elephants. Curtius, who musters the Army of Darius at two hundred thousand soot, & near fifty thousand horse, comes (I think) nearer to the true number; and yet seeing hee had more considence in the multitude than in the valour of his Vassals, it is like enough that hehad gathered together of all sorts some three or source hundred thousand, with which he hoped in those fair plains of Assyria, to have over-born the sew numbers of the invading Army. But it is a rule in the Philosophy of the War;

Inomni prælio non tam multitudo, & virtus indotta, quam ars & exercitium solent præ Vese. Sare victoriam; In every battell skill and practice do more towards the victory, than multitude and rude audacity.

While Alexander gave rest to his army after the passage over Tigris, there happened an Eclipse of the Moone, of which the Macedonians, not knowing the cause and reason, were greatly affrighted. All that were ignorant (as the multitude alwaies are) took it for acertain presage of their overthrow and destruction, in so much as they began not only to murmur, but to speake it boldly, That for the ambition of one man, a man that discinct Philip for his father, and would needs be called the son of Jupiter, they should all perish; For henot only enforce them to make war against Worlds of enemies, but a gainst Rivers, Mountaines, and the Heavens themselves.

Hereupon Alexander being ready to march forward, made a halt, & to quiet the minds of the multitude, he called before him the Egyptian Aftrologers, which followed him thence, that by them the Souldiers might be affured that this defection of the Moon was a certain prefage of good fuccesse; for, that it was naturall they never imparted to the common people, but referved the knowledge to themselves, so as a forry Almanack.

Of this kind of superstitious observation Casar made good use, when he sought against Ariovistus & the Germans: for they being persuaded by the casting of lots, that if they sought before the change of the Moone, they should certainely lose the battell, Casar force them to abide it, though they durst not give it, wherein having their minds already whether by their owne superstition, and being resolutely charged by the Romans, the whole Army in effect perished.

These Egyptians gave no other reason than this, That the Grecians were under the aspect of the Sun, the persians of the Moone; and therefore the Moone sailing and being darkened, the state of Persia was now in danger of salling, and their glory of being obscured. This judgement of the Egyptian Priests being noysed through all the Army, allwere satisfied, and their courage redoubled. It is a principle in the Warre, which, though devised since, was well observed then: Exercitum terrore pleasan Dux ad pugnam and ucat; Let not a Captaine lead his Army to the sight, when it is possessed with matter of terrour.

It is truely observed by Curtius, that the people are led by nothing so much as by superstition; yea, we finde it in all stories, and often in our owne, that by such inventions, devised tales, dreames, and prophecies, the people of this Land have been carried head-long into many dangerous tumults and insurrections, and still to their owne losse and mine

As Alexander drew nearethe Persian Army, certaine letters were surprized, written by Darius to the Grecians, perswading them for great summes of mony-either to kill or betray Alexander. But thefe by the advice of Parmenie he suppressed.

At this time also Darius his faire Wife, opprest with sorrow, and wearied with travell, died. Which accident Alexander seemed no lesse to bewaile than Darius, who upon the sufficient bruit, suspected that some dishonourable violence had been offered her; but being faitsssed by an Eunuch of his owne that attended her, of Alexanders kingly respect to wardsher, from the day of her being taken, he desired the immortall Gods, That if they had decreed to make a new Master of the Persian Empire, then it would please them to confer it on so just and consinent an enemy as Alexander, to whom he once againe before the last tryall by battell offered these conditions of peace.

That with his Daughter in marriage he would deliver up and refigne all Asia the lesse, with Egypt, all those kingdoms between the Phœnician sea, & the River of Euphrales; That he would pay him for the ransome of his Mother, and his other Daughters, 30.

thousand talents and that for the performance thereof, he would leave his sonne Occhus inhostage: To this they sought to perswade Alexander by such arguments as they had. Alexander causing the Embassadors to be removed, advised with his Councell, but heard no man speak but Parmenio, the very right hand of his good fortune; who perswaded him to accept of these faire conditions. He told him, that the Empire between Euphrates and Hellespont was a faire addition to Macedon; that the retaining of the Persian prisoners was a great cumber, & the treasure offered for them of far better use than their persons. with divers other arguments; all which Alexander rejected. And yet it is probable that if he had followed his advice, and bounded his ambition within those limits, he might have lived as famous for vertue as for fortune, and left himselfe a Successor of able age to to have enjoyed his estate, which afterward indeed he much enlarged, rather to the greatning of others than himselfe: who to assure themselves of what they hadusurped upon his iffues, left not one of them to draw breath in the world within a few years after. The truth is, That Alexander in going fo far into the East, left behinde him the reputation which he brought out of Macedon; the reputation of a just and prudent Prince, a Prince temperate, advised and gratefull: and being taught new lessons by abundance of prosperity, became a lover of wine, of his owne flattery, and of extreme cruelty. Yea, as Sentes hath observed, the taint of one unjust slaughter, amongst many, defaced and withered the flourishing beauty of all his great acts and glorious victories obtained. But the Perssan Embaffadors ftay his answer, which was to this effect, That what soever he had bestow- 10 ed on the wife and children of Darius, proceeded from his owne naturall clemency and magnanimity, without all respect to their Master, but thanks to an enemy was improper: that he made no Wars against adversity, but against those that resisted him; not against Women and Children, but against armed enemies: and although by the reiterated pra-Etice of Darius, to corrupt his Souldiers, and by great summes of money to perswade his friends to attempt upon his person, he had reason to doubt that the peace offered was rather pretended than meant, yet he could not (were it otherwise and faithfull) resolvein haste to accept the same, seeing Darius had made the Warre against him, not as a King with Royall and overt-force, but as a Traytor by fecret and base practice; That for the Territory offered him, it was already his owne, and if Darius could beat him back again 19 over Euphrates, which he had already past, he would then beleeve that he offered him somewhat in his owne power: Otherwise he propounded to himselfe for the reward of the War which he had made, all those kingdomes as yet in Darius possession; wherein, whether hewere abused by his owne hopes or no, the battell which he meant to fight in the day following should determine. For in conclusion, he told them, that he came into Afia to give, & not to receive; That the heavens could not hold two Suns: and therefore if Darius would be content to acknowledge Alexander for his Superiour, he might perchance be perswaded to give him conditions fit for a second Person, and his Inferiour.

The battell of Arbela: and that it could not be so strongly fought as report

Ith this answer the Embassadors return; Darius prepares to fight, & sends MaZeus to defend a paffage, which he never dared yet for much as to hazzard. Alexander confults with his Captaines, Parmenio perswades him to force Darius his Camp by night; so that the multitude of enemies might not move terrour in the Macedonians being but few. Alexander disdaines to steale the victory, and resolves to bring with him the day-light, to witnesse his valour. But it was the successe that made good Alexanders resolution, though the counsell given by Parmenie was more found : For it is a ground in Warre, Si pauci necessario cum multitudine pagnare cogantur, confilium est nottis tempore belli fortunam tentare. Notwith standing upon the view of the multitude at hand, he ftaggers and trenches himselfe upon a ground of advantage, which the Persian had abandoned: And whereas Darius for feare of surprise had stood with his Army in armour all the day, and forborne sleepe all the night; Alexander gave his men rest and store of foode; for reason had taught him this Rule in the Warre, In pugna Milites validius resistunt, si cibo potuque refetti fuerint, namfames intrinscus magis pugnat, quam ferrum exterius; Souldiers do the better fland to it in fight, if they have their belies full of meate and drinke; for hunger within, fights more eagerly than steele

The numbers which Alexander had, faith Arrianus, were forty thousand foot, & seven thousand horse; these belike were of the Europæan Army: for he had besides both Syrians, Indians, Egyptians, and Arabians, that followed him out of those Regions. He used but a short speech to his Souldiers to encourage them; and I thinke that he needed little Rhetorick's for by the two former battels upon the River of Granick and in Cilicia, the Macedonians were best taught with what men they were to encounter. And it is a true n laying, Victoria victoriam parat, animumque victoribus auget, & adversariis aufert; One victory begets another, and puts courage into those that have already had the better, taking hirit away from those that have been beaten.

Arrianus and Curtius make large discriptions of this battell, fought at Gaugamela; They tell us of many charges and re-charges; That the victory inclined sometime to the Persians, sometime to the Macedonians; That Parmenie was in danger of being overthrowne, who led the left wing; That Alexanders Rear-guard was broken, and his carrimes lost; That for the fierce and valorous encounters on both sides, Fortune her selfe was long unrefolved on whom to bestow the Garland: And lastly, That Alexander in person wrought wonders, being charged in his retrait. But in conclusion, Currus delino versus in account but three hundred dead Macedonians, in all this terrible daies work, faying, That Epheftion, Perdiccas, and others of name were wounded. Arrianus finds nota third part of this number flaine; of the Perfians there fell forty thousand (faith Curius) thirty thousand according to Arrianus: Ninety thousand, if we believe Diodure. But what can we judge of this great encounter, other than that, as in the two formerbattels, the Persians upon the first charge ran away, and that the Macedonians purfied. For if of those foure or five hundred thousand Asians brought into the field by Darins, every man had cast but a dart or a stone, the Macedonians could not have bought the Empire of the East at so easie a rate, as fixe or seven hundred men in three notorious bands. Certainly, if Darius had fought with Alexander upon the banks of Euphrates, p & hadarmed but fifty or threescore thousand of this great multitude, only with Spades, (for the most of all he had were fit for no other weapon) it had been impossible for Alexander to have past that River so easily, much lesse the river of Tigris. But as a man whose Empire God in his providence had determined, he abandoned all places of advantage, and fuffered Alexander to enter fo far into the bowels of his Kingdome, as all hope and possibility of escape by retrait being taken from the Macedonians, they had presented untothem the choice, either of death or victory; to which election Darius could no way constraine his own, seeing they had many large Regions to run into from those that invaded them.

§. XI. Of things following the battell of Arbela. The yeelding of Babylon and Sufa.

Arius after the rout of his Army recovered Arbela the fame night, better followed in his flight, than in the fight. He propounded unto them that ranne after him his purpose of making a retrait into Media, perswading them that the Macolonians, greedy of spoyle and riches, would rather attempt Babylon, Susa, and other Cities filled with treasure, than pursue the vanquished. This miserable resolution his Nobility rather obeyed than approved.

Alexander soon after Darius his departure arrives at Arbela, which with a great masse Oftreasure, and Princely ornaments, was rendred to him: for the feare which conducted Darins, tooke nothing with it but shame and dishonour. He that had been twice beaten, hould rather have sent his treasure into Media, than brought it to Arbela, so nearethe place where he abid the comming of his enemies; if he had been victorious, he might have brought it after him at leasure; but being overcome, he knew it unpossible to drive Mules and Camels laden with gold from the pursuing Enemy, seeing himselfe, at the o-Venhrow he had in Cilicia, cast the Crowne from his head, to run away with the more peed. But errors are then best discerned when most incurable. Et preterita magis reprebindi possimit quam corrigi; It is easier to reprehend than amend what is past.

CHAP. 2. S. 12.

An.b. Alex.

From Arbela Alexander tooke his way towards Babylon, where Mazem, in whom Darim had most considence, rendred himselfe, his Children and the Citie. Also the Capt ain of the Castle, who was keeper of the treasure, strewed the streets with slowers. burnt frankincense upon Altars of silver as Alexander passed by, and delivered unto him whatfoever was committed to his trust. The Magi (the Chaldean Astrologers) followed this Captaine in great folemnitie to entertaine their new King: after these came the Babylonian horsemen, infinite rich in attire, but exceeding poorein warlike furniture. Betweene these (though not greatly to be feared) and himselfe, Alexander caused his Macedonian foot-men to march. When he entred the Castle, headmired the glorie thereof, and the aboundance of treasure therein found, amounting to 10 fiftie thousand talents of filver uncoyned. The Citie it selfe I have elsewhere described with the Walls, the Towers, the Gates and Circuit, with the wonderfull place of pleafure about two miles in Circuit, furrounded with a Wall of fourescore foot high, and on the top thereof (being under-borne with Pillars) a Grove of beautifull and fruitfull trees, which it is faid that one of the Kings of Babylon caused to be built, that the Queene and other Princesses might walke privately therein. In this Citie, rich in all things, but most of all in voluptuous pleasures, the King rested himselfe and the whole Armie source and thirtie dayes, consuming that time in banquetting and in all forts of effeminate exercife; which fo much softned the minds of the Macedonians, not acquainted til now with the like delicacies, as the fevere discipline of war, which taught them the sufferances of 10 hunger and thirst, of painefull travell, and hard lodging, began rather to be forgotten. than neglected.

The fourth Booke of the first part

Here it was that those bands of a thousand Souldiers were erected, and Commanders appointed overthem, who thereupon were stiled Chiliarchi. This new order Alexander brought in, was to honour those Captains which were found by certaine selected Judges to have deserved best in the late war. For before this time the Macedonian companies consisted but of five hundred. Certainly the drawing down of the foot-bands in this latter age hath been the cause (saith the Marshall Monluss) that the title and charge of a Captaine hath bin best owed on every Picque-Boufor Spurn-Cow; for when the Captaines of soot had a thousand Souldiers under one Ensigne, and after that five hundred, as in the time of Francis the first, the title was honorable, and the kings were lesse charged, and far better served. K. Henry the eighth of England never gave the commandement of any of his good ships, but to men of knowne valour, and of great estate, nay sometime he made two Gentlemen of qualitie Commanders in one ship: but all orders and degrees while Alexander was yet in Babylon, there came to him a great supply out of Europe; for Antipater sent him fixe thousand foot and five hundred horse out of Macedon; of Thracians three thousand foot, and the like number of horse; & out of Greece fourthoufand and foure hundred horse, by which his Armie was greatly strengthened: for those that were insected with the pleasures of Babylon, could hardly be brought againe, Designitude of the pleasures of Babylon, could hardly be brought againe.

He left the Castle and Citie of Babylon, with the Territories about it, in charge with three of his owne Captains, to wit, Agathon, Minetus, and Appolidorus; to supply all wants, a thousand talents: but to grace Mazeus, who rendred the Citie unto him, he gave him the title of his Lievtenant over all, and tooke with him Bagistines that gave up the Castle, and having distributed to every Souldier a part of the Treasure, he left Babilon, and entred into the Province Satrapene: from thence he went on towards Sufain Persia, the same which Ptolomy, Herodotus, and Elianus call Memnonia, situate on the iver Euleus,a Citic sometime governed by Daniel the Prophet. Abulites also, Governor of this famous Citie, gave it up to the Conqueror, with fiftie thousand talents of filverin Diador Speaketh bullion, and twelve Elephants for the warre, with all other the treasures of Darius. In of more than this fort did those Vassals of fortune, lovers of the Kings prosperitie, not of his person, torty thouland talents in bulli- (for fo all ambitious men are) purchase their owne peace and safetie with the Kingstreaen, and of nine fures. And herein was Alexander well advised, that what soever titles he gave to the Permillions of gold, fubdanicas frans, yet he left all places of importance in trust with his owne Captaines, to will, Babylon, Sufa, and Perfepolis, with other Cities and Provinces by him conquered; for if Darius (as yet living) had beaten the Macedonians but in one battell, all the Nobilite of Persia would have returned unto their naturall Lord. Those that are Traitors to their owne Kings, are never to be used alone in great enterprises by those Princes that entertaine them, nor ever to be trusted with the defences of any frontier-Town, or Formess of weight, by the rendring whereof they may redeem their liberty and estates lost. Hereof the French had experience, when Don Pedro de Navarra, being banished out of Spaine, was trusted with Fonterabe, in the yeare 1523.

While Alexander spoiled Arbela, Mazeus might have furnisht the King from Babylon; and while he stayed sourcand thirty dayes at Babylon, Abulues might have holpen him from Susa: & while he seasted there, Tiridates from Persepolis might have relieved him; for the great masse of Treasure was layd up in that City. But who hath sought out and friended searfull adversity? It is certaine, that benefits bindenot the ambitious, but the honest: for those that are but greedy of themselves, doe in all changes of fortune onely consult the conservation of their owne greatnesses.

The government of Susa, with the Castle and Treasure, he committed to his own Maccolonians, making Abultes, who rendred it unto him, his Lievtenant, as he had done Maccolonians, in giving them titles, but neither trust nor power; for he left three thousend old Souldies in Garrison to assure the place; and Darius mother and her children to repose themselves.

It is faid that Charles the fift, having promifed Charles of Bourbon the government of Marfeilles, if he could have forc't ir, and whereof he made fure accompt, told fome of his potential Counfellors, that he meant nothing lefte than the performance of that promife, because hee should thereby have left the Duke (revolted from his Master) very well wherewithall to have recovered his favour.

6. XII.

How Alexander came to Persepolis and burnt it.

Rom Susa Alexander leadeth his Army toward Persepolis, and when he sought to passe those Mountaines which sunder Susiana and Persia, he was soundly bearen by Ariobar and Susa Who desended against him those Streights, called Pyla Persidis, or Susaide, and after the losse of many Companies of his Macedonians, he was forc't to save himselse by retrait, causing his Foot to march close together, and to cover themselves with their Targets from the stones tumbled on them from the Mountain top. Yet in the end he sound out another path, which a Lycian, living in that Country, discovered unto him, and came thereby suddenly inview of Ariobar Lanes, who being enforc't to fight, uponeven ground, was by Alexander broken, whereupon he sted to Persepolis; but safter that they of Persepolis had resused to receive him) he returned and gave a second charge upon the Macedonians, wherein he was slain. In like manner did King Francis the first, inthe year 1515, sinde a way over the Alpes, the Switzers undertaking to desend all the offices, who, if their sootmanship had not faved them upon the Kings descent on the other side, they had been ill payd for their hard lodging on those Hils:

Four thousand Greeks, saith Curtius (Justine numbers them but at eight hundred) having bin taken prisoners by the Persians, presented themselves to Alexander now in sight of Persepolis. These had the barbarous Persians so maimed and defaced, by cutting off their hands, noses, eares, and other members, as they could no way have been known to their Countri-men, but by their voyces, to each of these Alexander gave three hundred Crownes, with new garments, and such Lands as they liked to live upon.

Tiridates, one of Darius his false-hearted Grandes, hearing of Alexanders approach, made him know that Persepolis was ready to receive him, and prayed him to double his pace, because there was a determination in the people to spoyle the Kingstreasure. This City was abandoned by many of her Inhabitants upon Alexanders arrivall, and they that stayed followed the worst counsell; for all was left to the liberty of the souldiers, to spoyle and kill at their pleasure. There was no place in the world at that time, which, if it had been laid in the ballance with Persepolis, would have weighed it downe. Babylon indeed, and Susa, were very rich; but in Persepolis lay the bulke and main store of the Persians. For a ster the spoyle that had been made of money, curious plate, bullion, Images of gold and silver, and other Jewels; there remained to Alexander himselse one hundred and twenty thousand talents. He left the same number of three thousand Macedonians

CHAP.2. S.12.

Macedonians in Perfepolis, which he had done in Sufa, & gave the fame formall honour to the traitor Tiridates, that he had done to Abalises; but he that had the trust of the place was Nicarides, a creature of his owne. The body of his Army he left here for thirm dayes, of which the Commanders were Parmento and Craterus, and with a thousand horse and certain troupes of chosen foot, he would needs view in the Winter-time those parts of Persia, which the Snow had covered; a fruitlesse and foolish enterprise, but as seneca faies : Non ille ire vult fed non potest fare : He bath met a will to goe, but he is unable to frand fill. It is faid and spoken in his praise, That when his Souldiers cryed out against him because they could not endure the extreme frost, and make way, but with extreme difficulty, through the flow, that Alexander for fook his horse, and led them the way, to But what can be more ridiculous than to bring other meri into extremity, therby to flew how well himselfe can endure it ! His walking on foote did no otherwise take off their wearinesse that followed him, than his sometime forbearing to drinke did quench their thirst, that could lesse endure it. For mise owne little judgement, I shall sather commend that Captain that makes carefull provision for those that follow him, & that seeks wife. ly to prevent extreme necessity, than those witlesse arrogant fools, that make theyanne of having endured equally with the common Souldier, as if that were a matter of great glory and importance.

We find in all the Wars that Cafar made, or the best of the Roman Commanders, that the provision of victuals was their first care. For it was a true saying of Coligni, Admirall 20 of France; That who so will shape that Beast (meaning War) must begin with his belly.

But Alexander is now returned to Persepolis, where those Historians that were most amorous of his vertues, complaine, that the opinion of his valour, of his liberality, of his clemency towards the vanquished, and all other his Kingly conditions, were drowned in drinke; That he fmothered in carowfing cups all the reputation of his actions past, and that by descending, as it were, from the reverend Throne of the greatest King, into the company and familiarity of base Harlots, he began to be despised both of his owne and all other Nations. For being perswaded, when he was inflamed with wine, by the infamous Strumper Thais, he caused the most sumpruous and goodly Castle and Citie of Persepolis to be confirmed with fire, notwithstanding all the arguments of Parmento to to the contrary, who told him that it was a different to deferoy those things by the perfwalions of others, which by his proper vertue and force he had obtained; and that it would be a most strong perswasion to the Asians, to think hardly of him, and the royalien their hearts: for they might well beleeve that he which demolished the goodliest Ornaments they had, meant nothing leffe than (after fuch vaftation) to hold their poffession. Per vinotentiam crudelitas sequetur; Cruelty doth commonly follow drunkennesse: For it fo fell out soone after, and often, in Alexander.

The Treason of Bessus against Darius. Darius his death.

Bout this time hereceived a new supply of Souldiers out of Cilicia, and goson to finde Darius in Media. Darius had there compounded his fourth and last Army, which he meant to have increased in Bactria. had he not heard of Alexanders comming on, with whom (trusting to such companies as he had, which was manbred at thirty or forty thousand) he determined once again to try his fortune. He therefore cals together his Captaines and Commanders, and propounds unto them his refolution, who being desperate of good successe, used silence for a while. Artabazus, one of his eldest men of Warre, who had sometime lived with Philip of Macedon, brakethe se yee, and protesting that he could never be beaten by any adversity of the Kings, from the faith which he had ever ought him, with firme confidence, tharall the rest were of the same condition (whereofthey likewise assured Darens by the like protestation) he approved the Kings resolution. Two only, and those the greatest, to wit, Nabur Zanes and Beffus, whereof the leater was governour of Bactria, had confpired against their Mafter; and therefore advised the King to lay a new foundation for the Warre, and to purfue it by some such person for the present, against whom neither the gods nor fortune had in all things declared themselves to be an enemy: this preamble Nabar Janes used and in conclusion advised the election of his fellow Traitor Besses, with promise that the warres ended, the Empire should againe be restored to Darius. The King swollen with disdain, prest towards Nabur Zanes to have slain him, but Bessus and the Bactrians whom hecommanded, being more in number than the rest, with-held him. In the meane while NaburZanes with-drew himselfe, and Bessus followed him, making their quarter a-part from the rest of the Army. ArtabaZus, the Kings faithfull servant, perswaded him to be advised and serve the time, seeing Alexander was at hand, and that he would at least make shew of forgetting the offence made; which the King being of a gentle disposition, willingly yeelded unto. Beffus makes his fubmiffion, and attends the King, who removes his Army. Patron, who commanded a Regiment of four thousand Greeks, which had in all the former battels ferved Darius with great fidelity, and alwayes made the retrait in spight of the Macedonians, offered himselfeto guard his person, protesting against the Treason of Bessus; but it was not his destiny to follow their advice who from the beginning of the Warre gave him faithfull counsell, but hee enclined still to Bessus, who told him, that the Greeks, with Patron their Captaine, were corrupted by Alexander, and practifed the division of his faithfull servants. Beffus had drawner unto him thirty thouland of the Army, promising them all those things, by which the lovers of the World and themselves are wont to be allured, to wit, riches, safety, and honour.

Now the day following Darius plainly discovered the purposes of Bessus, and being overcome with passion, as thinking himselse unable to make head against these ungratefull and unnatural! Traytors, he prayed Artaba Zus his faithfull servant to depart from him, and to provide for himselfe. In like fort he discharged the rest of his attendants, all favea few of his Eunuches; for his Guards had voluntarily abandoned him: His Perfians being most base cowards, durst not undertake his defence against the Bactrians, not withflanding that they had foure thousand Greeks to joyne with him, who had been able to have beaten both Nations. But it is true, that him, which forfakes himselfe, no man followes. It had been far more Man-like and King-like, to have dyed in the head of those foure thousand Greeks, which offered him the disposition of their lives, (to which Artaba? us perswaded him) than to have lyen bewailing himselfe on the ground, and suffering himself to be bound like a slave by those ambitious Monsters that laid hand on him. whom neither the confideration of his former great estate, nor the honour he had given them, nor the trust reposed in them, nor the world of benefits bestowed on them, could move to pity: no nor his prefent adverfity, which above all things should have moved them, could pierce their viperous and ungratefull hearts. Vaine it was indeed to hope its for infidelity hath no compassion.

Now Darius, thus for saken, was bound & laid in a Cart, covered with hides of Beasts, to the end that by any other ornament he might not be discovered; & to adde despight and derisson to his adversity, they fastned him with Chaines of Gold, and so drew him on among their ordinarie Carriages and Carts. For Besses and Naburzanes perswaded themselves to redeemetheir lives and the Provinces they held, either by delivering him a prisoner to Alexander, or, if that hope sailed, to make themselves kings by his slaughter, and then to defend themselves by force of Armes. But they sailed in both. For it was against the nature of God, who is most just, to pardon so strange villanie, yea, though against a Prince purely Heathenish and an Idolater.

Alexander having knowledge that Darius was retired towards Battria, and durst not abide his comming, hastened after him with a violent speed, and because he would not force his footmen beyond their powers, he mounted on hors-back certain selected companies of them, & best armed, & with six thousand other horse, rather ran than marched after Darius. Such as hated the Treason of Bessus, and secretly for sook him, gave knowledge to Alexander of all that had happened, informing him of the way that Bessus stook, and how neere he was at hand: for many men of worth daily ran from him. Heerepon Alexander againe doubled his pace, and his Vant-guard being discovered by Bessus its Reare, Bessus brought a Horse to the Cart, where Darius lay bound, perswading him to mount thereon, and to save himselse. But the unfortunate King ressing to follow those that had betrayed him, they cast Darts at him, wounded him to death, and wounded the Beasts that drew him, and slew two poor Servants that attended his person. This sone, they all fled that could, leaving the rest to the mercie of the Macedonian swords.

Macedonius in Perfepolis, which he had done in Sufa, & gave the fame formall honour to the traitor Tiridates, that he had done to Abalites; but he that had the trust of the place was Nicarides, a creature of his owne. The body of his Army he left here for thirty dayes, of which the Commanders were Parmento and Craterus, and with a thousand herfe and certain troupes of chosen foot, he would needs view in the Winter-time those parts of Persia, which the Snow had covered; a fruitlesse and soolish enterprise, but as Seneca faies : Non ille ire vult, sed non potest fare : He bash was a will so goe, but he is unable to fand fill. It is faid and spoken in his praise, That when his Souldiers cryed out against him because they could not endure the extreme frost, and make way, but with extreme difficulty through the frow, that Alexander for fook his horse, and led them the way, to But what can be more ridiculous than to bring other men into extremity, therby to flew how well himselfe can endure it ! His walking on foote did no otherwise take off their wearineffe that followed him, than his fornetime forbearing to drinke did quench their thirst, that could lesse endure it. For mine owne little judgement, I shall rather commend that Captain that makes carefull provision for those that follow him, & that seeks wife. ly to prevent extreme necessity, than those witlesse arrogant fools, that make the vaunt of having endured equally with the common Souldier, as if that were a matter of great glory and importance.

We find in all the Wars that Cafar made, or the best of the Roman Commanders, that the provision of victuals was their first care. For it was a true faying of Coligni, Admirall 10 of France; That who to will shape that Beast (meaning War) wish begin with his belly.

But Alexander is now returned to Persepolis, where those Historians that were most amorous of his vertues, complaine, that the opinion of his valour, of his liberality, of his clemency towards the vanquished, and all other his Kingly conditions, were drowned indrinke; That he smothered in carowing cups all the reputation of his actions past. and that by descending, as it were, from the reverend Throne of the greatest King, into the company and familiarity of base Harlots, he began to be despited both of his owne and all other Nations. For being perfwaded, when he was inflamed with wine, by theinfamous Strumper Thais, he caused the most sumperious and goodly Castle and Citie of Perfepolis to be confirmed with fire, not withflanding all the arguments of Parmenie to 20 the contrary, who told him that it was a different to deferoy those things by the verfivalions of others, which by his proper vertue and force he had obtained; and that it would be a most strong perswasion to the Asians, to think hardly of him, and therby alien their hearts: for they might well beleeve that he which demolished the goodlieft Ornaments they had, meant nothing leffe than (after fuch vastation) to hold their possession on. Per vinolentiam crudelitas sequitur; Cruelty doth commonly follow drunkennesse: For it so fell out soone after, and often, in Alexander.

The Treason of Bessus against Darius. Darius his death.

Bout this time he received a new supply of Souldiers out of Cilicia, and goeson to finde Darius in Media. Darius had there compounded his fourth and last Army, which he meant to have increased in Bactria, had he not heard of Alexanders comming on, with whom (trufting to fuch companies as he had, which was menbred at thirty or forty thousand)he determined once again to try his fortune. He therefore cals together his Captaines and Commanders, and propounds unto them his refohition, who being desperate of good successe, used silence for a while. Artabasus, one of his eldest men of Warre, who had sometime lived with Philip of Macedon, brake the 50 yee, and protesting that he could never be bearen by any adversity of the Kings, from the faith which he had ever ought him, with firme confidence, that all the rest were of the same condition (whereof they likewise assured Darius by the like protestation) he approved the Kings resolution. Two only, and those the greatest, to wit, Nabur Lanes and Beffus, whereof the leater was governour of Bactria, had confoired against their Mafter; and therefore advised the King to lay a new foundation for the Warre, and to purfue it by some such person for the present, against whom neither the gods nor fortune had in all things declared themselves to be an enemy: this preamble Nabur Zanes used, and in conclusion advised the election of his fellow Traitor Bessus, with promise that the warres ended, the Empire should againe be restored to Darius. The King swollen with disdain, prest towards Nabur Zanes to have stain him, but Bessus and the Bactrians whom he commanded, being more in number than the rest, with-held him. In the meane while Nabur Zanes with-drew himselse, and Bessus followed him, making their quarter a-part from the rest of the Army. Artabazus, the Kings faithfull servant, perswaded him to be advised and serve the time, seeing Alexander was at hand, and that he would at least make shew of forgetting the offence made; which the King being of a gentle disposition, willingly yeelded unto. Beffus makes his fubmiffion, and attends the King, who removes his Army . Poly stratus Polyfratus a Macedonian, being by pursuite of the vanquished prest with thirst, as he was refreshing himselfe with some water that he had discovered, espying a Cart with a Teame of wounded beafts breathing for life, and not able to move, fearched the fame and therein found Darius bathing in his owne bloud: And by a Persian captive which followed this Polystrains, he understood that it was Darius, and was informed of his barbarous Tragedy. Darius also seemed greatly comforted (if dying men ignorant of the living God can be comforted) that he cast not out his last forrowes unheard, but that by this Macedonian, Alexander might know and take vengeance on those Traytors, which had dealt no leffe unworthily than cruelly with him, recommending their revenge to A. Lexander by this messenger, which he besought him to pursue, not because Darins had to defired it, but for his own honour, and for the fafety of all that did, or should after weare Crownes. He also having nothing else to present, rendred thanks to Alexander for the Kingly grace used towards his Wife, Mother, & Children, desiring the immortal leads to submit unto him the Empire of the whole World. As he was thus speaking impatient death pressing out his few remaining spirits, he defired water, which Polystraus presented him, after which he lived but to tell him, that of all the best things that the world had, which were lately in his power, he had nothing remaining but his last breath, wherewith to defire the gods to reward his compassion.

T was now hoped by the Macedonians, that their travels were neare an end, every man preparing for his returne. Hereof when Alexander had knowledge, he was great-Iy grieved; for the bounded earth sufficed not his boundlesse Ambition. Many arguments he therefore used to draw on his Army farther into the East, but that which had most strength, was, that Besser, a most cruell traytor to his Master Darius, having at his devotion the Hyrcanians and Bactrians, would in short time (if the Macedonians should return)make himselse Lord of the Persian Empire, and enjoy the fruits of all their somer 10 travels. In conclusion he wan their consents to go on: which done leaving Craterus with certaine Regiments of foot, and Amystas with fixe thousand horse in Parthenia, heenters not without some opposition into Hyrcania; for the Mardons, and other barbarous Nations, defended certaine passages for a while. He passeth the river of Zioberis, which taking beginning in Parthia, dissolves it selse in the Caspian Sea: it runneth under the ledge of Mountains, which bound Parthia & Hyrcania, where hiding it selfunder ground for three hundred furlongs, it then rifeth again, & followeth its former course. In Zadracarra or Zeudracarta, the same Citie which Ptolomy writes Hyrcania, the Metropolisos that Region, he rested fifteen dayes, banquetting and feasting therein.

Phataphernes, one of Darius his greatest Commanders, with others of his best follow- as ers, submitthemselves to Alexander, and were restored to their places and governments. But of all other he graced Artaba Zus most highly for his approved and constant faith to his master Darius. Artaba Zus brought with him ten thousand & five hundred Greekes, the remainder of all those that had served Darius; He treats with Alexander for their pardon, before they were yet arrived, but in the end, they render them selves simply without promise or composition: he pardons all but the Lacedæmonians, whom he imprisoned, their Leader having staine himselfe. He was also wrought (though to his great dishonour) to receive NabarZanes that had joyned with Bessus to murder Darius.

Of Thalestris Queen of the Amazons; where by way of digression, it is shewed, that such A. mazons have been and are.

PEre it is faid that Thalestris or Minothea, a Queene of the Amazons, came to vi fite him, and her suit was, (which she easily obtained) that she might accompany him till she were made withchild by him: which done (refusing to follow him into India) the returned into her owne Country. Plutarch

Plutarch citeth many Historians, reporting this meeting of Thatefris with Alexander. and some contradicting it. But indeed, the letters of Alexander himselfe to Antipater. recounting all that befell him in those parts, and yet omitting to make mention of this Amazonian bufinesse, may justly breed suspition of the whole matter as forged. Much more justly may we suspect it as a vaine tale, because an Historian of the same time reading one of his bookes to Lysanachus (then King of Thrace) who had followed Alexander in all his voyage, was laught at by the King for inserting such newes of the Amazons; and Lysimachus himselfe had never heard of. One that accompanied Alexander, tooke upon him to write his acts; which to amplifie, He told how the King had fought fingle with an Elephant, and slaine it. The King hearing such stuffe, caught the booke, to and threw it into the river of Indus; faying, that it were well done to throw the writer after it, who by inferting fuch fables, disparaged the truth of his great exploits. Yet as webeleeve & know that there are Elephants, though it were falle that Alexander fought with one; fo may we give credit unto writers making mention of fuch Amazons, whether it were true or falle that they met with Alexander; as Plutareh leaves the matter undetermined. Therefore I will here take leave to make digression, as well to show the opinions of the ancient Historians, Cosmographers, and others, as also of some moderne discoverers touching these warlike Women, because not only Strabo, but many others of these our times make doubt, whether or no there were any such kind of people. Julius Solimus seates them in the North parts of Asia the leffe. Pom. Mela finds two solicizes 65. Regions filled with them; the one on the River Thermodoon, the other neare the Cabian Sea : Quas (faith he) Sauromatidas appellant ; Which the people call Sauromatidas. The former of these two had the Cimerians for their Neighbours; Certumes (faith Vadianus, who hath commented upon Mela illos proximos Amazonibus fuisse; It is certaine Ptollib.6. that the Cimerians were the next Nations to the AmaZons. Ptolomy sets them farther into Pinto.c.20. the Land North-wards, neare the Mountaines Hippaci, not far from the Pillars of Ahexander. And that they had Dominion in Asia it selfe toward India, Solinus and Pling tellus, Where they governed a people called the Pandeans, or Padeans, fo called after 30 Pandea the Daughter of Hercules, from whom all the restderive themselves. Claudian affirmes, That they commanded many Nations: For he speakes (largely perhaps as a Poet) thus:

Over the Medes, and light Sabæans reignes This female fexe: and under armes of Queen. Great part of the Barbarian Landremaines.

Diodorus Siculus hath heard of them in Lybia, who were more ancient (faith he) than Lib.2. those which kept the banks of Thermodoon, a River falling into the Euxine Sea, neare Heraclium.

Herodotus dothalfo make report of these Amazons, whom he tels us that the Scythians call Aorpatas, which is as much as Viricidas, or men-killers. And that they made incurfioninto Afia the lefte, fackt Ephelin, & burnt the Temple of Diana, Manethon, & Aventimes report, which they performed forty years after Troy was taken. At the fiege of Troy it selfe we reade of Penthesilea, That she came to the succour of Priamus.

Am, Marcellinus gives the cause of their inhabiting upon the River of Thermodoon, L, 22.6.74 ipeaking confidently of the wars they made with divers Nations, & of their overthrow. Plutareh in the life of Thefeur, out of Philochorus, Hellenicus, and other ancient Historians, reports the taking of Antiops Queen of the Amazons by Hercules, and by him given to Thefeus, though some affirme, That Thefeus himself gother by steatth, when she came to visit him aboord his ship. But in substance there is little difference, all confessing, That fuch Amazons there were. The fame Author in the life of Pompey speakes of certaine companies of the Amazons, that came to ay de the Albanians against the Romans, by whom after the battell, many Targets and Buskins of theirs were taken up : and he fairh farther, That these women entertain the Gelwand Lelages once a year, Nations inhabiting between them and the Albanians.

But to omit the many Authors, making mention of Amazons that were in the old times, Fran. Lopez, who hath written the navigation of Orellana, which he made down the river of Amazons from Peru, in the yeare 1542: (upon which river, for the divers turnings, he is faid to have failed fixe thousand miles) reports from the relation of the said Orellana, to the Councell of the Indies, That he both saw those women, and fought with them, where they sought to impeach his passage towards the East-Sea.

It is also reported by Ulrichus Schmidel, that in the yeare 1542. when he failed up the Rivers of Paragna and Parabol, that he came to a King of that country, called Scherver, inhabiting under the Tropicke of Capricorne, who gave his Captaine Ernando Rieffere, a Crown of filver, which he had gotten in fight from a Queene of the Amazons in those 10

Ed. Lope? in his description of the Kingdome of Congo, makes relation of such Amazons, telling us, That (agreeable to the reports of elder times) they burne off their right breasts, and live apart from men, save at one time of the year, when they feast and accompany them for one moneth. These (saith he) possessed apart of the Kingdome of Monomorapa in Africa, nineteen degrees to the Southward of the line: and that these women are the strongest Guards of this Emperour, all the East Indian Portugals know.

I have produced these authorities in part, to justifie mine owne relation of these Ama. Zons, because that which was delivered me for truth by an ancient Cacique of Guiana, how upon the River of Papamena (since the Spanish discoveries called Amazons) that 20 these women still live and govern, was held for a vain and unprobable report.

6. XVI. How Alexander fell into the Persian Luxurie: and how he further pursued Bessus.

Ow as Alexander had begun to change his conditions after the taking of Persepolis: fo at this time his prosperitie had so much over-wrought his vertue, ashe accounted clemencie to be but basenesse, and the temperance which he had used all his life time, but a poor and dejected humour, rather becomming the instructers of his 30 youth, than the condition and state of so mightie a King as the World could not equall. For he perswaded himselfe that he now represented the greatnesse of the gods; he was pleased that those that came before him, should fall to the ground and adore him, he ware the robes and garments of the Persians, and commanded that his Nobilitie should doe the like the entertained in his Court and Camp, the same shamelesse rabble of Curtisans, and Sodomiticall Eunuchs, that Darius had done, and imitated in all things the proud, voluptuous, and detested maners of the Persians, whom he had vanquished. So licentious is selicitie, as notwithstanding that he was fully persuaded, that the gods whom he served (detesting the vices of the invaded)assisted him in all attempts against them, he himself, contrary to the Religion he profest (which how Idolatrous foever it were, could not be but 40 fearfull unto him by neglecting it) became by imitation, & not by ignorance or education, a more foule and fearfull Moniter than Darius, from whose tyrannie he vaunted to have delivered so many Nations. Yea, those that were dearest and nearest unto him, began to be ashamed of him, entertaining each other with this, and the like scornefull discourse; That Alexander of Macedon was become one of Darius his licentions Courtiers; Thatby his example, the Macedonians were in the end of fo many travels, more impoverished in their vertues, than inriched by their victories; and that it was hard to judge whether the Conquerors, or the Conquered were the baser slaves. Neither were these opinions fo referved, but that the noise of them came to his eares. He therefore with great gifts fought to pacifie the better fort, and those of whose judgments he was most jealous; and so making it knowne to the Armie, that Beffus had affumed the title of a King, and called himselfe Artaxerxes, and that he had compounded a great Armic of the Battrians, and other Nations, he had arguments enow to perswade them to goe on, to the end that all alreadie gotten, might not with themselves (so farre ingaged) be cast away. And because they were pestered with the spoiles of so many Cities, as the whole armie seemed but the guard of their carriages, (not much unlike the warfare of the French) having commanded every mans fardels to be brought into the market-place, he, together with his owne, caused all to be confumed with fire. Certainly, this could not but have proved most dangerous unto him, seeing the common Souldiers had more interest in these things which they had bought with their painefull travailes, and with their bloud, than in the Kings ambition; had not (as Seneca often observed) his happy temerity overcome all things. As he was in his way, newes came to him, that Satribar anes, whom hehad established in his former governement over the Arrians, was revolted; whereupon leaving the way of Bactria, he fought him out; but the Rebell, hearing of his comming, fled to Beffus, with two thousand Horse. He then went on towards Beffus and by fetting a great pile of wood on fire, with the advantage of a strong winde, won the paffage over an high & unacceffable Rocke, which was defended against him with thirteene thousand foot. For the extremity of the Flame & smoake forced them from the place. otherwise invincible. I saw in the third civill warre of France, certaine Caves in Lanoutdoe, which had but one entrance, and that very narrow, cut out in the mid-way of high Rockes, which we knew not how to enter by any ladder or engine, till at last, by certaine bundels of straw, let down by an yron chaine, & a waighty stone in the middest, those that defended it, were so smothered, as they rendred themselves, with their plate, mony, and other goods therein hidden. There were also some three yeers before my arrivall in Guiana, three hundred Spaniards well mounted, funothered to death, together with their Horses, by the Countrie-people, who did set the long dry graffe on fire to the Eastward of them, (the winde in those parts being alwayes East) so as not with stanoding their flying from the smoake, there was not any one that escaped. Sir John Borrowes alfo, with a hundred English, was in great danger of being loft at Margarita, in the Well-Indies, by having the graffe fired behinde him; but the smoake being timefully discover red, he recovered the Sea-shore with the losse of fixteene of his men. I remember these things, but to give caution to those that shall in times to come invade any part of those Countries, that they alwayes, before they passe into the Land, burne down the grasse and ledge to the East of them; they may otherwise, without any other enemy than a handfull of straw set on fire, dye the death of hony-Bees, burnt out of the Hive.

§. XVII.

A Conspiracie against Alexander. The death of Philotas and Parmenio.

Lexander was, after he parted hence, no where refifted, till he came into Aria, to the East of Battria, where the chiefe City of that Province, called Artacoana, was a while defended against him, by the revolt of SatribarZanes, but in the end he received the Inhabitants to mercie. At this place his Army was re-enforced with a new supply of five thousand and five hundred soot, and neere five hundred Horse, out of Greece, Thessate, and other places. His journey out of Persa into these parts, is very consolided, described. For having (as all his Historians tell us) a determination to find Besse in Battria, he leaves it at the very entrance, and takes the way of Hyrcania, from thence he wanders Northwards towards the obscure Mardi, upon the Cassian-Sea, and thence over the Mountaine Coronus into Aria, and Drangiana.

At this time it was that the treason of Dimmus brake out, of which Philotas the sonne of Parmenio was accused, as accessary, if not principall. This Dimmus, having (I know not upon what ground) conspired with some others against the life of Alexander, went about to draw Nichomachus, a young man whom he loved, into the same treason. The Youth, although he was first bound by oath to secrecy, when he heard so soll a matter uttered; began to protest against it so vehemently, that his friend was like to have staine him for security of his owne life. So, constrained by seare, he made shew as if hee had bin won by perswassion; and by seeming at length to like well of the businesse, he was told more at large what they were that had undertaken it. There were nine or ten of them, all men of ranke, whose names Dimmus (to countenance the enterprise) reckoned up to Nichomachus. Nichomachus had no sooner freed himselfe from the company of this Traitor Dimnus, than he acquainted his owne brother Ceballinus (who might with least suspicious) should goe to the Court, and utter all. Ceballinus, anceting with Philotas, told him the whole business desiring him to acquaint the King therewith: which he promised to do, but did not. Two dayes passed, and Philotas never brake with the King about the matter, but still excused himselfe to Ceballinus by the Kings want of leisure. This his coldnesse bred suspition, and caused Ceballinus to addresse himselse to another, one Metron, Keeper of the Kings Armorie, who forth-with brought him to Alexanders presence. Alexander, finding by examination what had passed betweene Ceballinus and Philotas, did fully perswade himselfe that this concealement of the treason, argued his hand to have bin in the businesse. Therefore when Dimnus was brought before him, hee asked the Traitor no other question than this: wherein have I so offended thee, that thou Chouldest thinke Philotas more worthy to be King than 1? Dimnus perceiving when he was apprehended, how the matter went, had so wounded himself, that he lived no longer, than 10 to give his last groane in the Kings presence. Then was Philotas called, & charged with the suspition, which his silence might justly breede. His answer was, That when the practice was revealed unto him by Nichomachus, he judging it to bee but frivolous, did forbeare to acquaint Alexander therewithall, untill he might have better information. This errour of his, (if it were onely an errour) although Alexander, for the notorious fervices of his Father Parmenio, of his brother Nicanor lately dead, and of Philotal himfelfe, had freely pardoned & given him his hand for affurance; yet by the instigation of Craterus, he againe swallowed his Princely promise, and made his enemies his Judges. Curtim gives a note of Craterus in this businesse; How he perswaded himselfe, that he could never finde a better occasion to oppresse his private enemie, than by pretending 10 piety, and dutie towards the King. Hereof a Poet of our own hath given a note as much better, as it is more generall in his Philotas:

See how these great men cloathe their private hate, In these faire colours of the publike good, And to effect their ends, pretend the State, As if the State by their affection stood: And, arm'd with power and Princes jealousies, Will put the least conceit of discontent Into the greatest ranke of treacheries, That no one action shall seeme innocent: Yea valour, honour, bountie, shall be made As accessaries unto ends unjust: And even the fervice of the State must lade The needfull'st undertaking with distrust; So that base vilenesse, idle Luxurie, Seeme safer farre, than to doe worthily, &c.

Now although it were so, that the King following the advice of Craterus, hadresolved the next day to put Philotas to torment, yet in the very evening of the famenight in which he was apprehended, hee called him to a banquet, and discoursed as familiarly 46 with him as at any other time. But when in the dead of the night Philotas wastaken in his lodging, and that they which hated him began to binde him, he cryed out upon the King in these words: O Alexander, the malice of mine Enemies hath surmounted they mercy, and their hatred is farre more conftant than the word of a King. Wany circumstances were urged against him by Alexander himselse (for the Kings of Macedon did in person examine the accusations of treason)& this was not the least (not the least offence, indeed, against the Kings humour, who defired to be glorified as a God) That when Alexander wrote unto him concerning the title given him by Jupiter Hammon; He answered, That he could not but rejoyce that he was admitted into that facred Fellowship of the gods, and yet he could not but withall grieve for those that should live under such a one as 50 would exceede the nature of man. This was (faith Alexander) a firme perswafionunto me, that his heart was changed, and that he held my glory in dispight. See what a strange Monster Flatterie is, that can perswade Kings to kill those that doe not praise and allow those things in them, which are of all other most to be abhorred. Philotas was brought before the multitude, to heare the Kings Oration against him: he was brought forthin vile garments, and bound like a Theefe; where he heard himselfe, and his absent Father, the greatest Captaine of the World, accused; his two other Brothers, Hester and Nicanor having beene lost in the present Warre. He was so greatly opprest with griefe, as for a while he could utter nothing but teares, and forrow had so wasted his spirits, as he sanke under those that led him. In the end, the King asked him, In what language he would make his defence; he answered, In the same wherein it had pleased the King to accusc him; which he did, to the end that the Persians, as well as the Macedonians, thighe understand him. But hereof the King made his advantage, perswading the assembly, that hedisdained the language of his owne Country, and so with-drawing himselse, left him

This proceeding of the Kings, Philotas greatly lamented, seeing the King, who had so fharply inveighed against him, would not vouchfafe to heare his excuse. For not his ene-10 mies onely were imboldened thereby against him, but all the rest, having discovered the Kings disposition and resolution, contending among themselves, which of themsshould exceede in hatred towards him. Among many other arguments, which he used in his own defence, this was not the weakest; That when Nicomachus desired to know of Dimmm, what men of marke and power were his partners in the conspiracie (as seeming unwilling to adventure himselfe with meane and base Companions) Dimnus named unto him Demetrius of the Kings Chamber, Nicanor, Amyntas, & some others; but spake not aword of Philotas, who by being Commander of the Horse, would greatly have valued the party, and have incouraged Nicomachus. Indeede, as Philotas faid well for himselfe, ir is likely that Dimnus, thereby the better to have heartned Nicomachus, would have named him, though he had never dealt with him in any fuch practice. And for more cername proofe, that he knew nothing of their intents that practifed against the King, there was not any one of the Conspirators, being many, inforc'd by torments, or otherwise, that could accuse him; and it is true, that adversity being seldome able to beare her own burden, is for the most part found so malicious, as she rather defires to draw others (not alwayes deferving it) into the fame danger, than to spare any that it can accuse. Yet at the lift, how foever it were, to avoid the extremity of refiftleffe and unnaturall torments, devifed by his profest enemies Craterus, Cenus, Ephestion, and others, Philoras accused his ownefelfe; being perswaded that they would have slaine him forthwith. But he failed even in that miserable hope, and suffering all that could be laid on slesh and bloud, he was 10 forced to deliver, not what he knew, but whatfoever best pleased their eares, that were farre more mercilesse than death it selse.

Of this kinde of judiciall proceeding S. Augustine greatly complaineth, as a matter to Aug. de Civil. be bewailed, faith he, with Fountaines of teares. Quid cum in sua causa quisque torque- Deith. 1.c. 6. tur: & cum quaritur utrum sit nocens cruciatur : & innocens luit pro incerto scelere certisimas pænas : non quia illud commisisse detegitur, sed quia non commisisse nescitur? what shall we say to it, when one is put to torture in his own cause; and tormented whilest jet it is in question whether he be quilty; and being innocent, suffers assured punishment for a fault, of which there is no certaintie : not because he is knowne to have committed the offence, but because others doe not know that he hath not committed it?

It had beene enough for Alexanders fafety, if Philoras had been put to death without torment; the rest would not much have grieved thereat, because he was greatly suspected. But Hemolam, who afterward conspired against him, made the Kings cruelty and delight inbloud, the greatest motive of his owne ill intent. Therefore, Seneca, speaking of Alexander, faith thus: Crudelit as minime humanum malum est, indignum ammiti animo; ferina ista rabies est sanguine gaudere & vulneribus, & abject o homine, in silvestre animal Soute cloud. transfire; Cruelty is not a humane vice, it is unworthy of so milde a spirit: It is even a beaftly rage to delight in bloud and wounds, and casting away the nature of man, to become a savage Monster.

For the conclusion of this Tragedie, Curtius makes a doubt, whether the confession that Philotas made were to give end to the torments which he could not any longer endure, or that the same was true indeede; For (saith he) in this case, they that speake truely, or they that deny falfly, come to one and the same end. Now, while the Kings hands were yet wet in bloud, he commanded that Lyntefter, fonne-in-Law to Antipater, who had beene three yeares in prison, should be slaine: The same dispatch had all those that Nicomachus had accused: others there were that were suspected because they had followed Philotas, but when they had answered for themselves that they knew no way so direct to winne the Kings favour, as by loving those whom the King favoured, they were difmift. But Parmenio was yet living; Parmenio, who had ferved with great fidelity as wel Philip of Macedon the Kings Father, as himself; Parmenio, that first opened the way into Asia; that had deprest Att alm the Kings enemy; that had alwaves, and in all hazzards, the leading of the Kings Vant-guard, that was no leffe prudent in counsell, than fortunate in all attemps; A man beloved of the men of War, and, to fav the truth he that had made the purchase for the King of the Empire of the East, and of all the glory and fame he had: That he might not therefore revenge the death of his Sonne. though not upon the King, (for it was unlikely that he would have dishonoured his fidelity in his eldest age, having now lived threescore and ten yeers) yet upon those that by the witchcraft of flattery had posses themselves of his affection, it was resolved that he should be dispatcht. Polydamas was imployed in this businesse, a man whom of all other ra Parmenio trusted most, and loved best, who (to be short) finding him in Media, and having Cleander and other murderers with him, flew him walking in his Garden, while he was reading the Kings letters. Hic exitus Parmenionis fuit, militia domique clari viri: Multa sine Rege prospere, Rex sine illo nihil magna rei gesserat; This was the end of Parmenio (faith Curtius) who had performed many notable things without the King but the King , without him, did never effect any thing worthy of praise.

6. XVIII.

How Alexander fubdued the Bastrians, Sogdians, and other people. How Bessus delivered into his hands. How he fought with the Scythians.

Hen these things had end, Alexander went on with his Army, and brought under his obedience the Araspians or Evergitans; he made Amenides (somtime Darim his Secretary) their Governour, then he fubdued the Aracholians, & left Menon to command over them. Here the Army, somtimes led by Parmenio, findes him, confilting of twelve thousand Macedons and Greeks, with whom he past through fome cold Regions with difficulty enough. At length he came to the foote of the Mountaine Taurus towards the East, where he built a City, which he honoured with his own name, & peopled it with seven thousand of his old Macedons, worne with age & with travailes of the war. The Arians, who fince he left them were revolted, he subdued 30 againe by the industrie and valour of Caranus and Erigius. And now he resolves to finde out the new King Beffus in Bastria. Beffus, hearing of his comming, prepares to passe over the great River of Oxus which divides Ballria from Sogdiana; Artabazus is made Governor of Battria abandoned by Beffus; The Macedonian Army fuffereth for want of Water, infomuch as when they came to the River of Oxus, there died more of them by drinking inordinatly, than Alexander had loft in any one battaile against the Persians. And it may well be: For (as Clytus did after object unto him) he fought against women, not against men, and not against their persons, but their shadowes. Hee found on the bankes of this great River no manner of Timber or other materials, to make either boates, bridges, or raffe, but was forc't to few together the Hides that covered his carriages, and stuffe them with straw, and on them in fixe daies to passe over his Army; which Beffu might eafily have diffrest, if hee had dared but to behold the Macedonian Army afar of. He had formerly complained against Darius for neglecting to defend the banks of Tigris, and other passages, and yet now, when this traiterous slave had styled himself a King, he durst not perform any thing worthy of a slave. And therefore those that were neerest unto him, & whom he most trusted, to wit, Spitamenes, Dataphernes, Catanes, and others the Commanders of his Army, moved both by the care of their own fafety, and by the memory of Beffus his Treason and cruelty against Darius, bound him in the like manner that he had done his Master, but with this difference, that he had the chaine closed about his necke like a mastiffe Dog, and so was dragged along to be presented to 50 his enemy.

In the meane while Alexander was arrived at a certaine Town inhabited with Greeks of Miletum, brought thither by Xerxes, whenlong before hee returned out of Greece; whose issues had well-neere forgotten their Country-language. These most cruelly (after they had received him with great joy) he put to the sword, & destroyed their City. At this place he received Besse, and having rewarded Spitamenes with the rest that delivered him, he gave the Traitor into the hands of Oxatres, Darius his brother, to be tormented.

But while he now thought himself secure, some twenty thousand Mountainers assaulted his Campe; in repelling whom he received a shot in the legge, the arrow head sticking in the stell, so as he was carried in a Horse-litter, sometime by the horsemen, sometime by the foot.

Soone after he came unto Maraeanda, which Petrus Perondinus takes to be Samar-chand, the regall City of the great Tamerlaine. It had incompasse threescore & ten surlongs (Curtius saith.) Here he received the Embassadors of the Scythians (called Aviant) who offered to serve him.

The Bastrians are shortly again with the Sogdians stirred to Rebellion, by the same spitamenes & Catanes, who had lately delivered into his hands the traitor Bessel Many to Cities were resolvedly defended against him, all which, after victory, he defaced & razed, killing all therein. At one of these he received a blow on the necke, which strucke him to the ground, and much diabled him for many dayes after. In the meane while spitamenes had recovered Maracanda, against whom he imployed Menedemis with three thousand some and eight hundred horse.

In the heate of these tumults Alexander marched on (if we may believe Currius and others) till he came to the river of Tanais; upon whose banke he built another Alexandria, threescore surfaces in compasse, which he beautified with houses within seventeen dayes after the wals built. The building of this City is said to have bin occasion of a war to between him and the Seythians; the Seythian King perswading himselfe, that this new Towne was fortissed of purpose to keepe him under. I doe not well understand, why the Seythians, offering war in such terrible manner, that Alexander was judged by his owne Souldiers to counterfeit sicknesse for very seare, should neverthelesse make suit for peace: neither finde I the reason why Alexander (not intending the conquest of those Northerne desarts, but onely the desence of his owne banke) should resure to let them alone, with whom he could not meddle further than they should agree to suffer him. Yet hereof is made a great matter; and a victory described; in pursuit of which the Macedons can beyond the bounds and monuments of Bacchushis expedition.

The truth is, That Curtius and Trogus have greatly mistaken this River, which they call Tanais. For it was the River of Jaxartes, that runs betweene Sogdiana and Soythia, which Alexander past over, while Menedemus was imploied in the recovery of Samarhand: But Tanais, which divides Asia from Europe, is neere two thousand miles distant from any part of Bastria and Sogdiana, & the way desart and unknowne. So that Alexander had (besides Jaxartes) the great River of Volga & many others to swim over, ere hecould recover Tanais: which (from the place where he was) he could hardly have discovered with the Army that followed him, if he had imploied all the time that he lived in Asia in that trayaile.

Wherefore it is enough to believe, that the Assaulus Scythians, making some offer to disturbe the erection of this new City, which was like to give some hinderance to so their excursions, were driven away by the Macedonians; and being naked of defensive Ames, easily chased some tenor twelve miles; which is the substance of Curring his report. As for the limits of Bacching his journes; like enough it is that Bacching (if in his life time he were as sober a man, as after his death he was held a drunken god) went not very far into that wast Country, where he could find nothing but trees and stones, nor other businesse that to set up a monument.

Threefcore of the Macedons are said to have bin slaine, and one thousand one hundred hurr in this sight; which might easily be in passing a great River, defended against them by good Archers. Of Seythian horses one thousand eight hundred were brought into the Campe, and many prisoners. It is forbidden by some Historians, and indeeded it is hardly possible to set down the numbers of such as perish in battell: yet Cafar commonly didit. And where the diligence of the victors hath beene so inquisitive into the greatnesse of their own successe, that writers have beene able to deliver such particulars by credible report, I hold it not unlawfull to set down what we finde; especially when it serves to give light to the businesse in hand. The small number which the Macedonians lost; the omission of the number which they slew (a thing not usual in Currius, who forbeares nothing that may set out the greatnes of Alexander) and the little bootie that was gotten; doe make it probable, that this war was no better than the repulsion of a sew roving Tartars (the like being yeerly performed by the Moscovite; without any boast) and therefore better omitted by some Historians, than so highly extolled as a great exploit, by others.

Ret

While Alexander was affuring himself of those Scythians bordering upon Jaxartes, he received the ill newesthat Menedemus was slain by Spitamenes, the Army (by him led) broken, and the greatest numbers slaine, to wit, two thousand foot, and three hundred horse. He therefore, to appease the rebellion, and to take revenge of Spitamenes, makes all the haste he can; but Spitamenes slies into Badria. Alexander kills, burns, and layes waste all before him; not sparing the innocent children, and so departs, leaving a new Governour in that Province.

To repaire this losse he received a great supply of nineteene thousand Souldiers out of Greece, Lycia, & Syria; with all which, & the old Army, he returnes towards the South and paffeth the River of Oxus; on the South-fide whereof he built fixe Townes neere each other for mutuall succour. But he findes a new start-up-Rebell, called Arimages. (a Sogdian) followed with thirty thousand Souldiers, that defended against him a strong piece of ground on the top of a high Hill; whom when Alexander had fought in vaine to win by faire words, he made choice of three hundred young men, & promifed ten talents to the first, nine to the second, and so in proportion to the rest, that could findea way to creepe up to the top thereof. This they performed with the loffe of fome two and thirty of their men, & then made a figne to Alexander, that they had performed his commandement. Hereupon he fent one Cophes to perswade Arimazes to yeeld the place; 10 who, being shewed by Cophes that the Army of Macedon was already mounted up, veelded fimply to Alexanders mercy, and was (with all his kinred) scourged and crucified to death; which punishment they well deserved for neglecting to keepe good watch in fo dangerous a time. For the place, as feemes by the description, might easily have been defended against all the Armies of the World. But, what strength cannot doe, Manswir, being the most forcible engine, hath often effected: Of which I will give youan example in a place of our owne.

The Iland of Sarke, joyning to Garnfey, & of that government, was in Queen Maries time furprised by the French, and could never have beene recovered agains by strong hand, having cattell and corne enough upon the place to feed fo many men as will ferve to to defend it, and being every way so inaccessible, that it might be held against the Great Turke. Yet by the industry of a Gentleman of the Netherlands, it was in this fort regain ned. He anchored in the roade with one Ship of small burden, and pretending the death of his Merchant, befought the French, being some thirty in number, that they might burie their Merchant in hallowed Ground, and in the Chappell of that Isle; offering a present to the French of such Commodities as they had aboord; whereto (with condition that they should not come a-shore with any weapon, no not so much as with a Knife) the French men yeelded. Then did the Flemings put a Coffin into their Boat, not filled with a dead carkaffe, but with Swords, Targets, and Harquebuffes; The French received them at their landing; and fearching every of them fo narrowly as they could not 40 hide a Pen-knife, gave them leave to draw their Coffin up the Rockes with great difficulty; some part of the French tooke the Flemish Boat & rowed aboard their Ship, to fetch the commodities promised, & what else they pleased; but being entred, they were taken and bound. The Flemings on the Land, when they had carried their Coffin into the Chappell, thut the doore to them, and taking their weapons out of the Coffin, fet upon the French; they run to the Cliffe and cry to their Company abourd the Fleming to come to their fuccour, but finding the Boat charged with Flemings, yeelded themselves and the place. Thus a Fox-taile doth fometimes helpe well to piece out the Lyons-skin, that else would be too short.

6. X I X. How Alexander slew his owne friends.

Fter these Sogdian & Seythian Warres, we reade of Alexanders killing of a Lion, and other Frivolous matters, and that he committed the Government of Maracanda, and the Country about it, to Clyim, and how he slew him soone after, for valuing the vertue of Philip the father before that of Alexander the son, or rather because he objected to the King the death of Parmenio, & derided the Oracle of Hammon.

for therein he toucht him to the quicke, the fame being delivered in publike, and at a drunken Banquet. Chrus, indeed, had deferved as much at the Kings hands, as any man living had done, & had in particular faved his life, which the King well remembred when he came to himselfe, and when it was too late. Yetto say the truth, Chrus his insolency was intolerable. As he in his Cups forgat whom he offended, so the King in his (for whereof the tare his owne face, and sorrowed so inordinately, as, but for the griefe of Calishenes, it is thought he would have slaine himselfe.

Wine begat Furie, Furie matter of Repentance: but preceeding mischieses are not amended by succeeding bewailing: Omne vitium ebrietas & incendit, & detegit; obstan10 tem malis conatibus verecundiam removet; ubi possedit animum nimia vis vini; quiequid mali latebatzemergit: non facit ebrietas vitia, sed protrabit; Brunkennesse both kindles & layes open every vice; it removes out of the way that shame which gives impediment unto badde attempts; where wine gets the mastrie, all the ill that before lay hidden breakes out drunkennesse indeed rather discovers vices, than makes them.

Soone after this, Spitamenes, who flew Beffus, & had lately revolted from Alexander, was murdered by his Wife, & his head prefented to Alexander. Spitamenes being taken away, the Dahans also seized upon his fellow-conspirator Dataphernes, and delivered him up. So Alexander being now freed from all these pettie-Rebels, disposed of the 20 Provinces which he past over, & went on with his Army into Gabaza, where it suffered so much Hunger, Cold, Lightning, Thunder, and Storme, as he lost in one Tempest a thousand of his Traine. From hence he invaded the Sacans, & destroyed their Country. Then came he into the Territory of Cohortanes, who submitted himselfe unto him, feasited him greatly, & presented him with thirty beautifull Virgins, among whom Roxane, asterwards his Wise, was one: which although all the Macedonians disclained, yet none of them durst use any freedome of speech after Clysus his death. From hence he directed his course towards India, having so increased his numbers, as they amounted to an hundred and twenty thousand armed men.

In the meane while he would needs bee honoured as a god: whereto that hee might allure the Macedonians, he imployed two pernicious Parasites, Hagis and Cleo; whom Califhenes opposed: For, among many other honest arguments used to the affembly he told Cleo. That he thought, that Alexander would disdaine the gift of God-head from his Vasfalls; That the opinion of Sanctity, though it did sometime follow the death of those, who in their life-time had done the greatest things, yet it never accompanied any one as vet living in the world. He further rold him, That neither Hercules nor Bacchus were Deified at a banquet, and upon drinke (for this matter was propounded by Cleo at acarowfing feast:) but that, for the more than manly acts by them performed while they lived, they were in future and fucceeding Ages numbred among the gods. Alexander flood behinde a partition, and heard all that was spoken, waiting but an opportunitie to be revenged on Califthenes, who being a man of free speech, honest, learned, and a lover of the Kings honour, was yet soone after tormented to death; not for that he had betraied the King to others: but because he never would condescend to betray the King to himselfe, as all his detestable flatterers did. For in a conspiracy against the King made by one Hermolaus & others (which they confest) he caused Calisthenes without confession, accusation, or triall, to be torne asunder upon the racke: This deed unworthy of a King, Seneca thus censureth. Hocest Alexandri crimen aternum, quod nulla virtui nulla bellorum fælicitas redimet. Nam quoties quis dixerit, Occidit Persarum multa millia: opponitur, & Calisthenem: Quoties distum erit, Occidit Darium: opponitur, & Calisthenem. Quoties dictum erit, Omnia Oceano tenus vicit, ipsum quoq; tentavit novis classibus, & Imperiu ex angulo Thracia usq; ad Orientis terminos protulit dicetur, sed Calisthenem occidit. Omnia licet antiqua Ducum Regumque exempla transierit, ex his qua fecit nihil tam magnum erit quam scelus Calisthenes, This is the eternall crime of Alexander, which no vertue nor felicity of his in warre shall ever be able to redeeme. For as often as any man hall say, he slewmany thousand Persians, it shall by replied, He did so, & he slew Calisthenes: When it Shall be said , He slew Darius , it shall be replied , and Califthenes ; When it Shall be said, He wan all as farre as the very Ocean, thereon also he adventured with unusuall Navies, & extended his Empire from a corner of Thrace, to the utmost bounds of the Orient: It shall be said withall; But he killed Calisthenes. Let him have out-gone all the ancient examples of Captaines and Kings ; none of all his acts make so much to his glory , as Callisthenes to his reproach.

Of Alexanders journey into India. The battaile betweene him and Porus.

Ith the Army before remembred of one hundred & twenty thousand foor & horse, Alexander did enter the borders of India, where such of the Princes, as submitted themselves unto him, he entertained lovingly, the rest he constrained; killing Man, Woman, and Childe, where they refisted. He then came before Nifa built by Bacchu, which after a few daies was rendred unto him. From thence he removed to a Hill at hand, which on the top had goodly Gardens, filled with delicate fruits and Vines, dedicated to Bacchus, to whom he made feasts for ten dayes together. Now when he had drunke his fill, he went on towards Dedula, and from thence to Acadera. Countries spoiled and abandoned by the Inhabitants; by reason whereof, victualls failing, he divides his Army: Ptolomy led one part, Cenon another, and himselfe the reft. They take many Townes, whereof that of greatest fame was Mazage, which had init three hundred thousand men; but after some resistance: it was yeelded unto him by Cla ophethe Queene, to whom againe he restored it; at the siege of this City he received? wound in the legge. After this, Nora was taken by Polysperchon, and a Rocke of great to strength by himselfe: hee wanne also a passage upon one Eryx, who was slaine by his companie, & his head presented to Alexander. This is the summe of Alexanders doings in those parts, before such time as he arrived at the River of Indus. Comming to Indus. he found there Ephestion, who (being sent before) had prepared boates for the transportation of his Army, & ere Alexanders arrivall, had perswaded Omphis King of that part of the Country, to submit himselfe to this great Conquerour. Therefore, sooneupon Alexanders comming, Omphis presented himselfe with all the strength of his Country, & fixe & fiftie Elephants, unto him; offering him his fervice and affiltance. He made Alexander know, that he was an Enemie to the next two great Kings of that part of India, named Abiafares and Porus; wherewith Alexander was not a little pleased, hoping by 10 this dif-union to make his owne victory by farre the more easie. He presented Alexander with a Crowne of gold, so did he the rest of his Commanders, & withall fourescore talents of filver coyne; which Alexander not only refused, but to shew that he was covetous of glory, not of gold, he gave Omphie a thousand talents of his owne treasure, besides other Persian rarities. Abiasares, having heard that Alexander had received his enemy Omphis into his protection, resolved to make his owne peace also: For knowing that his own strength did but equal that of Omphis, and that there was no other differeace betweene them, than that which the chance of Warregave, hee thought it snill match when Alexander, who had already beaten under foote all the greatest Princes of Afia, should make himselse a Party and Head of the quartell. So had Alexander none 40 now to stand in his way but Porm, to whom he sent a commandement, that he should attend him at the border of his Kingdome, there to doe him homage. But from Porm he received this manly answer. That he would fatisfie him in his first demand, which was to attend him on his borders, and that well accompanied; but for any other acknowledgement he was refolved to take counfell of his Sword. To be short, Alexander refolves to passe over the River Hydaspes, and to finde Porm at his owne home. Pormattends him on the farther banke with thirty thousand foot, fourescore & ten Elephants, and three hundred armed Chariots, and a great troope of Horse. If Darius had done the like on Tigris, Alexander had furely stated formwhat longer ere he had seene India. The River was foure furlongs broad, which makes halfe a mile, and withall deepe and fwift. 10 It had in it many Ilands, among which there was one well shadowed with wood, and of good capacity. Alexander sent Ptolomy up the River with a great part of the Army, shrowding the rest from the view of Porm: who by this device being drawne from his first incamping, sets himselfe down opposite to Ptelomy, supposing that the whole Army of Macedon meant to force their passage there. In the meane while Alexander recovers the farther shore without resistance. He orders his troopes and advanceth rowards Porus, who at first rather believes, that Abiasares his Confederate (but now the Confederate of fortune) had bin come over Hydaspes to his aide, than that Alexander had past it.

But he findes it otherwise, and sends his Brother Hagis with foure thousand horse, and a hundred armed waggons to entertaine him. Each waggon had in it foure to fight, and two to guide it; but they were at this time of little use: for there had fallen so much raine and thereby the fields were so moistned, as the horses could hardly trot. The Serthians and Dahans had the Vant-guard, who fo galled these Indians, as they brake their raines. & other furniture, overturning the waggons, & those in them . Perdiccas also gave up the Indian horse-men, & the one and the other were forc't to recoile. Porus moves forward with groffe of his Army, that those of his Vant-guard scattered might recover his Reares Alexander being followed with Epheftion, Ptolomy, & Perdiccas, tooke on him to charge to the Indian horse-men on the left wing, commanding Census or Cenon to invade the right: Antigonus & Leonatus, he directed to breake upon Porus his battaile of foot, strengthened with Elephants, Porus himselfe being carried upon one of them, of the greatest stature. By these beasts the Macedonian foote were most offended but the Archers & Darters being well guarded with the long & strong pikes of the Macedonians, so galled them, asbeing inraged, they turned head, and ranne over the foot that followed them: In the end, and after a long and doubtfull fight, by the advantage of weapon, and by the courage and skilfulnesse of the Macedonian Captaines, the victory fell to Alexander, who allo farre exceeded Porus in number: for befides the Macedonians and other Easterne & Northerne Nations, Porus was affailed by his owne Confederate and Countrie people. o Yet for his owne person he never gave ground otherwise than with his sword towards his enemies, till being weakened with many wounds, and abandoned by his Army, he became a prisoner to the Conqueror, from whom againe he received his estate with a great enlargement.

§. X X I. How Alexander finished his expedition, and returned out of India.

Forbeare to trouble my felf and others with a frivolous discourse of Serpents, Apes & Peacocks, which the Macedonians found in these their travailes: or of those pettie Warres which Alexander made betweene the overthrow of Porus, and his failing downe the River of Indus. The descriptions of places about the head & branches thereof are better knowne unto us in this Age, by meanes of our late Navigations into those parts, than they were in any former times. The magnificence and riches of those Kings we could in no fort be perfwaded to believe, till our own experience had taught us, that there were many stranger things in the World, than are to be seene betweene London and Stanes.

Our great traveller Mandevile, who died in the year 1372, and had feene fo much of the World, and of the East India, we accompted the greatest fabler of the World; yet had he another reputation among other Nations, as well able to judge as we. Witneffe the Monument made of him in the Covent of the Friers Guillimius in Liege, where the religious of that place keep some things of his, Comme pour honorable memoire de son Guie, in Disc. of Excellence: For an honourable memorie of his Excellencie, faith Guichardine.

The Countries towards the Springs of Indus, and where those many Rivers of Hyda-tries. spes, Zaradris, Acesines, and the rest, fall into the maine streame, are now possess by the great Mogor, the ninth from Tamberlaine, who commands all that tract between Persia and Indus towards the West, as also a great extent of Countrie towards Ganges. In the mouth of Indus, the Ascension, a shippe of London, suffered shipwracke, in the yeere 1609. and some of the company travelled over Land till they came to Agra, the same great Citie (as I take it) which our later Cosmographers call Nagra, being named of od Dionysopolis.

Philostratus in the life of Apollonius Tyanaus, speaking of the expedition of Bacchus &c Hercules into the East India, tells us, that those two great Captaines (whom Alexander lought by almeans to out-fame) when they indea youred to fubject to them the Oxydrace, apeople inhabiting betweene the Rivers of Hyphalis & Ganges, they were beaten from the affault of their Cities with thunder and lightnings. This may well be understood by the great Ordnance that those people had then in use. For it is now certainely knowne, that the greatKings of the uttermost East, have had the use of the canon many hundreds of yeares fince, and even fince their first civilitie and greatnesse, which was long before Alexanders Alexanders time . But Alexander pierc't not so farre into the East. It sufficed, that having already over-wearied his Army, he discovered the rest of India by same. The Indian Kings whom he had subdued, informed him, that a Prince called Aggramenes, who commanded many Nations beyond the River Ganges, was the powerfullest King of all those Regions: and that he was able to bring into the field two hundred thousand Foot, three shoufand Elephants, twenty thousand Horse, and two thousand armed Chariots. With this report, though Alexander were more inflamed than ever to proceed in this discovery and conquest, yet all the art he had, could not perswade the Souldiers to wander over those great Desarts beyond Indus & Ganges, more terrible unto them than the greatest Army that the East could gather. Yet at the last contented they were, after many per- 10 fwafive Orations, to follow him towards the South, to discover such part of the Ocean Sea, as was neerer at hand, whereunto the River of Indus was their infallible guide. Alexander seeing that it would be no otherwise, devised a prettie tricke, wherewish he hoped to beguile posterity, and make himselfe seeme greater than he was. He enlarged his Campe, made greater trenches, greater cabbines for Souldiers, greater Horse-stalles, and higher mangers than Horses could feede in. He caused all furniture of men & horses to be made larger than would serve for use; & scattered these Armours & Bridles about his Campe, to be kept as reliques, and woundred at by the Savages. Proportionableto these he raised up twelve great Altars to be the monument of his journies end. This was a ready way to encrease the same of his bignesse; to his greatnesse it could adde nothing 20 fave a suspition, that it was lessethan is thought, seeing he strove so earnestly to make it thought more than it was.

This done, he returned againe to the banke of Acesines, and there determined to setup his fleet, where Acelines and Hydaspis incounter; where to testifie by a surer monument, how far he had past towards the East, he built by those rivers two Cities: the one he called Nicaa, & the other Bucephalon, after the name of his beloved Horse Bucephalus. Here againe he received a fourth supply of fixe thousand Thracian Horse-men, seven thousand Foot; and from his Lievtenant at Babylon five and twenty thousand Armours, gamished with filver and gold, which he distributed among his Souldiers. About these Rivers he wan many Townes, and committed great flaughter on those that resisted; It is then 20 written of him, that affaulting a Citie of the Oxidracans, he leapt from the top of the wall into it, and fought, I know not how long, against all the Inhabitants; tales like those of Bevis of Southampton, frivolous and incredible. Finally, he past downe the River with his fleet, at which time also the newes came unto him of a rebellion in Bastria, and then of the arrivall of an hundred Embassadours from a King of India, who submitted himselfe unto him. He feasted these Embassadours upon a hundred beds of gold, with all the sumptuosity that could be devised, who soone after their dispatch, returned againe with a present of three hundred Horse, one hundred and thirty Waggons, and to each of them foure Horses, a thousand Targets, with many other things rare and

Their entertainments ended, he failed towards the South, passed through many obscure Nations, which did all yeeld unto him either quietly, or compelled by force: among these he builded another Alexandria. Of many places which he tooke in this pasfage, Samus was one, the Inhabitants whereof fought against him with poisoned swords, with one of which Ptolomy (afterward King of Egypt) was wounded, and cured by an hearb which Alexander dreamt he had seene in the mouth of a Serpent.

When he came neere the out-let of Indus (being ignorant of the tides of the Sea) his Gallies, as they were on a fudden shuffled one upon another by the Floud, so on the Ebbe they were left on the drieground, and on the sandie bankes of the River, wherewith the Macedonians were much amazed; but after he had a few daies observed well the course 50 of the Sea, he past out of the rivers mouth some few miles, & after Sacrifices offered to Neptune, returned : and the better to informe himselfe, he sent Nearchus and Onesicritus, to discover the coast towards the mouth of Euphrates. Arrianus in the beginning of his fixt Book hath written this passage downe the River of Indus at length, with the maner of the Vessels in which he transported his Army, the Commanders that were used therein, and other the marvellous provisions made.

Neere the out-lets of this river, he spent some part of the Winter, and in eighteene daies march from thence recovered Gedrosia, in which passage his Army suffered such miserie for want of foode, that of a hundred and twenty thousand foot, and twelve thoufand horse, which he carried into India, not the fourth part returned alive.

Of Alexanders Riot, Cruelty, and death.

Rom Gedrosia. Alexander led his Army into Carmania, and so drawing neere to Persia, he gave himselfe wholly to feasting and drinking, imitating the triumphs of Bacchus. And though this Swinish vice be hatefull enough in it selfe, yet it alwayes to inflamed this King to Cruelty. For (faith Curtims) the Hang-man followed the feast, for Aspastes, one of his Provinciall Governors, he commanded to be staine, so as neither did the excelle of voluptuousnesse qualifie his cruelty, nor his cruelty hinder in ought his volup-

While he refreshed his Army in these parts, a new supply of five thousand soot and a thousand horse, was brought him by Cleander, and his fellows, that had bin imployed in the killing of Parmenio. Against these Murderers great complaint was made by the Denuties of the Provinces, in which they had commanded; and their offences were so outragious, as Alexander was perswaded, that, had they not altogether despaired of his retume out of India, they durst not have committed them. All men were glad of the occa-20 fion, remembring the vertue of him, whom they had flaughtered. The end was, That cleander, and the other chiefe, with fixe hundred Souldiers by them imployed, were delivered over to the Hang-manievery one rejoycing that the Ire of the King was at last executed on the ministers of his Ire.

Nearchus and Onesicritus were now returned from the coast, and made report of an lland rich in gold, and of other strange things; whereupon they were commanded to make some farther discoverie: which done, that they should enter the mouth of Euphrates, and finde the King at Babylon.

As he drew neere to Babylon, he visited the Sepulchre of Cyrus in Fasargada, now call Arrianus hath a led Chalquera: where he was presented with many rich gifts by Orfines, one of the Prin-farre different ces of Persia, of the race of Cyrus. But because Bagoas, an Eunuch in especial favour with description of the King, was neglected, he not only practifed certaine loofe fellowes to witnesse against Orfines, that he had robbed cyrus tombe, for which hee was condemned to die; but he affilted the Hang-man with his own hands in tormenting him. At which time also Alexander caused Phradites to be slaine, suspecting his greatnesse. Coperat (saith Curtius) esse praceps ad repræsentanda supplicia, item ad deteriora credenda; He began head-longly to bed bloud and to beleeve false reports. It is true, that he tooke a way to make all men weary of his government, feeing cruelty is more fearefull, than all adventures that can bemade against it.

At this time it is faid, that Calanus the Philosopher burnt himselfe, when he had lived o threescore and thirteene yeares. Whether herein he followed the custome of his Countrie, being an Indian, or fought to prevent the griefe and incommoditie of elder age, it is uncertaine: but in this the Historians agree, that fore-seeing and fore-shewing Alexanders death, he promised to meet him shortly after at Babylon.

From Pasargadahe came to Susa, where he maried Statira, Darius his eldest Daughter, giving her younger fifter to his beloved Epheltion, and fourescore other Persian Ladies to his Captaines. There were fixe thousand guests invited to the feast, to each of which he gave a cup of gold. Here there came unto him three thou fand young fouldiers, out of his conquered Provinces, whereat the Macedonians greatly murmured. Harpalus, his Treasurer in Babylon, having lavishly consumed the monies in his keeping, got him going with five thousand Talents, and fixe thousand hired Souldiers; but he was rejected in Greece, there flaine. Alexander greatly rejoyced at the fidelity of the Greeks, whom Harpalus with these forces and treasures could not stirre : yet he sent commandement, that they should againe receive their banished men, whereunto (fearefull of his indignation) all submitted themselves (except the Athenians) though they resolved, that it was a manifest preparation towards their bondage. After this there followed a marvellous discontentment in his Army, because he had resolved to send into Macedon all those old Souldiers which could no longer endure the travell of Warre, and to keepe the rest in Asia. He used many Orations to satisfie them, but it was in value during the tempest of their fury. But afterward, as Whales are drawne to the Land with a twine. threed, when they have trumbled a while, fo are the unconfiderate multicude eafily conducted when their first passions are evaporate. With such as were licenced to depart. he sent Craterus, to whom he gave the Lievtenantship of Macedon, Thessaly, and Thrace. which Antipaper had held from his first departure out of Europe, who had beaten the rebellious Greeks in his absence, discharged the trust committed unto him with great sideliev, and fent him fo many strong supplies into Asia from time to time. Certainely if Alexander had not taken counsell of his cups, he would have cast some better colour on this alteration, and given Antipater a stronger reason for his remove, than to have imploved him in the conduction of a new supply to be brought him to Babylon, the Warre ra being now at an end. For Antipater faw nothing in this remove, but the Kings disposition to fend him after Parmenio, and the rest. With this Antipater, the King, not with standing his great courage, had no great appetite to grapple: Princes, though jealous, doe not stand in doubt of every manill affected, though valiant: but there is a kinde of kingly courage, compounded of hardinesse and understanding, which is many times so feareful unto them, as they take leave both of Law and Religion, to free themselves thereof.

After he had fent for Antipater, he made a journey into Media to fettlethings there: where Ephestion, whom he favoured most of all men, dies. The King according to the greatnesse of his love, laments his losse, hangs his Physician, and bestowes upon his Monument twelve thousand talents: After which he returnes to Babylon. Thither Antipater 20 came not, but fent; and not to excuse himselfe, but to free himselfe. For if we believe Gurtius (whom Plutarch & others gaine-fay) Antipater by his fonnes, Caffander, Philip. and Iolla, who waited on Alexanders cup, gave him poyfon; Theffalus (who was of the conspiracie) having invited him to a drinking feast of purpose. For after he had takena carouse in Hercules his cup, a draught of drinke stronger than Hercules himselfe, he quitted the World within a few daies.

Certainly the Princes of the World have feldome found good, by making their Minifters over-great,& thereby fulpicious to themselves. For he that doth not acknowledge fidelity to be a debt, but is perswaded, that Kings ought to purchase it from their Vassals. will never please himself with the price given. The only restorative, indeed, that streng- 30 thens it, is the goodnesse & vertue of the Prince, & his liberality makes it more diligent; To as proportion and distance be observed. It may be that Antipater, having commanded two or three Kingdomes ten or twelve yeares, knew not how to play any other part; no more than Cafar did, after he had so long a time governed the Gaules, where hee utterly forgat the art of obedience. A most cruell and ungratefull traitor Antipater was, if Curtius do not belie him: For though he feared some ill measure upon his remove (the Tragedies of Parmenio, Clytus, and Callifthenes, having bin fo lately acted) yet he knew nothing to the contrary, but that the King had refolved to have given him some other great government in Afia: The old Souldiers thence returned having perchance defired to be governed by Craterus, whom they had followed in all the former Warre.

of Alexanders person and qualities.

Owfoever it were, Alexanders former cruelties cannot be excused, no more than his vanity to be esteemed the sonne of Jupiter, with his excessive delight in drinke and drunkennesse, which others make the cause of his sever and death. In that he lamented his want of enterprising, and grieved to consider what he should doe when he had conquered the World, Augustus Casar found just cause to deride him, 26 50 if the well-governing of fo many Nations and Kingdoms, as he had already conquered, could not have offered him matter more than aboundant, to busie his braines withall-That he was both learned and a lover of learning, it cannot be doubted. Sir Francis Bacon, in his first booke of the Advancement of Learning, hath proved it sufficiently. His liberality I know not how to praise, because it exceeded proportion. It is said, That when he gave a whole Citie to one of his fervants, He, to whom it was given, did out of modesty refuse it, as disproportionable to his fortune:to whom Alexander replied, That he did not enquire what became him to accept, but the King to give : of which Sentes;

Animosa vox videtur & regia, cum sit stultisima. Nihil enim per se quenquam decet. Refert Lade Benes. auid.cui,quando,quare,ubi, &c. sine quibus facti ratio non constabit; babeatur personarum le dignitatum proportio, & cum sit ubiq; virtutis modus, aque peccat quod excedit, quam and deficit; It feems a brave and royall speech, whereas indeed it is very foolish. For nothing simply considered by it selfe beseemes a man. We must regard what, to whom, when, where, and the like; without which confiderations no act can be approved. Let honours be proportioned unto the persons: for whereas vertue is ever limited by measure, the excesse is as faulty as the defect.

For his Person, it is very apparent, That he was as valiant as any man, a disposition taken by it selfe, not much to be admired; For I am resolved that he had ten thousand in his Army as daring as himselfe. Surely, if adventurous natures were to be commended fimply, we should confound that vertue with the hardinesse of Theeves, Russians, and malliffe Dogs. For certainly it is no way praife-worthy but in daring good things, and in the performance of those lawfull enterprises, in which we are employed for the service of our Kings and Common-weales.

If we compare this great Conquerour with other troublers of the world, who have hought their glory with fo great destruction and effusion of bloud, I think him far inferiout to Cafar, and many other that lived after him, seeing he never undertook any warlike Nation, the naked Scythians excepted; nor was ever encountred with any Army of which he had not a most mastering advantage, both of Weapons & Commanders, every one of his Fathers old Captains by far exceeding the best of his Enemies. But it seems Fortune and Destinie (if we may use those termes) had found out and prepared for him, without any care of his owne, both heapes of Men, that willingly offered their necks to theyoke, and Kingdomes that invited and called in their owne Conquerours. For condulion, we will agree with Seneca, who speaking of Philip the Father, and Alexander the Son gives this judgement of them: Quod non minores fuere pestes mortalium, quaminun. Naques, 1343 latio qua planum omne perfusum est quam conflagratio qua magna pars animantium exaruit; They were no lesse plagues to mankind, than an overflow of waters, drowning all the levell : or some burning drought, whereby a great part of living creatures are scorchedup.

CHAP.III.

The reigne of Aridæus.

Of the question about succession to Alexander.

HE death of Alexander left his Army (as Demades the Athenian then compared it) in such case, as was that monstrous Giant Polyphemus, having lost his only eye. For that which is reported in fables of that great Cyclops, might well be verified of the Macedonians: their force was intolerable, but for want of good guidance uneffectuall, & harmfull chiefly to themselves. The causes whereof (under the divine ordinance) where partly the uncertainty of Title to fuccession in the Kingdome of Macedon, partly the stub-borne pride of Alexander himselfe, who thinking none worthy to be his heire, did refuse to establish the right in any one, leaving every one to his own fortune: but especially the so great ambition of his followers, who all had learned of their Master to suffer no equals; a lesson foon taught unto spirits reslecting upon their own worth, when the reverence of agreater object faileth.

It hath formerly beene shewed, That Philip (the Father of Alexander) governing in Macedon as Protector, assumed unto himselse the Kingdome, not rendring it unto Amyntas, (the Sonne of his elder brother Perdiccas) when he grew to mans estate; but onely bestowing upon him in marriage a Daughter of his owne: by which bond, and much more by his owne proper strength, he assured the Crown unto himselfe: Amyneas never attempting ought against Philip; though (with price of his life) he did against against Alexander in the beginning of his reigne. Wherefore Eurydice, the fole iffue of this marriage, ought in reason to have been acknowledged Queen after Alexander; as having better Title thereto, than either He or Philip had, when they lived, vnlesse (peradventure) some Law of that Nation forbad the reigne of Women. But the excellent vertue of these two Princes had utterly defaced the right of all Pretenders, not claiming from their owne bodies: and so great were their conquests, that Macedonit selfe was (in regard of them) a very small Appendix, and no way deserving to be laid in ballance against the demand of their posterity, had they left any able to make challenge of the Royall seat.

Alexander having taken many wives, had iffue by none of the principall of them. Bar- 10 fine the Daughter of ArtabaZus a Perfian, had borne unto him a young Son: and Roxane the Daughter of Oxyartes (whom he had more folemnly married) was left by him great with childe. But the basenesse of the Mothers, and contempt of the conquered Nations, was generally alledged in Barre of Plea made for them, by some that would (perhaps) have wrought out their owne ends, under the name of Alexanders children.

Cleopatra a fifter of Alexander, widow to the King of Epirus, & Aridens his base brother (son to Philip by a Concubine of no account) who had married the Lady Eurydice before mentioned, were next in course. Of Cleopatra there was no speech, which may give suspition, that either Law or Custome had made that sex uncapable of the Soveraignty: Arideus (besides his bastardy) was neither for personnor quality sit to sules as King; yet upon him the election fell, but slowly, and (as happeneth often) for lacke of a better: when the Counsellors having over-laboured their disagreeing wits in devising what was bast, were content for very weatinessee to take what came next to hand.

Ptolomy (foon after King of Egypt) concurring with them who rejected all mention of the halfe-Perfian brood, King Alexanders children, was of opinion, that the rule of all should be given to the Captaines; that going for law which by the greater part of them should be decreed: fo farre was he from acknowledging any one as true Heire to the Crowne.

This Ptolomy was called the sonne of Lagus, but reputed of Philp: who having used the company of Arsinov Ptolomie's mother, delivered her in marriage to Lagus, being 30 great with child. Therefore, whether it were so that he hoped well to work his own fortune out of those differtions, which are incident unto the consultations of many ambitious men, equall in place, forcing them at length to redeeme their quiet with subjection to one, deserving regard by his bloud, and trust for his even carriage; or whether he desired only to get a share to himselse, which could not have come to passe, had all been given to one: plaine enough it is, that he thought not on preferring Aridaus before himselse; and therefore gave such counsell as fitted his owne and other mens purposes. Yea, this device of his tooke place indeed, though not in forme as he had propounded it; For, it was in effect all one, to have assembled at Alexanders empty chair, as Ptolomy had conceived the forme of their consultations, or to set in the chaire such a King 40 as Aridaus, no wifer than the chaire it selse. Also the controversies arising were determined by the greater part of the Captaines; by the greater part, if not in number, yet in puissance.

But as these counterseit shewes of dissembling aspirers doe often take checke by the plain dealing of them who dare to go more directly to work: fowas it like to have fared with Ptolomy and the rest, when Aristonia another of the Captains, interpreted the very words of Alexander; saying, That he lest his Kingdom to the worthiest, as designing Perdicas, to whom (lying at the point of death) he delivered his ring. It seemed good in reason, that Alexander should be disposer of his owne purchases: and those tokens of Alexanders purpose appeared plain enough, so long as no man would interpose anothers construction: every one being uncertain how the secret affections of the rest might be inclined. Many therefore, either out of their love, or because they would not be of the latest, urged Perdices to take upon him the estate Royall. He was no stranger to the Royall bloud; yet his birth gave him not such reputation, as the great savour of his dead King, with whom he had bin very inward, 8 that especially since the death of Ephession (a powerful Minion) into whose place he was chosen. For his own worth he might well be commended, as a good man of War, and one that had given much proofe of his private valour. But very surly he was: which quality (joyned with good fortune) carried a shew of Majefty: being checkt with misadventure, it was called by a true name, Pride; and rewarded with death.

In the present businesse a foolish over-weening did him as great harme, as it had been great happinesse to have succeeded Alexander. For, not content to have the acclamation of the Souldiers, approving the sentence of Aristonus, he would needs counterfeit modefly; thinking that every one of the Princes would have intreated him to take the weighty burden of an Empire, which would be the lesse envious, the more solemnity he used in the acceptance. It is truly said, He that faineth himselfea Sheep, may chance to be eaten by a Wosse. Meleager, (a man by nature envious, and bearing a particular hartered to Perdices) took advantage of his irresolute behaviour, and very bitterly enveighed against Souldiers ought to be Heires to the Treasure; and therefore he invited them, who were nothing slow, to share it. This disturbed all the Consultation. The Captaines were less along, farre enough from agreeing, and not able to have brought any conclusion to good effect without consent of the Souldiers, who greedy of spoyle, thronged about Meleager.

6. II.

The Election of Aridæus, with the troubles there-about arifing ; the first division of the Empire.

Uring this up-roare, mention was made of Aridaus by fome one, and entertained with good liking of many, untill at last it grew to the vovce of the Army. Meleager having with-drawne himselfe tumultuously from the company of the Lords, was glad of so faire an occasion to make himselfe great: therefore he produced Mridans, commended him to the Souldiers, who called him by his Fathers name Philip, and brought him into the Palace, investing him in Alexanders Robes, and proclaiming him King. Many of the Nobles withstood this election, but in vaine: for they could not refolve what course to follow, rejecting this. Only Python, a hot-headed man, took upon him to proclaime the Son of Alexander by Roxane, according to the counfell which Perdiscas at first had given appointing Perdiscas and Leonatus his Protectors. But this childe was not vet borne, which made that attempt of Python vaine. Finally, Perdicto with fixe hundred men, and Ptolomy with the Kings Pages, tooke upon them to defendthe place where slexanders body lay: but the Army conducted by Meleager, who carried the new King about whither he lifted, eafily brake in upon them, and inforced them to accept Aridam for their Soveraigne Lord. Then by the interceffion of the ancien Captains, a reconciliation was propounded and admitted, but on neither fide faithfully meant.

Leonatus, who was of Royall bloud, a goodly Gentleman and valiant, iffued out of Babylon, being followed by all the horse, which confisted (for the most part) of the Nobility. Perdiceas abode in the City (but standing upon his guard) that he might be ready to take the opportunity of any commotion that should happen among the infantry. The King (who was governed by Meleager) commanded, or gave leave to have Perdiess made away; which attempt succeeded ill, being neither secretly carried, nor committed to fure executioners. Their comming was not unexpected: and they were by Perdices rebuked with fuch gravity, that they departed honefter than they came; being forry for their bad enterprise. Upon the newes of this attempt, the Campe was in anup-roare, which the King feeking to pacifie, wanted authority, as having newly got othe Crowne by them, and holding it by their courtefie. The matter it felfe afforded no good excuses, and his indifferction made them worfe. He faid that no harme was done, for Perdiceas was alive: but their exclamations were against the tyrannous enterprise, which he imputed to Meleager; abandoning the furest of his friends to the rage of the multitude, who were not appealed, untill the King by offering to refigne his estate unto them, renewed out of their pity that favourable affection, which had moved them to fet him up at the first.

Perdiccus having now joyned himselfe with Leonatus, kept the fields, intending to cut offall provision of victuals from the Citie. But after fundry Embassies passing betweene Cccc 2

the King and the Nobles, (they requiring to have the Authors of fedition given up into their hands; the King, that Meleager might be joyned with Leonatus and Perdices, as a Third ingovernment of the Army) things were compounded according to the Kings defire. Meleager should have done well to consider, That such men as had one day demanded his head, were not like the day following to give him a principall place among them without any new occasion offered, had not some purpose of treachery lurked under their great facility. Generall peace was renewed, and much love protested where little was intended. The face of the Court was the same which it had beene in Alexanders time: but no longer now did the fame heart give it life; and windy fpirits they were which moved in the arteries. False reports were given out by appointment of Perdiceas, 10 tending to his owne diffrace, but in fuch termes as might feeme to have proceeded from Meleager: who finding part of the drift, but not all, took it as an injury done to himfelfe. and (as defirous of a true friendship) defired of Perdiccus, that such authors of discord might be punished. Perdiccas (as a lover of peace) did well approve the motion; and thereforeagreed that a generall Muster should be made, at which time the disturbers of the common quiet should receive their punishment (as was the manner for Souldiers offending) in presence of the Army. The plot was mischievously layd. Had Meleager given way to feditious rumours, he must needs have incurred the general hatred of all as a fower of diffention, & thereby with a publike approbation might have bin cut off, as having often offended in that kinde: his Prince being too weak a Patron. Now feeking redreffe ofthese disorders, he hastened his owne ruine, by a lesse formall, but more speedy way. This kind of Muster was very solemne, & practifed with many ceremonies, as for cleanfing of the Army. The Horse-men, the Elephants, the Macedonian foot, the Mercenaries were each according to their quality fet in array, apart from others, as if they had bin of fundry forts, met at adventure: which done, the manner was to skirmish (as by way of exercise) according to the direction of their severall Captaines. But at that time thegreat battell of Macedonian Pikes, which they called the Phalanx, led by Meleager, was of purpose bestowed in a ground of disadvantage 3 and the countenance of the Horse and Elephants beginning to give charge upon them, was fuch, as discovered no jesting passing nor good intent. Kings were alwayes wont to fight among the horse-men: of which cu- 30 frome Perdiceas made great use that day, to the utter confusion of his enemies. For Aridans was alwaies governed by him, which for the present had him in possession. Two or three dayes before, he lought the death of Perdiccas at the instigation of Meleger: now he rides with Perdiceas up and downe about the foot-men, commanding them to deliver unto the death all fuch as Perdiceas required. Three hundred they were who were cast unto the Elephants, and by them flaine, in the presence of the King (who should have defended them) and of their affrighted companions. But these three hundred werenotthe men whose punishment Meleager had expected: they were such as had followedhim, when he disturbed the first consultation that was held about the election of a new King, and some of them his especiall friends. Having therefore kept himselfe quiet a while, as 40 unwilling to give offence to them which had the advantage; when he saw their proceedings tend very manifestly to his destruction, he sted away into a temple, which he found no Sanctuary: for thither they fent and flew him.

The Army being thus corrected, was led into the City, where anew Councell of the Princes was held, who finding what manner of man their King, was, divided all the Provinces of the Empire among themselves; leaving to Arideus the office of a Visitor, and yet making Perdiccus his Protector, and Commander of the forces remaining with him. Then were the funerals of Alexander thought upon; whose body having bin sevendaies neglected, was opened, and embalmed by the Egyptians: no signe of poyson appearing, how great soever the suspicion might be. The charge of his buriall was committed to so Arideus: one of the Captains, who was two years preparing of a great and costly shew, making a stately Chariot in which the corps was laid; many coarses of his friends being layd in the ground before that of Alexander was bestowed in Alexandria, a City of his owne building, in Egypt.

6. III.

The beginning of the Lamian Warre.

Hilest these things were in doing, or presently after, Antipater & Craterus, two principall Noble-men, and inferiour to none of Alexanders followers; if not greater than any of the rest, were busied in Greece with a war, which the Athenians more bravely than wifely had begun in Alexanders life, but now did profecute more boldly than before, upon the courage which they had taken by his death. Alexander not long before he died, had commanded that all the banished Greekes (few 10 excepted) should be restored unto their former places. He knew the factious quality of the Grecian Estates, & therfore thought so to provide, that in every City he would have a fure party. But it fell out otherwise: For helost the hearts of many more than he wan by this proud injunction. His pleasure indeed was fulfilled; yet not without great murmuring of the whole Nation, as being against all order of Law, and a beginning of o nen tyranny. The Athenians greatly decayed in estate, but retaining more than was needfull of their ancient spirits, forbade the execution of this decree in their Dominions; for didalfo the Ætolians, who were valiant men, and inhabited a Region well fortified by nature : yet neither of them tooke Armes, but seemed to beare themselves, as men that had done no more than they might well justifie by reason: neverthelesse to prevent the worst, the Athenians gave secret instructions to Leosthenes, a Captaine of theirs, willing him to levie an Army, but in his owne name, and to keepe it in a readinesse for their use. This was no hard thing for Leofthenes to doe: great numbers of Greek Souldiers being lately returned from the Asian War in poor estate, as defrauded of their pay by the Captaines. Of these he had gathered up eight thousand, when the certaine newes were brought of Alexanders death: at which the City of Athens declared it felfe, and more honourably than wifely, proclaimed open War against the Macedonians for the liberty of Greece. Hereupon Leofthenes drew-in the Ætolians and fome other Estates, gave battellto the Boeotians, who fided with Antipater, and overthrew them; growing fo fast in preputation, and fo ftrong in adherents, that Antipater (arming in all hafte, yet suspecting his owne (trength) was faine to fend into Afia to Craterus for fuccour.

Nothing is more vaine than the feares and hopes of men, shunning or pursuing their defficies a farre off, which deceive all mortall wisdome, even when they seem neare at hand. One moneth was scarcely past, since nothing so heavily burthened the thoughts of Antipater as the returne of Craterus into Macedon, which he then feared as death, but now defired as the most likely affurance of his life. Craterus, whom Alexander held as of allmen the most assured unto him, was sent into Macedon to convey home the old Souldiers (that was the pretence) & to fucceed Antipater in the government of Macedon and Greece. The fuspitions were strong that he had a privile charge to put Intipater to to death: neither did that which was commonly published found much better; which was, That Antipater should be sent unto the King, as Captain of the young Souldiers, newly tobelevied in Europe. For Alexander was much incenfed against him by his Mother Olympia: and would fometimes give out speeches, testifying his owne jealousie and hatred of him; but yet he strove to smother it, which in a cruell Prince betokeneth little good. Few of Alexanders Lievtenants had escaped with life: most of them indeed were meane persons in regard of those who followed him in his Indian expedition, and were therefore (perhaps) removed to make place for their betters. But if the Kings rigour was such, as could finde rebellious purposes (for so hee interpreted even lewd government) in base persons; little might Antiquer hope for, who having sitten Vice-roy ten so yeares in the strongest part of the Empire, was called away to the presence of so fell a Master, and the envie of a Court, wherein they had been his inferiours, which would now repine to seehim their equall. Therefore whether his feare drew him to prevention, working first the Kings death by poyson, given by his some tolaus, Alexanders Cup-bearer; or whether it brake not forth untill opportunity had changed it into the paffion of revenge, which was cruelly performed by his fonne Cassander : great cause of much feare he had; which I note in this place, as the ground of effects to be produced in

Very few yeares.

At the present Craterus was sent for, and all the Captaines of companies lying nears, folicited to make hafte. Not without cause: For in Macedon there could not at that time be raifed more than thirtcene thousand foot, and fixe hundred horse; which Mustar was of raw Souldiers, all the force of the Country being emptyed into Asia. The Thessalians indeed who had long stood firme for Philip & Alexander, who also were the best horse. men of Greece, furnished him with very brave troups, that might have done great fee. vice, had their faith held out, which they changed for the liberty of Greece. With the forces did Antipater in Thessaly try the fortune of a battell with Leotthenes; Tather (as may seem) searing the increase of his enemies power, and rebellion of the Greeks, (were they not checkt at the first) than prefuming on his strength. For Leostheres had of Athenians, Atolians, and Mercenatics, two and twenty thousand foot, besides the affishere of 10 many perty Signories, and of some Illyrians and Thracians: of horse he brought into the field about two thousand and five hundred; but over-strong he was that way also when once the Thessalians had revolted unto him. So Antipater lost the day : and his tosse was fuch, that he neither was able to keepe the field, nor to make a fafe retrait into his owne Country: therefore he fled into the Towne of Lamia, which was well fortified, and wel provided of all things necessary to beare out a fiege. Thicher did Leesthenes followhim. present him battell againe, and upon refusall close up the Towne with earth-works, and a wall. There will we leave him for a while, travelling in the last honourable enterprise that ever was undertaken by that great City of Athens.

§. IV. How Perdiccas employed his Army.

Ing Aridam living under the rule of Perdices, when all the Princes were gone each to his owne Province, kepta naked Court: all his greatnesse consisting in a bare title, supported by the strength of his Protector, who cared not for himotherwise than to make use of him. Perdices had no Province of his owne peculiar, neither was he like to be welcome to any whom he should visit in his government. A stronger Army than any of the rest he had, which he might easily hope in that unsetled condition of things to make better worth to him than many Provinces could have bin. The 30 better to accomplish his desires, he closely sought the marriage of Cleopatrs, the sister of Alexander 3 yet about the same time he either married Nicesa the daughter of Anipater, or made such love to her as blinded their eyes, who did not somewhat narrowly search into his doings.

Ariarathes the Cappadocian, the fecond of that name, and tenth king of that Country, had continued faithfull to the Persian Empire as long as it stood : following the example of his forefathers, even from Pharnaces the first that reigned in Cappadocia, who married Aiossa sister to the great Cyrus. Some of his Ancestors had (indeed) been oppressed by the Perfians: but what fortune tooke from them at one time, Vertue restored at another, and their faithfull Princes had much encreased all. But now in the farall Period of 40 so great an Empire, with much wisdome, and (Darius being slain) with sufficient honour, he might have acknowledged the Macedonian in the Perfians roome. This he did not; neither did Alexander call him to account, being occupied with great cares. But Perdiccas, who had no greater business wherein to entertain his Army, found it expedient both for the honour of the Empire, to take that in-land Kingdome, furrounded with Provinces of the Macedonian conquest, and for his own particular, to have one opportune place of fure retrait, under the government of a stedfast friend. Therefore he entred Cappadocia fought with Ariarathes, who drew into the field thirty thousand foot, and fifteene thousand horse(a strong Army, had it not encountred a stronger, and better trained)wan the victory, and thereby the whole Kingdome. But with much cruelty did he use the vi-50 ctory: for having taken Ariarathes prisoner with many others, he crucified him, and as many of his Kindred as he could light upon; and fo delivered that Province to Eumenes, whom of all men living he trufted most.

Another part of his forces he had comitted to Python, rather as to the most honourable of such as remained about him, than as to the most affured. Python was to subdue the Greeks rebelling in the high Countries of Asia. About twenty thousand foot, and three thousand horse they were, (all old Souldiers) who, planted in Colonies by Alexander, to bridle the barbarous nations, were soon weary of their unpleasant habitations, & the tude people people, among whom they lived: and therefore took advantage of the prefent troubles to feeke unto themselves a better fortune. Against these Python went, more desirous to make them his owne, than to destroy them : which intent of his, Perdiccas discovering; did both give him in charge to put all those Rebels to the sword, giving the spoyles of them to his Souldiers, and further enjoyned it unto Pythons Captaines (his owne creatures) that they should see this commandement executed. These directions for use of the victory, might have proved needleffe; fo uncertaine was the victory it felfe. A Captaine of the Rebels commanding over three thousand, corrupted by Python, did in the heate of the fight (which was very doubtfull) retire without necessity to a hill not farre off. This dismaied the rest, and gave the day to Python: who being far enough from Perdicalo, offered composition to the vanquished, granting unto them their lives and liberty, under condition of laying downe their armes; and hereupon he gave them his faith. Being master of these Companies, he might well have a good opinion of his owne power: all power being then valued by strength in followers, when as none could vaunt himselfe asfree Lord of any Territory. He had thirteene thousand foot, and eight thousand eight hundred horse, besides these new Companions, whom needlesse seare without great losse had caused to leave the field: but in true estimation all the greatnesse whereof Python might thinke himselfe affured, was (and soon appeared to be) inherent in Perdiccas. For by his command were ten thousand foot, and eight thousand horse, of those which followed Python, levied; the Rulers of the Provinces carefully obeying the letters of Perdiceas, by which they were enjoyned to give affiftance to that businesse: and by vertue of the precept given unto them by Perdiscan, did the Macedonians cut in pieces all those poore men who had yeelded themselves; leaving Python as naked as he came forth to returne unto his great Master.

Nowwas Perdiceas mighty above the mighty, and had fair leafure to pursue his hopes of marriage with Cleopatra, and thereby to make himselfe Lord of all: but this must be screetly carried for seare of opposition. How it succeeded, will appear e when the Lamian War taketh ending.

The processe of the Lamian War.

Ee left Antipater hardly befieged, wanting means to free himfelfe without fuccours from his friends in Afia. Those helps not appearing so soon as he expected, he came to parley with Leosthenes, and would have yeelded unto any terms of reason, wherewith men possessed with hope of victory, does eldome limit their desires. Leosthenes willed him without further circumstance to submit himselfe to discretion. This was too much for him that had once commanded over them, who now required of him such a dishonourable composition. Wherefore knowing that the extressor mities, from which as yet he was surre enough, could bring no worse with it, Antipater prepared for the desence; and the other for winning the Towne, which selt great want of victuals.

Inthis lingring War the Ætolians (whether weary of fitting still at a fiege, or having businesse which they pretended at home) took their leave, and returned into their owne Countrey. Their departure left the trenches so thinly manned, that Antipater found meanes to fally out upon his enemies to their great loffe : for many were flaine, and Leof benes himselfe among them, ere he could be repulsed into the Towne. Yet hereby the Macedonians were nothing relieved, their victuals wasted, and they were not strong enough to deale with the Greeks in open fight. Craterus was long in comming. Lysima-50 thus, who was neareft at hand in Thrace, had worke too much of his owne, leading no more than foure thousand foote, and two thousand horse, against Seuthas the Thracian King, who brought into the field above four times that number; and though Lysimachus, not without losse had gotten one victory, yet the enemy abounding in multitude, felt not the blow so much as might abate his courage. Therefore Leonatus was earnestly folicited by Antipaters friends, to make all haste to the rescue. He had the government of Phrygiathe leffe, and was able to raife an Army of more than twenty thousand foor; and two thousand five hundred horse, whether levied out of his province, or appointed unto him out of the maine Army, it is uncertaine. Certaine it is, that he was more wil184 ling to take in hand the journey into Greece, than Anipater was to have him come. For Cleopatra had written unto him, desiring his presence at Pella, the chiefe Citie of Macedon, and very kindly offering herselfe to be his wise; which letters he kept not so close as had bin requisite, and therefore brought himselfe into great suspition, that soon ended with his life. Antiphilas, chosen Generall by the Athenians in place of Leosshenes, heaving of his approach, for sook the siege of Lamia, and tooke the ready way to these great Conquerors of Asia, with purpose to give them an evill welcome home, before Anipa-ter and they should joyne in one. He had (notwithstanding the departure of the Ætolians) the advantage of Leonatus in horse, by the ods of 2000. Thessalians; in other things he was equall with him; in cause he thought himselfe Superiour; in the fortune of that 10 day he proved so: for he wan a great victory (chiesly by vertue of the Thessalians) which appeared the greater by the end of Leonatus himselfe; who sighting valiantly, was draupeared the greater by the end of Leonatus himselfe; who sighting valiantly, was draupeared the greater by the end of Leonatus himselfe; who sighting valiantly, was draupeared the greater by the end of Leonatus himselfe; who sighting valiantly, was draupeared the greater by the end of Leonatus himselfe; who sight so the first of ground, where he found his death, which he desperately had so the Indians, but it waited for him at home, not far from the place of his nativity. He was the first of Alexanders Captaines which dyed in battell, but all, or most of the rest shall sollow him the same way. After this day, the Athenians did never any thing sutable to their ancient glory.

The vanquished Macedonians were too weak to senew the fight, and too proud to slie. They betooke themselves to high grounds, unfit for service on horse-back, and so abode in the fight of the enemy that day; the day following Antipater with his men came into their Campe, and took the charge of all. The Athenians perceiving their strength to be at the greatest, and fearing lest that of the enemy should increase, did earnestly seek to determine the matter quickly by another battell. But still Antipater kept himselse on ground of advantage; which gave more than reasonable considence to the Greeks, many of whom departed to their homes, accounting the enemy to be vanquished. This wretchlessels (incorrigible in an Army of voluntaries) was very inexcusable; seeing that the victories by Land were very much defaced by losses at Sea, where the Athenians, labouring to have made themselves once againe Masters, were put to the worst.

But now the fatall captivity of Greece came on of which the never could be delivered unto this day. Craterus with a ftrong Army having made great marches from Cilicia, 30 paffed over into Europe, and comming into Teffaly, joyned himselfe with Anipair. The forces of Leonatus, Intipater, and Craterus being joyned in one, contained fony thousand weightily armed, three thousand light-armed men, and five thousand horse; of which numbers the Greeks wanted a thousand and five hundred in horse; in foot, eighteene thousand. Carefully therefore did Antiphilus labour to avoyd the necessity of a battell, untill fuch time as the Towns confederate should returne unto the Camp those bands which had straggled from it. But those companies were so slow in comming, and Antipater fourgent upon the Greeks, that compelled they were to put the matter in hazzard without further attendance. Like enough it is, that with a little more help they had carried away the victory : for the Theffalians had the upper hand, and held it, untill fuch 40 time as they perceived their battels (over-laid with multitude) retire unto the higher ground, which caused them also to fall back. So the Macedonians became Lords of the field, having little elfe to boast of considering that with the losse of an hundred & thirty men, they had only purchased the death of some five hundred enemies. Yet hereof was great use made: For the Greeks, as not subject unto the ful command of one General; and being every one desirous to preserve his own estate and City; concluded to make a treaty of peace with Antipater; who being a fubtle Artificer, and well understanding their aptnesse to division, refused to hearken to any generall composition, but willed every city to deale apart for it selfe. The intent of his device was so apparent, that it was rejected; the Greeks choosing rather to abide the comming of their affishants, whose unreasonable 50 carelesnesse betrayed the cause. Antipater and Craterus besieging and winning some Towns in Theffaly, which the Army of the Confederates wanted means and courage to relieve, wearied that Nation from attending any longer upon other mens unlikely hopes, with their owne affured and present calamity.

of the peace granted to Athens by Antipater. Of Demosthenes his death.

The Thessalians falling off, all the rest soon followed severely, & sued for peace; the gentle conditions given to the most forward, inviting such as were slack. Only the Athenians and Ætolians held out. Little favour could they hope for, having been Authors of this tumult: and their feare was not great; the seat of the war being far from them. But the celerity of Antipater consounded all their imaginations; who save fill at Athens, devising upon courses of prosecuting the War to come, which came to their dores before their consultation could finde issue. He was ready to enter upon their Frontiers; they had no ability to resist, and were as heartlesse as friendlesse. All that remained was to send Embassadors, desiring peace upon some good termes: necessity enforcing them to have accepted even the very worst. Phocion, with Demades the Orator, & Xenocrates the Philosopher, were chiefe of this Embassage; Phocion, as the most honourable; Demades, a strong perswader (both of them well respected by Anipater); and Xenocrates, as one admired for wisdome, gravity of manners, and vertue; but all these ornaments consisting in speculation, and therefore of selfer regard, when their admiration was to cost them much in reall effects.

Antipater calling to mind the pride of Leoshbenes, required of the Athenians, that they should wholly submit themselves to his pleasure; which being (perforce) granted, he commanded them to defray the charges of the War past, to pay a fine, and entertaine a Garrison. Further, he abrogated the popular estate, committing the government of the City to those of most wealth, depriving of the right of suffrage all such as wanted a convenient proportion of riches.

About nine thouland they were, all men of good substance, to whom the administration of the Common-wealth was given; a number great enough to retaine the name and forme of a Democratic. But the rascall multitude of beggarly persons, accustomed to 30 get their livings out of the common troubles, being now debarred from bearing offices and giving their voices, cried out, that this was a meere Oligarchie, the violent usurpation of a few incroaching upon the publike right. These turbulent fellowes (of whom King Philip had beene wont to say, That war to them was peace, and peace war) Anti-pater planted in Thrace, & gave them lands to manure; leaving as few of them as he could to molest the quiet of Athens.

To the same end (yet withall for satisfying his owne suspicions and harred) he caused Demosthenes and Hyperides, famous Orators, with some others, to be slaine. Had the death of these two, especially of Demosthenes, beene forborne, the rest of his proceedings in this action might well have passed for very milde: whereas now all such, as eigother are delighted with the Orations of Demosthenes, or have surrendred their judgements to Authors justly admiring him, as the most eloquent of all that ever did speake and write, condemne him utterly, calling him a bloudie tyrant. Such grace and reputation doe the learned arts finde in all civill Nations, that the evill done to a man, samous in one of them, is able to blemish any action, how good soever otherwise it be, or honourably carried.

Demosthenes had taken Sanctuarie in the Temple of Neptune, in the Isle of Calauria; there did Archias (sent with Souldiers by Antipater for the purpose) find him, and gently personaded him to leave the place; but not so prevailing, he threatned violence. Then Demosthenes entreating a little respite as it had beene to write somewhat, secretly stooke possion, which he had kept for such an ecessitie, and so died; rather choosing to doe the last execution upon himselfe, than to fall into the hands of such as hated him. Only this act of his (commendable perhaps in a Heathen man) argued some valour in him; who was otherwise too much a coward in battell, how soever valiant in perswading to enterprises, wherein the way to very honourable ends was to be made through passage exceeding dangerous. He loved money well, and had great summes given him by the Persian, to incourage him, in finding work for the Macedonians at home. Neither did he ill (me thinkes) in taking from the Persians which loved not his Countrey, great reward, for speaking such things as tended to his Countryes good; which he did not cease

Such as in tender contemplation of his death can endure no honourable, though true, mention of Antipater, may (if they can) believe Lucian, who tels us, That it was Antipaters purpose to have done him great honour. Sure it is, that he was a stedfast enemie to the Mace. donians; therefore discretion required that he should be cut off.

Thematters of Athens being thus ordered, the chiefe command was left in the hands of Phocion, a vertuous man, and lover of his Countrie, yet applying himfelfe to the necesfitie of the times; by which commendations he had both at other times done the Cirie much good, and now procured this peace, which (though grievous to free-men, yet favourable to the vanquished) he endeavoured carefully to preserve.

How Craterus and Antipater were drawn from their Etolian wars into Asia. The grounds of the first civill war between the Macedonian Lords.

O Antipater with Craterus returned into Macedonia, where they strengthned their friendship with a new alliance; Craterin taking Phila, the Daughter of Antipater. to Wife.

Shortly after they went against the Ætolians, whose povertie was not so easily daunted, 10 as the Iuxurious wealth of the more powerfull State of Athens had bin. Their Countrie was rough and mountainous, having many places of great fastnesse, into which they conveied fuch of their goods as they most esteemed, and of their people, as were least fit for war: with the rest they fortified the strongest of their Cities, and so abode the comming of the Macedonians, whom they manfully refifted. With great obstinacie did the Mace donians contend against the difficulties of the places, which the Ætolians made good as long as their victuals held out. But when Craterus had shut up all passages, & utterly debarred them of reliefe, then were they put to a miscrable choice; either to descend from their strong holds, and fight upon equall ground, with unequall numbers, or to endure the miseries of hunger & cold, against which they could make no long resistance; or to yeeld 39 themselves to the Macedonians: who, incensed by the losse of many good Souldiers, were not like to leave fo stubborn enemies in places, which might give confidence to rebellion. In cases of extremitie, much finenesse of wit apprehending all circumstances of danger, commonly doth more hurt than a blunt confideration of that only, which at the present is in hand. These Atolians did not as yet want meat: but their enemies daily molested them: wherefore as yet they thought upon nothing but fighting. Fortune was gracious to their courage. For fuch newes came out of Afia into the Macedonian Camp, as made Antipater and Craterus think every houre a moneth, till they had rid their hands of these A tolians, giving them what soever conditions they would aske: yet with purpose to call them to fevere account; yea, to root them out of Greece by death, or by captivitie, when 4 once they should have settled the affairs of Asia; as they hoped and defired. But of mens purposes God is disposer: in whose high counsell it was ordained, that this poore Nation should continue atroublesome bar to the proceedings of Maredon and Greece, and (when time had ripened the next Monarchie) an open gate to let the Roman Conquerors into those and other Provinces. Likewise concerning the matters of Asia, the reformation in sended by Antipater and Craterin, was so far from taking effect, that it served meerly as an introduction to all the civill wars enfuing.

The grounds of the Afiatique expedition, which did fet the world in an uproare, were these. Antipater and Crateriu were of Alexanders Captaines the mightiest in reputation: The one, in regard of his ancient precedencie, and the present rule which he bare se in the parts of Europe. The other, as of all men the best beloved, and most respected, both of Alexander & of the whole Armie. Next unto these had Perdiceas been; whom the advantage of his presence at the Kings death did make equall, or superiour, to either of these, if not to both together. The first intents of Perdiceas were, to have consorted with these two, and to have beene with them a third partner in the government of all; to which purpose hee entertained the discourse of marriage with one of Antipaters Daughters. But feeling in short space the strength of that gale of winde which boilehim up, he began to take wing and foare quite another way. Aridiem was a very fimple man, vetserved well enough to weare the title of that Majesty, whereof Perdiccas being Administrator, and hoping to become proprietary, the practice was more severe than had been in the dayes of Alexander: the defire to feeme terrible, being very familiar with weake Princes, and their ambitious officers, who know no other means of preferving themselves from contempt, and of giving such a fiery lustre to their actions, as may dazle theeyes of the beholders. How cruelly the poor Greeks in the higher Afia were all put to the fword; and how tyrannously the King and Princes of Cappadocia were crucified, hath already been shewed. The Pisidians were the next who selt the wrath of these counterfeit Atexanders. One City of theirs was utterly razed; the children fold for o flaves, and all the reft massacred. The Isaurians by this example growne desperate, when affertwo or three dayes triall they found themselves unable to continue the defence, locktthemselves into their houses, and set the Town on fire, into the slame whereof the voing mendid throw themselves, after that they had a while repelled the Macedonians

These exploits being performed, the Army had no other workthan to sift the ashes of the burnt City for gold and filver; but Perdiceas had bufineffe of greater importance troubling his braines. Nothing was more contrary to his ends, than to fit still without imployment: letting his Souldiers grow idle about him, whileft others grew great, and took deep root in their severall Provinces. He purposed therefore to transport his forto tes into Europe, under pretence of bringing the King into Macedonia, the feat of his Anceltors, and head of the Empire. The Kings presence would make the Offices of his Vice-Royes(during the time) actually voyd; Antipater with Graterus being once in case of private men, and only Perdiceas holding authority, the match with Cleopaira might eafily hemade. So should greatnesse meet with a good title; and what more could be wished? Some impediment the power of Ptolomy might give, who held Egypt well fortified with men, but much better with love of the people; yet if the businesse prospered in Macedonia, like enough it was that either Ptolomy would follow of himselfe, or be driven to ome to reason. Antigonus likewise then governing in Phrygia, a busic headed man, and ill affected to the fide, was to be looked into and made away, for feare of further trouble. so So thought Perdiccas, and was deceived in so thinking. Antigonus was as good a man of War, of as deep a judgement, as high a spirit, and as great undertaking, as any of Alexandes Captains. His imployments had been leffe than some of theirs, which made him albut leffe respected. But his thoughts were as proud as theirs: for he valued himselfe by his owne worth, not by the opinions of other men; with carefull attention had he watched Perdiceas, and founded the depth of his purposes, which it was now high time wdiscover. For Perdiceas having with a jealous eye pryed into the demeanour of Anti-(1001), and finding him no way fit for his turne, caused him to be charged with such accufitions, as might fuffice to take away his life, especially by a Judge that sought his death. This device Antigonus would not feeme to perceive, but prepared himselfe in shew to make answer, indeed, to make escape; which easily he did, putting himselfe and his Sonne Demetrius aboord of some Athenian Gallies, that carried him to Antipater, laden with fuch tidings as finished the Ætolian War before mentioned.

As the comming of Antigonus made Craterus and Antipater manifestly perceive their owne danger : To his flight gave Perdiccas to understand that his intentions were layed on, and must now be justified by the sword. Therefore he prepared as fast as he could, not onely for defence, but (as having on his fide the Kings name) to meet with them at home, who were nothing flacke in providing to encounter him. Ptolomy being adverti-Idofthese proceedings, and confidering how nearely they concerned him, fided with Anipater. To his government of Egypt he had annexed the Dominion of Cyrene, not without consent of the chiefe Citizens; and now in the midst of these garboyles he ceebrated the funerall of Alexander with great folemnity, purchasing thereby to himselfe much good will and many partakers, notwithstanding the terrible report of the Kings

Army comming against him.

6. VIII.

Perdiccas his voyage into Egypt, and his death.

Erdiceas, uncertaine which way to bend his maine power, at length refolved to fet upon Ptolomy; leaving Eumenes to keepe to his use, against Craterus and Antipater, the parts of Asia bordering upon Europe.

It may feem ftrange, that hedid not rather make head against those who were to come out of Greece with a great number, and of more able men than Ptolomy could bring, Perhaps he thought to make a quick end with Ptolomy; or beleeved that Crateria Would not 10 be readie for him foone enough. Sure it is that he tooke a bad course, and made it worse with ill handling.

Ptolomy by his sweet behaviour allured many to his partie, without helpe of any bad arts. Perdiceas contrariwise was full of insolencie, which never failed to be rewarded with hatred; that is truely defined, An affection founded upon opinion of an unjuft contempt. The whole storie of his proceedings in Egypt is not worth relation: for hedid norhing of importance; but (as a wilfull man) tired his followers, and wasted themin hard enterprises without successe. His most forceable attempt was upon a little Town. called the Camels wall: thither he marched by night, with more hafte than good speed: for Ptolomy preventing him, did put himselfe into the place, where behaving himselfe 20 not only as a good Commander, but as a front Souldier, he gave the foile to Perdices. caufing him to retire with loffe, after a vehement, but vaine, affault continued one whole day. The night following, Perdiceas made another journy, (which was his last) and came to the divisions of Nilus, over against Memphis. There with much difficultie he beganto passe over his Armie into an Iland, where he meant to incampe. The current was strong. the water deepe, and hardly foordable. Wherefore he placed his Elephants above the passage, to breake the violence of the streame, and his horse-men beneath it, to take up fuch as were carried away by swiftnesse of water. A great part of his Armie beingarived on the further banke, the channell began to waxe deep; fothat whereas the former companies had waded up to the chin, they who should have followed could find no foo-39 ting. Whether this came by the rifing of the water, or flitting away of the ground; (the earth being broken with the feet of fo many Men, Horse, & Elephants) no remedy there was but such as had passed must repasse again, as well as they might: for they were too weake for the enemie, and could not be relieved by their fellowes. With great confusion therefore they committed themselves to the river, wherein above two thousand of them perished, a thousand were devoured by Crocodiles, a miserable spectacle evento such as were out of danger; such as were strong and could swim, recovered the Campe, many were carried down the stream, and driven to the contrary banke, whereby they fell into the hands of their enemies.

This misfortune exasperated the Souldiers against their Generall, giving libertic to their tongues, which long time had concealed the evill thoughts of their hearts. While they were thus murmuring, newes came from Ptolomy, which did fet them in an up-roar. Ptolomy had not only shewed much compassion on those who fell into his hands alive, but performed all rights of funerall to the dead carkaffes, which the river had caft upon his fide: and finally, fent their bones and ashes to be interred by their Kinsmen or Friends. This did not only move the common Souldiers, but made the Capraines fall to mutinie, thinking itunreasonable to make warreupon so vertuous and honourable a person, to fulfill the pleasure of a Lordly ambitious man, using them like slaves. These dition growing strong, wanted only a head, which it quickly found. Python was there, who inwardly hated Perdiccas, for the differed which he had fuffered by his procurement, after the victorie upon the rebellious Greeks. Python had lived in honourable place about Alexander; he was in the division of the Provinces made Governour of Media, He had followed Perdiccas, and being in all things (the Protectorship excepted)equal to him, had neverthelesse been scornfully used by him, which now he requited. Drawing rogether a hundred of the Captaines, and a good part of the Horse, which consisted of the Gentrie, (the footmen having declared themselves before) he entred the Tentos Perdiceas, where without further circumstance they all, ranne upon him, and slew him Such end had the proud mif-governing authoritie of Perdiccas. He might have lived as great as any, could he have fuffered any as great as himfelfe; yea, peradventure mafter of all, had he not been too masterly over those which were already his.

The next day Ptolomie came into the Campe, where he was joyfully received; he excused himselfe of things past, as not having beene Author, or given cause of the warre, and was eafily beleeved: the favour of the Army being such toward him, that needes they would have made him Protector in the roome of Perdiccas. But this he refused. Irwas an Office fit for one that would feeke to increase his greatnesse with his trouble. Prolomie was well enough already; wherefore, for his own quiet he forbare to accept ir. and for their well-deferving of him, he procured that honourable charge to Python, & to 10 Arideus the Captain, who having had some companies of Souldiers, to furnish with their attendance the folemnities of Alexanders Funerals, did with them adhere to him against

In the middest of these businesses came newes of two great victories obtained by Eumenes; which newes, had they arrived two or three dayes sooner, had been entertained with joy full acclamations; and would have given fuch reputation to Perdiceas, as had raused both his private maligners to continue his open flatterers, and his open enemies to have accepted any tolerable composition. But these good tidings comming in ill time, when death had stopped the eares which would have given them welcome, found bad acceptance, as shall be shewed hereafter.

The Fore wee proceeds in the relation of things happening about the person of the King, it is meet that we speake of those businesses in the lower Asia, which were handled by Eumenes with notable dexterity, whilest Perdicess was occupied in the Egyptian Wars. Alcetas the brother of Perdiccas, and Neoptolemus, had received command from Perdiceas to be affiftant to Eumenes, and to follow his directions. But Alcetas made flat answer that he would not; alledging the backwardnesse of his men to beare Ames against so great a person as Antipater, and a man so much honoured as Craterue. Nuptolemus was content to make faire shew, but inwardly he repined at the precedency given to Eumenes, as thinking himselfe the better man. Eumenes discovering, through the counterfeited looks of Neoprolemus, the mischiefe lurking in his heart, wisely diffembled with him, in hope to win him by gentle behaviour, and fweet language, that commonly are lost, when bestowed upon arrogant creatures. Yet the better to fortifie himselfe, that hemight stand upon his own strength, he raised out of the Countries under his jurisdiction, about fixe thousand horse, giving many priviledges to such as were serviceable, and taining them well up. Not without great need. For when upon advertisement of the great preparations made by Craterus and Antipater (who had newly passed the Hellefont) for the invafion of his Provinces, he willed Neoptolemus to come to him with all his power; Neoptolemus did(indeed)advance, but in hostile manner, though unprovoked, presented him battell. Neoptalemus had secretly covenanted with Antipater to lay open the way for him to the conquest of Asia, which now intending to performe, hee was shamefully disappointed. For though his footmen, being all Macedonians, had much the better, and prevailed far upon Eumenes his battels; yet were his horse driven our of the field, and himselfe compelled, with a few of them, to run away, leaving naked the backs ofhis Macedonian foot-men to be charged by Eumenes, who forced them in fuch wife, that cashing down their Pikes, they cryed for mercy, and gladly took their oath to doe him faithfull fervice. Antipater and Craterus endeavoured with many goodly promiles to draw Eumenes into their fociety, who contrariwise offered himselfe as a meane ofreconciliation, betweene Perdictas and Craserus, whom he dearely loved; professing withall his hatred to Apripater, and constant faith to the cause which he had undertaken to maintaine.

Whilest these negotiations were on foot, Neoptolemus came with his broken crue to Antipater, and his Affociates, vilifying Eumenes, & calling him a Scribe (at which foolish railing they laught) but extolling the vertue of Craterus (as well he might) with high commendations; affuring them, that if Craterus did but once appeare, or that his voyce were but heard by any Macedonian in Eumenes his Campe, the victory was wonne; for

they would all forth-with revolt unto him. Earnestly therefore he defired them to give himayd against Eumenes, and especially requested that Craterus might have the leading of the Army to be fent. Their owne affections did eafily lead them to condescend to his motion; and good hope there was, that the reputation of Craterus might prevaile ac much as the force which he drew along. For he had in the middest of Alexanders vanities, when others (imitating their King) betooke themselves to the Persian fashions of garments and customes, retained the ancient Macedonian form of behaviour, and apparrell; whereby he became very gracious with the common Souldiers, who beheld these new tricks of Asia with discontented eyes, as reproachfull and derogatory to the manners of their native Countrey. So Antipater took the way toward Cilicia, to hold Per- 10 diceas at bay, and to joyne with Ptolomy. Craterus used great celerity, to have taken Eumenes revelling (as hee hoped) according to the common fashion of Captaines, after a great victory. But he had a wary and well advised enemy to encounter, who kept good espiall upon him, and with much wisedome fore-saw all that was to be seared, and the meanes of prevention, which his courage did not faile to execute. Eumenes was not ignorant that Craterus was able to defeat him without battell, yea without stroke; him thereforehe feared more than the Army following him: (yet the Army following him was fuch as much exceeded his own in foot-men, but was inferiour in horf-men)& thought it more uneafie to keept the Macedonians from revolting to him, than from knowing him. Hereupon he took in hand a strange piece of work, which desperation of all courses else 20 taught him, & wife managing prosperously accomplished. He gave out reports, that Neoptolemus was returned with fuch company as he could gather together, & had gotten Pigres (a Captain of no great estimation, who lay not far off) to joyn with him. Havinganimated his men against Neoptolemus, whom he knew to be despised & hated among them, (as having bin vanquished by some of them, & for saken others in plain field, whill they valiantly fought in his quarrel) he took great care to keep them from receiving any intelligence of the enemies matters. Peremptorily he commanded that no messenger nor trumpetershould be admitted; & not herewith satisfied, he placed against Craterus no one Macedonian, nor any other that much would have regarded him had he bin known: but Thracians, Cappadocians & Persians, under the leading of such, as thought more highly 30 of none, than of Perdiccas & himselfe. To these also he gave in charge, that without speaking or hearkning to any word, they should run upon the enemy, and give him no leasure to fay, or do any thing but fight. The directions which he gave to others, he did not hall to execute in his own person: but placing himselfe in the right wing of his battell, oppofite to Neoptolemus, who (as he understood) conducted the left wing on the contrary fide, he held the Macedonians arranged in good order, and ready to charge the enemy as foon as the distance would give leave. A rising piece of ground lay between them, which having ascended, the Armies discovered each other: but that of Eumenes every way prepared for the fight, the other wearied with long journies, which over-halfily they had made, seeking the deceitfull issue of frivolous hopes. Then was it high time for Craterin 40 (having failed in furprifing them as enemies) to discover himselfe to his old friends, and fellow fouldiers, of whom he could fee none. Phanix a Tenidian, & Artaba Zusa Persian, had the leading of that fide, who mindfull of their inftructions, began to give upon him, with fuch countenance as told him his errour; which to redeem, he bad his men fight, and redeem the day, and take the spoyle to themselves, but the Bear whose skin he sels, is not yet caught. The ground whereon the battell was fought gave most advantage to the horse, who encountred very roughly on all parts: especially about Eumenes and Neoptolemus; who as foon as they had discovered one another, could not containe themselves, but with great rage met body to body, & letting loose their bridles, grappled so violently together, that their horses ran from under them, leaving both of them tumbling on the 50 ground. Neoptolemus rose first up, but Eumenes had his fword first drawn, wherewith he houghed the other, causing him to fall down & fight upon one knee. In this conflict they received many wounds, but Neoptolemus giving flight ones, took fuch as were deadly, by which he dyed in the place, and was there (being halfe-dead, halfe-alive) stripped by his mortall enemy, whose revilings he requited, Iying even at the last gaspe, without wound in the groine, dangerous had it not wanted force. The death of Neoptolemus caufed his followers to run away upon the spurre, and seeke shelter behinde the battels of their foote. They were nothing hotly pursued. For Eumenes pained himselfe to carry fuccour to his left wing, which he suspected much to be distressed; but found accompanied with the same fortune, that had affitted him when he fought in person. Craterus had gallantly borne himselfe a while, and sustained the impression of Artabazus and Phanix with more courage than force; holding it nothing agreeable with his honour to retire and protract the fight, when he was charged by men of little estimation or note. Otherwife it is not unlikely, that he might have either carried the day, or preferved himfelfeto abetter adventure by giving ground, as the rest (when he and Neoptolemus were saine) did. But whilest he fought to preferve his reputation, he lost his life by the fall of his horse, or his falling from his horse, through force of a wound received; upon which accito dent he was trampled under foot by many that knew him not, and so perished unknown, till it was too lare to know it. Eumenes comming to the place where he lay, made great lamentation, as having alwayes loved and honoured Craterus, of whose death he was now become the instrument. The vanquished Army entertained a treaty of peace with Eumenes, making shew of willingnesse to become his followers; but their intent was only to refresh themselves, which (by his permission) having done, they stole away by night, and fled toward Antipater.

This battell fought withinten dayes of the former, wanne to Eumenes more reputationthan good will: for his owne Souldiers took the death of Craterus heavily; and the Armies lying further off were inraged with the newes. But other matters there were which incented men against him, besides the death of Craserus, whereof it manifestly appeared, that he was as forry as any that pretended greater heavinesse. His Army wanted pay. This was a great fault; which he wifely amended by giving to them the spoyle of fuch Towns as were ill-affected to him. So he redeemed the love of his own men, who of their meere motion appointed unto him a Guard for defence of his person. Others were not so easie to be reconciled. They who had been Traytors to Perdiccus, hated him for his faithfulnesse, as greatly, as they thought he would hate them for their falshoods neither found they any fairer way of excufing their late revolt, than by accufing and condemning the fide which they had for faken. Wherfore they proclaimed Eumenes a Traiw, and condemned him to die: but it was an easier matter to give that sentence, than to putit in execution.

CEAP-3.5,10,

Quarrels between Eurydice the Queene, and Python the Protestor. Python resignes bis office, into which Antipater is chofen.

Tribon and Aridaus being chosen Protectors of King Aridaus, and the children of Alexander, took the way to Asia the leffe, conducting the Armie through Syria. Of these two, Python was the greater in reputation, yet far too weak to sustaine so important a charge. For Eurydice wife to King Aredaus, was come to her husband, a Lady of a masculine spirit, well understanding what she was or should be, and thinking her este able to support the weight which fortune layd upon her foolish husband, being due toher owne title. Her Mother Cynn, fifter to Alexander, by her Father King Philip, was married (as hath been shewed) to Amyntas, who was the right Heire to the Kingdome of Macedon, being the only for of King Perdictas, Philips elder brother.

This Cynu was a warlike woman; the had led Amies, and (as a true lifter of Alexander) ighting hand to hand with Carra Queene of the Phrygians, a Virago like unto her felfe, ad flaine her. Shee brought up this Eurydive in the fame unwomanly Art of Warre, who now among the Souldiers beganne to put in practice the rudiments of her education, to the small contenument of Python, that could not brooke her too curious intermedling in his charge. Whether it were fo, that Python had some purpose to advance the some of Alexander by Roxane, to the Kingdome; (as once he had fought to doe) or whether the Queene did suspect him of some such intent; or whether only defire of rule cufed her to quarrell with him; quarrell free did, which disturbed the proceeding agunt Eumenes. The Army having shaken off such a ratike-rider as Perditear, would not afterward be reined with a twined threed. Python bearing himfelfe upon his office, took upon him to give directions in the Kings name, which the Queene did oftentimes controll, using the same name, with more authority, and better liking of the Souldiers.

CHAP.3. S. 12,

Python feeing this, would needs refigne his office, whether upon wearinesse of the contentions daily growing, or on purposeto bring the Queene into envie, it is uncertaine. Perhaps he thought, that now being the far worthicst maninthe Campe, he should be intreated to retain the place, and have his authority confirmed, or (as might be) increased. were it but for want of a fit Successor. Eurgdice was nothing forry at this course; for now the thought to mannage the affaires of the Empire at her own will, being freed from the troublesome affistance of a Protector. But the souldiers disappointed both her & Python of their contrary expectations; choosing Antipater, the only powerfull man of Alexan. ders Captains, then living, into the room of Python. Hereat the Queen fretted exceedingly, & began to deale earnestly with the Macedonians, that they should acknowledge no 10 Lord fave only the King their Soveraigne. Yet she failed of her purpose, being hindred (as may feeme) by three things: the apparent weaknesse of her husband: the growth of Alexanders children, who (though born of out-landish women) were bred in the Macedonian Camp; and the mightineffe of Antipater, who commanding a great Army neare at hand, arrived in few daies at the Camp, and enforced Eury dice to hold her felf content. Antipater was of fuch power, that henceded not to work by any close devices, as Perdiccas had done: he had no concurrents, all the Governors of Provinces that remained alive. acknowledged him their better: yea many of them he displaced out of hand, putting others in their roomes. This done, he took the King, Queene, and Princes along with him into Macedonia, leaving Antigonus Generall of the Royall Army: to whom for his good 20 fervices done, and to be done against Eumenes, he gave the rule of Susiana, besides his former Provinces, and committed into his hands the government of Afia during that War.

6. X I.

Antigonus Lievtenant of Asia, wins a battell of Eumenes, and besiegeth him in Nora: Hu vanquishethother followers of Perdiccas.

The begins the greatnesse of Antigonus, whose power in few yeares over-growing the rest, wanted little of spreading it selfe over the whole Monarchic. He to was to make War upon Eumenes, Alcetus the brother, and Attalus the brotherin-law to Perdiccas: worke enough to keep his Army imployed in the publike service, till fuch time as he might finde occasion to make use of it in his owne businesse. The first of these which he undertooke was Eumenes, with whom Alcetus and Attalus refused to joyne, having unfeafonably contended with him in time of common danger about the chiefe place. Eumenes had an Army strong in number, courage, and all needfull provisions; but obedient only at discretion. Therefore Antigonus tryed all wayes of corrupting his Souldiers; tempting first the whole Army with letters: which practice failing by the cunning of Eumenes (who made shew as if hee himselfe had scattered abroad those letters to try the faith of his men) he dealt apart with fuch Captains as he thought most a cafie to be wonne. Of these Captains one rebelled, breaking out too hastily before any helpe was nearehim, yet looking to carelesty to himselfe, that he and his were surprised, when he thought his enemies far off. Another follower of Eumenes (or rather of good fortune, which he thought now to be in company with Antigonus) kept his treachery fecret, referving it for the time of execution. Upon confidence of the treason which this false man Apollonides had undertaken, Antigonus presented battel to Euments; in the heat wherof Apollonides, General of the horse to Eumenes, fled over to the contrary fide, with fuch as he could get to follow him: but was closely followed by fome, whose company he defired not. Eumenes perceiving the irrecoverable mischief which this traiterous practice had brought upon him, purfued the villain, & cut him off before he could s thrust himselfe into the troups of Antigonus, and boast of his treachery. This was some comfort to Emmenes in the loffe of that battell, which disabled him utterly to keepe the field, & left it very hard for him to make a safe retrait. Yet one thing he did which much armazed his enemies, and (though a matter of small importance) caused Antigonus himselfe to admire his high resolution. It was held no small part of the victory to get polfession of the dead bodies. Eumenes, whilest Antigonus held him in chase, turned out of the way, and fetching a compasse, returned to the place where the battell had beene fought; there he burned (according the manner of the time) the bodies of hisowne men, and interred the bones and a shes of the Captains and common Souldiers apart, raifing up heaps of earth as mountains over them, and fo went his way. As this bold adventure bred in the Macedonians (returned to their Campe) great admiration of his brave fpirit: fo the newes which Menander (who was fet to look unto their carriages) brought and published among them, enticed them to love him as their honourable friend. Hee had found Menander in an open Plaine, careleffe, as after an affured victory, and loaden with the spoyles of many Nations, the rewards of their long service; all which he might have taken: but fearing left fuch a purchase should prove a heavie burden to him, whose chiefe hope confifted in swift expedition, he gave fecret warning to Menander to flie to to the mountains, whilest he detained his men (whom authority could not have restrained) by this fleight setting them to bait their horses. The Macedonians extolled him for this courtefie, as a noble Gentleman, that had forborn when it lay in his power to ftrip them out of all their wealth, and make their children flaves, and to ravish their wives: but Anngonus told them, that he had not forborne to do this out of any good will to them; but out of meere fubtlety had avoyded those precious fetters, which would have hindred his speedy flight. He told them true. For Eumenes did not only think all carriages to be over-burdensome, but the number of his men to be more troublesome than availeable in his intended course. Wherefore he fent them from him as fast as he could, wishing them to hist for themselves; and retaining only five hundred horse, and two hundred soot. When he had wearied Antigonus awhile in following him up and downe, he came to Nora: where againe keeping no more about him than necessity required to make good; theplace, he lovingly dismissed all the rest. Nora was a little fortresse in the borders of Lycaonia and Cappadocia, so strongly situated, that it seemed impregnable, & so wel vidualled and stored with all necessaries, that it might hold out for many yeares. Thither did Antigonus follow him, with more defire to make him his friend, than to vanquish him in War. To this purpose he entertained parley with him, but in vaine. For, whereas Aniganus offered him pardon and his love; Eumenes required restitution of his Provinces, which could not be granted without Antipaters confent. Then was Nora closed up; where Antigonus leaving sufficient strength for continuance of the siege, took his journy mo Pisidia, against Alcesus and Astalus, with whom he made short work. He came upon them unexpected, and seized on passages, which wanted not men, but such a Captaine Is Eumenes, to have defended them. Alcetus and Attalus, as they had been too fecure beforthis comming, so were they too adventurous, in fighting at the first fight, upon all distrantages: and their folly was attended with furable event. Attalus with many principall Captains was taken; Alcetus fled to the City of Termefus, where the love of the younger fort toward him was so vehement, that stopping their cares against all perswalons of the ancient men, they needs would hazzard their lives and their Country in his defence. Yetthis availed him nothing: for the Governors of the Town having secretly compounded with Autigenus, caused the young mento fally out; & using the time of advantage, they with their servants did set upon Alcetus, who unable to resist, slew himself. Hisdead body was conveyed to Antigonas, and by him barbaroufly torn, was east forth without buriall. When Antigenus was gone, the young men interved the carcaffe with solume funerals, having once been minded to set on fire their own towne in revenge of his death. Such favour had he purchased with courteous liberality: but to make an able Generall, one vertue, how great foever, is infufficient.

Prolomic wins Syria and Phanicia. The death of Antipater.

Hilest these things were in doing, the rest of the Princes lay idle, rather seeking to enjoy their Governments for the present, than to confirm or enlarge them. Only Ptolomic looking abroad, wan all Syria and Phoenicia: makion of great importance, but not remarkeable for any circumstance in the manastite ender a Lievtenant with an Army, who quickly took Laomedon prisoner, that rush there by appointment of Anipater, and formerly of Perdicess; but (as may seeme) without any great strength of Souldiers, far from affiltants, and vainly relying upon the authoritie which had given him that Province, & was now occupied with greater cares, than with seeking to maintaine him in his Office.

Antipater was old and fickly, defirous of rest, and therefore contented to let Antigonus pursue the dispatch of those businesses in Asia. He had with him Polysperchon, one of the most ancient of Alexanders Captains, that had lately suppressed a dangerous insurrection of the Ætolians, which Nation had stirred in the quarrell of Perdiccas, prevailing farat the first, but soon losing all that they had gained, whilest Anipater was abroad in his Cilician expedition. In this Poly perchon Antipater did repose great confidence; so far forth that (sufpecting the youth of his own Son Cassander of insufficiencie in so great a charge) he bequeathed unto him on his death-bed the government of Macedon and Greecestogether with his office of Protectorship. So Antipater died, being four-score years old, having alwaies travelled in the great affaires of mighty Princes, with fuch reputation, that to Alexander in all his greatnesse was jealous of him, and the successors of Alexander did either quietly give place unto him, or were unfortunate in making oppositions. In his private qualities he was a subtle man, temperate, frugall, and of a Philosophicall behaviour not unlearned, as having been Scholler to Aristotle, and written some Histories. He had been much molested by Olympia, Alexanders mother, whom after the death of her Son. he compelled to abstaine from comming into Macedonia, or entermedling in matters of Estate: yea, at his own death he gave especiall direction, that no woman should be permitted to deal in the administration of the Empire. But this precept was soonforgotten: and yet ere long, by forrowfull experience approved to have been found and good.

of Polysperchon, who succeeded unto Antipater in the Protectorship. The insurrection of Cassander against him.

Polyperchon was very skilfull in the Art of Warre, having long time beene Apprentife in that occupation; other qualities, requifite in fo high an Office as hee under-went, either Nature had not given to him, or Time had robbed him of them. He managed his businesse more formally than wisely, as a man of a second wir, fitter to assist, than command in chiefe. At the first entrance upon the stage, he called to accounsell all his friends, wherein for weighty considerations (as they who weighednot the contrary reasons held them) the Queene Olympias was revoked out of Epyrus into Macedon, that the presence of Alexanders mother might countenance and strengthen their proceedings. For, the condition of the times requiring, that the Governours of Provinces abroad should keepe greater Armies, than were needfull or easie to be retained about the person of the King in Macedonia; it seemed expedient, that the face of the Court should be filled with all Majesty, that might give authority to the Injunctions from thence proceeding, and by an awfull regard containe within the limited bounds of dutie such as could not by force have beene kept in order, being strong, and lying too farre off.

Such care was taken for prevention of imaginary dangers and out of fight, whileft present mischiefes lay unregarded in their bosomes. Cassander, the Sonne of Antipater, was not able to discover that great sufficiency in Polysperchon, for which his father had reposed in him so much considence : neither could he discerne such odds in the quality of himselfe and Polysperchon, as was in their fortune. He was left Captaine of one thousand; which Office by practice of those times was of more importance, than the title now feemesto imply. He should thereby have beene as Campe-master, or Lievtenant generall to the other: a place no way farisfying his ambition, that thought himfelse the better man. Therefore hee began to examine his owne power, and compare with the forces likely to oppose him. All that had relyed on his father, were his own affured, especially such as commanded the Garrisons bestowed in the principall Cities of Greece. The like hope was of the Magistrates, and others of principall authority, in those Common-weales, whose formes had beene corrected by Antipater, that they would follow the fide, and draw-in many partakers: it concerned these men in their own particular to adhere unto the Captains, by whom their faction was up-held; and b whom the rascall multitude, covetous of re-gaining the tyrannous power which the had formerly exercised over the principall Citizens, were kept in order, obeying the betters perforce. Besides all these helpes, Cassander had the secret love of Queen

Eurydice, who had in private rendred him fuch curtefie, as was due onely to her husband. But neither the Queenes favour, norall his other possibilities, gave him considence to break out into open rebellion; because he saw Polysperchon much reverenced among the Macedonians, and strong enough to suppresse him, before he could have made head. Therefore he made shew of following his pleasures in the Countrie, and calling many of his friends about him, under pretence of hunting, advised with them upon the safest course, and most free from all suspicion. The necessitie was apparent of raising an Armie, before the businesse was set on foot; and to doethis, opportunitie presented him with fair means. Ptolomie had by fine force, without any commission, annexed Syria to his goto vernment of Egypt and Cyrene: this was too much either for the King to trust him with, or for him to part with. Antigonus upon the first newes of Antipaters death, began to lay hold upon all that he could get, in fuch fort, that he manifeltly discovered his intent of making himselfe Lord of all Asia. These two therefore stood in need of acivill war; which Cassander wel noted, & presumed withall, That the friendship which had passed between his father and them, would availe him somewhat. Whereupon he secretly dispatched messengers to them both; and within a little while conveyed himself on a sudden over the Hellespont, that he might in person advance the businesse with greater speed. Much perfwaffon is needleffe in winning a man to what he defireth. Antigonus coveteth nothing more, than to find Polysperchon work, by raising some commotion in Greece. Yet (as foromalities must not be neglected) Cass ander did very earnestly presse him, by the memorie offiis Father, and all requifite conjurations, to affift him in this enterprise; telling him, that Ptolomie was readie to declare for them, and urging him to a speedie dispatch. Antigonus on the other fide repaied him with the fame coine, faying, that for his own fake, and his dead Fathers, whom he had very dearly loved, he would not faile to give him all mannerof fuccour. Having thus feasted one another with words, they were nothing slacke in preparing the common means, leading to their feverall ends.

§.XIV.

The unworthie courses held by Polysperchon, for the keeping down of Cassander.

Reat necessitie there was of timely provision. For, Polysperchon needed no other instructions to informe him of Cassanders drift, than the newes of his departure. He was not ignorant of the readie disposition, which might be found in Antiginus and Ptolomie, to the strengthening of rebellion; and well he knew that one prinapall hope of Caffander was reposed in the confidence of such as ruled in the Grecian Elate. Therefore (loving to work circumspectly) he called another Councell, wherehit was concluded, That the Popular forme of Government should be erected in all the Cities of Greece; the Garrisons withdrawn; and that all Magistrates and principall Men, inowhose hands Antipater had committed the supreme authoritie, should forthwith be ether slaine or banished. This was a sure way to diminish the number of Cassanders fiends, and to raise up many enemies to him in all quarters. Yet hereby was disclosed both an unthankefull nature in Polysperchon, and a factious malice in his adherents. For, how could he be excused of extreme ingratitude, that for hatred of the son went about to dishonour the Fathers actions, whose onely bountie had inabled him to doe it? Or what could be faid in their defence, who fought to destroy many worthiemen, friends to the State, by whom the Greekes were held restrained from stirring against the Macedonians? and in opposition to their private enemie, gave the rule of things to base Com-Panions, and fuch as naturally maligned the Empire: But as in mans bodie, through finews newly iffuing from one branch, a finger is more vexed by inflammation of his next heighbour, than by any distemper in the contrarie hand: so in bodies politique, the himours of men, subdivided in faction, are more inraged by the disagreeable qualities of fuch as curbe them in their nearest purposes, than they are exasperated by the geneallopposition of such as are divided from them in the maine trunke. Hereby it comes to palle, that contrary religions are invited to helpe against neighbour Princes; bordeting enemies drawn-in, to the part in civill warres; and ancient hatred called to counfellagainst injurious friends. Of this fault Nature is not guiltie; shee hath taught the ameto offer it selse unto manifest losse in desence of the head: They are depraved affections.

affections, which render men sensible of their own particular, and forgetfull of the more generall good, for which they were created.

The decree, whereby the Greekes were presented with a vaine shew of libertie, ranun. der the Kings name; but fo, as one might eafily difcerne, that Polysperchon had guided his pen. For the maine point was, That they should follow such directions, as Polysperchan gave, and treat with him about all difficulties. In the rest it contained such a deale of kindneffe, as proceeding on a fudden from those who had kept them in hard subjection, might well appeare to have some other root than the pretended good will and was of it self too base and unfit for a King to use toward his conquered Subjects, and often-subdued Rebels.

6. X V.

Of the great commotions raised in Athens by Polysperchons decree. The death of TEvertheless the Athenians with immoderate joy entertained this happy-seeming Proclamation, and fought how to put it in execution without further delay. But Nicanor, Captain of the Garrison, which kept one of their Havens, called My. nuchia, in the lower part of the Town, would needs take longer time of deliberation, than was pleafing to their haftie defires.

Nicanor, as a truftie follower of Caffander, was by him shifted into the place, and Menillus (that was Captain there before) discharged, when Antipater was newly dead. His comming to Athens was no way gratefull to the Citizens, who soone after hearing the newes of Antipaters death, cried out upon Phocion, faying, That he had fufficient intelligence of that accident, and might, by advertifing them indue time, have put into their hands a faire opportunitie of thrusting out the Macedonians. But these exclamations argued no more than a defire to shake off the Macedonian yoke. Farre more grievoully would they have beene offended had they knowne the inftructions which Call ander had given to Nicanor, & his resolution to follow them. It was concluded, That he should not onely retaine Munychia, any injunction to the contrary notwithstanding; but that hee 30 should finde meanes to thrust some companies into Piram, and fortifie that also, which was the principall haven against the high-town-How to accomplish this, he rather wanted some reasonable pretence, than good abilitie. But the Atherians were not longingiving him fufficient cause to do that, which he would have done without any cause siven. They defired him to come unto their councell, affembled in the Piram, there to confider of the Kings Proclamation: whither upon Phocione word and fafe conduct hecame, and earnefully preffed them to hold with Caffander in the war which was readie to break forth. Contrariwife, they urged him first of all, to make them masters of their own, which how to use, they might consult afterwards. Each of them refusing to condescend unto the others demand; the Athenians (who did alwayes measure justice by profit, yet seldom thrived by that course) practised with Dercillus, a Captain following Polyperchon, and then lying neare at hand, that he should enter into the Town, and take Niconor priloner. But Phocion, who then governed in Athens, a man very unlike to the rest of the Citizens, being nothing pleafed with fuch a tricke of politicke dishonestic, did quietly fuffer him to depart and fave him felfe.

Nicanor hereupon began to devise upon taking Piram; not as following now the project of Caffander, but profecuting his own just revenge. He levied as many Souldiers as he could, and drew them closely into Munychia, which done is the iffued into Pirams took it, and intrenched himselfe therein, to the exceeding discomfort of the Athenians, who lately impatient of his keeping the one Haven, faw him now Mafter of both. Alex-50 ander, the fon of Polysperchon, came thither shortly after with an Armie. Then were the Citizens ingreat hope of recovering all, and addressed themselves unto hims, who made faire shewes, intending meere mischiese, which they perceived not; being blinded with the vaine Epiftles of his Father, and of Olympias the old Queenc. Olympias, taking upon her to command, before the durst well adventure to terurne into Macedon, had peremptorily charged Nicanor to restore to the Athenians the places which hee held: but hee would first consider more of the matter. Polysperchin had further ordained, that the Isle of Sames should be rendred unto them: a goodly offer, had it accorded with his power and meaning. He was (indeed) fo farre from purposing to let them have Samos, that as vet he did not throughly intend to let them have themselves. The commoditie of their Havens was fuch, as he would rather get into his owne hands, than leave in theirs; yet rather wished in theirs, than in Cassanders. His Son Alexander, not ignorant of this, made fair shew to the Athenians, and spent much labour in communing with Nicanor, but suffored not them, for whom he seemed to labour, to intermeddle with the businesse. Hereupon the Citizens grew jealous, and the displeasure they conceived against him, they noured out upon Phocion, depriving him of his office. This was done with much tumult: hanished men and strangers thrusting themselves into the assembly of the Citizens, who distracted with sundrie passions, growing out of their present missortunes, thought every one that best could inveigh against things past, a most likely man to finde some remedie for the evill threatning them. In this hurly-burly was Alexander devising how he might come to some good point of composition with Nicanor, & held much privie conference with him; which he could not fo fecretly carry, but that his negotiation was discovered, whereby the uproare in the Town was so far increased, that Phocion with many of his friends, were accused, and driven to seek safeguard of their lives by slight. So they came to Alexander, who entertained them gently, and gave them his letters of commendation to his Father, defiring him to take them into his protection.

Polysperchon was in the Countrie of Phocis, readie to enter with an Armie into Attica. in Thither came Phocion with his companions, hoping well that the letters which they brought, and their own deferts, (having alwayes been friends to the Macedonians, as far asthegood of their Countrie gave leave) should be enough to get patronage to their innocencie. Besides all this, Dinarchus a Corinthian, Polysperchons familiar friend, went along with them (in an evill houre) who promifed to himfelfeand them great favour, by meanes of his acquaintance. But Polysperchon was an unstable man, very earnest in what hetooke in hand, yet, either for want of judgement in following them, or of honeftie in holding the best of them, easily changing his intended courses, and doing things by the halves, which made him commonly faile of good fucceffe. For fear of Caffander he had offered wonderfull kindnesse to the Athenians; this had caused them to love him:out of otheir love he gathered hope of deceiving them, which made him to change his minde, and seeke how to get into his owne hands those keyes, with which Cassander held them fallockt up: finding himselfe disappointed of this purpose, and suspected as a salse dishonourable man, he stood wavering betweene the contrarie allurements of profit and reputation. To keepe the Athenians perforce at his devotion, would indeed have done well: but the effecting of this began to grow desperate; and many Towns of importance in Greece began to cast their eyes upon his proceeding in that action. Wherefore hee thought it the wifest way to redeeme their good opinion, by giving all contentment unto the popular faction, which was then growne to be Master of that Citie. Andingood time for this purpose were the Athenian Embassadours come, treading (as one may fay) upon Phocions heeles, whom they were fent to accuse. These had solemne audience given to them in the Kings presence, who was attended by many great Lords, and for oftentations fake was glorified with all exteriour shewes of Majestie; yetalltoo little to change Aridaus into Alexander: for hee did nothing there, but either laugh or chafe, as he faw others doe. For beginning of the businesse Polysperchons commanded that Dinarchus should bee tortured and slaine. This was enough to testifie his heartie affection to the Commonaltie of Athens, in that he spared not his old acquaintance for their sake; whose Embassadours he then bad to speake. When their errand was done, and answer to it made by the accused, who had no indifferent hearing, Phecion and the rest were pronounced guilty of treason; but to give sentence, ⁵⁰ and doe the execution upon them, was (for honours sake) referred unto the Citic of Athens, because they were Burgesses. Then were they sent away to Athens, where the raicall multitude, not fuffering them to speake for themselves, condemned them to dye. So they perished being innocent. But the death of Phocion being very conspicuous, made the fortune of the rest to bee of the lesse regard. Five and fortie times had hee beene chosen Governour of the Citie, never suing for the place, but sent for when hee was absent, so well was his integritic knowne, and so highly valued, even of fuch as were no pretenders to the same vertue. He was a good Commander in War, wherein though his actions were not very great, yet were they of good importance, and never unfortunate. Never did the Citie repent of having followed his counsell: nor any private man of having trusted his word. Philip of Macedon highly esteemed him; so, and much more did Alexander, who (besides other signes of his love) sent him two hundred talents of silver, and offered to bestow upon him of foure Cities in Asia any one which he would choose. But Phocion resulted these and other gifts, how soever importunately thrust upon him; resting well contented with his honest povertie: whereinhe lived above sourcescore years, and then was compelled by the unjust judgment of wicked men, to drink that poy son, which by just judgment of the righteous God, so infected the Citie of Athens, as from that day forwards it never brought forth any worthy man refembling the vertue of their Ancestors.

Of Polysperchon his vain expedition against Cassander.

Ot long after these things were done, Cassader, with such forces as Antigonal lent him, entred into Piraus; which newes drew Polysperchon headlong into Attica, with a great Armie, but so il victualled, that he was sain to depart without any thing done. Only he had given some impediment to the enemie; who, not contented with desending what he held, began to looke out, and make new purchases abroad. Find-10 ing therefore himselfe unable to drive Cassader out of Athens, he left his son Alexander, with such number of men as exceeded not the proportion of victuals, to withstand his further incroaching. The greatest part of his Armie he carried into Peloponnessus, to make the Countrie sure to himselfe, wherein Cassader had many Friends.

His doings in Peloponnessa were fuch, as they had been in other parts of Greece. First, he began to fight with Edicts, restoring the Democracie, or Popular forme of government. He commanded that the principall Citizens, that had by Antipater been made Rulers, should be either slaine, or driven into exile. This decree tooke immediate effect in most places: The vulgar fort being very readie to seale the Charter of their freedome and authoritie, with the bloud of those who had kept them in subjection. Yet many Cities there were, which delighted in the rule of the chiefe Citizens; and many which wished well to Caffander, especially they of Megalopolis, on whom Polysperchon meant to inflict an exemplarie punishment of disobedience to him, which he termed Rebellion. Megalopolis had in it fifteen thousand serviceable men, well furnished of necessaries, and refolved to endure the worst. And need there was of such resolution. For Polysperchon comming thither with all his power, did so much, that he overthrew, by a Mine, three of their Bulwarks, and all the space of wall between them. But the Defendants manfully repelled the Macedonians which came up to the breach; and at the same time with great labour they raifed up an inner wall, to be are out the next affault. The Affailants having failed to carry the Town at the first attempt, took much paine to cleare the ground, and make fair way for their Elephants, whose violence was likely to overthrow all that came in their way. But the Towns-men perceiving their drift, prepared boords driven through with long nailes, which they used as gal-throps, bestowing them sleightly covered, with the points upwards, in the way by which the beafts were to passe. Neither did they set any to encounter them in front, but appointed certaine light-armed men to beateupon their fides with arrows and Darts, as they were instructed by some that had learned the manner of that fight in the Afan Wars. Of these provisions they made happy use in the next affault. For, by them were the Elephants (wherein the enemie chiefly trufted) either forely hurt, or driven back upon the Macedonians, whom they trampled under feet. Polysperchon came as ill furnisht for long abode to Megalopolis as before to Athens. There-50 fore being neither able to dispatch the businesse quickly, nor to take such leasure as was requisite, he for sooke the fiege, with some losse, and much dishonour, leaving some part of his Armie to lye before the Town for his credit.

After this he sent Cliem, his Admirall, to Sea, to joyne with Aridem that was come out of Phrygia, and to cut of fall succour which might come to the enemie out of Asia. Cassander also sent his whole seet under Nicanor, who taking along with him some ships of Antigonus, came to the Propontis, where he fought with Cliem, and was beaten. But Antigonus hearing of the over-throw, gathered together the ships that were escaped, and manning them very well, sent out Nicanor againe, affuring him of the victorie, as well he might. For he sent out sufficient numbers of light-armed men, whom he caused to be wasted over the streights in small Vessels by night; these before day-light setting upon Clitus, drave his men, that lay securely on the land, head-long into their ships; in which tumult Nicanor arriving did assalle them so lustily, that sew or none escaped him.

This losse at Sea, together with his bad successe by Land, brought Polysperchon into great contempt. He had a good facilitie in penning bloudie decrees, but when the execution was referred to his own sword, he could find the matter more difficult. Wherestore the Athenians, perceiving that he had lest them to shift for themselves, and was not able to give them protection against the enemie which lay in their bosomes, came to agreement with Cassander; accepting a governour of his appointment; and restoring allthings to the same state wherein Antipater had lest them. The like inclination to the partie of Cassander, was found in very many Ciries of Greece, which daily and willingly revolted unto him; as to an industrious man, and likely to prevaile in the end. Thus was the whole Countrie set in a combustion, uneasse to be quenched; which presented unto Antigonus an opportunitie, that he negle cted not, of making himselse Lord of Asia.

§. XVII.

Antigonus seeks to make himselfe an absolute Lord: and thereupon treats with Eumenes, who disappointeth him. Phrygia and Lydia won by Antigonus.

Artigonus had in Antipaters life time a firm resolution; to make unto himselse the utmost benefit that he might of the Armie committed to his charge. And in faire season for advancement of his purposes came the newes of Antipaters death; eventhen, when all the businesse in Pissaia was dispatched, and no more imployment for the Armie remaining, save onely the continuance of the siege of Nora, a small thing of it selfe, but as hard as a greater matter; and requiring few men, but much time; when time of all things was most precious. Eumenes lay in that Fort of Nora, able to make the place good, and hoping that the mutabilitie, to which the present Estate was manifestly subject, would in continuance of some years (which he might abide) worke more for him, than his enemies in that space could worke against him. His most feare was, that for want of exercise in that narrow Castle, his men & horses might grow sickly and unserviceable: which made him to practise many devices of keeping them in health and lustice. But when he had continued shut up in this manner about a yeare, his hopes sentent ogood passe, and he was eased of his cares by Antigonus himselse, whose forces heldhim besieged.

Amigonus knowing the great sufficiencie of Eumenes, & considering his sidelitie shewed uno Perdiceas, thought that he could not find in all the world a fitter man than him, to imploy in managing those high designes, wherein he doubted not that he should be withflood by the mightiest Princes of the Empire. He sent therefore to Eumenes by one that was friend to them both, acquainting him with some part of his intent, and promising to make him a better Lord than ever he had bin, and the next man to himself, if things fel out shedefired:in regard whereof he required only his friendship, and thereupon sent him an Outh to take; which done, he might at his good pleasure issue safely out of Nora; and enjoy his perfect libertie. Eumenes peruling the form of the oath, did perceive the meaning of Antigonus; which was, rather to make him his follower than his fellow. For whereas in a few words, it mentioned the King and Princes of the bloud, rather to keep the Decorum, othanupon any loyall intent; the binding words and fum of all were fuch, as tied him faft only to Antigonus, omitting all reservation of dutie to the King or any other. This heliked nor, holding it unfeemly to become a fworn man to him, with whom he had fought for the masterie; and being assured that his voluntarie assistance, which way soever he gave, would be more acceptable, and farre more honourable, than the course propounded. Yet would he not therefore breake off the negotiation, and wait for some berter occasion of inlargement, which might perhaps belong in comming: but seeming to be well agreed with Antigonus, he prepared to give up his Hold and depart. As for the bath it felfe, when he came to take it, he made shew of dislike, in that it was not solemne enough for fuch personages as they were, who could not be too ceremonious in testifing their allegiance. The Macedonians which lay incamped before Nora, liked his words, and gave him leave to put in Olympias, and the children of Aiexander, binding himself to them and their adherents, as well as to Anrigonus; and so he departed.

Antigonia had taken upon him, as foone as he came downe to the Sea-fide, to remove fome of the Governours of the Provinces, behaving himselfe according to the authoritie which he had received of Antipater, to exercise in the time of war. Neither did he want sufficient pretence wherebyto justifie his proceedings. For if Polysperchou might lawfully hold the Protectorship, which the old man doting on his death-bed bequeathed unto him, as a legacie, without consent of the Princes or Souldiers; why might not the himselfe as well retaine the Lievtenantship of Asia, that was granted unto him for the generall good of the State, in presence of the whole Armie, by the King, and by Antipater, who had power to ordaine what should seem convenient whilst he lived, not to dispose of things that should happen after his death? To give a faire colour to his ambition, this was enough: if any were not herewith satisfied, he had threescore thousand footmen, ten thousand horse, and thirtie Elephants in a readinesse to answer them.

The first that perceived his drift, and provided to resist him, was Aridau Governor of Phrygia; who fortisted the Townes of his own Province, and sought to have won Cyzicus, a faire Haven Town, and seated very conveniently for him, but was faine to goe was away without it. Hereupon Antigonus took occasion to command him out of the countrie. Aridaus was so far from obeying him, that he sent forces to relieve Eumens. Neverthelesse sinds that he was unable of himselfe to make long resistance, he tooksuch companies as he could draw along with him, and so passed over into Europe, to compain at the Court. The like fortune had Clitus, who ruled in Lydia, and sought the like remedy of his fortune, with some hope at the first (for both of them were entertained with very good words) which quickly vanished, and grew desperate, when they were beaten at Sea, as hath already been declared.

§.XVIII.

Antigonus pursues Eumenes Eumenes having authoritie from the Court, raiseth great war against Antigonus in defence of the Royall house.

Arigonus having thus gotten into his hands all, or most of all Asia the lesse, was able to have entred Macedon, and seized upon the Court; which that he forbare to doe, it proceeded (as may seeme) from some of these reasons. It would have bred as much jealousie in Cassander, as seare in Polysperchon, which might have brought them to termes of reconciliation; It would aske more time than he could spare; and the envie which sollowed the Protectorship was such, as he that had power enough without the Office, ought rather to shun, than to pursue. Besides all this, it was manifest that Eumenes would not only resuser to the part, but would make war upon him in defence of the Royall house, to which it was found that Antigonus did not stand well-affected. Against him therefore he bent his course, and with an Armie of twentie thousand soot, and source thousand horse, made great haste toward Cilicia, hoping to suppresse him before he should be able to make head.

Eumenes was one of those few that continued faithfull to their dead master, which being well known in the Court, he had commission sent unto him from thencetoraise an Armie, and make war upon Antigonus, taking of the Kings treasure as much as he should need. Other letters also there were directed to all the Governours of Provinces, requiring them to give a shistance to Eumenes, and be ordered by his direction: especially to the Captaines of the old Souldiers, called the Argyraspides, or silver-shielded bands, commandement was given to be at his appointment. He had of his old followers gathered together two thousand foot, and five hundred horse, before this authoritie was given him: but now hee purposed with all the strength which he could make, to sight with Antigonus in desence of the Royall bloud. Olympias had written to him, desiring him to bring helpe to her and her Nephew the son of Alexander; and in the meane time to give her his advice in that which Polysperchon required of her: for shee was defirous to returne into Macedon, but suspected his ambition, as not contained within lawfull bounds. Eumenes therefore counselled her to remaine in Epirus, till such time as he could bring the warre to a good issue, which done, he promised that his faith and care should not be wanting to the seede of Alexander.

Strange it is to consider, that in all the Empire, scarce any one could be found among the Noble-men, in whom Alexanders mother; wives, and children, might repose firme considence, saving onely this Eumenes, a stranger to the Macedonian blond, borne at Cardia, a Citic of Thrace. His reputation was no more than his owne vertue had made it; his followers obeyed at their owne discretion; and compelled he was to travaile as farte as Persia, to gather together an Army sufficient to result the enemies that pursued his heeles.

How the Princes of Macedon stood affected mutually. Olympias takes Arideus and Eurydice, whom she cruelly puts to death.

Ow, forasmuch as in this present Warreall the Rulers of the Provinces did entermeddle; and great alterations happened, not onely in the parts of Asia, but Macedon it selfe, which brought a new face unto the State, by the extirpation of the Royall house of Philip and Alexander: I hold it convenient in this place, before wenter into the particulars of the Warre it selfe, to shew briefly how the great ones did mutually stand affected; and by what passions they were drawne into those courses, which over-threw most of them, and out of their ruines built the greatnesse of sew: as likewise to what extremity the faction brake out in Macedon it selfe, about the maine controversie of the title to the Crowne, whereupon all other quarrels were or should have been depending.

Aridam the King, being simple and fearefull, did onely what he was bidden.

Polysperchon, desirous to continue long in Office, had a purpose to advance the sonne of Alexander by Roxane to the Kingdome, and become Governour to a King of his own making.

Eurydice the Queene discovering plainly this intent, and meaning nothing less than to let her husband serve as a Stale, keeping the throne warme till another were growne old enough to sit in it, grew acquainted with Cassader, who hated the memory of Alexander, and was therefore the sitter for her turne.

Cassander held fresh in minde the danger wherein his family had been through Alexanders malice, together with the indignity offered to himselse by Alexander, who knoked his head against a wall for deriding one that adored him after the Persian maner. The displeasure hereof, and the pleasure which he tooke in the amorous Queene, made him to resolve, both to suppresse the image which he hated, and to maintaine his belowed mistresse, either by supporting her weake husband, or by taking her to be his owne wise.

The rest of the Lords steld it a thing indisserent who reigned over all, so as they might reigne in their severall Countries, & establish their authority in such wise, that immight to the taken from them.

Among these, Ptolomy and Antigonus were well enough already, if their ambition would have suffered them to see it.

Pith and Seleucus lying farre off, and being ftrong, had fome good hope to encroach from their neighbours. Against these, Peucestes, and some others, with much adoc hardly made resistance, untill such time as Eumenes came to them; who propounded to him-selfe great matters, which he lived not to accomplish.

Olympias the old Queene (as it is common with step-dames) hated the children of her husband by his other wives. It was thought that she had given poisson to Aridaus, which failing to take away his life, had much impaired both his body and wits. Now the confidence, that Eumenes was too full of businesse to come home so soone as the wished take should; and that Cassander daily prevailed in Greece: thought it the best way to love with Polysperchon, & set up, as King, her Nephew Alexander, the son of Rowane, knowing Aridaus before Cassander were able to defend him. To this intent she protected men among her kindred in Epirus, and so tooke her way towards Polysperchon, who joyning with her, entred into Macedon.

Eurydice hearing these newes, wrote very earnestly to Cassander, praying him to set afide all other businesse, & come to succour her. She her selfe by entreaty, gifts, and promifes, drew to her partie as many of the Macedonians as the could, untill the thought her owne fide ftrong enough; and then taking her husband with her, went boldly forth against Olympias, and the Traitor Polysperchon.

These two Queens met armed, as if the matter should have beene determined by their own hands, which ended without any stroke stricken, by the revolt of those who followed Eurydice. For as foone as the Macedonians beheld Olympias; calling to minde her former Estate, and the victorious reignes of her husband and son, they refused to lift any to weapon against her. Eurydice finding her selfe thus forsaken, fled towards Amphipolis, but was intercepted, and made prisoner with her husband. Olympias having obtained this victory without bloud, thought that all things would fucceed as eafily, and upon the same confiderations for which they had refused to beare Armes against her, the Macedonians would not Ricke to maintaine her, whatfoever her proceedings were. Having therefore that up Aridam and his wife in a close roome, where they could scarce turne round, she fed them through a little hole, till after a while it came in her head (for feare left the people should have commiseration of him, that had reigned almost fixe yeeres and a halfe) to put them to death. So she delivered Aridam to some barbarous Thracians; who tooke away his life by cruell torments: to Eurydice W the fent a fword, a hakter, & a cup of poison, willing her to choose the instrument other own death, who praying that the like presents might one day be sent to Olympia, yeelded her necke to the halter, having frent her last curses not in vaine. Nicanor the brother of Caffander, and a hundred the chiefe of his friends, did Olympias then choose our, all whom the commanded to be flaine. His brother Iolaus that was already dead and buried, The accused of poison given to Alexander, & thereupon caused his Tombe to be thrown downe, and his bones to be scattered abroad. The Macedonians wondering at this fury, began to condemne themselves, and the folly of Polysperchon, who had, quite contrary to Antipaters charge given on his death-bed, called this outragious woman to the government of the Empire.

6. X X.

How Cassander was revenged upon Olympias.

The great expedition of Caffander. Olympias Souts her selfe into Pydna, where Caffander besiegedher. Æacides King of Epirus, comming to succour Olympias, is forsaken, and banished by his owne Subjects.

Assander at that time lay before Tegea, in Peloponnessu; whither when all these ill tidings were brought to him, he never staied to take the City, nor to give order for the State of things in that Countrie, (though Alexander the some of Polysperchon were there with an Armie) but compounding with them of Tegea, he willed his affociates to looke to themselves as well as they could, till his returne; and so in all haste he tooke his journey towards Macedon, carried headlong with the greedie defire of just revenge. The Aerolians had taken the Streights of Thermopyla, in favour of the Queene & Polysperchon, to hinder his paffage; but he, not willing to mif-spend any time in dealing with them, got together as many shippes as he could, great and small, with which he transported his Army into Theffaly. There he divided his companies, appointing some under Callas, a subtile Captaine, to hold Polysperchon busied, who then lay incamped neere to Perhabia; with the rest he marched directly against Olympias. She, having once prevailed by the respect given to her dignity , tooke more care how to appeare Maje fticall, than to make her selfe strong. To this end she made a solemne progresse to Pid. na, a Sea-towne, and well fenced, having in her company all the flowre of the Court, el pecially the great Ladies, among whom was Roxane, & her young fon Alexander, here to the great Alexander, by his grand-mothers defignement : who, during his minority kept the Soveraigne power in her own hands. But all this pompe ferved to little use, against the violence of the enemy, that soone presented himselfe before the walls; onely it fed the besieged with a vaine hope of succour, that would from all parts arrive, to rescue persons of their quality. And hereof there soone appeared saire likelihood, which as soone vanished, and went away in smoake.

For Aeacides King of Epirus, made great hafte to bring succour to Olympias, his cousen, with whom Deodamia his daughter was also shut up. Neverthelesse, his Subjects were nothing forward in this expedition; but finding certaine paffages taken in the way by Callanders men, they called upon him to retire, & quit the enterprise. The Kings importunitie urging them to proceede, and the obstinate refusal of the Army, brake out at length into fuch termes, that when he had raged in vaine against the multitude, his authority, with which he thought to have prevailed upon them, was by them taken from him, and he compelled to forfake his Kingdome, and to wander up and down in forraine Countries a banished man, his people joyning with the enemy, against whom hee had kd them forth to war.

Pydna in the meane time was closed up streightly, both by Sea and Land, so that neither any could iffue out of the City, nor any reliefe be conveyed into it, but it held out as long as any food was left, no memorable fervice being done there, whilst great actions were managed abroad.

t. II.

A continuation of Olympias her story. Polysperchon defeated. Extreme famine in Pydna. Olympias yeeldes to Cassander.

 \mathbf{T} Ow, though order of time require it, that we should rehearse the doings of $E_{\mathbf{u}}$ menes & Antigonus in this place, leaving Olympias yet a whileto the houre of her destiny; which growes the faster upon her, because she may discerne it comming: yet that we may not be compelled to interrupt the course of our narration, by infring her Tragedie in the midst of things not maniscally coherent with it; we will here (as elsewhere we have done, and elsewhere must) continue to an end one History, that we may not be therewith diffracted, when we shall come to the relation of another. All thehope of the befieged, remaining in Folysperchon, was in like manner disappointed, as their former trust had bin, which was reposed in the succours of the Epirot. For Callas, who was fent against him, found the meanes to corrupt the greatest part of his Army with money, leaving him within a little while fo flenderly accompanied, that hee was fit for no other businesse of warre, than a swift retrait. When famine had so farre prevailed in the City, that the horses were killed as a precious food, many men, feeding on the dead carcasses of their fellowes, and saw-dust being given to the Elephants for provender; some of the Souldiers obtaining the Queenes leave, (who could not denie it) others, without asking leave, yeelded themselves to the enemy, and were by him gently relieved, and fent abroad into the Country. The newes of the Queenes affaires, dispersed by these men, did so affright her well-willers, that such as had reserved themselves to the event, came in apace, and submitted them to Cassander. At length, when the mortalitie was so great in the Towne, that the living were even poyloned with the noy some sent of the dead; Olympias bethought her selse of stealing away by Sea in a Galley that she had: wherewith her successe was as bad as in the rest. For God had appointed this Towne, by her chosen as a place of refuge, to be unto her as a house of torment, and a Jaile, out of which she should not bee delivered, but unto anevill death. Being therefore utterly broken with miseries, which daily afflicted her & the other Ladies, unaccustomed to so wretched a kind of life, she offered composition, & with much labor hardly obtained of Caffander (who having fetcht her Gally out of the Haven, accounted himselfe as good as master of her body) a grant of her ownlife. Immediatly uponher apprehension, Pella, the chiefe City of the Kingdome, was yeelded to Cass ander. Amphipolis did stand out : for Aristonias (to whom Olympias had given charge of fuch forces as were left abroad in the Country, taking courage from the fucteffeof some petty services wherein he had prevailed) began to promise himselfe great unlikelihoods. But Olympias, to win Cassanders favour, very earnestly required him up-Ecce 2 on his faith to her, that he should give it up. He did so, and presently after was killed by his private enemies, that were set on by Cass and partly hated him upon oldrespects, partly doubted him, as a man likely to seeke innovation.

†. III.

The death of Olympias, and her conditions.

Hen Olympias had now heard forrowfull tidings of all her friends, the her felf was called into question, & accused in an assembly of the Macedonians for the murthers (they were so stilled in her affliction, which in time of profperity (he called justice) by her committed. There was she (being not heard, nor called to fpeake) condemned to die. The fuite was commenced and profecuted against her, by the kindred of those whom she had slaine. But it was at Cassanders instigation, who (to haften the execution) fent her word, that he would furnish her with a ship, and other necessaries. to fave her felf by flight : which when she refused, saying, that she would plead forher felf, & tell her owne tale; he diffembled no longer, but fent unto her fuch men, as hated her most, who tooke away her miserable life. She was daughter, and sister, unto two Kings of Epirus; wife, & mother, unto two the mightiest Kings, of that, or many other ages ; a fout Lady , and of unreproveable chaftity ; but her ambition was boundleffe, her hatred unappeasable, and her furie in revenge most unwomanly. Her perverse con-10 ditions made her husband feeke other wives and Concubines, which caused her to hate both him, and them. She was thought privie to her husbands death; after which, very cruelly shee slew his late wife Cleopatra, having first murdered one of her two children in her armes, and with a beastly fury broiled the other alive in fire, in a copper bason. For these things, her some Alexander (otherwise loving her well) forbad her to meddle in the government of Macedon. But God, more severe unto cruell Tyrants, than only to hinder them of their wils, permitted her to live and fulfill the rest of her wickednesse. (which was his justice upon the adulteries of Philip, and the oppression done by him & others;) after all which, He rewarded her malice, by returning it upon her ownehead.

†. IV. Cassander celebrates the funerall of Aridaus and Eurydice; and seekes to make himselfe King of Macedon.

Fter her death, Cassander gave honourable buriall to Aridam & Eurydice, among their Progenitors, Kings of Macedon. And looking further into his own possibilities of greatnesse, he married the Lady Thessander, whom he had taken at Pydna, being the daughter of King Philip, by another of his wives; that by her he might have some title to the Crowne. For the same end he committed Roxane, & her young sont o close prison, removing thereby some part of his impediment. And, the better to encrease his same, and purchase love, built a City, called by his own name Cassanderia, that some grew to be very great and powerfull. He re-edified likewise Thebes in Greece, & restored it unto the old inhabitants, after it had laine twenty yeeres waste, being utterly razed by Alexander. By these meanes, especially by the restauration of Thebes, whereunto all Greece voluntarily contributed, he grew so strong, that sew remained enemies unto him; and they, with much labour, hardly could resist him. Leaving him therefore daily prevailing in Greece, we will returne to them, who contended in Asia, for lesse titles, but larger Provinces, with greater forces.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the great Lordship which ANTIGONUS got in Asia.

S. I.

The journey of Eumenes into Persia. His wise dealing with those that joyned with him.

UMENES, having joyned unto his company the Argyraspides. made haste into the Easterne parts, to take possession of those Countries, according to his commission, and strengthen himselfe against Antigonus. He tooke his journey through Cælosyria and Phænicia, hoping to reclaime those Provinces, usurped with the rest of Syria (as hath beene shewed) by Prolomy, to the Kings obedience. But to effect this, his haste of his passing forward was too great, his Army too little, and the readinesse of the people, to returne to their due obcdience, none at all. Besides all which impediments, one inconvenience troubled himin all his proceedings, making them the leffe effectuall. The Captaines of the Argyrafpides were so froward, that they scorned to repaire to him, and take his directions; and their fidelity was fo unfleady, that he might more eafily have dealt with open traitors. It was not expedient, that he, being Generall, should weaken his authority by courting them; neither lay it in his power to keepe him in order by compulsion. Therefore he fained that Alexander had appointed unto him, in a dream, a place for their meeting, namly, in a rich pavilion, wherein an emprie throne was placed, as if Alexander himself had been present attheir consultations. Thus he freed himselfe from their vaine pride; but of their faith he could have no affurance. Yet when Ptolomy requested them, and Antigorus bribed them to forfake him, they continued (though not without confidering of the matter.) to take his part. So he marched on, fending before him the Kings warrant; which Pytho and Seleucus refused to obey; not as rejecting the Kings authority, but excepting the person of Eumenes, as a man condemned to die by the Macedonian Army, for the death of Craterus. Eumenes, knowing well that he was not to rely upon their affillance, who flood otherwise affected than his affaires required, and were not to be dealt with by perswafion, sought paffage by strong hand through the Country of Babylon, in such wife that Seleucus, having in vaine affaied to hinder him, by opening the fluces of Exphraces, was glad at length to grant him friendly way, as desirous to be rid of him. Thus he came to Pencestes and the rest of the Easterne Lords, who were glad of his company, because of the differences betweene Pytho, Seleucus, and themselves. Yet the contention about superiority grew very hot among them, every one finding matter enough to feede his owne humour of selfe-worthinesse. But the former device of assembling in one pavilion, made all quiet; the conclusion ever being sure to follow that which Eumenes propounded, who was both wifeft in giving advice, and best able to reward, by meanes of the authority given him, to take what he pleased of the Kings treasures. By these meanes he won to himselfe many of those, who had most power to doe good or hurt.

How Antigonus, comming to set upon Eumenes, was driven off with losse.

Ntigonus, hearing that Eumenes lay in the Province of Susa, had an earnest defire to follow him, and drive him further from the Kings treasures, which were kept there. To which end, as soone as he had made himselfe strong enough, hee removed out of Mesopotamia, where he had wintered; and taking to him Pytho and Selencus, with their men, he marched directly against the enemies, with intent to give them battell. Eumenes had sortified the Castle of Susa, and was retired back toward Persia, keeping the River of Tigris betweene him and his pursuers. The passages of the River were well guarded, & good espiall keptupon Antigonus, to observe which way he took.

CHAP.4.5.4.

Before he came to Tigris it felfe, he was to passe over Coprates, a great River, and not foordable, which he sought to doe by small vessels, whereof he had no great store. A great part of his Army had gotten over, when Eumenes, who kept a bridge upon Tigris, came with a thousand horse, & soure thousand foot, to see their demeanour; and finding them out of order, charged them, brake them, and drave them headlong backe into Coprates, wherein most of them were drowned; very sew escaping with life, except soure thousand that yeelded themselves prisoners in sight of Antigonus, that was not able to relieve them. This loss made Antigonus glad to fall oss; and the heate of that Countrie in the dog-dayes, breeding diseases in his Army, by which many perished, caused him to remove as farre as into Media. So he tooke Python with him; (leaving Seconded him to remove as farre as into Media. So he tooke Python with him; (leaving Seconded him to remove as farre as into Media. So he tooke Python with him; shad through savage Nations, that continually vexing him with skirmishes, slew great numbers of his savage Nations, that continually vexing him with skirmishes, slew great numbers of his men, before he could arrive in Media, with his troupes that were quite heart-broken.

6. III.

Of Eumenes his cumning. A battaile betweene him and Antigonus.

Fter his departure, Eumenes with his affociates fell into consultation, about the remainder of their businesse. Faine he would have had them to enter upon those Provinces, which Antigonus had left behinde him; to which also the Captaines to of the Argyraspides or Silver-spields were very inclinable, as desiring to draw necerto Greece. But Peucestes, and the rest, whose dominions lay in the high Countries, had more care of their owne particular Estates, and would needes march Eastward. These carried it; for the Army was not strong enough to divide it selfe into parts.

When they came into Perfia, Peuceftes, ruling there, feasted them royally, and sought by all meanes to winthe Souldiers love to himself. Eumenes perceiving whereuntothose doings tended, suffred him a while to keepe good cheare, till the time of war drew neere. Then did he faine an Epistle, directed, as from Orontes Governor of Armenia, to Peucestes himselfe: The purport whereof was; that Olympias had vanquished Cassander, & sentover a great Army under Polysperchon, to joyne with Eumenes. These newes, as they filled 3 the Campe with vaine joy, so they wrought in all mens mindes a great willing nesseto obey Eumenes, by whom was the likeliest appearance of their preferment; wherein they dealt wisely, he being farre the most sufficient Commander, as they found some after. Fot when Antigonus, comming out of Media, drew neere unto them, Eumenes by some mischance was fallen sicke, and faine to be carried in a Litter; the Army marched invery bad array, and was likely to have beene forced to take battaile in that diforder. But Esmenes, when the rest of the Captaines were amazed, was carried about the Army in his Litter, and upon the fodaine did cast his men into so good forme, that Antigonus, perceiving him a far off, could not refraine from giving him deserved commendations. Yet he did not cease to promise great rewards to the Captaines, & all forts of men, if they would forfake Eumenes: which hopes deceiving him, he came to the triall of a battaile. Eumenes had more Elephants than Antigonus; otherwise, he was inferiour in number both of horse and soote by a third part. The battaile was fought with variable success, and great losse on both sides, continuing a great part of the day, & of the night following. Yet the victory was uncertaine. For Eumenes could not force his mento lyefare from their carriages: by which meanes Antigonus (who had a more absolute command over his) incamping on the ground whereon they fought, had in his power the dead bodies; which was accounted the figne of victory; for he buried his owne, & gave leave to his enemies craving it, to doe the like. But a greater figne of victory had Eumenes. For he abode still in the same place, & not only buried his men very honourably, at great leafure, but held the Countrie round about; whereas Antigonus was glad (having tarried but one day) to steale away by night, and returne into Media, from whence he came.

6. IIII.

Of divers stratagems prattifed by Antigonus, and Eumenes, one against the other.

Hus did the Warre continue doubtfull, and was protracted to a greater length. each part having four Souldiers, and skilfull Generalls: but the fide which had hitherto prevailed, being hindred by the equall authority of many, from purfuing all advantages to the best. Antigonus grew daily weaker, in men and reputation. so that to repaire himselfe he could finde no way fafer, than to put all to adventure. He to knew that his enemies lay in their wintering places, quartered far afunder, fo that if hee could fuddenly come among them, he was likely to put them in great distresse. Between him & them, the way was not long, being only nine daies journey, but very bad, through arough drie wildernesse, hardly passable. Another way, fairer and leading through a Country well peopled, but requiring 25 daies journy, he for fook, partly for the length, partly, and chiefly, because he would come undiscovered. So therefore taking his journy inthe dead of winter, he forbade unto his men the use of fire by night, because he would not have them descried a farre off. This commandement had beene well observed foure or five daies, when continuance of time (as commonly) breeding negligence, & the cold 20 weather pinching them, they were bold to cherish themselves, being neer to their waies end. The light of these fires gave notice of their comming; which being reported to Peucelles, and other Captaines, they were fo aftonished with the sudden danger, that in all haste they betooke themselves to slight. But Eumenes, meeting with the newes, began to hearten his affrighted companions, promifing to make Antigonus march leifurely, and willing them to abide, and draw up their men together. They could fcarce beleeve him: yet they were content to be ruled, and did as he appointed, who failed not in making his word good. He tooke with him some companies of the readiest men, wherewith he occupied certaine tops of mountaines, looking toward the Campe of Antigonus: there he otholea convenient ground to incampe upon, and made great store of fires in fundry places, as if the whole Armie had beene present. This was a forrowfull spectacle to Antigonus, who thought himselfe prevented of his purpose; and began to feare lest he should becompelled to fight, whilest his men were tired with a long and painfull journy. Therfore he refolved to turne afide, and take the way to fuch places, as might better ferve to refresh his Army. This he did with great care and circumspection, at the first, as knowing howready Eumenes would be upon all advantages. But after a while, confidering that no enemy stirred about him, he began to pause, and think in himselfe, that somewhat or other was not fallen out according to his opinion. To be the better informed in the marter, he caused some inhabitants of that defart to bee taken, and brought before him; of whom he learned, that they had feene no other Army than his thereabout, but onely a few men that kept fires on the hill tops. It vexed him exceedingly to finde that he had beene fo deluded. Therefore he went against these troupes with great fury, meaning to take sharpe vengeance on them, for having so deceived him. But by this time, sufficient firength was arrived there, which could not be forced without much businesse, and long flay. All the Army was come, fave only Eudamus, Captaine of the Elephants, who, beides those beasts, had no more than foure hundred horsemen in his company. Antigonus hearing of this fupply comming to his enemies, fent above two thousand horse, and all his light-armed foot-men, to cut it off by the way. Eudamus being fallen into this danger, was faine to place his Elephants round about his carriages, & fo to defend himfelf a wellas he could; for his horsemen, overlaied with multitudes, were quickly broken, and driven to run away upon the spurre. Neither knew they, who sate upon the Ele-Phants, which way to turne them, for on all fides they received wounds, and were not able to requite them with the like. In this extremity there appeared brave troupes of horse and foot, that came unexpected to the rescue; and charging the assailants upon the backe, drave them to feeke their owne fafety by speedy flight. These were sent by Eumenes; who though he knew not what his adverfary meant to do, yet he knew very well what was fittelt for him to doe : and therefore, playing both games himselfe, provided the remedy.

The conspiracie of Peucestes and others, against Eumenes his life.

Y these meanes Eumenes wonne great honour, and was by the whole Army acknowledged a most expert Generall, and well worthy of the chiese command. But Peucestes, and the other Captaines, guilty of their owne much insufficiency, were so transported with envie, that they could no longer contains their vile thoughts, but held communication, as upon a necessary point, how they might finde meanes to murder him. Surely, it is great injuffice to impute the mischiefe contrived against worthy men, to 10 their own proud carriage, or some other ill deserving: For, though it often happen, that fmall vices do serve to counterpoise great vertues; (the sense of evill being more quick and lasting than of good) yet he shall bewray a very foolish malice, that, wanting other testimonie, will thinke it a part of wisedome, to finde good reason of the evills, done to vertuous men, which oftentimes have no other cause than vertue it selfe. Eumenes, among many excellent qualities, was noted to be of fingular courtefie, of a very sweet conversation among his friends, and carefull by all gentle meanes to winne their love, that seemed to beare him any secret ill affection. It was his meere vertue that overthrew him, which even they that fought his life acknowledged. For they concluded that he 10 should not be slaine, before the battaile were fought with Antigonus, wherein they confessed that it stood best with their safety, to be governed by his direction. Of this treason he was quickly advertised by Eudamus, to whom he had done many pleasures, andby fome others of whom hee used to borrow mony when hee needed not, to the endthat they should be carefull of his good, for feare of losing their owne. Considering therefore, and discoursing with himselfe of the villany intended against him, he made his last Will, and burnt all his Writings that contained any matter of fecret: which done, he revolved many things in his minde; being doubtfull what course he were best to follow. All the Nobles of the Empires stood ill affected to the Royall bloud, excepting those which were with him, that were more in number than in worth. How things at that time stoode in Macedon and Greece, either he knew not, or, knowing the truth, knew no. 3 thing that might incourage him to feeke their helpe, that needed his. To make his owne peace with Antigonus, had beene against his faith to Olympias, and the Princes, that had committed this great power into his hands. For which cause also it may be thought, that he forbare either to lose the battaile willingly, or to flie into Cappadocia, and make shift for himselfe among his old friends. At length he resolved to do his best against the common enemy, and afterwards to looke to himselfe as well as he might.

The last battaile betweene Antigonus and Eumenes.

He Souldiers, especially those old bands of the silver-spields, finding Eumenest perplexed, and not knowing the cause, entreated him not to doubt of the victory, but onely to bring them into the field, and set them in array; for the rest, they alone would take sufficient order. The like alacritie was generally sound in the common Souldiers faces; but the chiese Commanders were so misschievously bent against him, that they could not endure to thinke of being beholding to him for the victory. Yet he ordered the battaile so well, that, without their owne great fault, they could hardly saile of getting the upper hand.

Before the Armies came to joyning, a horse-man from the side of Eumenes, proclaimed with a loud voice unto the sollowers of Antigonus. That their wickednes in sighting against their own Fathers, would now be punished, as it well deserved. This was not spoken in vaine. For the Silver-spields were men of threescore or seventy yeeres old, and strengthened more by continual exercise than decayed by age, and excelling in courage, as having passed through greater dangers, than any like to bee presented in that fight. Therefore Antigonus his men (who had often beene beaten by them, and were now to trie their last hope with these resolute warriours, the most Ancient and best regarded of all Alexanders Souldiers) grew very penfive, and advanced heavily, suspecting their owne cause, and searing that the threatnings uttered would prove true.

Antigonia was now againe farre the stronger in horse, which gave him cause of great hope; the ground, on which they were to sight, being a plaine levelled field. Placing therefore himself and his son Demetrius in the right wing, and committing the left wing to Python, he did set forward couragiously against the Enemies, that were ready to give him a sharp entertainement.

Eumenes tooke unto him Peucestes, with the rest of the Lords, and stood in the lest wing of his battaile, in the face of Antigoniu; meaning both to prevent the Traitors, his Companions, of all meanes to make head against him on the sudden; & (withall) to give proofe of his owne valour, which perhaps he should no more doe, in the face of all his Enemics. In the right wing, opposite unto Python, he bestowed the weakest of his horse and Elephants, under one Philip, an honest man, and (which was enough at such a time) obedient: commanding him to protract the fight, and make a reasonable retrait, expeding the event of the other side.

So they joyned very fiercely; Antigonus, labouring to make himselse master of all; Eumenes, to die an honourable death, or to win such a victory upon his open enemies, as might give him leisure and opportunity to deale with his false friends.

The footmen of Antigonus, being even in their owne opinions, far inferiour to those whom they must encounter, were at the first brunt presently deseated by the Silverssields, who slew above five thousand of them, losing of their owne not one man. But in Horse, Eumenes was so over-matched, that he could not repell Antigonus, who presed him very hard, but was faine to stand wholly upon desence. Yet his courage wrought so well by example, among his followers, that the Enemy could not win one foot of ground upon him, untill such time as Peucestes, with one thousand five hundred Horse, withdrew himselse our of the battell, leaving his companions fighting to desend his backe.

Then did Eumenes desperately rush amongst his Enemies, labouring to break open the way unto Antigonus himself. And though he failed of his purpose; yet with great slaughter he did so beat upon them which came in his way, that the victory hung a long time insuspense, uncertaine which way to incline.

The ground whereon they fought, being of a flight fandie mould, through the trampling of horfes, men, and Elephants, did cast up such a cloud of dust, as hindred the prospect, so that no man could see what was done a little from him. Anigonus sinding this advantage, dispatched away some companies of horse, that passed undiscovered beyond Eumenes his battailes, and came to his carriages, which lay about halfe a mile from the place of fight, slenderly guarded, (for that the whole body of the Army lay betweene them and danger) and therefore casily taken. Had Peucestes retired himselse no further than unto the carriages, he might not onely have defended them, but peradventure have substituted those which came to surprise them, & so have done as good a piece of service as abetter man. But he was gotten somewhat surther, to a place, where out of danger he might expect the event: and Eumenes was so over-laboured both in body and minde, that he could not possibly give an eye to every place, being not well able to continue where he was.

It happened so, that the Elephants meeting together, those of Antigonus had the better hand; whereupon Eumenes, finding himselfe every way over-charged, beganne to give back, and withdrew himselfe and his companies in good order, to the other side of the battaile, where Philip (as he was directed) had by fighting and retiring together, kept that wing from losse. The Antigonians had felt so much of Eumenes that day, that they were well content to let him depart quietly, and wished not to see him come againe; as saine he would have done.

The losse of the carriages was reported unto him, as soon as he had any leisure to heare how things went: whereupon he presently ordered his men for a fresh charge, and sent for Peucestes that was not far off, requesting him to bring in his men, & renew the fight, whereby he trusted, not only to recover their own goods, but to enrich themselves with the spoiles of the enemies. Peucestes not onely resulted to joyne with him, but immediately withdrew himselfe into a safer place, where he might be further from such dange-tous temptations.

By this the night grew on; and both Armies, wearied with fighting, were defirous to returne into their Campes. Yet Antigonus conceived hope of doing somewhat more. & therefore taking halfe his horsemen, he waited upon Eumenes a part of his way homewards, but found no opportunity to offend him: the other halfe he committed to Python. willing him to fet upon the Silver-shields in their retrait; which yet he forbare to doe, because it appeared too full of danger. So the battaile ended; wherein Antigonus had not fo much the better in horse, as the worse in foot: but the spoile which he got, by surprifing his enemies carriages, made amends for all his other loffes.

§. VII. How Eumenes was betrayed to Antigonus, and staine.

Tumenes, comming into his Campe, and finding the Silver-shields extremely difcontented with their misfortune, began to cheere them up, and put them inhove contented with their misrortune, began to their brave demeanour that day had for of recovering all with advantage. For their brave demeanour that day had for the brave demeanour t crushed the enemy, that he had no power left, wherewith to abide them in open field, and was much lesse able to draw their Carts after him, through that great wildernesse, over the high mountaines.

But these perswasions availed nothing. Pencestes was gone; the other Captaines would needes returne into the high Countries; and the Souldiers had no defire either to flie or 20 to fight, but onely to recover their goods. Wherefore Teutamus, one of the two Captaines of the Silver-shields, (who had in former times readily consented unto traiterous motions, in hope of gaine, but was letted hy bis partner Antigenes) finding, as he thought, a fit occasion of making himselfe great, & winning the love of those bands, dealt screetly with Antigonus, requesting him to restore unto those old Souldiers their goods, which hee had taken, being the onely reward of their services, in the warres of Philip and Alexander.

Antigonus, as a fubtile man, knew very well, that they which requested more than they had reason to expect, would also with little entreatie, persorme a great deale more than they promised; and therefore he lovingly entertained the messengers, filling them 30 with hopes of farre greater matter than they defired, if they would put Eumenes into his hands, by whom they were seduced to make war against him. This answer pleased them fo well, that they forthwith devised how to deliver him alive. Wherefore comming about him, as at other times, to doe their dutie, & pretending more joy of their victory, than forrow of their loffe, which they faid they would redeeme by another fight; inthe middest of this goodly talke, they leaptupon him, caught hold of his fword, and bound him fast. So they haled him away; & stopping their cares against all perswasions, would not yeeld so far, as to loosen one of his hands, and let him kill himselfe, but brought him alive (that was their own Generall, under whom they had obtained many victories) as it had been eintriumph, into the Campe of their enemies.

The presse of men, running out of the Campe to see him, was sogreat, that Antigonus was faine to fend a guard of horse-men & Elephants, to keep him from being smothered; whom hee could not fuddenly refolve, either to kill or fave. Very few they were that fued for his life; but of these, Demetrius the son of Antigonus was one; the rest were defirous to be rid of him quickly; thinking belike, that if he were faved, he would foone be the chiefe in reputation, for his great ability. So after long deliberation, Antigonus concluded, that it was the fafest way, to put him to death; which intending to have done by famine (perhaps because he would keepe it a while in his owne power, to reverse the fentence, as defiring, if it might be, to have him live his friend) hafte of other businesse made him doe it by the fword.

To this end came all the travailes of that worthy Generall Eumenes; who had with great wisedome, fidelity, & patience laboured in vaine, to uphold the family which God had purposed to cast down. Hee is reckoned among the notable examples of Fortunes murability, but more notable was his government of himselfe, in all her changes. Adversity never lessened his courage, nor prosperity his circumspection. But all his vertue, industrie, and wit, were cast away, in leading an Army, without full power, to keepe it in due obedience. Therefore it was not ill answered by Gaspar de Coligny, Admirall of France in our daies, to one that foretold his death, which enfued foon after in the maffacre of Paris; That rather than to leade againe an Army of Voluntaries, he would die a thousand times.

Antigonus himselfe gave to the body of Eumenes honourable Funerall; and rewarded the Treafon, wrought against him, with deserved vengeance. One chiefe Captaine of the silver-spields he burnt alive; many of the other Captaines he slew; and to the whole multitude of the silver-shields, that had betraied so worthy a Commander, he appointed a Leader that should carry them into farre Countries, under pretence of wars; but with aprivie charge, to confume them all, as perjured wretches, letting none of them returne aliveunto his friends and kindred, or formuch as once behold the Seas that beate upon the shores of Greece and Macedon.

6. VIII.

How Antigonus flew Python , and occupied Media . How he removed Governours of Provinces, and made himselfe Lord of Persia, carrying away Peucestes.

He two Armies being joyned thus in one, were carried into Media, where they spent the rest of the Winter: the common Souldier idly; the principall men intentively bent unto the businesse ensuing. Python began to consider his owne deservings; for that the whole warre had beene chiefly maintained by the strength and to riches of his Province. Besides, he thought himselfe as good a man as Antigonus, unlesse itwere in the Souldiers opinion, which he judged easie to be purchased with gifts, and therefore spared not to assay them with great liberality. But in following this course he was driven by necessity to trust many, of whom hee stumbled upon some, that were unsecret, and others, bearing him no fincere affection. Thus was his purpose discoveredto Antigonus, who (nothing like to Python) diffembled his indignation, and rebuked theinformers, as breeders of diffention betweene him, and his honourable friend, unto whom he meant to commit the Government of all those Countries: his owne bufinesse calling him into the lower Afia. These reports, comming daily to his eares, did finely 30 delude Python. By his greatnesse with Alexander; his authority in that Province where they lay, whereof he was Governour; & the love of the Souldiers which hee had bought with money; he was strong enough to maintaine, even an offensive war. But what need hadhe to use the sword, when he was likely without contention, to obtaine more than his owne asking? Therefore he came as foone as he was fent for, to take his farewell of Antigonus, and to divide the Provinces with him, that meant nothing leffe than to yeeld to any fuch division. As soone as he came, he was taken, and accused, condemned to die, and flaine out of hand. For Antigonus, having begun with Eumenes his ancient friend, was not afterward restrained by any consideration of old acquaintance, from cutting downe indifferently all that stood in his way: but swamme carelesly through the bloud, wherein at the first he doubtfully waded.

When this businesse was ended, he appointed a new Governour in Media, to order the Province, and a Captaine, to suppresse all commotions: thinking belike, that the power and authority, so divided, would hardly agree in one against him, from whom both were derived.

After this he marched into Persia, where he was entertained as absolute Lord of Asia. There began he to shew how well he understood his owne mightinesse. For hee placed and displaced at his owne pleasure, Governors in all Provinces, leaving none in Office, that were not his owne creatures, except fuch as lay too farre off to bee diflodged

Peucestes, who ruled in Persia, thought with good cheere to redeeme old offences, but was deceived, having to doe with one that could not be taken with fuch baites: he was carried away, and feasted with goodly words of promise, that never after tooke effeet. Thus he, that envied the vertue of his friend, was driven to flatter (in vaine) the fortune of his enemie, after which he led a most contemptible life, till he died obscurely a man forgotten.

How Selcucus was chafed out of Babylon by Antigonus. The great riches of Antigonus.

Eleucus was the next in this vifitation; one that had from time to time continued in the same tenor of good will to Antigonia, and now gave proofe of his hearty affection toward him, by making the Captaine of the Castle of Susa to meete him on the way, rendring unto him that strong Peece, and all the treasures therein beflowed. This offer was so great, that Antigonus (though having in his hands the Keeper of the place) could hardly believe it; but used him with excessive kindnesse, for seare so good a mood should change. In that Castle he found all the treasures of Alexander, with the Jewels of the Perfian Kings, which, added to his former store of mony, made up 25. thousand talents. Having all this, he might well account himselfe a happy man, if riches were sufficient to happinesse. But large dominion was the marke at which he aimed: therefore he proceeded, with intent to leave no Country behinde his backe, that should not acknowledge him for Soveraigne Lord. Comming to Babylon, he was entertained by Seleucus with all possible demonstration of love, and honoured with presents befeeming the Majestic of a King. All this he accepted with great gravitie, as being due to him; and began to require an account of the revenues of that Province. This demand Seleuens held unreasonable; saying, That it was not needfull for him to render unto any man an 10 account of that Province, which was given unto him, in respect of his many good services to the State. But whether hee spake reason or no, it sufficed, that Antigonus waspowerfull; who urged him daily to come to a reckoning. Manifest it was, that neither want of money, nor any other necessity, moved Antigonus to presse him thus, but onely the defire to picke matter of quarrell against him, whereof it was likely that he should finde fuch iffue, as Python and Peucestes had done. Therefore taking with him only fifty horse, he conveyed himselfe away, & fled into Ptolomies Dominions; defiring him to proted him from such a man as went about to oppresse all, that in former times had beene his betters, or at least his equalls. Antigonus was glad of his flight; for now all those Comtries were yeelded unto him without battaile, whereas to fight with Seleucus for them, he ? wanted all pretence; and to kill him it was not his defire, having received many benefits of him, and those not intermixed, as commonly it happens, with any injuries. Yet it is reported, that the Chald aans brought a strange Prophesie to Antigonus, bidding him looke well to himselfe, and know, that if seleucm did escape his hands, he should recover Babylon, yea, winne all Asia, & kill Antigonus inbattaile. Easie beleevers may give credit to this tale. Had it beene true, me thinkes, Antigonus rather should have hanged those Chaldeans, for giving him no warning till it was too late, than fent pursuers (as they say that he did)after him, whom the destinies preserved for so great purposes. When he had fetled things at Babylon, he tooke his journie into Cilicia, where he wintered. There he tooke up ten thousand talents more of the Kings treasures, & casting his accounts, found his yearely in-come to amount unto eleven thousand Talents.

Of the great Warre betweene ALEXANDERS Captaines: and how they assumed the name and state of Kings.

6. I

The combination of Ptolomy, Cassander, and others against Antigonus. Their demands, and his answer.

His great riches, and the rest of his power, made Antigonus dreaded envied, and suspected, whereby he quickly was embarked in a new Warre. Prolomic, Cassander, and Lysimachus, had privily combined themselves together, intending to hinder his further growth, and bring him to more reason than of his owne accord he seemed like to yeeld unto. Of their practices he had some notice; the good entertainment given unto Seleucus, giving him sufficient cause of mistrust. Therefore he sent Embassadors to them severally, entreating them to continue firme in their love toward him, that would bee ready to requite them with the like. The cold answers which they made, occasioned his hasty preparation against the most forward of them, which was Ptolomy, it being likely that a good army should prevaile more than a faire message. Therefore, as soone as the season of the yeare would permit, he tooke the way toward Syria, & was encountred by Embaffage from them all. These told him, that their Lords did much rejoyce at his victory, obtained against Eumenes their common enemy, and the honour that he had thereby gotten. In which warre, for a fruch as they being his Confederates, must have endured great losse, with hazzard of their whole Estates, if the 10 mitrary faction had prevailed; they held it very just, that all should be partakers in the fuits of that voyage, wherein they had beene all adventurers. Wherefore they defired him, that making betweene them all an equall division of the treasures that were in his hands, (a thing easie to be done) he would also take some convenient order for enlarging their Dominions, according to the rate of his new purchases. This might best be to everyones liking, if he would make over Cappadocia, with Lycia, to Callander; and Phrygia, bordering upon the Hellespont, to Lysimachus: for whereas his own Dominions were so much extended Eastward by his late victory, he might well spare some of those Western Provinces, to those that were feated in the West. As for Ptolomy, he would not crave any new addition, but rest contented within his own Territories. Provided al waies, that Seleneus their common friend, and partner in the late warre, might be restored to his owne, out of which he had beene driven so injuriously, that all of them were forced to ake it deeply to heart - requiring amends, with his friendly confent unto their demands, which otherwise they must labour to obtaine with armed hands.

Antigonus knew, that after many losses received, hee should yet be able to redeeme pace when soever he listed, with these, or perhaps with easier conditions. Neither was heefo weake, to give away quietly any part of his strength into the hands of such bad fiends, for feare only, left it should be taken from him perforce. Rather he hoped that helhould be able to finde them worke, more than enough to defend their owne. Therefor the roundly answered the Embassadors, that it was no part of his meaning to communicate with other men the profit of that victory, which he alone without other mens helpe had obtained. Though indeed they had already fufficiently gained by him, if they could fee it, having by his meanes kept their governments, whereof they were like to be dispossessed by Polysperchon; and the councell of estate in Macedon. But what marvell wasit, if they confidered not how he had faved them, feeing one of them had forgotten thetime, when comming to him as a fugitive, and begging fuccour, he was by his meere bounty relieved, and enabled to get all that he now held - Cassander did not (faid he) in those dayes command me to surrender Provinces, and give him his equall share of my treasures; but (for his Fathers sake) defired me to pitty him, and helpe him against his othermies: which I did; by lending him an Army, and Fleet, on confidence whereof hee now prefumes to threatenme. As for seleucus, how can he complaine of wrong, that durft not fray to plead his right ? I did use him well; but his conscience told him that he haddeferved it; effe he would not have fled. Let them that so curiously search into my doings, confider well their owne, which some of them can hardly justifie. I am now in the way to Spria, meaning to examine Ptolomies proceedings, and after him to deale with others, if they continue to provokeme.

9. II.

The preparation and beginnings of the warres.

Hen the Embaffadors were difinisfed with this answer, nothing was thought upon but Warre. Antigonus perceiving that he should be invaded from Europe, as soone as he was entred into Syria; left his Nephew Prolony to guard the Sea-cost, and hinder Cassander from landing in Asia; giving him also in charge, to drive out of Cappadocia some that were already sent over to molest him. Likewise he dispatched Messengers into Greece and Cyprus, not unsurrissed of money; to draw friends to his side, and raise up troubles to his sent nices. Especially, he laboured to make himself the strongest by Sea; to which purpose he rather hastened, than foreslowed his journy into Syria, that he might get possession of Mount Libanus, which afforded many excellent commodities for building of a Navie. Therfore, having erected Beacons, & laid post-horses throughout all Asia, to give swift advertisement of all occurrences, he invaded Syria, that was not held against him by any power sufficient to maintain the field.

and honoured of the people as their naturall Lord: his other Provinces he kept with a few Garrisons, better serving to containe the people within obedience, than to confront a forraine enemy. So Antigonus tooke many Cities and Places of that Country, and began to set great numbers of Artisfeers on worke in making ships, which was one of his most earnest cares. In these businesses he consumed a yeare and three moneths; not idly. For hee tooke Joppe, and Gaza, which were yeelded unto his discretion, and well used. The strong city of Tyrus held out long, but was compelled in the end by famine, to render it selfe upon composition, that Ptolomies Souldiers might depart with their Amnes; which was permitted.

Ptolomy was not asleep, whilest these things were in doing, though he kept himselfe within the bounds of Egypt, as indeed it behooved him to doe. His forces were not able to stand against Antigonus in plaine field, but likely they were to increase, which made him willing to protract the time. Neverthelesse by Sea (where his enemy was as yet unready) he sent his Fleet into all quarters, whereof Seleucus had the chiefe command.

Seleucus passed with an hundred saile along the coast of Syria, in the full view of Antigonus, and his Army, to their no little discomfort. He landed in Cyprus, which was then governed by many petty Lords; of whom the greatest adhered to Prolomy, the rest were by the Factors of Antigonus, bought for him with gold, but now redeemed by the

The same commodity of aide by Sea encouraged the President of Caria (called also Cassader, but not the son of Antipater, how soever by the painfull and learned writer Reinerus Reineccius, he is, by some oversight, counted for the same) to declare for Ptolomy and his Confederates, and busily imploy in their quarrell all his forces, which he had hitherto kept in good neutrality, and thereby enjoyed rest; but now he threw himself 30 into dangerous war, choosing rather to undergoe trouble at hand, than to fall under certaine ruine, though somewhat surther distant, which would have overwhelmed him, if Antigonus had beaten all the rest.

6. III.

How each party fought to minne the affiftance of Greece. Antigonus his declaration against Cassander. Alexander the some of Polysperchon revolveth from Antigonus who had set him up.

N the meane season all care possible was taken on both sides, to assure unto them the 40 people of Greece, whose aide, which way soever it inclined, was of great importance. Herein at the first, Antigonus sped so well by large essusion of his treasure, that he drew to him the Lacedamonians, and other Peloponnessans, of whom he waged eight thousand, and caused Polysperchon (who had a good while made hard shifts) to rowse himselfe againe, and taking upon him the title of Captain of Peloponnessan, to make head

These hopefull beginnings encouraged him to proceed further in the same kinde. Wherefore to make Cassander the more odious, he called together both his owne Souldiers, and all the Greeks & Macedonians that were to be found thereabouts. To these he declared, that Cassander had very cruelly slain Olympias, mother to the great Alexander, stand not herewith contented, had shut up in close prison the poore Lady Roxane, Alexanders wife, and his sonne begotten on her body. That all this proceeded from a defire to make himselfe King over the Macedonians; which well appeared by his enforcing the Lady Thessander, Daughter to King Philip, a match unsit for a man of no greater pagintage than he, to joyne with him in marriage. That in meere despight of those dead Princes, Philip and Alexander, he had planted the Olynthians, rooted out by Philip, in a new City by him built, and called by his own name Cassandra, and had re-edified the City of Thebes, which for the great treason of the inhabitants, was levelled with the ground by the victorious hand of Alexander. For these reasons he required them to make a decree, that Cassander should restore to absolute liberty the Lady Roxane, and her son; & should yeeld obe dience to the Lord Lievtenant Generall of the Empire, (by which name mie to the State. Furthermore he propounded, that all the Cities of Greece should be restored into freedome: this hee did, not because he was careful of their good, but for the end of their assistance.

These things being decreed, Antigonus was perswaded, that not onely the Greekes would adhere unto him, as to their loving Patron, and fall off from Coffander; but that there is of Provinces, who had hitherto suspected him as a man regardfull of nothing buthis owne benefit, would correct their opinion, and think him the most faithfull of all others to the Royall bloud. But concerning his loyalty to the young Prince, the world was too wise to be deceived with vaine shewes. His undertaking for the liberty of the Greekes was more effectuall, and got easie beliese, in regard of his present hatred to Cashopeto win to himselfe that valiant Nation, which afforded men farre more serviceable inwar, than were to bee found in any Province of the Empire.

And this indeed was the point at which both fides aimed. Wherein Antigonus thinking tomake all fure, deceived himselfe, not without great cost. For he gave to Alexander whe so of Polysperchon five hundred talents, willing him to set the war on foot in Peloponnesus, whereby it might appeare, that on his side was meant nothing else, that what

In Peloponnesus, Cassanders men had with much bloud-shed, grievously afflicted the contrary faction, and he himselfe perceiving, that they were more easily spoiled as enemies than retained as friends, thought it the best way to make what use he could of them. that were not long like to continue his. Finally, perceiving that Alexander came furnifedwith plentie of gold, wherewith hee was able, not onely to win the doubtfull, but ocorrupt fuch as might feeme best assured the thought it a part of wisedome, to surrender upon faire conditions, that which he could not affure himselfe to hold any long time by force. Therefore he fent one to deale with Alexander about the matters in controversestelling him, that Antigonus was very skilfull in setting men together by the eares. not caring who prevailed, but only defiring to have them weary themselves, whilest hee was busied elsewhere; that so at length he might find opportunity to set upon the stronget. If therefore Alexander were so wise, as to keep in his purse the five hundred talents which he had, and without stroke striken, to receive the whole Lordship of Peloponnesius; it should be freely put into his hands by Cassander. Provided, that he should from thenceforthrenounce all confederacy made with Antigonus, and enter into a fure and faithfull legue with Ptolomy, Caffander, and the rest of the Consederates. Otherwise he might will perswade himselfe, that the Country which his Father could not keepe, when hee ws indeed the Lievtenant of the Empire, should not in haste bee won by him, that was onely the Factor of a proud injurious man, fo stilling himselfe, but not acknowledged by Alexander had lived a while with Antigonut fince the beginning of these wars; among whose followers it was not hard to discover the intent, (which he did not carry very secure) of making himselfe absolute Lord of all. Therefore he was soone entreated to accept logood an offer; and did not sticke to enter into that league, whereby he was to be-

Howbeit, this his honour continued not long, ere he lost both it and his life together, bytrasion of the Sicyonians; who thinking thereby to have made themselves free, were some after vanquished in battaile by Cratesipolis, Alexanders wise, a discreet and valiant Lady. Shee in revenge of her husbands death, crucified thirty of the Citizens taken in sight; and having by severity raught them obedience, did afterwards continue her Army mgood order, and governed those places that shee held, with the commendation of her Subjects and Neighbours.

CHAP. 5. 5.5.

6. IIII.

The AEtolians rife against Cassander in favour of Antigonus, and are beaten. Afleet and land-army of Antigonus utterly defeated by Ptolomies Lievtenant. In what termes the warre flood at this time. Antigonus drawes neerer to Greece.

Ntigonus, when he found, that with fo much money he had only bought an ene. my, began to raise troubles to Cassander and his other adversaries in Greece, by ftirring up the Ætolians against them: Likewise he laboured to winne to his party the Ilands in the Greek Seas, by whose affishance he might be the better able to deale 16 with Ptolomy, that greatly prevailed by reason of his strong Fleet. But neither of these attempts had the successe which he expected. The Ætolians, a factious Nation, & alwaies envying the greatnesse of their Neighbours, were often in commotion, but so, that commonly their gaines equalled not their losses. Cassander wan some of their owne Country, fortified the Acarnanians against them, & compelled Glaucias, King of the Illvrians, whom he vanquished in battaile, to forsake their side, and binde himselfe to beare no

Armes against Cassanders friends.

On the other side, as many petty Ilands were drawne to joyne with Antigonus: forther Fleet of the Rhodians under Theodatus, who was Admirall to Antigonus, paffing alono the coast of Asia towards Cyprus, with an Army under conduct of Perilaus marching on the shore for mutuall affistance, was quite overthrowne by Ptolomies Navie. Polyclytus. who in Ptolomies behalfe had been fent into Peloponnesus against Alexander, finding no need of his service in that Country, because Alexander was come over to their side returned homewards, and by the way heard of the course which these Antigonians held. whom he very cunningly furprised. He rode with his Fleet behinde a Cape, which the enemies were to double; his Land-forces he placed in ambush, whereinto Perilam falling was taken prisoner, with many of his men, & many were staine, making little relistance. Theodatus the Admirall perceiving this, made all haste to helpe his fellowes that were on Land; but whilest he with all his Fleet were intentive onely to that businesse. Polyclytus appeared at their backs; who as foon as he perceived their diforder, haftened about a the Cape, and charging them behinde , suffered not one of them to escape him. These ill tidings caused Antigonus to deale with Ptolomy about some composition. First, he sent Embassadors; afterwards they met in person. But Antigonus would not yeeld unto the demands of Ptolomy: fo the parley was vaine.

Hitherto each part seemed to have indifferently sped in the warre, & thereby to have equall cause of hope and seare. This late victory, with the good successe of his affaires in Cyprus, did seeme to make amends to Ptolomy for his losses in Syria, Likewise the revolt of Alexander from Antigonus did equall the confederacy, made between the Atolians & him; as also those petty skirmishes, that had been in Asia the lesse, to Antigonuhisadvantage, were sufficiently recompensed by others of like regard, but adverse to him, and by the troubles brought upon his estates in those parts by the two Cassanders.

Contrariwife, Antigonus valued the losse of his men, mony, and ships, no otherwise than as the paring of his nailes, that were left long enough, and would eafily grow againe, but the enlargement of his Tertitory by addition of Syria, he prized at a higher rate; as if thereby he had fed upon a limbe of Ptolomy his enemy, and strengthened the body of his owne Empire. Concerning other accidents, whereof the good were hitherto sufficient to counterpoize the bad, hee meant to proceed as occasion should direct, which commonly is not long wanting to them, that want no mony.

That which most molested him, was the attempts of his enemies upon Asia the lesse, wherein though as yet they had gotten little, yet had he cause to fear, lest the people, beingtied unto him by no bond of allegeance, might upon small occasion revolt from him, to men of as honourable reputation as he himselfe. To prevent this, and to be neerer to Greece, he held it expedient for him to be there in person, where his affaires did seeme to prosper the worse, by reason of his absence. Therefore he left part of his Army in Syria under his fon Demetrius, to whom, being then but two & twenty yeers old, be appointed many ancient Captaines as affishants, or rather as Directors: the rest he carried with him into Phrygia, where he meant to winter.

How Lysimachus and Cassander vanquished some enemies, raised against them by Antigonus. The good successe of Antigonus in Asia and Greece: with the rebellion of many Cities against Cassander.

He comming of Antigonus into those parts, wrought a great alteration in the processe of his businesse thereabouts. For his enemies had short leisure to thinke upon molesting him in Asia: they themselves were held over-hardly to their owne worke on Europe side. Seuthes a King of the Thracians, joyning with some To Townes that rebelled against Lysimachus, brought also the bordering Scythians into the quarrell. All these relied upon Antigonus, who was to help them with mony and other aide. The Ætolians likewise tooke courage, and rose against Cassander, having Aeacides, lately restored to the Kingdome of Epirus, their assistant. But Lysimachus gave unto his Rebells no time to confirme themselves. Hee suddainly presented himselfe before two of the Cities that had rebelled, and compelled them by feare to returne unto their former duty. Hee fought a battaile with the Scythians, and wilde Thracians, and drave them out of the Country. Finally, hee overcame Seuthes; and following the heate of his victory, flew Paufanias in battaile, whom Antigonus had fent over with an Army; and all his men hee did either put to ransome, or fill up with them his owne Bands. The like successe had Philip, Cassanders Lievtenant, against the Etolians. For hee wasted their Countrey; fought with the Epirotes, that came to helpe them : and after the victory, fought againe with their forces joyned in one, overthrowing them, &killing Aeacides that unfortunate King. Finally, he drave the Ætolians out of most of their Country, and forced them to feeke their fafety among the wilde Mountaines. Of the Epirotes he fent as prisoners to Cassander, the principall authors of the Kings restitution, and of the present War. Yetthese actions required some time, and wearied Antigonus his adversaries with painfull travaile; after which they remained onely favers. Antigonus himselfe at faire kilure wan all Caria the whilest, and sent Armies into Peloponnesus, and other parts of Greece, bestowing liberty upon all the Cities he tooke out of Cassanders hands. The whole Country of Peloponnesus (excepting Sicyon and Corinth) with the Isle of Eubea, and many places of the firme Land, were by those means won to bee his in true and vehement affection, ready to doe or fuffer any thing for him that had made so evident a demonstration of his readinesse, to give them the liberty in deed, which others had promiled in idle words. Many States defirous of the fame benefit, would faine have thewed their good will; but they were kept in by Caffanders Garrisons, who was too wise to trust them loose. Therefore Antigonus made shew as if hee would passe over into Macedon: by which terrour he forced Caffander to repaire thither in all haste, with the best of his strength, leaving many good Townsof Greece so weakly guarded, that well they might take courage to help themselves, if any forraine succour appeared. The aide which they defired was not long wanting. The Lievtenant of Antigonus, taking the advantage of Cassanders departure, entred the Country; drave his Garrisons out of divers Cities: forced the Governour of Athens to enter into league with their Lord; wanne the Citidell of Thebes; and fet the people at liberty. This last action was somewhat remarkeble. For Thebes had not long before bin raised out of her old ruines by the meere power of Cassander; of which act he was accused by Antigonus, as if it had beene some hanous crime. Yet now the same Antigonus winneth the City, and the love of the Inhibitants, onely by expelling him that was their Founder. So much are men readier to thanke the Increaser, than the Author of their good; and rather to looke forward upon those hopes, which vainly they extend beyond all measure, than backward upon their miscable nullity, that held them uncapable of being any thing.

Victories of Ptolomy by Sea. Agreat battaile at Gaza, which Ptolomy and Seleucus wan, against Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus.

S the presence or neernesse of Antigonus gave life to his affaires in the lower A. fia and Greece; so the designes of his enemies, taking advantage of his absence. La ruined the very foundations of those great workes in the Easterne parts, wherewith in the yeare preceding he had over-topped them. The Isle of Cyprus, whose Princes wavered betweene contrary affections, inclining one while to Antigonus, another, while faintly regarding their covenant with Ptolomy, was visited by an Egyptian Fleet, wherewith Ptolomy, in his owne person easily reduced them to a more settled order, purting some to death, carrying others away prisoners, & leaving a Lievtenant of his owne appointment, Governour of the whole Country. With the same Fleet he ran alongst the Sea-coasts, wasting agreat part of Caria & Cilicia, with the spoiles of which heenriched his followers, and returned loaden to Cyprus. Demetrius the sonne of Antigonu. hearing frequent reports of the miseries, wherewith his Fathers subjects were oppressed, made all haste out of Syria to the rescue, taking only his Horse and light-armed Foore with him , because the businesse required expedition. But in vaine did hee tire himselfe and his followers, in hasty seeking of one, that by lanching out into the deep, coulding to few minutes delude the labour of so many dayes, if need had so required. Answerable to the vanity of this expedition was the successe. For Ptolomy was gone, before Demetrius came into Cilicia. Neither was it certain, whether having lightned his ships of their burthen in Cyprus, hee would return upon those maritime Countries, or make towards Syria, where his comming was expected. He was indeed gone into Egypt, and there with Seleucus was describing a Royall Army, which he levied with all convenient speed, for the recovery of Syria. This was more than Demetrius knew. Therefore he was faine to choose out of uncertainties the most likelihood, and returne the way that he came, with all his companies, which were fitter for service in the open field, than to be bestowed in Garrisons among the Cilicians. He had scarce refreshed his men and Horses in Syna, 30 when the newes arrived of Ptolomies comming with a puissant Army, to give himbartaile. Hereupon hee called to counfaile his principall friends, who advised him to give way to the time, and expect some better opportunity in the future: being a young man, and weakly furnished with meanes to refift such ancient and famous Generalls, as Ptolomy & Seleucus. This counfaile feemed rather to proceed from the cold temper of those aged men that gave it, than from any necessity growing out of the present businesse. For Demetrius considering him selfe to be the son of Antigonus, and now General of his Fathers Army, thought his own title weightie enough to belaid in ballance against the bare names of those two great Commanders. Neither found hee much reason that should move him to distrust his forces, as insufficient. His men were better exercised than the 40 enemies, & promised as much as could be required. Therefore perswading himselfe, that fuch oddes of number, and of great fame, would rather ferve to adorne his victory, than hinder him in obtaining it, herefolved to put the matter to triall, without expecting the advantage of more helpe. So animating his Souldiers with hope of spoile and rewards, he abode the comming of the Enemies at Gaza, with purpose to encounter them, as foone as they had finished their wearisome journy over the Desarts of Arabia.

Ptolomy and Seleucus issuing out of so rich a Province as Egypt, came so well provided of all necessaries, that their Army selt not any great grievance of the evill way, when battaile was presented them, which considently they undertooke. In all things else they had the ods of Demetrius; of Elephants they were utterly unprovided. But how todeals with those beasts they were not ignorant. They had prepared a kinde of Palisado, sattened strongly together with chaines, and sharpened in such a manner, that the Elephants could not seeke to breake upon it, without receiving much hurt. The rest of their forces (which (besides that they had advantage in multitude) were heartened with many fortunate services, by them performed that yeere, whilest the enemies had warried themselves, either with vaine journies, or long and dulling expectation,) they diposed in such order, as best answered to the forme, wherein Demetrius was embattailed. The sight began, and was maintained with equal courage, for a long time, each part

Arriving more to win honour, than to fatisfie any other passion, as having little cause of hatred, or revenge. But after some continuance, the greater number holding better our the errour of Demetrius, who upon no necessity would needes fight a battaile with difadvantage, began to appeare by his losses. He had committed himselfe to Fortune, having more to lose by her than he could get: but in this fight shee was idle, and left all to be decided by strong hands; unlesse it may be said, that the terror brought upon his men, by the losse of his Elephants, was bad lucke. Those beasts were in that kinde of warre hardly to bee refisted on plaine ground; and therefore at the first they made great fooile amongst Ptolomies men. Afterward feeking to breake throught he Palisado, they were forely hurt, and every one of them taken. This difaster caused the Horse-men of To Demetrius to faint. They had laboured hard, & prevailed little, till now perceiving that all must lye upon their hands, who were ill able to make their owne places good, they began to shrinke, and many of them to provide for their safety by timely flight, which example the rest quickly followed. When Demetrius had stroven so long in vaine to make his men abide, that he himselfe was likely to be lost; he was faine to give place to the stronger, making a violent retrait as far as to Azotus, which was about thirty miles from the place of battaile. A great part of his carriages was in Gaza, whither fome of his company turned afide, hoping to fave fuch goods, as in hafte they could pack up. This foolish covetousnesse was their destruction, and the losse of the Towne. For whilest they forgetfull of the danger, had filled the streets with sumpter-Horses, and cloyed up the gates, thronging, some to get in and fetch; others, to carry out what they had already loaden, Ptolomies Army brake in without resistance, taking them with their goods and the City altogether.

This victory restored unto Ptolomy the best part of Syria, a Province more easie in those times to get, than to keepe; and opened the way unto all the greatnesse of Selencus. For between Gaza & Phœnicia no place offered resistance. In Cœlosyria & Phœnicia, some Townes held out a while, but were soon taken in by Ptolomy. Among these were the great Cities of Tyrus and Sidon; of which Sidon was given up by the inhabitants:

Tyrus by the Garrison, falling to mutiny against their Captaine, who trusting to the strength of it, had made great vaunts, but was pardoned by Ptolomy, and honourably entertained in respect of his fidelity.

§. VII.

How Scleucus recovered Babylon, and made himselfe Lord of many Countries in the highest Asia. The Exa of the Kingdome of the Greekes, which began with the Dominion of Scleucus.

Hile Ptolony followed this bufineffe with fuch prosperity, Seleucus tooke leave of him, and went up to Babylon, to try his owne fortune; which he found so favourable, that recovering first his owne Province, he became at length master of the better part of Alexanders purchases.

This expedition of Seleucus was very strange, and full of unlikelihoods. His trainconfilted of no more than eight hundred foot, and two hundred horse, a number too small to have been placed as Garrison, in some one of those maine great Cities, against which hecarried it into the higher Asia. But little force is needfull, to make way into strong places, for him that already stands possessed of their hearts which dwell within the wals. The name of Seleucus was enough; whom the Baby lonians had found so good a Governour, that none of them would finde courage to resist him; but left that worke to Anti108 mus his owne men, wishing them ill to speed. Some of the Macedonians that were in those Countries, had the like affection; others made a countenance of warre, which by, casse compulsion they left off, and followed new Ensignes. This added courage to the people, who came in apace, and submitted themselves joyfully to Seleucus. In a defection of generall, it was not a safe course for the Antigonians, to thrust themselves into the Townes of most importance: for every man of them should have been troubled with daily enemies in his owne lodging. It remained that they should issue forth into the field, and try the matter by fight. But the treason of one principall man, who revolted to the enemy, with more than a thousand Souldiers following him, so dissinged the rest.

that they did no more than feeke to make good one strong place, wherein were kept the Hostages and Prisoners, that Antigonus held for his security inthose quarters. This Ca-Ale, belike, they had not fortified in times of leifure, against dangers, that were not then apparent. Seleucus quickly tooke it; and so got the entire possession of Mesopotamia and Babylon.

Antionnus had bestowed in Media and Persia, forces convenient for defence of those Provinces, that were the utmost of his Dominion. In the Countries about Euphrates he had not done the like: for his owne great Army lay between them & all enemies. Therefore when the victory at Gaza had opened unto Seleucus the way into those parts; hee found little impediment in the rest of his businesse. Having now gotten what he sought, to it behooved him to seeke how hee might keepe his gettings: for his owne forces were too small, and his friends were ill able to lend him any more. That which his friends could not doe for him, his enemies did. Nicanor, to whom Antigonus had committed his Army in Media, joyning unto him selfe, out of Persia and other Countries, all needfull helpe, came, with ten thousand Foot, and seaven thousand Horse, either to save all from being loft, or to drive Seleucus out of that which he had won.

Against this power, Seleucus had onely foure hundred Horse, and somewhat above three thousand Foote, wherewith to oppose himselfe: his large Conquest of unwarlike Nations having yeelded him many loving Subjects, but few Souldiers. Therefore when his enemies were neere to the River of Tigris, he withdrew himselffrom the place where 10 his resistance was expected, into certaine marishes not farre off; where he lay secretive waiting for some advantage. Nicanor thought that he had been fled, and was the leffe carefull in fortifying his Campe. In recompence of this vaine fecurity, his Campe was taken by furprife, the first night of his arrivall; the Satrapa, or Lievtenant of Persia. together with fundry of the Captaines, were flaine; hee himselfe was driven to flee for his life into the defarts, and the whole Army yeelded unto Seleucus: whose gentledemeanour, after the victory, drew all Media, Susiana, and the Neighbour Provinces, to acknowledge him their Lord without any further stroke stricken.

This victory of Seleucus gave beginning unto the new stile, of The Kingdome of the Greekes, an accompt much used by the Jewes, Chaldwans, Syrians, and other Nations 10 in those parts. I will not make any long disputation about the first yeere of this Aera. The authority of that great Astrologer Ptolomy, from which there is no appeale, makes Pul Almeg. W it plaine, that the five hundred and nineteenth yeare of Nabonassar, was the fourescore and two yeare of this accompt. Other inference hereupon is needlesse, than that note of the learned Gauricus, That the first of these yeers was reckoned compleat, at Babylon, together with the end of four hundred thirty and eight yeers after Nabonassar. With the observation of the Saturne, recorded by Ptolomy, agrees (as it ought) the calculation of Bunting; finding the same Planet to have beene so placed in the signe of Virgo, as the Chaldrans had observed it , in the same yeere ; which was from Nabonassar the five hundred and nineteenth; from Selencus the fourescore and two yeer; & the last of the hundred thirty 40 and feaventh Olympiad. These observations of the celestiall bodies are the surest marks of time: from which he that wilfully varies, is inexcufable. As for fuch occurrences in History, and the yeeres of succeeding Princes (that are not seldome ambiguous, by reason of unremembred fractions) if they seeme to be here-against, it is not greatly materiall. Yet thus much is worthy of note; that these yeares of the Greekes were not reckoned in all Countries from one beginning; as plainly appears in the difference of one yeer, that is found between actions, related by the severall Authors of the two Books of the Macchabees, who follow divers accompts. He that shall adhere to the time defined by Ptolomy, may apply the other supputations thereunto, as being no farther from it, than a years distance.

6. VIII.

How Ptolomy lost all he wonne in Syria. What the causes were of the quiet obedience, performed unto the Macedonians, by those that had beene subject unto the Persian Empire. Of divers petty enterprizes, taken in hand by Antigonus and Demetrius, with ill successe.

N a happy houredid Seleucas adventure to goe up to Babylon, with fo few men as his friend could then well spare: for had he staied longer upon hope of getting more 10 Souldiers, Ptolomy could have spared him none at all. Demetrius the son of Antigonus, having lost the battaile at Gaza, received from Ptolomy all his owne goods, his Pages, and Servants, in free gift, and therewithall a courteous meffage, to his effect: That no personall harred was the ground of this Warre, which he and his Confederates held with Antigonas; but only termes of honour, wherein they would feeke to right themselves after such maner, that other friendly Offices, without reference to the quarrell,

CHAP. 5. C.8.

This Noble dealing of Ptolomy, did kindle in Demetrius an earnest defire of requiring him, with some as brave liberality. Which to effect, he gathered together the remainder of his broken troupes; drew as many as could be spared, out of the Garrisons in Cilicia, or other Provinces thereabouts, and advertifing his Father of his misfortune, befought him to fend a new supply, wherewith he might redeeme his honour lost. Anticonus upon the first newes of this overthrow, had faid, That the victory which Ptolomy wan upon a beardlesse Boy, should be taken from him by bearded men: yet upon desire that his fon, whom he tenderly loved, should amend his owne reputation, he was content to make a stand in Phrygia. Ptolomy hearing of Demetrius his preparations, did nevertheleffe follow his own businesse in Coelosyria; thinking it enough to spend part of his Army under Cilles his Lievtenant, against the remnant of those, that had been already vanquished, when Cilles too much undervalued the power of such an Enemy. Hee o thought that this young Gallant, having lately faved his life by flight, would now bee more carefull of having a faire way at his backe, than adventurous in fetting further forward, than urgent reason should provoke him. In this considence he passed on without all feare; as one that were already Master of the field, and should meet with none, that would iffue out of their places of strength, to make refistance. When Demetrius was informed of this carelesse march; he tooke the lightestofhis Army, and made his journey with fuch diligence, one whole night, that early in the morning, he came upon Cilles unexpected, and was on the suddaine, without any battaile, Master of his Campe: taking himalive, with his Souldiers, and their carriages all at once.

This exploit served not only to repaire the credit of Demetrius, which his losse at Gapahadalmost ruined: but further it enabled him, to recompence the bounty of Ptolomy, with equall favour, in reftoring to him Cilles, with many other of his friends, accompanied with rich presents. But neither was Ptolomy so weakened by this losse, nor Demetrius fo emboldened by his victory, that any matter of consequence thereupon ensued. For Demetrius feared the comming of Ptolomy; & therefore he fortified himselfe in places of advantage: Ptolomy on the other fide was loth to engage himselfe in an enterprise, wherein he might perceive, that if the comming of Antigonus found him entangled, hee hould either bee driven to make a shamefull retrait, or a dangerous adventure of his whole estate, in hope of not much more than already he possessed.

Antigonus, indeede, was nothing flow in his way towards Syria; whither hee made loal hafte, not so much to relieve his sonne, as to embrace him. For he rejoyced exceedingly, that the young man had so well acquitted himselfe, and being left to his owne advice, performed the office of a good Commander. Wherefore to increase the re-Putation of this late victory, he brought fuch forces, as might ferve to re-conquer all Syria: meaning, that the honour of all should bee referred unto the good foundation, laied by his son; whom from this time forwards, he imploied in matters of greatest im-

Ptolomy had now leffe reason to encounter with Antigonus, than before his comming to have affailed the Campe of Demetrius. Yet he made it a matter of consultation; as if he had dared more than he meant. But all his Captaines advised him to retire into Egypt; alledging many good arguments to that purpose: which they might well perceive to be agreeable to his own intent, by his propounding that course; not without remembrance of the good successed against Perdiccas, in the like defensive warre. So he departed out of Syria, preserving his honour; as being rather led by mature deliberation, than any suddaine passion of sear: and he departed at faire lessure, not onely carrying his treasures along with him, but staying to dismantle some principall Cities, that he thought most likely to trouble him in the suture. All the Country that he left at his backe, fell presently to Antigonus, without putting him to the trouble of winning it by pieces: so easie ly to Antigonus, without putting him to the trouble of winning it by pieces: so easie was it in those times, for the Captain of a strong Army, to make himselse Lord of a great to Province.

We may justly wonder, that these Kingdomes of Syria, Media, Babylon, and many other Nations, (which the victory of Alexander had over-run, with so hasty a course, as other Nations, (which the victory of Alexander had over-run, with so hasty a course, as gave him not leisure to take any good view of them) were so easily held not onely by himselfe, but by the Captaines of his Army after him. The hot contentions for superiority betweene the King of Israel, and those of Damascus; betweene Egypt, and Babylon; Babylon and Nineve; the Persians and many Countries; argue a more manly temper, to have once beene in those people; which are now so patient of a forraigne temper, to have once beene in those people; which are now so patient of a forraigne tyoke, that like Sheepe or Oxen, they suffer themselves to be distributed, sought for, won, lost, and againe recovered by contentious Masters; as if they had no title to their owne to heads, but were borne to follow the fortune of the Macedonians. This will appear the more strange, if we shall consider, how the severall States of Greece (many of which had never possessing the sum of their spirits to swell beyond their ability) did greedily embrace all occasions of liberty: and how these proud Conquerous were glad to offer it, desiring to have them rather friends than servants, for sea re of surther inconvenience.

It must therefore bee noted, that most of these Countries had alwayes been subject unto the rule of Kings, or petty Lords, whom the Babylonians and Persians long since had rooted out, and held them in such bondage, that sew of them knew any other Law, than the command of forraigne Masters. This had utterly taken from them all remembrance of home-borne Princes, & incorporated them into the great body of the Persian Empire: so that wanting within themselves all soveraigne power, or high authority, the life and spirit of every Estate; they lay as dead, and were bereaved of motion, when that Kingdome fell, whereof they lately had beene members.

Why the Persian Satrapa, or Princes of that Empire, did not when Darius was taken from them, as the Macedonian Captains, after the death of Alexander, strive to lay hold upon those Provinces, which had many ages bin subject unto them, & scarce source years in quiet possession of their enemies; or why at least they contended not (when the terrible name of that great Conquerour did cease to affright them) to get their shares among his followers, if not wholly to dispossessing them of their new purchases: it is a question wherein, who is not satisfied, may finde no lesse reason to suspect the History, that thority to confirme it. For wee seldome reade, that any small kingdome, prevailing against a farre greater, hath made so entire a conquest, in the compasse of ten yeares, as less unto the vanquished no hope of recovery, nor meanes to rebell; especially when such disorders, or rather utter consussion hath ensued, by the sury of civill warre among the Victors.

The cause why the Macedonians held so quietly the Persian Empire, is well set down by Machiavell; and concernes all other Kingdomes, that are subject unto the like forme of Government: the summe whereof is this; Wheresover the Prince doth hold all his Subjects under the condition of slaves, there is the conquest easie, and some assured: Where ancient Nobility is had in due regard, there is it hard to winne all, and harder to keepe that which is won. Examples of this are the Turkish Empire, and the Kingdome of France. If any invader should prevaile so farre upon Turkie, that the great Sultan and his Children (for Brethren he users not to suffer alive) were taken or slained the whole Empire would quickly bee wonne, and easily kept, without any danger of rebellion. For the Bassas, how great soever they may seeme, are meere flaves; neither is there in all that large Dominion, any one man, whose personal regard could get the people to follow him in such an attempt, wherein hope of private gaine should not countervaile.

countervaile all apparent matter of feare. Contrariwise, in France, it were not enough for him that would make a conquest, to get into his hands the King and his Children; though he further got the better part of the Country, and were by farre the strongest in the field. For, besides the Princes of the Royall bloud, there are in that Kingdom store of great men; who are mighty in their feverall Countries, and having certaine Royalties and Principalities of their owne, are able to raise Warre in all quarters of the Realme; whereunto the remembrance of their owne ancient Families, and long continued Nobility, will alwayes stirre up and inflame them: fo that untill every one piece were won. andevery one (an endlesse worke) of the chiefe Nobility brought under or destroyed. the wettory were not compleat, nor well affured. It is true, that fuch power of the Nobility doth often-times make way for an Invader; to whom the discontentments of a few can eafily make a faire entrance. But fuch affiftants are not fo eafily kept, as they are gotten; for they looke to be fatisfied at full, in all their demands; and having what they would, they foone returne to their old allegeance, upon condition to keepe what they have unlesse they be daily hired with new rewards: wherein it is hard to please one man. without offending another as good as himselfe. The Turke, on the other side, needs not to fear any peril, that might arise from the discontented spirits of his principall men. The greatest mischiefe that any of them could worke against him, were the betraying of some frontier Towne, or the wilfull losse of a battaile: which done, the Traitor hath spent his sting, and must either flye to the enemy, whereby he loseth all that hee formerly did hold; or else, in hope of doing some further harme, he must adventure to excuse himselse unto his Master, who seldome forgives the Captaine, that hath not striwdby desperate valour against missortune. As for making head, or arming their followers against the great Sultan, and so joyning themselves unto any Invader; it is a marternot to be doubted: for none of them have any followers or dependants at all, other than fuch as are subject unto them, by vertue of their Offices and Commissions. Now as this base condition of the principall men, doth leave unto them no meanes, whereby tooppose themselves against the flourishing estate of their Prince; so would it weaken both their power and their courage in giving him affillance, if adverfity should make him hand in need of them. For there is fcarce any one among the Turks Baffaes, or Provinciall Governours, that knowes either from whence he was brought, or from whom descended nor any one among them, that by the losse & utter ruine of the Turkish Empire, can lose any foote of his proper inheritance; and it is the proper inheritance of the fubject, which is also a Kingdom unto him, which makes him fight with an armed heart against the Conquerer, who hath no other device painted on his Enfigne, than the pidure of flavery.

Asin the Turkish Empire, so was the Persian, voide of liberty in the Subjects, and uterly destitute of other Nobility, than such as depended upon meere favour of the Prince. Some indeede there were of the Royall bloud, and others, descended from the Princes that joyned with Darius, the Sonne of Hystaspes, in oppressing the Magi thesewere men of reputation in Persia, but their reputation consisted onely in their Pedigree, and their fafery in not medling with affaires of State, which made them little effeemed. In what small account these Persian Princes were held, it may appeare by this, that the Kings Uncles, Cousin Germans, and Brethren, were called by the Kings, Their Slaves, and fo did ftile themselves, in speaking unto these great Monarchs. That moneyery light occasion of displeasure they were handled as Slaves, it is easie to bee derned, in that example of cruelty, practifed by Xerxes upon his owne brother Maffles, which hath beene formerly noted, in place more convenient. As for the Satrape, or Governours of the Provinces, it is heedlesse to cite examples, proving them otohave beene meer flaves : it may fuffice , that their heads were taken from them at the Kings will ; that is , at the will of those Women and Eunuchs, by whom the King was governed.

To this want of Nobility in Perfia, may be added the generall want of liberty convenient among the people: a matter no leffe availeable, in making case and sure the conquest of a Nation, than is the cause assigned by Machiavell. For as Aesope his Asse did not care to run from the enemies, because it was not possible, that they should load him with heavier burthens, than his Master caused him daily to beare: so the Nations, that endure the worst under their owne Princes, are not greatly scarfull of a forraigne yoke;

Nor will be hasty to shake it off, if by experience they finde it more light, than was that whereunto they had been long accustomed. This was it that made the Gascoignes beare such faithfull affection to the Kings of England; for that they governed more mildely than the French: this enlarged the Venetian jurisdiction in Lombardy; for the Townes that they wan, they wan out of the hands of Tyrannous oppressors: & this did cause the Macedonians, with other Nations; that had been subject unto the posterity of Alexanders followers, to serve the Romans patiently; if not willingly; for that by them they were eased of many burthers, which had been imposed upon them by their own Kings.

So that of this tameneffe, which we finde in those that had been subjects of the Perfian Kings, the reasons are apparent. Yet some of these there were, that could not so eafily be contained in good order by the Macedonians: for they had not indeed been abfolutely conquered by the Persian. Such were the Sogdians, Bastrians, and other Nations about the Caspian Sea. Such also were the Arabians bordering upon Syria: against whom Antigonus fent part of his Army; thinking therewith to bring them under, or rather to get a rich booty. The Captains that he fent, fell upon the Nabatheans, at fuch time as they were busied in a great Mart; wherein they traded with the more remote Arabians, for Myrre, Frankincense, & other such commodities. All or most of these rich wares, together with five hundred talents of filver, and many prisoners, the Macedonians laid hold upon: for their comming was sudden & unexpected. But ere they could recover Syria, the Nabathaans overtook them, & finding them weary with long marches, 20 made fuch a flaughter, that of foure thousand foote, and fixe hundred horse, onely fifty horse escaped. To revenge this losse, Demetrius was set out with a great power: vet all in vaine; for hee was not refifted by any Army, but by the naturall defence of avaite Wildernesse, lacke of water, and of all things necessary. Therefore he was glad to make peace with them; wherein hee lost not much honour: for they craved it, and gavehim presents. Returning from the Nabatheans, he viewed the Lake Asphaltites, whence hee conceived hope of great profit that might bee raifed, by gathering the Sulphure. With this good husbandry of his fon, Antigonus was well pleased, and appointed men to the worke: but they were flaine by the Arabians, and so that hope vanished.

These petty enterprises, with the ill successe accompanying them, had much impaired 30 the good advantage against Ptolomy: when the newes of Seleucus his victories in the high Countries, marredall together. For neither was the losse of those great and wealthy Provinces, a matter to be neglected, neither was it safe to transport the warre into the parts beyond Euphrates, whereby Syria and the lower Asia should have beene exposed, to the danger of ill-affected Neighbours. A middle course was thought the best; and Demetrins with fifteen thousand foot and three thousand horse, was sent against Seleucus. These forces being sent away, Antigonus did nothing, and his sonnedid lesse. For Seleucus was then in Media; his Lievtenants about Babylon withdrew themselves from necessity of fight; some places they fortified and kept; Demetrius could hold nothing that hegot, without setting in Garrison more menthan hee could foare, neither did he get much; & therefore was faineto set out the bravery of his expedition, by burning and spoiling the Country; which he did thereby the more alienate, & as it were acknowledge to belong unto his enemy, who thenceforth held it as his owne assured.

Antigonus had laid upon his fon a peremptory commandement, to returne unto him at a time prefixed: reasonably thinking (as may seeme) that in such an unsettled state of things, either the Warre might be ended, by the fury of the first brunt; or else it would be vaine to strive against all difficulties likely to arise, where want of necessaries should frustrate the valour, that by strength of time was like to become less terrible to the Enemy. Demetrius therefore leaving behinde him five thousand soot, and a thousand horse, rather to make shew of continuing the warre, than to effect much, where himselfe, with 5 greater forces could doe little more than nothing, for fooke the enterprise, and went backe to his Father.

A generall peace made and broken. How all the house of Alexander was destroyed.

Hese ambitious heads, having thus wearied themselves with uneffectuall travelly in seeking to get more than any one of them could hold; were contented at length to come to an agreement: wherein it was concluded; that each of them but meere desire of Empire, had moved them to enter into the war; so was it no friendly to reconciliation, but only a dulinesse growing upon the flow advancement of their severall hopes, that made them willing to breathe a while, til occasion might better serve to fight

Besides that maine point, Of retaining the Provinces which every man held, there were two Articles of the peace, that gave a faire, but a salfe colour, to the businesse; That the son of Alexander by Roxane, should be made King when he came to sull age; and, That all the Estates of Greece should be set at libertie. The advancement of young Alexander to his Fathers kindome, seems to have bin a matter forceably extorted from Antigonus; in whom was discovered a purpose, to make himselse Lord of all. But this, indeed, more neerly touched Cassander. For in his custodie was the young Prince and his Mothermeitherdid he keepe them in fort answerable to their degree; but as close prisoners, taken in that warre, wherein they had seene the old Queene Olympia taken and murdered; that sought to put them in possessing the Empire. The muruall hatred and seare betweene shen, rooted in these grounds, of injuries done, and revenge expected; upon this conclusion of peace, grew up faster than any time before, in the heart of Cassander: who saw the Macedonians turne their savourable expectation, towards the son of their late renowated King.

All this either little concerned Antigonus; or tended greatly to his good. The young Prince must first have possession of Macedon: whereby Cassander should be reduced to his poor office, of Captain over a thousand men, if not left in worse case. As for them that to held Provinces abroad, they might either doe as they had done under Aridamisor better, as being better acquainted with their owne strength. He in the meane time, by his readinisses acknowledge the true Heire, had freed himselfe from that ill favoured imputation, offeeking to make himselfe Lord of all that Alexander had gotten.

The like advantage had he in that Article, of reforing the Greeks to their libertie. This libertie had hitherto beene the subject of much idle discourse: but it never tooke effect. Anisonau held scarce any Towne of theirs, Cassander occupied most of the Countrie: which if he should set free, he must be a poore Prince; if not, there was matter enough of quarrell against him, as against a Disturber of the common peace.

In the meane season, the Countries lying between Euphrates and the Greek seas, together with a great Armie, and mony enough to entertaine a greater, might serve to hold with credit of Antigonm, and to raise his hopes as high as ever they had beene.

With much disadvantage doe many men contend against one that is equall to them all in puissance. Cassanders friends had left him in an ill case; but he could not doe withall: for where every one mans helpe is necessarie to the warre, there may any one make his own peace; but no one can stand out alone, when all the rest are wearie. The best was, that he knew all their affections: which tended to no such end as the becomming Subsects unto any man, much lesse to the son of an Assatique woman, of whom they had long fince refused to heare mention. Therefore he tooke a short course, and caused both the child and his Mother to be flaine: freeing thereby himselfe in a trice, from the dangerous necessitie of yeelding up his government, which he must have done when the childe had'come to age. Roxane was a Ladie of fingular beautie, which was perhaps the cause, why Perdiccas defired to have her sonne, being as yet unborne, proclaimed Heire to the great Alexander. Immediatly upon the death of Alexander, the had used the favour (if it were not love) of Perdiccas, to the fatisfying of her owne bloudie malice, upon Statira, the Daughter of King Darius; whom Alexander had likewise married, according to the custome of those Countries, wherein pluralitie of wives is held no crime. For, having by a counterfeit letter, in Alexanders name, gotten this poore Ladie into her hands, she did, by affistance of Perdiceas, murder her and her Sister, and threw their Gggg bodies into a Well, causing it to be filled up with earth. But now, by Gods just vengeance, were she and her son made away, in the like secret fashion; even at such time as the near approaching hope of a great Empire had made her life, after a wear slome imprisonment grow dearer unto her than it was before.

The fourth Booke of the first part

The fact of Cassander was not so much detested in outward shew; as inwardly itwas pleasing unto all the rest of the Princes. For now they held themselves free Lords of all pleasing unto all the rest of the Princes. For now they held themselves free Lords of all that they had under them; fearing none other change of their estates, than such as might that they had under them; fearing none other change of their estates, than such as might arise by chance of warre; wherein every one persuaded himselfe of success, that had work cer than worse. Hereupon all of them (except Lysimachin and selenem, that had work enough at home) began to rowze themselves; as if now the time were come, for each to man to improve his own stocke. Antigonum his Lievtenants were buse in Peloponness, and about Hellespont: while their Master was carefull in following other, and some greater matters that were more secretly to be handled. He pretended the libertie of Greece: yet did the same argument ministerium of Prolomic matter of quarrell, against both him yet did the same argument ministerium of Prolomic matter deeply to hearthat and Cassander: Prolomic complaining (as if he had taken the matter deeply to hearthat and Cassander: Prolomic complaining (as if he had taken the matter deeply to hearthat and Cassander: Prolomic complaining this enormatic, he sent an Armie into Cilicia, where he won source Townes, and soon after lost them, without much labour of his owne or his

After this, putting to Sea with a strong Fleet, he ran along the coast of Asia, winning an After this, putting to Sea with a strong Fleet, he ran along the coast of Asia, winning an many places: and in that voyage allured unto him a nephew of Antigonus (a good Commander, but discontented with the ill requitall of his services) whom sinding shortly, as sall to himselfe as he had been to his own Uncle, he was fain to put to death. But in doing these things, his desire to set the Greekes at libertie, appeared not so plaine, as he wished that it should: for their case was no way bettered by his molesting Antigonus Asia. Therefore to get the love of that valuant Nation, he made at the last an expeditionino Greece it selfe: where having set free some little Ilands, and landed in Pelopumes sur, he raised so great an expectation of sinshing the long desired work, that Cratespolis, the Widow of Alexander, Polyspenchons son, gave up into his hands the Towns of Sicyon and Corinth.

and Corine.

Ptolomie had conceived a vain beliefe that the Greeks, emboldened by his countenance and affiltance, would all of them take heart and rife up in armes; whereby with little labour their libertie might be gotten; and he be acknowledged as Author of this immortall benefit. But long fervitude had wel-neare extinguished the ancient valour of that Nation: and their ill fortune, in many likely attempts to recover freedome, had so their spirits, that they would no more stir in pursuit thereof; but sate idly still, as wishing it to fall into their mouthes.

The Laced amonians, about these times, began to fortissie their Town with wals; trusting no longer in their vertue (for both it, and the discipline that upheld it were too much impaired) that had been a wall to their Town and Territorie.

The Athenians were become as humble servants, as they had been in times past insolent Masters: erecting as many statuaes in honour of Demetrius Phalereus, as there were daies in the year. This Demetrius was now their Governour; and he governed them with much moderation: but in spight of their hearts, as being set over them by Cassader. By this base temper of the principall Cities, it is easie to gather, how the rest of the County stood affected. Ptolomie could not get them to set their helping hands to their owngood, and to surnish him with the promised supplies of mony and victuals. Credible it is, that he had a true meaning to deliver them from thrasdome; as judging the commodite that would arise by annexing them to his partie, a matter of more weight than the losse that Cassader should receive thereby, who could hardly retaine them, if once Antigonus took state worke in hand. But when he found such difficultie in the businesse, he changed his purpose: and renewing his former friendship with Cassader, he retained Sieyon and Corinth in his own possession.

Before the comming of Ptolomie into Greece, Cassander had beene held occupied with very much worke. For (besides his paines taken in warres among barbarous Princes) hee sound meanes to allure unto himselse the Lieutenants of Antigonus, that werein Peloponness, and about Hellespont: making his owne advantage of their discontentments. By the like skilfull practice he freed himselse from a greater danger, and made those those murthers which he had committed seeme the lesse odious by teaching his enemies to doe the like. Old Polysperchon, that had made so great a stir in the reign of Aridam, did after the death of Roxano and her childe, enter agains upon the Stage: leading in his hand another some of the great Alexander, and meaning to place him in his Fathers Throne.

The name of this young Prince was Heroules: he was begotten on Barfine the daughter of Artabazma Persian; but had been lesse esteemed than the some of Roxane, either for that his Mother was held no better than a Concubine, or else perhaps, in regard of the favour which Perdicens, and after him Olympias, did beare unto Roxane. At this time the death of his brother had moved fuch compassion, and regard of his being Alexanders onely living childe, had procured unto him fuch good will, that the demand which Po-Inferction made in his behalfe, was deemed very just and honourable. There were indeed more hearts than hands, that joyned with this young Prince: yet wanted he not sufficient frength of hands, if the heart of him that least ought, had not been most false. Callander had raifed an Armie to withstand his entrie into Macedon: but little trust could he repose in that Armie, whose wishes he perceived to be with Hercules. Therefore he assailed Pohisperchon himselfe with gifts and promises; wherewith at length he prevailed so far, that the old Villaine was contented to murder his Pupill; chooling rather with many curfes and foule dishonour, to take the offered Lordship of Peloponnessus, and Commander of nan Armie; than to purchase a noble same with dangerous travell, in maintaining his faith, unto both his dead and living Soveraignes.

Antigonus had not all this while bin afleep; though his loffes were hitherto the chiefe wimefles, of his having beene a stirrer in these commotions. Hethought it enough for him at the present to retaine his owne: and therefore tooke order for the recoverie of those places which Ptolomie had taken paines to winne. As for the reft, it no way grievedhim to fee Caffander incur the general hatred of men by committing those murders of which the profit was like to redound unto him that was the most powerfull, or to fee Polisperchon and Ptolomie sweat in a busie warre against Cassander. If they would have continued their quarrels, he could well have affoorded them leafure, and have thought thetime well spent in beholding their contentions. For he was throughly perswaded that when the rest had wearied themselves in vaine with long strife, his armies and treafires, wherein he exceeded them all, would bring all under. According to these haughthe conceits, he demeaned himselfe among his followers; looking big upon them and likea King before his time. This was it that caused so many of them to revolt from him: but was no great loffe to be for faken by those that looked with envious eyes upon that forume whereon their owne should have depended. Against this envie of his men, and the malice of others, Antigonus bufily fought a remedie, fuch as was like to give him goodly title to the whole Empire.

Cleopatra, Sister unto the great Alexander, lay for the most part in Sardes: whom he had a great desire to take to wife. This his desire was not without good hope: for how-fover she discovered much unwillingnesse thereunto, yet was she in his power; and might therefore be entreated, were it only for feare of being enforced. But it was not his purpose to get her by compulsive meanes: either because his sancie; being an old man, was not over-violent; or rather because his ambition, whereunto all his affections had reference, could have made small use of her, by doing such apparent wrong. She had been married unto Alexander King of Epirm, after whose death she came to her brother in Asia; hoping belike to finde a new husband in his Campe. But neither any of those brave Captaines, that were, in times following, so hot in love with her, durst then assignment of her marriage: nor did her brother, full of other cares, trouble himselfe with fostire to prevaile against her honour, that she supplied the want of an husband by entertainment of Paramours. Alexander hearing of this, turned it to a jest: saying, That she was his sister, and must be allowed this libertie, as her portion of the Empire.

When by his death the Empire lay in a manner voide, and the portion due to her thereingrew, in mens opinion, greater than it had beene: then did many feeke to obtain the her felfe defired onely a proper man, with whom shee might lade a merrie life. To this purpose did she invite Leonatus unto her; who made great laste, but was cut off by deathere he came to her presence. Now at the last, after long tarrying, the had her choice of all the great Commanders: Antigonus, Ptolomie, Lyfimachus, and Caffander, being all her earnest wooers. All these (Antigonus excepted) had wives alreadie; Ptolomie had many wives, and many Concubines, whom he respected as much as his wives, being noted of too much dotage in that kind. This hindred not his fuire: peradventure it advanced it, by giving to Cleopatra some hope of mutuall toleration. To him therefore she bequeathed her felf, and was taking her journie from Sandes towards him; when Antigonus his Deputic in that Citie, made her to stay, untill his Ma. sters further pleasure should be known. Antigonus had now a Wolfe by the eares: he neither could well hold her, nor durft let her goe. She would not be his wife; he had no honest pretence to force her; and to keepe her prisoner, had bin the way, by which to he might have incurred a generall harred, lasting perhaps beyond her life; as the course taken by Callander against Roxane (a Ladie leffe respected than Alexanders ownsister) did well testifie. Therefore he thought it the wifest way to procure her death: for toler any other enjoy the commoditie of so faire a title to the kingdome, it was no part of his meaning. To this purpose he sent instructions to the Governour of Sardes, willing him in any case to doe it secretly. So the fact was committed, and certain women about her put in trust with the murder: which women afterwards were put to death, as milchievous conspirers against the life of that good Ladie. So was Antigonus freed from blame. at the least, in his owne opinion : but the world was lesse foolish, than to be so deluded. How the murther was detected, we need not aske: for feldome is that bloudie crimeun- 10 revealed, and never so ill smothered, as when great persons are the Authors.

Thus was the whole race of Rhilip and Alexander the great extinguished, and it was extinguished by the hands of such as thought upon nothing lesse than the execution of Gods justice, due unto the crueltie of these powerfull, but mercilesse Princes. Wherefore the ambitious frames, erected by these Tyrants, upon so wicked foundations of innocent bloud, were soon after cast down, over-whelming themselves or their children, with the ruines, as the sequell will declare.

6. X.

How Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, gave libertie to Athens, expelling the Garrisons of Cassander out of those parts. The immoderate honour decreed by the Athenians to Antigonus and Demetrius.

One being left alive that had any title to the Kingdome; it stood with good reason, that they which were Lords of the Provinces, acknowledging no Superiour, should freely prosesse themselves Kings in name, as they were already in substance. Yet had this name it beseemed the weaker, while the strongest of all did forbeare it: neither seemed it convenient in the judgement of Anigona, to crowne his last action with such a title, as if he had attained unto greatnesse by that soule murder, the infamic whereof he was carefull how to discharge from his own head. He purposed therefore to undertake a plausible enterprise, even the libertie of Greece: whereby it was apparent, that he might get such honour as would not only drown all bad reports, but make him be thought equall to any name of royaltie, whereof in seeming modessie, he was not covetous. To this purpose he delivered a strong armie, with a Navie of two hundred and siftie saile, and five thousand talents of silver, unto Demetrius his son: willing him to begin at Athens, and thence to proceed, in setting all the Countrie free.

Demetrius came to Athens before he was expected: so that without resistance he entred the Haven; it being thought that a fleet of Ptolomie, Cassanders good friend, had bing arrived. But when it was known, both who he was, & what was the cause of his commings the joy of the Citizens brake out into loud acclamations: Demetrius Phalereus for soke the town, and withdrew himself to Thebes under safe conduct; only the Garrison in Munychia strove to make good that piece, which after a while was won upon them by sorce. During the siege of Munychia, Demetrius went to Megara; whence he expelled the Garrison of Cassander, and so restored the Citie to libertie.

I thinke it not impertinent, fometimes to relate such accidents, as may seeme no better than meere trifles: for even by trifles are the qualities of great Persons as well disclosed disclosed, as by their great actions; because in matters of importance, they commonly fraine themselves, to the observance of generall commended rules; in lesser things they follow the current of their owne Natures. The Lady Cratespolis lay in Patras, and hada oreat defire to fee Demetrius; hoping, belike, that she might by his meanes better her effate, and recover her Townes of Sycion and Corinth, detained by Ptolomie; to whose Lievtenant, in those places, Demetrins before his departure out of Greece, offered mony for the surrender of them. Yet the onely businesse pretended was love. He being adverrifed hereof, left his forces in the Country of Megara, and taking a company of his lightell armed, for guard of his person, made a long journey to meet with her. This troupe allo, he caused to lodge a great way from his Tent, that none might see her when shee came. As closely as the businesse was carried, some of his enemies had gotten knowledge of it; whereby they conceived good hope, that the diligence of a very few men might overthrow all the great preparations of Antigonus; and bring him to any termes ofreason, by taking his deare some prisoner. Their project fell but a little short of the effect. For they came so suddenly upon him, that he had no better shift, than to mussle himselse in an old cloake, and creepe away disguisted; leaving them to ransacke his Tent. There was in this Prince a strange medly of conditions; especially an extreme dissolutenessein wanton pleasures, and a painefull industry in matter of Warre. He was of a most amiable countenance, a gentle nature, and a good wit; excellent in devising Engines of Warre, and curious in working them with his owne hands. He knew better how to reformehis bad fortune, than how to rule his good. For adversitie made his valour more adive: prosperity puffed him with over-weening, wherein he thought that he might do what he lifted. His fortune was changeable, as were his qualities: turning often round, like the picture of her wheele, till she had wound up the threed of his life, in such manner as followeth to be shewed.

Returning to his Campe, and finishing his businesse at Megara; he resolved no longer to attend the issue of a siege, to assail Munychia by force, that so he might accomplish the liberty of Athens: which, untill it was fully wrought out, he refused to enter into the Citie. Munychia was strongly fortified: yet by continuance of the assault, the multitude without, through help of their Engines that scoured the walles, prevailed upon the resolution of those that lay within it, and wan the place in two dayes. The wals, and all the defences of that piece against the Citie, were levelled with the ground, and so was it freely put into the Citizens hands, to whom with all was given their liberty, with promise to aide them in maintaining it.

The fame of this action was lowder, than of any other victory, gotten by Demetrius with greater skill and industry. For the Athenians, having forgotten how to imploy their hands, laboured to make up that defect with their tongues: converting to base skittery, that eloquence of theirs which the vertues of their Ancestors had suted unto more manly arguments.

They decreed unto Antigonus and Demetrius the name of Kings; they confecrated the place in which Demetrius leaped from his Chariot, when he entred their Citie, and built there an Altar, calling it of Demetrius the a-lighter; they called them by the names of the gods; their Saviours, ordaining that every yeare, there should be chosen a Priest of these gods; and further, that such as were imployed by their State, in dealing with either of these two Princes, should not be called Embassadours, but Theori, or Consulters with the gods; like as were they, whom they sent unto the Oracle of Jupiter or Apollo.

It were a frivolous diligence to rehearse all their flatteries, these being so grosse. Herebythey not onely corrupted the young Prince; but made that acclamation, which best would have pleased the old man, to be of no use. For he could not handsomely take uponlim the name of King, as imposed by the Athenians; unlesse he would seeme to approve their vanity, in loading him with more than humane honours. Yet was he so tickledwith this their fine handling him, that when their Theorier Consulters came shortly after, desiring him to relieve them with Corne and Timber to build ships; he gave them almost a hundred thousand quarters of wheate, and matter sufficient to make a hundred Gallies. So gracious was his first Oracle: or rather so weake is great power in resisting the affaults of flattery.

CHAP.5. S.II.

6. X I

The great victorie of Demetrius against Ptolomie in Cyprus. How Antigonus and Demetrius tooke upon them the stile of Kings; wherein others followed their example.

Rom this glorious worke, Antigonus called away Demetrius, unto a businesse of greater difficultie; meaning to imploy his service against Ptolomie, in Cyprus. Before his departure out of Greece, he was willed to establish a general Counsell, that should treat of matters concerning the common good of the Countrie. About the same time Antigonus withdrew his owne Garrison out of Imbros, committing their libertie entire, into the peoples hands; whereby it might appeare, that as he would not permit any other to oppresse the Greekes, so would he be farre from doing it himselfe. This was enough to hold his reputation high, among these new purchased Friends: it followed, that hee should convert his forces, to the winning of ground upon his Enemaise.

A pittifull Tragedie had lately hapned in Cyprus, through the indifcretion of Menelaus, Ptolomies brother, and his lieutenant in that Isle. Nicocles, King of Paphos, was entred into some practice with Antigonus: yet not so far that he thought himselfe pastexcuse; by which considence, he was perhaps the more easily detected. To cut off this negotiation, and the salfe-hearted King of Paphos at one blow, Menelaus was fent thither: 20 who surrounding Nicocles his house with Souldiers, required in Ptolomies name, to have him yeelded to the death. Nicocles offered to cleare himselfe; but Menelaus told him, that dye he must, and bad him come forth quietly. This desperate necessitie caused the unhappie King to rid himselfe of life: and his death strooke such an impression into his wise, that she not onely slew her selfe, but perswaded the wives of her husbands brethen to doe the like. Also those brethen of Nicocles, unto whom Ptolomie had intended noill, being amazed with the suddennesse of this calamitie, did shut up the Palace, and setting it on fire consumed it, with all that was in it, and themselves together.

What soever the crime objected was; Nicoles perished as a man innocent, because he was not suffered to make his answer. Of this sad accident, though Menelaus deserved the blame, for his rigorous proceeding: yet is it to be thought, that much dislike fellals up on Ptolomie: as men that are grieved, cast an ill affection even upon those that gave the farthest removed occasion.

Not long after this, Demetrius came into Cyprus, with a power sufficient, against any opposition that Ptolomie was like to make. The Cypriots did little or nothing against him: either because they had final strength, or for that they held it a matter indifferent, whom they acknowledged as their Lord, being sure that they should not themselves have the rule of their owne Countrie. Menelaus therefore, out of his Garrisons, drew forth an Armie, and sought with Demetrius. But he was beaten, and driven to save himself within the walls of Salamis, where he was so hardly besieged, that without strong succour, he had no likelihood to make good the place, much lesse to retain possession of the whole Iland. His greatest helpe at the present was the fidelitie of his Souldiers; whom no rewards could win from him, nor good usage (when any of them were taken prisoner, and involled in the enemies bands) keepe from returning to him, with the first opportunitie. Most of them were Mercenaries: but all their goods were in Egypt, which was enough to keepe them saithfull. Yet could not this their resolution have stood long against the ods of number, which Demetrius had of men as resolute, and against his terrible Engines of batterie, if Ptolomie had not hasted to the rescue.

Ptolonie brought with him a hundred and fortie Gallies, befides two hundred flips of burden, for transporting his Armie and Carriages. This Fleet made a terrible flew, 50 when it was described afarre; though more than halfe of it was unfit for service in fight at Sea. Wherefore to make the opinion of his forces the more dreadful, Ptolonie sent unto Demetrius a threatning message: willing him to be gone, unlesse he would be overwhelmed with multitudes, and trampled to death in a throng. But this young gallant repaired him with words of as much braverie, promising to let him escape, upon condition, that he should withdraw his Garrisons out of Sycion and Corinth.

Demetrius had no more than one hundred and eighteene Gallies; but they were, for the most part, greater than those of Ptolomie; better stored with weapons fit for that service.

vice; and very well furnished with Engines in the prows, to beat upon the enemie. Nevertheless he stood ingreat doubt of threescore gallies that lay in the Haven of Salamis, less Menelam with them should fet upon his back: in which case, it was very likely that all would goe very ill with him. Against this mischise, he bestowed ten of his own Gallies in the mouth of that Haven, to keepe Menelam from issuing forth, and setting his horsemen on the shore, to give what affistance they could, he with the rest of his Fleet, puts to Sea against Ptolomie.

The fight began early in the morning, and continued long, with doubtfull successe. The Generals were not ranged opposite one to the other; but held each of them the left owing of his owne fleet. Each of them prevailed against the squadron wherewith he encountred; but the successe of Demetrius was to better purpose. For his victorie in one part was such, as caused others to fall out of order, and finally drave all to betake themselves unto speedie slight. As for Ptolomie, he was faine to leave his advantage upon the memic in one part of the fight, that he might relieve and animate those of his own which needed him in another: wherein he found his losse over-great to be repaired, by contending any longer against the fortune of that day; and therefore he laboured onely to save himselfe, in hope of better event, that might follow some other time.

There fell out in this battell no unufuall accident; yet was the victorie greater than could have been expected. The occasions whereof were, partly the great skill in Sea-services, which the Greekes and Phenicians, that were with Demetrius, had, above those which followed Ptolomie: partly the good furniture of the Ships, wherein confisted no less, than in the qualitie of those with whom they were manned. Further, we may reafonably judge, that the two hundred ships of burthen, carrying the strength of Ptolomies. Armie, did not more encourage his own men, and terrefie his enemies the day before the fight, than breed in each part the contrarie affections, when in the beginning of the fight they fell off, and stood aloofe. For though it were fitting that they should so doe; yet a multitude, preposses abandoned. Besides all this, the expectation that Menelaus, issuing with his steet out of Salamio, should charge the enemies in sterne, was utterly frustrate. He was kept-in perforce, by the ten ships appointed to bar up the mouth of the Haven: which they manfully performed, as great necessitie required.

Such disappointment of expectation dothmuch abate the courage of men in Fight; the the affailants: whereas on the contrarie, they that finde some part of their fares vaine, doe easily gather hopefull spirits, and conceive an opinion of their own abilitie, to doe more than they thought upon, out of their not suffering the harm that they ladimagined.

Whatfoever the causes of this victorie were, the fruit was very great. For Ptolomie had no more than eight Gallies that accompanied him in his flightfall the rest of his sleet was either taken or sunk. Neither did Menelaus any longer strive against the violence of fortone, but yeelded up all that he held in Cyprus, together with his Armie, consisting of twelve thousand foot, and a thousand and two hundred horse, and those Gallies in the slaven of Salamis. The same dejection of spirit was found in the common Souldier, as well that was taken at Sea, as that had served the Egyptian by Land; none of them reposing any more considence in Ptolomie, but willingly becomming followers of a new Lord, whose Armie they now increased.

It was generally believed, that much more depended on the event of this fight, than the Isle of Cyprin; for which they contended. Wherefore the common expectation was gear; especially Antigonus, whom it most concerned, was deeply perplexed with eares, thinking every day a year, till he were advertised of the issue. In this mood Aristodemus found him, a noble flatterer, whom Demetrius had honoured with the Message of these good newes. Aristodemus had bethought himselfe of a tricke, whereby to double the welcome of his joyfull errand: He caused his ships to ride at Anchor, a good distance from the shore: he himselse landed in a Cock-boat, which he sent immediately back to the ship; and foals alone he went forward, looking very sally that no part of his tidings might appeare in his countenance. Report of his arrivall (for it was not known where he had bin) came presently to Antigonus, who sent Messagerafter Messager to meet him on the way, and bring speedie word how all went. But neither any answer, nor so much of a looke, as might intimate the purport of his errand, could be won from this demure Gentleman. Thus marched he faire and softly forward with a great throng at his heeles (that served well to set out his Pageant) untill be came in fight of Antigonus; who could not containe himselfe, but went downe to meet him at the Gate, and heare the newes. Then did Aristodemus, upon the sudden, with a high voyce salute Antigonus by the name of King; uttering the greatnesse of the victorie (with as much pomp, as before he had covered it with silence) in the hearing of all the people; who with loud acclamations, gave that name of King, both to Antigonus and his son Demetrius. Antigonus, in requitall of the long suspence, wherein Aristodemus had held him, sayd, That it should also be long ere he received his reward. But the Title of King, together with the Diademe, which his friends did set on his head, he could not wish a fairer occasion to assume where-to fore he readily accepted them, and sent the like to his son.

When it was once noyled abroad, that Antigonus and Demetrius called themselves When it was not long ere their fellowes were readie to follow the good example. Ptolomie his friends would by no meanes endure, that their Lord should be thought a mandenie his friends would by no meanes endure, that their Lord should be thought a mandenie his friends would by no meanes endure, that their Lord should be thought a mandenie his friends would by no meanes endure, that their Lord should be thought a mandenie had boldnesse enough to put the Diademe about his own head. Seleucus had, before this time, among the barbarous people, taken upon him as King: but now he used the stile indisferently, as well among the Greeks and Macedonians, as in dealing with others. Only Cassader held himselfe contented with his own name: whereby howsoever he might shadow his pride, he no way lessened with sown name: whereby howsoever he might shadow his pride, he no way lessened the fame of his crueltie against his Mastershouse, as the name which he forbore, his sons after him were bold to usurpe, though withill successe, as will appeare, when they shall enter upon the Stage, whereon these old Tragedians, under new habits, as no longer now the same persons, begin to play their parts, with bigger lookes, and more boisterous actions, not with greater grace and judgement, than in the Scenes alreadie past.

Of the Warres betweene the Kings of Egypt, Asia, Macedon, 30

§. I.

The Expedition of Antigonus against Egypt, with ill successe.

Ll the rest of these Kings had taken that name upon them, in imitation of Antigonus himselse, as beseeming his greatness: which was such as gave him hope to swallow them up, together with their new titles. Being not ignorant of his own strength, he resolved to single out Ptolomie, and make him an example to others: who should hardly beable to stand, when the greatest of them was fallen. To this purpose he prepared an armie of eighteen thousand foot, & eight thousand horse, with fourfcore and three Elephants: as likewise a sleet of a hundred and fiftie Gallies, and a hundred ships of burthen. The Land forces he commanded in person: of the Navie Demetrius was Admirall.

When all was readie for the journey, the Sea-men advised him to stay yet eight dayes of longer, and expect the setting of the Pleiades. But his hastie desire to prevent all preparations for resistance that Ptolomie should make, rejected this counsell; imputing it rather to their seare than skill: wherefore he departed from Antigonia (a Town which he had built in Syria, and called after his ownename, that was soon changed into Seleucia, by his mortall enemie) and came to Gaza, where he met with his Fleet. The neares that he drew to Egypt, the more haste he made: thinking by celeritie to prevaile more than by his great power. He caused his Souldiers to carrie tenne dayes provision of Victuals; and had many Camels loaden with all necessaries for passing the Desarts, over which he marched with no fmall toile, though he met with no refiftance. At Mount Cassing, which is neare adjoyning to Nilus, he saw his Fleet riding at Anchor, not farre from the shore, in ill case, and many Shippes wanting. It had been forely beaten with foule weather, wherein some were lost, others driven backe to Gaza, or scattered elsewhere into fuch creekes as they could recover: Demetrius himselfe, with the best and frongest vessels, did so long beat it up against the wind, that all his fresh water was spent; in which extremity, he and all his must have perished, had not the tempest ceased when it did, and Antigonus appeared in fight, from whom these over-wearied, thirsty and Seaheaten Souldiers received reliefe. After these painfull travels, there followed a Warre no leffe painfull than to little purpose; for Prolomie had so fortified all the paffages upon the River of Nelus, as hee affured himfelfe either to end the warre there, or if his guards should happen to be forc't, yet could it not be done but so much to the weakning of the Affailants, as he should afterward, with a second Army (which he held entire) entertain the Invader upon advantage enough. All that Antigonus fought, was to come to blowes feedily : Ptolomie on the contrary, to beat Antigonus by the belly. It is true that Nilus gave him water enough, but wood he had none to warme it, and while Antigonus affaulted the Rampiers raised upon the River in vaine, Ptolomicassaid the faith of his souldiers with good fuccesse; for with great gifts, and greater promises, he ferried them over so fall; as had not Antigonus thrust some affured Regiments, upon the passages next the to enemy, and in the mean while taken a resolution to returne, Psolomie had turned him out of Egypt ill attended.

Some of them indeed he laid hands on, in the way of their escape, and those he put to death with extreme torments; but in all likelihood with the same ill successe that Perdical had formerly done, when he invaded Egypt: had he not readily removed his Army surther off, from the noyse of their entertainment, that had already been won from him. To prevent therfore as well the present danger of his stay, as the shame following a force retail, he secretly practised the advice of his Councell, upon whom the burther must be laid of his entrance, and leaving Egypt.

Itis indeed leffe prejudiciall in fuch like cases, that errours, dishonours, and losses be be laid on Counsellors and Captains, than on Kings; on the Directed, than on the Director for the honour and reputation of a Prince is farre more precious than that of a Vasfall. Charles the fift, as many other Princes have done, layd the losse and dishonour he received in the invasion of France, by the way of Provence, to Antonie de Leva, whether justly one, I know not, but how soever, all the Historians of that time agree, that the sorrow thereof cost that brave Captaine his life. Certainly to give any violent advice in doubt-till enterprises is rather a testimony of love, than of wisdome, in the giver; for the ill successes alwaies cast upon the Councell, the good never wants a Father, though a salse one, to acknowledge it. Yet I have sometime known it, that great Commanders, who are for the present in place of Kings, have not onely been disswaded, but held, in a kind, by strong hand, from hazzarding their own persons, and yet have those kind of Mutiners never been called to a Marshals Court.

§. II.

How the Citie of Rhodes was befieged by Demetrius.

His departure of Antigonus, left behind it many dead carcasses, and a great deale of joy in Egypt. Ptolomy held a solemne Feast, and sent Messengers abroad, loaden with glad newes, to Seleucus, Lysimachus, and Cassander, his Consederates: strongly encouraging all that side, with the report of this his late selicity, though it appeared but in a defensive Warre. Antigonus on the contrary, stattered himselfe with another interpretation, calling the joyes of his enemies for witnesses of his owne great-nesses, seeing they arose but from so little things: his enemies being but bare savers by the last bargaine, and himselfe, as he supposed, having lost but a little time, and no part of his honour in the late retrait. Howsever it were, yet he meant to follow his affaires henceforth in another sashion; for that which he could not cleave a-sunder by great blowes, he purposed by little and little to pare off, by cutting off the branches first, to fell the

and board a bad

the Tree it selfe with the more facility. To effect which, he resolved (leaving the great ones to grow awhile) to roote up the Dependants of his Enemies: Dependants, whom the fore-named Confederates should be fore't either to relieve, or to sole; and hereby he doubted not to draw them into the field, where the advantage of power, and of all other warlike provision promised him victory.

At this time the Citie of Rhodes was very mighty, being well governed, and having long held it selfe in good Neutrality; it drew the better part of all the trade of those parts, and therein a great deale of riches to it selfe; to maintain which, and to increase it, it furnished and kept on the Seasa Fleet of well armed Shipps, by which it not onely beate off all Pyrates and petty Theeves, but the reputation of their strength was to thereby so much encreased, as all the neighbour Princes sought their alliance and con-

In this fo dangerous a time (in which they must either refuse all that sought them, and fo ftand friendlesse and apart; or joyne themselves to some one, and thereby forgoe the peace, by which their greatnesse had growne) their affections carryed them to the Egyp. tian: both because the greatest part of their trade lay that way, as also for that Anties. nus his dispessition, greatnesse, and neighbourhood was fearfull unto them. This affection of theirs, with some other passages more apparent, gave argument of quarrell to Anieg. nus, who began to declare himself against them by petty injuries, of taking some of their thips, with fuch other grievances, while he made a more weighty preparation, to purfue 10 the War against them openly and strongly. All things soon after ordered according to the greatnesse of the enterprise, he employed his Sonne Demetrius against them in their owne Iland, who brought fuch terrour upon the Citizens, that laying afide all respect of friendship and honour, they offered him their assistance and service against whomsoever. Demetrius, who knew from whence this change came, and that the alteration was perfwaded by feare, and not by love; raifed his demands to an intolerable height, requiring a hundred Hostages to be delivered him, and liberty to lodge in their Port as many ships of War as himselfe pleased. These conditions more properly to bee imposed upon a State already conquered, than on those who as yet had heard of nothing but a constrained affiftance, restored unto the Rhodians their lost courage, and made them resolvetode- 20 fend their liberty to the last man: this taught them to infranchise all their able bond-men, and wifely rather to make them their fellow-Citizens, than to make themselves sellowflaves with them.

Demetrius having refused the faire conditions offered (as the Rhodians the fearfull ones pro pounded unto them) makes preparation for a long siege, and finding no appearance to carry the place in surie, he set in hand with his Engines of battery; in the invention and use of which, he did never shew himselfe a greater Artisan, than in this War. But in conclusion, after the Citizens had sustained all the affaults given them for a wholeyear, after many brave fallies out of the Town, and the samine which they endured within the Towne, which had proved farre more extreme, if Ptolomy had not with many hazzards a relieved them, Demetrius by mediation of the Grecian Embassadors, gave over the siege; a hundred hostages they gave him for performance of the peace made, but with exception of all the Magistrates and Officers of the Citie.

Hereunco Demetrius was brought by the usuall policie of War, and state: for while with the flower of all his fathers forces he lay before Rhodes, Cassander recovered many of those places in Greece, which Demetrius had formerly taken from him; neither did Cassander make the War as in former times, by practice and surprise, but by a strong and well compounded army, which he himselfe led as far as into Attica, and therewith greatly distressed and endangered Athens it self. On the other side (though with lesse since Athenians and Peloponnesus. These dangerous undertakings upon Greece, advised the Athenians and Etolians to dispatch their Embassadors towards Demetrius, and advised Demetrius rather to abandon the enterprise of Rhodes, than to abandon the great honour which he had formerly gotten by setting all Greece at liberty.

Denetrius was no sooner out of the Hand, than that the Rhodi ans erected statues in honour of Lysimachus and Cassander; but for Prolomy, whom they most affected, and from whom they received their most relief, they consulted with the Oracle of Jupiter, whether it were not lawfull to call him agod. The Priests which attended in the Temple of Hammon, gave the same sair answer for Prolomy, which they had formerly done for Alexander his Master; for as Alexander consulted the Oracle with an Army at his heeles, so was piolony at this time Lord of the soile: and yet was this a far more cleanly creation than that done by the Athenians, who Deisied Antigonus and Demetrius by decree of the people. Amadage it was, when so many of Alexanders Captaines could not content themselves with the stile of Kings, but that they would needs be called gods.

§. III.

10 How Demetrius prevailed in Greece. Cassander desires peace of Antigonus, and cannot ob-

Emetrius comming with a strong Fleete and Army into Greece, quickly drave Cassander out of Attica; and pursuing his fortune, chased him beyond the straits of Thermopyla. Herein his reputation did much availe him; which was fo great, that fixe thousand of his enemies Souldiers revolted unto him. So, partly by the greatneffeo his name, partly by force, he recovered in short space all that Cassander held inthose fraits, and giving liberty unto the people, he bestowed upon the Athenians those peeces, which had been fortified against them, to blocke them up. Then went he into Peloponnesus, where he found the like, or more casie successe: for he suddenly tooke Argos, Corinth, Sicyon, and the most of the Country, bestowing liberty upon such as neededit. The Town of Sicyon he translated by consent of the Citizens, from the old sear into another place, and called it after his owne name, Demetrius. This done, he betooke himselse to his pleasure. At the 1sthman games, he caused himselse to be proclaimed Captaine Generall of Greece, as Philip and Alexander had been in former times: whereupon (as if he were now become asgreat as Alexander) he despised all others, making ita matter of jest, that any, save himselse or his father, should usurpe the name of King. But in his behaviour he was fo farre unlike to a King, that in all the time of his leafure, hedeferved none other name than of a drunken Palliard. Yet were the Athenians as readyas ever to devise new honours for him: among which they made one Decree, That whatfoever King Demetrius should command, ought to be held facred with the gods? and just with men.

All Greece being now at the disposition of Antigonus, Cassander stood in great seare, letthe war should fall heavily upon him in Macedon: which to avoyd, he knew no better way than to make peace with his enemies betimes. And to that purpose he sent Embushadors; but had no better answer from Antigonus, than that he should submit his whole state to his discretion. This proud demand made him looke about him, and labour hard in solliciting his friends, both to affist him, and take heed to themselves, neither sound he them slow in apprehending the common danger: for Lysimachus knew that stone Cassander had lost Macedon, Demetrius would soon be Master of Thrace. Neither were Ptolomy and Seleucus ignorant of that which was like to befall them, if Antigonus were suffered to put himselse in quiet possession of those Provinces in Europe. Wherefore it was agreed, that with joynt forces they should all together set upon the common enemy.

Hereof Antigonus had notice: but scorned all their preparations, saying, That he would ascassify scatter them, as a stock of birds are driven away with astone. With these conceins he pleased himselfe, and no way hindred the proceedings of his Enemies. He lay at that time in his Towne of Antigonia (a name that it must shortly lose) where he was carefully providing to set out some stately game and Pageants, in oftentation of his glory. But thinker was brought unto him the tumultuous newes of Lysimachus his victories about Hulespont. For Cassander had committed unto Lysimachus part of his forces, where with to passe over into Asia, while he himself with the rest should oppose Demetrius on Europe side. So Lysimachus passing the Hellespont, began to make hor War upon the subjects of Anigonus; getting some of the Cities in those parts, to joyne with him by saire means: winning others by force, and wasting the Country round about.

To represse this unexpected boldnesse, Antigonus made hasty journies, and came some enough to recover his losses, but not strong enough to drive Lysimachus home, or compell him to come to battell. Lysimachus waited for the comming of Seleucus; kecping himselfe the whilest from necessity of fighting. But Babylon was far off; and Seleum his preparations were too great to bee soon in a readinesse. The Winter also did hinder his journy: which inforced them on both sides to rest in some quiet, without performing any matter of importance. This delay of debating the quarrell in open field, held all those Nations in a great suspense, & bred much expectation. Yet might all have come to nothing, had not Antigonus bin so forward, that he resulted to yeeld upon any peaceable conditions. At length Seleucus drew neare with a mighty Army of his owne (for he had gathered strength in that long time of leasure, which Antigonus had given him) and with great aid from Prolomie, that was joyned with his forces.

To helpe in this needfull case, Demetrius was called over into Asa by his Fathers let. 10 ters: which he readily obeyed. Before his departure out of Greece, he made peace with Cassander, upon reasonable termes: to the end he might not be driven to leave any part of his Army for desence of the Country; and that his journy might be without any such blemish of reputation, as if shee had abandoned his Dependants: for one Article of the peace was, That all the Cities of Greece should be at liberty. Cassander was glad to be so rid of an Enemy that was too strong for him. Yet would this league have done him little good, if things had fallen our contrariwise than they did in Asis; seeing the ratification thereof was referred unto Antigonus. It sufficed, that for the present, every one found meanes to cleare himselfe of all incumbrances else-where, to the end that each of them might freely apply himselfe to the tryall of the maine controversie in Asia.

6. IIII.

How Antigonas was flaine in a great battell at Ipfut, neare unto Ephefus; wherein humbole eftate was loft.

Eleucus, with his Sonne Antiochus, joyning with Lysimachus, compounded a great Army, which was (all confidered) not inferiour to that of the Enemy. In greatnesse of name (that helpeth much in all Warres, but especially inthe Civill) they were rather unanswerable than unequall to their adversaries: for Antigonus had of long time kept them under with a mastering spirit, and had been reputed a King indeed, when the rest were held but Usurpers of the Title. Likewise Demetrius was generally acknowledged a brave Commander, having given proofe of his worthin many great services of all kinds, and enriched the art of war with many inventions, which even his enemies, and particularly Lysimachus, did much admire. Seleucus, who had some times flattered Ansigonus, and fearfully stolne away from him to fave his life, with young Antischus, a Prince not heard of before this journy; and Lysimachus, that had lived long in a corner, hardly keeping his owne from the wilde Thracians; wanted much in reputation, of that which was yeelded to their opposites: yet so, that as ancient Captains un- 4 der Philip and Alexander, two of them were held worthy enough to receive any benefit that fortune might give, and the third a Prince of great hope, whereof he now cameto make experience.

The Souldiers, on both fides, were for the most part hardy and well exercised: many of them having served under Alexander; though of those old Companies, the long space of two and twenty years had consumed the greatest number. But concerning their affections, the followers of Seleuus were easily persuaded, that in this battell they must either get the upper hand, or put in extreme danger all that belonged unto the Confederate Princes; whereas Antigonus his men could discerne no other necessity of fighting, than the obstinate quality of their Lord, that needes would be Master of all. Antigonus had about threescore and ten thousand foot, 'ten thousand horse, and threescore and fifteene Elephants. His enemies were fixe thousand short of him in number of their foot; in horse they had the oddes of five hundred; of Elephants they had soure hundred, and an hundred and twenty armed Chariots of War: which helpes, though they little had availed the Persuns, yet were they not to be despised, in the hands of a good Captaine.

Antigonus himselfe, either troubled with the unexpected greatnesse of his enemies forces, or presaging little good like to ensue, grew very pensive, communing much in private private with his fonne whom hee commended to the Army as his Succeffor: whereas in former times he had never been fo jocund; as towards the houre of battaile; nor had been accustomed to make his son, or any other, private to his counsaile; before it required execution. Other tokens of bad lucke, either foregoing the fight; or afterwards devised, I hold it needlesses to recount. Diana of Ephesus dwelt neere to the place of battell, a busine goddesse in many great fights; and therefore likely to have beene thrust into the sable, if any matter, nearly resembling a miracle, had chanced.

It is easie to believe, that these two so gallant Armies, containing well neere all the ftrength of Alexanders whole Empire, performed a notable fight, being led by fuch worthe Commanders, and whom the iffue thereof did highly concerne. Yet are few of the particulars recorded: an easie losse in regard of the much variety, wherewith every storyaboundeth in this kinde. The most memorable things in the battaile, were these: Demetrius with his best force of horse, charged valiantly upon young Antiochus; whom when he had broken, and put to flight, hee was so transported with the heat of his good fuccesse, that he never gave over his purfuit, but left his Father naked, and loft thereby both him, and the victory. For when Seleucus perceived this advantage, hee enterposed his Elephants, betweene Demetrius and the Phalanx of Antigonus; and with many troupes of horse offering to breake upon the enemies battaile, wheresoever it lay most open, he did so terrefie the Antigonians, that a great part of them rather chose to revolt from their Lord, whilst they were fairely invited, than to sustaine the surv of so dangerous an impression. This cowardize, or rather treason of some, discouraged others; and finally, cast them all into slight; exposing their Generall to the last end of his destinies. Antigonus was then fourescore yeares old, very fat and unwieldy, so that heewas unapt for flight, if his high spirit could have entertained any thought thereof. Hehad about him some of his most trusty followers, & as many others as he could hold together. When one that perceived a great troupemaking towards his person, told him, Sir King, yonder company meanes to charge you; He answered, well may they; for who defends me ? but anon Demetrius will relieve w. Thus expecting to the very last, that his for should come to the rescue, he received so many Darts into his body, as tooke away hislately ambitious, but then fearfull hopes, together with his troublesome life.

His great ability in matter of Armes, together with his unfatiable defire of Empire, have sufficiently appeared in the whole Volume, of his actions. He was more feared by his enemies, than loved by his friends; as one that could not moderate his fortune, but used infolence towards all alike, as if it had bim some vertue neerest representing a Kingly Majesty. This was the cause that so many of his followers revolted to his enemies; and finally, that a great part of his Army sorsooke him in his last necessity. For those kings and Princes that call all the carefull indeavours of their Vassalls, onely duty and debt; and are more apt to punish the least offences, than to reward the greatest services: still sindethemselves upon the first change of fortune, (seeing it is love onely that staies by adversity) not only the most friendlesse, but even the most contemptible, and despisad of all other. This Antigonus sound true in part, while he lived; in part he less tit to be verified upon his son.

6. V.

How Demetrius, for saken by the Athenians after his overthrow, was reconciled to Seleucus and Ptolomy, beginning a new fortune, and shortly entring into quarrels.

Or Demetrius, at his returne from the idle pursuit of young Aniochm, finding all quite lost, was glad to save himselfe, with source thousand horse ad five thousand foor, by a speedy retrait unto Ephesm, whence hee made great haste unto Athens, as to the place; that for his sake would suffer any extremity. But whilest hee was in the middest of his course thicker, the Athenian Embassadurs met him with a decree of the people, which was, that none of the Kings should bee admitted into their Citie. These were Embassadurs, not Theori, or Consulters with the Oracle. It was a shamelesse ingratitude in the Athenians, to reward their Benefactor, in his misery, with such a decree: neither did any part of his calamity more afflict the unfortunate Hhhh

CHAP.6.5.6.

Prince than to fee his adverfity despifed by those whom hee had thought his furest friends. Yet was he faine to give good words. For he had left many of his ships in their Haven of which he now stood in great need; & therefore was faine to speak them faire that fomtims had grofly flattered him. But he shall live to teach them their old language, & fpeake unto them in another tune. When he had gotten his ships, he sailed to the 18th. where he found nothing but matter of discomfort. His Garrisons were every where broken up; the Souldiers having betaken themselves to his enemies pay. So that he was King only of a small Army and Fleet, without money or meanes wherewith to suffaine him & his followers any long time. All the rest, or the greatest part of his Fathers large Dominion, was now in dividing among the Conquerers, and those few places which to as yet held for him (having not perchance heard the worst of what had happened) he no way knew how to relieve: for to put himselfe into the field on that side of the Sea hee had no power; and to inclose himselfe in any of them, how strong soever, were but to imprison his fortune, and his hopes, or therein indeede to bury himselfe and his estare. He therefore creeping thorow those bushes that had fewest briers, fell upon a conner of Lysimachushis Kingdome, whereof he gave all the spoile that was gotten, to his Souldiers, his owne losses having beene too great to be repaied againe by small prizes.

In the meane while the Confederate Princes had wherewithall to busie themselves. in the partition of those Provinces, of which their late victory had made them Lords: wherein Seleucus had a notable advantage by being present, and Master of the field; 20 for neither Prolomy nor Caffander were at the overthrow given, having onely sentcertaine troupes to re-inforce the Army which Selencus led, who tooke hold of a pare of Affa the leffe, and all Syria, being no otherwife divided from his owne Territory. than by the River of Euphrates. For there had not any order beene taken by the Confederates, for the division of all those Lands : because they did not expect so profierous an iffue of that warre, which they made onely in their owne common defence. It was therefore lawfull for Seleucus, to make the best benefit that hee could of the victory, at which neverthelesse others did repine, and though they neither could nor durst accuse him of ill dealing for the present, yet seeing the over-greatnesse of Seleucus brought no leffe danger to the rest of the new Kings, than that of Antigonus had done, 30 they confulted upon the fame reason of State as before, how to oppose it in time. Neither was Seleucini ignorant of what they had determined for he read it in the Lawupiverfall of Kingdomes and States, needing no other intelligence. Hereupon they forget friendships on all sides, and cure themselves of all unprofitable passion, the hatred of each to other, and their loves being laid on the one fide, against their profits on the other were found fo far too light, as Seleucus, who had to day flaine Antigonus the father, and driven Demetrius the sonne out of Asia, sought to morrow how to match himselfe with Stratonica, Demetrius his Daughter, and fo by Demetrius to ferve his turne against Lylimachus.

The story of this Stratonica, with whom young Antiochus, the forme of Seleuciu A fell so passionately in love, and so distempered, as Seleucus his father, to fave his sonnes life, gave her (though shee were his wife) unto him; and how his passion was discovered by his pulse, is generally noted by all Writers. But neither did this alliance between Seleucus and Demetrius; betweene Ptolomy and Lysimachus; betweene Demetrius and Caffander; betweene Demetrius and Ptolomy; though for the present it brought him againe into the ranke of Kings; otherwifetye any of them to each other, than the marriages between Christian Kings have done in latter times, namely between the Au-Brians, the Aragonians, the French, & other Princes ineither have the Leagues of those elder times beene found more faithfull, than those of the same latter times have beene; asin the stories of Charles the eighth of France, & of Charles the Emperour, of Frances 5 the first, and of the Kings of Naples, Dukes of Millan, and others, the Reader may of ferve: betweene whom from the yeer of our Lord, One thou fand foure hundred ninety and five, when Charles the eighth underrooke the Conquelt of Naples, to the yeer One thousand five hundred fifty and eight, when Henry the second died; the Histories of those times tell us, that all the bonds, either by the Bedde or by the Booke, either by Weddings, or Sacramentall Oaths, had neither faithfull purpose nor performance Yet did Demetrius reap this profit by giving his daughter to his enemy Seleucm, that he recovered Cilicia from Plistarchin, the brother of Caffander, who had gotten it as his share in the division of Antigonus his possessions: for the Intruder was not strong enough to hold it by his proper forces from him, that entred upon it as a lawfull Heire, neither would Seleucus lend him any helpe, as by the rule of Consederacy hee should have done against the common enemy. So Plistarchus with very angry complaint, as well against Seleucus as Demetrius, went unto Cassander; whither Philastheir sister, followed him shortly, to pacifie them both, & keep all quiet; being fent for that purpose by some profee glad to make use of that bond of aliance betwith them, whereof in his owne profeering, he never tooke notice to the others good. About the same time hee tooke to Wise a daughter of Ptolomy (plurality of Wives being samiliar with these Macedonians, that had learned it in their Eastern conquests) & so was he by two marriages rather freed from two enemies, than strengthened with two friends; for neither of them wished him any good, otherwise than might seeme to advance their owne ambitious desires.

Seleucus and Ptolomy could both of them have been contented better, that Demetriat, with helpe of their countenance, should feeke his fortune somewhat farther off, than fertle his estate under their noses. Particularly, Seleucus thought that Cilicia lay very fitly for himfelfe : and Ptolomy had a great appetite (which yet he concealed a while) to the Ile of Crorus. Now whether it were fo, that Seleucus would faine have fet his new father-in-law upon the necke of Lysimachus; or whether hee were indeede greedy of the bargaine; he offered to buy of Demetrius for ready money, his late purchase of Cilicia. Hereunto Demetrius would not haerken, but meant to keep as much land as he could having already found in Cilicia twelve thousand talents of his fathers treasure, that would ferve him to make fport a while. This refufall fo displeased Seleucus, that in angry terms hedemanded the Cities of Tyre and Sidon, to be furrendred unto him; which were the only places in Syria, that had not followed the fortune of the late great battaile. In flead of giving them up, Demetrius tooke present order to have them better manned: & pake it stoutly, That were hee overcome a thousand times, yet would he not hire Seleucus to become his Son-in-law. In this quarrell Seleucus was generally reprehended. ame of a malignant disposition, that would breake friendship with his Father-in-law fortwo Townes, from whom he had already taken more than well he knew how to govene. But the fire confumed it felfe in words, which had it fastened upon armes, like it is that the weaker should have found friends out of envie to the stronger.

How Demerius wanthe City of Athens, and prevailed in Greece, but lost in Asia.

Of troubles in Macedon following the death of Cassander.

Nthe meane while, the Athenians not knowing how to use the liberty which Demetrius had bestowed on them, were fallen by sedition, under the tyranny of Lachares. Through which alteration their differenced City was so weakened, that it seemed ill able to keepe off the punishment due to their late ingratitude. This advantage hastened him, whom they had one ecalled their God and Saviour, to present himselfe unterm, in the habit of a revenging stry. He brought against them all the force that hee tould well spare from other employments; which were at that time perhaps the more, because his doubtfull Easterne friends, were unwilling to give impediment to any businesse, that might entangle him Greece. His first enterptise in Athens had ill successes agreet part of his sleet perishing in a tempest. But he soone repaired the losse; and (after some victories in Pelopannesse, where hee wan divers Towns that had fallen from him) the City, both by Land and Sea.

Athers was not able to feed the great multitude within it, any long time: for it flood in abarren foile, and wanted now the command of those Ilands, and places abroad, from whence it was wont to be flored with victuals; being also destitute of means to keep such a Navie, as might bring in supply, or dare to do any thing at Sea, against that of Demetrial. Yet was there some hope of succour from Ptolomy, who (trusting thereby to win the love of Greece) had loaden a hundred and fifty ships with corne, and sent them to relieve the hundred. But these hundred and fifty were unable to deale with three hundred good fighting ships, which Demetrius had, rather they feared to become a prey to him. & therefore hafted them away betimes, as having done enough, in adventuring to come fo neere that they might be descried. This brake the heart of the people, among whom the famine was so extreme, that a Father and his Son did fight for a dead Mouse, which dropped downe betweene them from the house top. Wherefore they sent Embassadors to yeeld up the Towne, and crave pardon, having so farre offended, that out of desperation, they made it a capitall offence to propose any motion of peace. Yet were they fain to abolish this decree : rather because they knew not what else to do, than because they hoped to be forgiven.

Demetrius, contented with the honour of the victory, did not only forbeare to take away the lives of these unthankfull men, which they had submitted unto his mercy; but out of his liberality gave them food, & placed in Office amongst them such as were most acceptable to the people. Nevertheleffe he was growne wifer than to trust them fo far as he had done in times past. And therefore, when (among other flattering acclamations) they bade him take their Havens, and dispose of them at his pleasure; hee was ready to lay hold upon the word, & leave a fure Garrison within their walls, to keep them honest perforce. After this hee went into Peloponnesw, vanquished the Lacedamonians in two battailes, and was in very faire possibility to take their City: when the dangerous newes of Lysimachus and Ptolomy, that prevailed faster upon him elsewhere, than himselfedid upon his enemies in Greece, called him in all haste. Lysimachus had won many Towns 20 in Alia; Ptolomy had gotten all the Isle of Cyprus, except the City of Salamis, wherein Demetrius had left his Children & Mother, that were straightly besieged. Whilst he was bethinking himselfe which way to turne his face, a notable piece of businesse offeredir felfe, which thrust all other cares out of his head.

Caffander was lately dead in Macedon, and foon after him, Philip his eldeft fon, whose two yongerbrethren, Antipater & Alexander, Sought for the Kingdom. In this quarrell Theffalonica the Daughter of King Philip, whom Caffander had married, feemed better affected to Alexander, than to her elder son: who thereupon grew so enraged, that most barbarously he slew his owne Mother. The odiousnesse of this fact gave a faire lustreto Alexanders cause: drawing the generality of the Macedons to take his part, as in revenge 30 of the Queens death, upon that wicked particide Antipater. But Antipater was fo ftrongly backed by Lysimachus, whose daughter he had married; that Alexander could not hope to make his party good without some forraigne aide. For which cause he called inboth Purhus & Demetrius; who how they dealt with him, it will foon appeare in the following Tragedy, of him and his brother. Their Father Caffander had been one that shifted well for himselfe, at such time as every man sought how to get somewhat, in the ill ordered division of the Empire. He was cunning in practice, & a good Souldier: one of more open dealing than were his Companions, but withall more impudent, rudely killing those, whom others would more wisely have made away. He deeply hated the memory of Alexander, that had knocked his head against a wall, upon some opinion of contempt. 4 With Olympias he had an hereditary quarrell, derived from his father, whom she could not abide. Her feminine malice did so exasperate him, by cruelty that she used against his friends, both alive and dead; as it made him adventure upon shedding the Royall bloud: wherewith, when once he had stained his hands, he did not care how farre he proceeded in that course of murder. His carefulnesse to destroy those women and children, whose lives hindred his purpose, argues him to have beene rather skilfull in matters of Armes, than a valiant man; such cruelty being a true marke of cowardize, which feares a far off the dangers, that may quietly passe away : and seeks to avoide them by base & wicked meanes, as never thinking it felf fafe enough, untill there be nothing left, that carries likelihood of danger. Of Olympias & Roxane it may be faid, that they had well deserved the bloudy end which over-tooke them; yet ill beseemed it Cassander to doe the office of a Hang-man. But Alexanders children had by no law of men, deserved to die for the tyranny of their Father. Wherefore, though Caffander died in his bed, vet the divine Justice brought fwords upon his wife and children, that well revenged the cruelty of this bloudy man, by destroying his whole house, as he had done his Masters. The state of the s of Pyrrhus and his doings in Macedon. The death of Cassanders children. Demetrius gets the Kingdome of Macedon; prevailes in warre against the Greeks; Loseth reputation in his warre against Pyrrhus, and in his civill Covernment, and prepares to win Asia. How all conspire against Demetrius. Pyrrhus and Lysimachus invade him, his Army yeelds to Pyrrhus, who shares the Kingdome of Macedon with Lyfimachus.

Drrhm, the Sonne of that unfortunate Prince Aeacides, which perished in warre against Cassander, was hardly preserved, being a suckling Insant, from the sury of his Farhers enemies. When his Fosterers had conveighed him to Glaucias King of Illyria; the deadly hatred of Caff ander would have bought his life with the price of two hundred Talents. But no man can kill him that shall be his heire. Glaucias was so farre from betraying Pyrrhus, that he restored him by force to his Fathers Kingdome, when he was but twelve yeeres of age. Within the compasse of sixe yeers, either the indiscretions of his youth, or the rebellious temper of his Subjects, drave him out of his Kingdome, and left him to trie the world anew. Then went he to Demetrius (who married his fifter) became his Page, followed him a while in his warres, was with him in the great battell of Ipfus, whence he fled with him to Ephefus; & was content to be hoftage forhim, in his reconciliation with Ptolomy. In Egypt he to behaved himfelfe, that he got the favour of Berenice, Ptolomies principall wife, fo that he married her Daughter, & was thereupon sent home, with mony & men, into Epirus; more beholding now to Ptolomy, than to Demetrius. When he had fully recovered the Kingdome of Epirus, and was fettled in it, then fell out that busines between the children of Cassander, which drew both himand Demetrius into Macedon.

Antipater, the elder of Cassanders sons, was so farre too weake for Pyrrhus, that he hadno desire to attend the comming of Demetrius, but made an hasty agreement, and dwided the Kingdome with his younger brother Alexander; who likewise felt the aide of Pyrhus fo trouble some, that he was more willing to send him away, than to call in such another helper. For Pyrrhus had the audacity to request, or take as granted, by strong hand, Ambracia, Acarnania, & much more of the Country, as the reward of his pains: leaving the two brethren to agree as well as they could about the rest. Necessity enfored the brethren to composition: but their composition would not satisfie Demetrius, who tooke the matter hainoufly, that he was fent for, and made a foole, to come fo farre with an Army, and finde no worke for it. This was a frivolous complaint; whereby it appeared, that Demetrius had a purpose to doe as Pyrrhus had done, and somuch more, by how much he was stronger. Hereupon it seemed to Alexander a wise course, to remove this over-diligent friend, by murdering him upon some advantage. Thus Deinetrius reported the story, and it might bee true; though the greatest part, and perhaps the wifest, beleeved it not. But the issue was, that Alexander himselfe was feasted and laine by Demetrius; who tooke his part of the Kingdome, as a reward of the murder; exculing the fact fowell, by telling his owne danger, and what a naughty man Cassanderhad beene, that all the Macedonians grew glad enough to acknowledge him their king. It fell out happily, that about the same time Lysimachus was busied in warre with aking of the wilde Thracians: for thereby he was compelled to seek peace of Demerriw, which to obtaine he caused the remainder of Masedon to bee given up; that is, the Antipater, his Son-in-law. At this ill bargaine Antipater grievously homed, though he knew not how to amend it: yet fill he stormed; untill his Father-11-law, to fave the labour of making many excuses, tooke away his troublesome life. Thus in hafte, with a kinde of neglect, and as it were to avoide moleftation, were flaine the children of Caffander: of Caffander that had flain his owne Masters children, in a wise course of policy, with carefull meditation (so much the more wicked as the more long) fludying how to erect his owne house, that fell downe upon his grave, ere the earth on it Was throughly settled.

It might be thought, that such an accesse of Dominion, added much to the greatnesse of Demetrius. But indeed it shewed his infirmity ; and thereby made him neglected by hany, and at length hated by all. For he had no Art ofcivill Government: but thought or hewed by his actions that he thought) the use and fruit of a Kingdome, to be none other, than to doe what a King lifted. He gave himselfe over to Women and Wine, laughing openly at those which offered to trouble him with supplications, and the tedious discourse of doing justice. He had more skill in getting a Kingdome, than in ruling it : warre being his recreation, and luxury his nature. By long rest (as fixe years reigne is long to him, that knowes not how to reigne one yeare) he discovered so much of his worst conditions, as made the people both weary of his idlenesse; and the Souldiers of his vanity. He was freed from care of matters in Afia, by hearing that all was lost: though more especially, by hearing that Ptolomy had with great honour, entertained & dismissed his mother and children. This affoorded him the better leisure, of making war in Greece: where hee vanquished the Thebans, and won their City twice in short 10 space, but used his victory with mercy. Against Lysimachus he would faine have done fomewhat (the peace betweene them notwithstanding) at such time as he was taken by the Thracians; but Lysimachus was freely dismissed, and in good case to make resistance ere Demetrius came; fo as this journey purchased nothing but enmity. Another expedition he took in hand against Pyrrhus, with no better, or rather with worse event. Pyrrhus held fomewhat belonging to Macedon, which he had indeed as honeftly gotten, as Demetrius the whole Kingdome; he had also made excursions into Thessay. But there needed not any handsome pretence of quarrell, seeing Demetrius thought himselfe strong enough, to over-run his enemies Countrey, with two great Armies. It is a common fault in men, to despise the vertue of those, whom they have knowne raw Novices in 20 that faculty, wherein themselves are noted as extraordinary. Pyrrhus was a Captaine, whom latter ages, & particularly the great Hannibal, placed higher in the ranke of Generals, than either Demetrius, or any of Alexanders followers. At this time, he miffed that part of the Army, which Demetrius led, and fell upon the other halfe: which hee overthrew, not with more commendations of his good conduct, than of his privatevalour, shewed in single combat against Pantauchus, Demetrius his Lievtenant; who being a strong man of body, challenged this young Prince to fight hand to hand, and was utterly beaten. The losse of this battaile did not so much offend the Macedomians, as the gallant behaviour of Pyrrhus delighted them. For in him they feemed to behold a Captaine. These rumours were not more nourished by the vertue of the Epirot, than by dislike of their owne King; whom they began to diffesteeme, not so much in regard of his unprofitable journey into Epirus (for he had wasted much of the Country, and brought home his Army in good case) as of his insolence, that grew daily more and more intolerable. His apparrell seemed, in the eyes of the Macedons, not onely too sumptuous and new-fangled, but very unmanly 3 and ferving chiefly to bee a daily witnesse, how much he contemned them and their good opinions. Of his Souldiers lives he was retchlesse: 40 & suffered unwisely this un-princely sentence to escape out of his mouth; That the more of them died, the fewer he was to pay. He made a mockery of justice; and (as it were, to publish unto all his Subjects, how little hee esteemed it or them) having by a shew of Popularity invited Petitioners, and with a gratious countenance entertained their Supplications, he led the poore sucres after him in great hope, till comming to a bridge, he threw all their writings into a River; pleafing himselfe, in that he could so easily and fo boldly delude the cares of other men. By these courses hee grew so odious, that Pyrrhus gathered audacity, and invading Macedon, had almost wonne it all with little refistance. Demetrius lay then ficke in his bed: who recovering health, and taking the field, had such great oddes of strength, as made Pyrrhus glad to forfake his winnings and be gone, the lively figure of Alexander in his best quality. Other Kings did imitate, in a coun- 30

terfeit manner, some of Alexanders graces, and had good skill in wearing Princely ve-

flures: but (faid they) none, fave Pyrrhus, is like him in deed, in performing the office of

At length he began to have some feeling of the generall hate; which to redresse, he did not (for hee could not) alter his owne conditions; but purposed to alter their idle discourses of him, by setting them on worke in such an action, wherein his best qualities might appeare; that is, in a great Warre His intent was to invade Afra, with a Royall Army: wherein the fortune of one battaile might give him as much, as the fortime of another had taken from him. To this end, he first made peace with Pyrrhus, that so hee might leave all safe and quiet at home. Then did he compose a mighty Army, of almost a hundred thousand foot, and twelve thousand horses with a Navie of five hundred faile, wherein were many thips, farre exceeding the greatnesse of any that had hin seen before; yet so swift and usefull withall, that the greatnesse was least part of their

The terrible fame of these preparations, made Seleucus & Ptolomy suspect their owner forces, and labour hard with Lyfimachus & Pyrrhus, to joyne against this ambitious for of Antigonus, that was like to prove more dangerous to them all, than ever was his father. It was easily discerned, that if Demetrius once prevailed in Asia, there could be no fecurity for his friends in Europe, what league foever were of old concluded. Therefore they resolved to begin with him betimes, & each to invade that quarter of Macedon, that launext his owne Kingdome. Lysimachus came first, and against him went Demetrius with a great part of his Army: but whilst he was yet on the way, newes were brought into his Camp, that Pyrrhus had won Berrhæa. The matter was not over great: were it not, that minds prepared with long discontent, are ready to lay hold upon small occasions of diflike. All the campe was in uproare: some wept, others raged, few or none did forbeare to utter feditious words, and many defired leave of Demetrius, to goe to their owne houses, meaning indeed to have gone to Lysimachus.

When Demetrius perceived the bad affection of his Army, he thought it the wifest way to lead the Macedonians further off from Lyfimachus their own countriman, against Pyrhus that was a stranger: hoping by victory against the Epirot, to recover the love of his followers, in fuch fort that he might afterwards at leifure deale with the other. But berein his wisedome beguiled him. For the Souldiers were as hasty as he, to meet with Pyrhus; not intending to hurt him, but longing to fee that noble Prince, of whom they willy heard the honourable fame. Some spake of his valour; some enquired, others anfwered, of his person, his armour, and other tokens whereby hee might be knowne; as particularly, by a paire of Goats hornes, that he wore on his crest. It was not likely, that these men should hurt him. Divers of them stole away, and ran over into Pyrrhus his campe: where the newes that they brought, were better welcome than their persons. Forthey faid, and it was true, that if the Macedonians might once get fight of Pyrrhus, they would all falute him King. To trie this, Pyrrhus rode forth, and prefented him felfe bareheaded in view of the campe, whither fome were fent before to prepare his wellome. The newes of his arrivall found a generall applause, and every one began to looke out, with defire to fet eye on him. His face was not fo well known as his Helmet therefore he was admonished to put it on: which done, all came about him, and profferedtheir fervice: neither were there any, that spake for Demetrius; only some (& they the most moderate of tongue) bad him be gone betimes, and shift for himselfe. So Demetrius threw afide his maskers habit, and attyring himselfe poorly, did fearfully steale away out of his owne campe, deferving well this calamity: whether it were fo, that hee would not hearken to the good counfaile of his friends or whether his behaviour depriwedhim of fuch friends, as would dare to let him heare the unpleafant found of necessary truth.

Whilest Pyrrhus was making this triumphant entry into the Kingdome of Macedon; Lylimachus came upon him very unseasonably, and would needs have halfe: saying, that he had done as much as Pyrrhus in the warre; and therefore had reason to challenge his priof the gaine. The bargaine was quickly made, and the divifion agreed upon: each of them being rather defirous to take his part quietly, than to fight for the whole; as hoping each of them, to worke his fellow quite out of all, upon better opportunity.

6. VIII.

How Demetrius gathering forces, enterprised many things will ill successe, in Greece and Asia. How he was driven upon Seleucus, and compelled to yeeld himselfe. His imprisonment and death.

He Athenians were as unthankfull to Demetrius in this his adverfity, as they had beene in former times. For they prefently for fooke his friendship, and called Pyrrhus out of Macedon to bee their Patron. Demetrius, when hee went against Lysimachus, had lest a great part of his forces in Greece, under his sonne Antigonus. Therefore it is like, that he had soone gotten an Army, though Phila his wife (who is highly commended for a wife and vertuous Lady) did poyfon her felfe, upon desperate griefe for his misfortune. The first, upon whom he attempted to shew his anger, were the Athenians that had well deserved it. He began to lay siege to their Towne: but was pacified by Crates the Philosopher, whom they had made their spokef-man; and taking faire words in stead of satisfaction, passed over into Asia, with eleven thousand Souldiers, meaning to trie his fortune against Lysimachus, for the Provinces of Lydia

At his first comming into those parts, fortune seemed to smile upon him. For many good Townes, willingly, or by compulfion, yeelded to his obedience. There were also fome Captaines that fell from Lysimachus to him, with their companies and treasures. But it was not longer ere Agathocles the son of Lysimachus, came upon him with an Army fo strong, that it was not for Demetrius his good, to hazzard his last stocke against ir. Wherefore, he resolved to passe through Phrygia & Armenia, into Media, & the Provinces of the higher Asia; trusting to finde a Kingdome somewhere in those remote quarters. The execution of this counfaile was grievously impeached by Agathocles: who pursued him close, and cut off all his provisions, driving him to take which wayes hee could, without following his intended course. In many skirmishes Demetrius vanquished this troublesome Enemy : neverthelesse, he could not be shaken off, but continued affi-Ging the poore titulary King, with extreme famine. At length, in passing the river Lyeus. fo many of Demetrius his men were loft, that the rest could no longer make resistance: but were driven to travaile with fuch speed as might well be called a plain flight. Sothat with famine, pettilent diseases following famine, and other accidents of warre, eight thousand of them were consumed: the rest, with their Captaine, escaped into Cilia. Seleucus had gotten possession of Cilicia, whilest Demetrius was occupied in Greece; vet was it no part of Demetrius his errand, to lay claime to the Country; but with vehement & humble letters he befought his Son-in-law, to call to mind their alliance, & to pirty him in his great mifery. These letters, at the first wrought well with Seleucus, and he condescended to the request; yet considering further how Demetrius had carried himselse, when he recovered strength after the battell at Ipsus, he changed his purpose, and went against him with an Army.

Many treaties were held between them; of which none tooke effect, through the jealousie of Seleucus. Therefore, meere desperation enforced Demetrius to fight like amad man, and his furies got him fome victories, though of small importance. At lengthsicknesse tooke and held him forty dayes, in which time, a great number of his few men, ran to the enemy. This notwithstanding he still held out, and once had like to have taken Seleucus in his bed, had not his comming beene discovered by fugitives, that gave alarme. Finally, when all his Army had for faken him, and left him with a few of his friends to shift for himself, he was compelled by the last of those adherents (for even some of those few forsooke him) to yeeld unto Seleucus.

Seleucus hearing this, was exceeding glad, and fent him very comfortable messages. But the approbation of his owne humanity, by his followers, was such, as renewed his jealous thoughts; and hindred him from admitting Demetrius to his presence, though otherwise he used him with as much favour, as any prisoner could wish. He was kept under sure guard in a demy-Iland, wherein were goodly Walkes, Orchards, and Parkes for hunting. He had all that he asked royally, & friends allowed to vifit him, at his, and their pleasure. Only his liberty was reserved unto the comming of young Antiochus and Stratonica, out of the high Countries. In this fort he spent three years, living merily all the while (as one that now enjoyed the happinesse, which with so much travaile and bloud-shed, he had sought in vaine) and then dyed, leaving to his sonne Antigonus, the fame which his father had left unto himselfe; that is, friends and hope. His ashes were honourably buried in Corinth; his qualities have appeared in his actions, and the fortune of his House will shew it selfe hereafter, in times and places convenient.

6. I X.

The death of Ptolomy, of Lysimachus, and of Seleucus, that was last of Alexander Captaines: with other occurrences.

Bout the fame time that Demetrius died, died also Ptolomy King of Egypt, a vertuous Prince, warlike, gentle, bountifull, & (which in those times was a rare commendation) regardfull of his word. He had, by many Wives and Concubines, many children, out of whom he felected Ptolomy Philadelphus, and caused him to reigne together with himselfe, two or three yeares before he died, that so he might confirme to him in the inheritance of the Kingdome. At this, Ptolomy Ceraunus (for all of that house assigned the name of Ptolomy) was grievously incensed. But no man cared for his anger. Therefore he went to Seleucus, who gave him loving entertainement. There were now only two of Alexanders Captaines left, Selencus & Lysimachus. These two needs would fight for it, who should be the longest liver of that brave Company. The true ground of their quarrell, was their neere equality of strength, and want of one to part them. The pretence was the murders which Lysimachus had committed upon many of his Nobles, together with his poyfoning Agathoeles his eldeft fon: whose wife and children fled un-

The Macedons after seven Moneths pause , having spent their first heat of admiration, began to harken so well to Lysimathus, their naturall Country-man, that they for sooke Pyrhus, upon none other ground than because hee was an Alien. This they had knowne well enough before: but they did him no great wrong in taking lightly from him, that hey lightly gave him. Lysimachus had reigned about five yeares alone, when the City fissimachia (built by him, and called after his name) falling by an earth-quake, appeard, by events, to have foreshewed the fall of his house. His owne jealousie, and the instigaion of a Mother-in-law, caused him to poyson his Son Agathocles; which drew upohim that War, wherein (after the loffe of all his fifteen children that were taken away by divers accidents) he perished himselfe.

Solenem was encountred by Lyfimachus on Asia side, where one battell concluded the warre, with Lysimachus his death. It pleased Seleucus more than the victory, that he was the last of all the great Heroes that followed Alexander. For now he seemed to himself sLord and Heire of all the conquered World. So he passed over into Macedon, to take position of Europe, where there was none to withstand him. But there he ended his days, and within feaven Moneths followed Lysimachus, and other of his fellowes, by a bouldy death, being treacherously slaine by Prolomy Ceraunus, whose friend and Patron khad bin. Seventy & feven year old he was, when he fought with Lysimachus, and Lymaching was seventy and source. With them ended the generation of old Captaines, that had feen the daies as it were of another World under the Persian : yet was there left one equal to any of them in the Art of Warre: even Pyrrhus the Epirot, of whom we spake before; that is now ready to enter into warre with the Romans, a more warlike people the Alexander himselfedid ever encounter. Of which warre, and of which people, it steedfull that wee here make mention, as of a flory more important, than any likely bensue in Greece, or in the great Kingdomes that were held by Alexanders Succesburs, with leffe (and still decreasing) vertue, than was that, by which they were first puchaled.

The growth of Rome: and fettling of the Easterne Kingdomes.

How the Romanes enlarged their Dominions in Italy, from the death of Tullus Hostilius, unto such time as they were assailed by Pyrrhus.

Ow Rome was founded by Romulus; settled in good order by Numa Pompilius; and by many, though small, victories, it gathered strength, unto such time as it became the head of Latium, by the conquest of Alba, in the raigne of Tullus Hostilius: it hath beene already noted, in due order of time. But whereas now the Roman greatnesse beginneth to encounter the power of Greece; and extending it selse out of Italy, to overwhelme the Dominions of other States and Princes: I hold it convenient (as in like cases I have done) briefly to fet downe the growth of this mighty City, in a compendious relation of those to many actions, which could not have beene delivered in the ages, wherein they were feverally performed, without much interruption of the History, that was then occupied in matter more important.

After the death of Tullus Hostilius (who when he had reigned two and thirty years, was burnt together with his house by lightning) Ancus Martius, Grand-childe to Numa Pompilim by his daughter, & not much unlike him in disposition, succeeded in the Kingdome of Rome. He walled the City about ; enlarged it with the hill Aventine, whichhe enclosed; built a bridge over Tybris, and the City of Oftia upon the Sea, fixteenemiles distant from Rome. Finally, having reigned foure and twenty years, he died, and byhis last Will hee left his children in charge with one Lucumon, the son of Damaratus, a Co. ! rinthian, who avoiding Cypfelm King of Corinth his tyranny, had fled into Hetruris, and dwelt in Tarquinii, by the name of which Towne he was afterwards called Tarquinus. From that City in Hetruria comming to Rome, & encouraged by some ominous occurrents, together with his wife Tanaquils prophecy, he grew a favorite of Ancus Marius; by his Grecian withumouring the factions of the Romane Court, infomuch that afterhis decease, he became not only Protector to the children, but Governour to the City. He doubled the number of Senatours, and enlarged the Centurions of Horsemen: neither was he leffe eminent in warre, than in peace: for he prevailed often against the Tuscant, and from his victories, the chiefest ornaments of triumph tooke their originall. When this, Lucius Tarquinius had reigned eight and thirty yeers, hee was flaine by the fors of Ancus Martius, to whom he had been left Guardian. But Tanaquil his wife, perceiving what was done, enformed the people, from out of an high Turret, that her Husbandwas wounded, and sicke, but not dangerously. And withall signified unto them, that in the interim of his ficknes, one Servius Tullius, whom from his birth she alwaies prophecied to be borne to great hopes (the sonne of P. Cornicularm and Ocrifia, a well descended but captive woman) brought up in her house, and husband unto her daughter, should supply her husbands place, in governing the State, untill his recovery: which government, being thus at first obtained by cunning, he afterwards usurped as his right. He first ordained Ratements, Subfidies, and valuations of the peoples wealth; among whom, at that time, fourescore thousand were mustered, of which number consisted their whole corporation; and by diffinction of Dignitics, Ages, Trades, and Offices, he managed the Kingdome in as good fort, as if it had beene a private household. At length, having two daughters of different natures, the one milde and gentle, the other fierce and outragious: and finding also that the two sonnes of Tarquinius Prisem, Sextus and Aruns, which had beene committed unto his tuition, were of different dispositions, proportionably answering to his daughters; he (willing to adde water, not oyle, to fire) gave the milde daughter to Sextus the hot-headed fon, & the violent, to Aruns the gentle in marriage. But whether by intended courses, or by accident, it hapned; the two milde one being made away, the furious natures were readily joyned in marriage:who foon concurring, and calling the Senate together, began to lay claime to the Kingdome. Upon this tumult, Servius Tullius hastning to the Senate, (where hee thought by authority to have bridled infolency)was thrown down the staires, & going home fore bruised, was slain by the way, when he had reigned forty & foure yeares. Then Tullia his daughter, first procliming her husband Tarquinius Superbus King; returning home, enforced her Coachmanto drive his Chariot over her fathers corpes; whereupon the street had the denomination of wicked street. This Tarquine, exercising cruelty without justice, & tyranny without mercy, upon the people & Senators; having tired himselfe & them at home, used the famerage of treachery upon his borders. He tooke Ocriculum, Sueffa, Pometia, and the Gabit. The issue of besieging Ardea, a towne eighteene miles distant from Rome, was of had successe. In the heat of which warre, his some Sextus Tarquinius violently ravished that chafte Lady Lucretia, his kisman Collarines wife: who in way of expiation for so unchafte a deed, thought good to wash out those spots of infamy with her owne bloud; 6 (having first bequeathed the revenge unto her father Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, her hisband Collatine, and Junius Brutus) she kill'd her selfe: whereupon (chiefly by Junius Brutus his resolution) Tarquinius Superbus, with his wife & children, was deposed and bailhed; & fled to Forfenna King of Hetruria for succour, in the five & twentieth year of his reigne, and the two hundred forty and fourth from the building of their City: in which space Rome had scarce gotten possession of fifteene miles round about her.

Junius Brutus by the helpe of Collatine, having expelled Tarquine, & freed his Countrey from that heavie yoke of bondage, inforced the people by folemne oath, never to amitany government by Kingsamong it them : whereupon they ranfacked their Kings goods, consecrated their fields to Mars, & conserved the government of the State upon Brus and Collatine. But became the name of King was odious in their cares, they maged the manner of their government, from perpetuall to annuall, and from a fingle governour to a double; lest perpetuall or sole dominion might be some motive to usurpation; & in stead of Kings they called them Consuls, signifying, as it may be interprettd, Providers: that their titles might remember them of their place, which was to bee awayes mindefull of their Citizens welfare. And yet was it so hard settling of troubled waters, that the people, after this innovation of State, fearce daring to affure themselves officirowne fecurity, enforced Tarquinius Collatine to refigne up his authority, fearing hattylanny would bee hereditary, and supposing that the very name and affinity with thebouse of Tarquine, savoured already of their condition. In his roome was substiund Talerius Pablicola, who that he might (as his name importeth) be gracious in the proples eyes, gave liberty, in matters of controversie, to appeale from the Confuls to the people: and that hee might as well in goods as in person, avoide occasion of suspiriaduled his owne house to be pulled downe, because it was built in a place defencible, affir had beene a Cittadell. Neither was Brutus any wayes deficient in matter of guter moment; which concerned as well the peoples fafety, as their favour: for hawegot intelligence, that some greener wits; and in the first ranke his owne sonnes, were itching after innovations, hoping to restore the banished Kings; see caused them, blkely in the Market-place, to be whipt, and then to be brought all unpartially to the Hitherto the Romans, having by the unblemished integrity of Brutus, well appealed dinbred quarrels at home, now hereafter imploy their military defignements against brainers: first, for their liberty; fecondly, for enlarging of their possessions; & lastly, landefending their confederate Provinces, & extending their Empire. For Rome, lituated siwere in the mid-way betweene Latium and the Tuscans, having as yet but narrow bonds, being in her minority, could not but give occasion of offence to her neighbours; by maine opposition, having prevailed against her borderers, shee used them as innments, whereby to obtaine the rest.

Their first war, in the first years of Confuls, was against Porfenna King of Herruria: ho being over-perswaded by Tarquines lamentation, came to Rome, rogether with ebanished King, and with great forces, to seate him againe in his Kingdome.

In the first conflict, Horatius Cocles, having long time born the maine brunt of his eneo, on the bridge over Tibris; at length, feeling himselfe too faint to stand against so any, caused the bridge behinde him to be broken downe, and with his armour, leaping into the River, like a hunted Stagge, refreshed his hot spirits, and returned safe to his sellowes, with the like resolution to sustaine a new charge. Porsenna, although by this he had well-nigh wonthe hill Janiculus, which is the very entrance into the City, found the victory, in a maner, assuredly his owne: yet admiring their valour, terressed by the constant resolution of Mutius Scavola (who having by errour slaine Porsenna his Secretary, in stead of the King himselfe, did in scorne of torments threatned, burne off his own hand) he thought it not any whit prejudiciall, either to his safety, or credit, to enter league with them at the worst hand. And yet the edge of Tarquinius his spleen was not quite abated, though Aruns his sonne, & Brutus his enemy, in single combat, had slaine each other. And here the Romans, although they lost Brutus, got the field; and their Ladies, so whose Champion he was, for their chastity, not for beauty, mourned the loss of him one whole yeare. Into his place, for the residue of his yeare, was subrogated Sp. Lucreius Tricipitinus, father to Lucreia: and in his roome (deceasing naturally before the yeare expired) Horatius Pulvillus.

Tarquine, upon his overthrow, feeling the fates difastrous, thought it no boot to strive against the streame, but spent the residue of his time, which was about sourteeneyears, privately at Tusculum. Yet his Son-in-law Mamilius Tusculanus, stomaching a-freshat those old repulses, because Porfenna had made peace with the Romans, and denied further fuccour unto the Tarquines, mustered up his Latines, & gave battell to the Romans. at the Lake Regillum; where the conflict was fierce, & the iffue uncertaine, untill Aulus 20 Posthumus, the Roman Dictator, (for they had created this Magistracy greater than Confuls, purposely for this Warre, when first it was expected) to exasperate his Souldiers courage, threw their owne Enfignes amidst the Enemies; & Cossus or Spurius Cassus, (Master of the Horse-men, an affistant Officer to the Dictator) commanded to take off their bridles, that they might run with free violence, to recover againe their Enfignes. This fight was so well performed, that a report went of Castor and Pollux, two gods. who came on milke-white Steeds, to be eye-witnesses of their valour, and fellow-helpers of their victory; for the Generall consecrated a Temple to them, as a stipend for their paines. After this the Romans fierce spirits, having no object of valour abroad, reflected upon themselves at home; and the fixteenth yeare after the Kings expulsion,upor infligation of some desperate banckrouts, thinking themselves wrongfully oppresfed by the Senate and Confuls, they made an uproare in the holy Mount; untill by Meventus Agrippa, his discreet allusion, of the inconvenience in the head and bellies discord, to that present occasion, they were reconciled to the Senate : with condition, that they might have some new Magistrates created, to whom they might appealein cases of variance, and make them Solicitors in all their controversies, the Confuls authority notwithstanding. This was enacted, and they were called the Tribunes of the people. After this attonement among themselves, they had continuall Warre with the Latines, concerning their bounds and limits, and with other neighbouring States. Among these, the Volsei and Aequi held them longest; who made Warre of themfelves upon the Romans: whereby they loft the best City in their whole jurisdiction,

In this conquest, T. Martius got the furname of Coriolanus: a name honorable then, as derived from a great victory; although, by reason of the poverty of the Towne, a RomanGeneral, in after times, would have bin ashamed of that title. But yet these graces had bin no occasion of disparagement, had he not afterwards in a great time of dearth, advifed to fell corne, which they procured from Sicil, at too high a rate, to the people, whereupon, Decius Mus, their Tribune, in their behalfe, accused him, & after judgement baniflied him Coriolanus flying to the rolfei, whom lately before he had vanquished, incenfed them to renue their forces againe; which being committed unto him, and to Assius Tullus, he prevailed in field, fo far forth, that he was come within foure or five miles of the City. Incamping there, he made fo sharp warre, and was at such defiance with his Country, that he would not relent by any supplication of Embassadors, untill his Mother Veturia, & Volumnia his wife, with a pittifull tune of deprecation, shewing themselves better Subjects to their Country, than friends to their Son and Husband were more availed able to Rome, than was any force of Armes. Hercupon Coriolanus difmiffing his Army was after put to death among the Volfei, as a Traitor, for neglecting fuch opportunity or (as others furmise) living with them untill old age, he died naturally.

Not long after this the Veii in Hetruria, provoked the Romans; against whom the Fabii, three hundred and sixe in number, all of one Familie, intreated and obtained, that they only might be employed, as it had bin in a private quarrell. These Fabii, after some good services, lying incamped at Cremera, were circumvented, and all slaine: one only of that whole house had bin lest, by reason of infancie, at home; from whom afterward sprang Fabius Maximus, who vanquished Hannibal.

In processe of time, the Romans were also troubled with the Volsei, at the hill of Algidum, two miles from Rome; where Lucius Minutius their Consul, with his whole armie, had bindiscomfited, had not L. Quintius Cincinatus chosen Dictator, and taken from the ploughto the highest honour in Rome, with successe answerable to his expedition, dispersed his enemies, and freed his Countrie in the space of fixeen dayes. In the continuance of this Volscian war it was that Appius Claudius, one of the ten men, whom they had two years before chosen Governors of the State, and Inactors of Solons lawes amongst them, procured from Athens (abrogating in the mean while the Consuls, and all other Maginesallying then in a Campe at Algidum. Hereupon the people in an uproare tooke the Hill Aventine, and after much variance, enforced the ten men to resign up their authority spaint onew Consuls.

After this, either new quarrels, or defire to revenge old losses, drew the Romans into a new war against the Veientes and their adherents, upon whom, having tried their forces with diversitie of Captaines, and varietie of event, they vanquished the Falisi; and the Fidenates, and utterly subdued the Veientes. In conquering the Falisi, Furing Camillus shewed no less integritie than fortitude. For when a Schoolemaster, by traying forth into the Roman campe, many children of the principall Citizens, thought to betray the Towne, yeelding them all up as Hostages: Camillus delivered this Traitor bound unto his Schollers, willing them to whip him backe into the Citie; which forthwith yeelded mothin in reverence of his justice. The steep of Veil was ten years, and so troublesome, that the Romans were there first enforced to winter abroad under beasts skins (to which they were the more easily induced, because then first they received pay) and to make were never to return without victorie.

At length winning the Citie by a Mine, they got fo large spoils, that they consecrated their tenths to Apollo Pythins: and the whole people in generall were called to the ranacking of the Citie. But yet they were no less unthankful to Camillus for his service, than before they had been to Coriolanus; for they banished him the Citie, upon some occafonofinequalitie in dividing the spoiles: yet he requited their unkindnesse with a new precoffervice against the furie of the Gaules; who being a populous Countrie, and very healthfull, the fathers (as sometimes now) lived so long, that the sons, destinate ofmeanes, were enforced to roave abroad, seeking some place where to set up their rest: and withall being a Nation vaste in bodie, rude by nature, and barbarous in conditions, wandred as Rovers over many Countries. Some of them lighting on Italie, fet upon Chifum a Towne in Hetruria: whereof Rome having information, (and being carefull other Confederate Townes) fent Embassadours, warning them to defist from such inmious enterprises. But the barbarous people, not regarding the message, upon some inme offered by the Romane Embassadours, converted their forces from Chilium to-Wilds Rome; and giving a great overthrow unto the Romans, by the River Allia, upon the fixteenth day before the Calends of August (which day was after branded for unluc-& called Allienfis in the Roman Kalendar) they haftned towards the Citie. Then was Romethe true map of miserie and desolation. For some leaving the Citie 3 some cree-Ping into holes; Priests hiding their reliques; and every one shifting for himselfe ere the farmiccame; Romewas abandoned as indefensible. The Vestall Virgins, in this tumult, were fafely conveyed away; the Ancients of the Citie, gathering boldneffe out of desperate sear, did put on their Robes, and taking their leave of the world, did seat themelves in Thrones, in their feverall houses, hourely expecting the messengers of death, and meaning to dye, as they had lived, in State. The younger fort, with M. Manlius their Captime, took upon them to make good the Capitoll.

By this the Gaules were entred the Citie, who seeing all quiet, at first suspected some abush; afterward finding all secure, they fell to the spoyle, committing all so the fire ad sword. As for the old Senatours, they sate in their Majestie with a grave resolutions having first reverenced them as gods, anonthey tried whether they would die likemen. When the Citie was throughly rifled, they attempted the Capitoll: which held them work for the space of seven moneths. Once they were like to have surprised it by night, but being descried by the gagling of Geese, M. Manlius did awaken, and kept them from entrance. At length a composition was agreed upon: the Gaules being weary, and the Romans hungry. The bargaine was, that the Gaules should take a thousand pound weight ingold, to desist from their siege. Whilest the gold was inweighing, the Gaules, with open insolencie, made their weights too heavie: Brennus their Captaine, casting his fword into the ballance, and with a proud exprobration, faying, that the vanquished must be patient perforce. But in the middest of this cavilling came Furius Camillus with an Army from Ardea, (where he had lived in his banishment) and fell upon the Gaules, with such violence, that he dispersed their troupes, quenched the fire of the Citie with their bloud, forcing them to restore the spoyles with advantage, and forbeare the gold, in accepting which they had lately been so nice. Further, having rid the City of them, he fo hotly purfued them through a great part of Italie, that the remainder of their Army which escaped from him, was very small. Other Armies of the Gaules, which followed this first, had the like ill successe. They were often beaten by the Romans; especially the victories of M. Torquatus, and of M. Valerius Corvinus (each of which in fingle fight flew a severall Champion of the Gaules) abated their presumption, and restored conrage to the Romans. Camillus, for his notable service, was afterwards accounted a second to Romulus.

The people, after this destruction of their Citie, were earnestly bent to go to the Veii to inhabite; but Camillus, disswaded them.

About the fametime, somewhat before the fiege of Veiithey changed their government from Consuls to military Tribunes. The government of these also, after some yeares, was by civill diffention interrupted : fo that one while Confuls ruled, another while there was an Anarchie : Then the Tribunes were restored and ruled againe, till after many yeares expired, the Consular authority was established, it being enacted, that one of the Confuls should alwaies be a Plebeian. This was after the building of the City 365 yeares. And now Rome by Suppression of her neighbour Countries, creeping well 30 forward out of her Minority, dares fet forth against the warlike Samnites, who dwele almost one hundred and thirty miles off: fituated betweene Campania and Apulia. These did so strongly invade the Campanians their Neighbours, that they forced them to yeeld themselves subjects to Rome, and undergoe any conditions of Tribute, or whatsoeveresse to obtaine protection: which the Romans, although both Countries had been their Confederates, yet not willing that the greater, like fish, should devoure the lesse, easily allowed of ; aiming themselves at the good situation of Campania, the aboundance of Come and Wine, pleasant Cities and Townes, but especially Capua it selfe, the fairest City then in all Italy.

The families of the Papyrii and Fabii were most imployed in the managing of this 4 War, which endured the space of fifty years. And in this season were the Romans oftentimes dangerously encountred by the Samnites, as when T. Vetwins and Sp. Posthumins were Confuls, and discomfitted by Pontius at Caudium, with no small ignominic: and when 2. Fabius Gurges lost the field with three thousand men. But for those losses, many great victories made large amends: The greatest whereof were gotten by L. Papprius, and by Quintus Fabius Maximus.

The Sammites drew the Hetrurians into their quarrell. But the force of the Sammites was well broken, ere the Hetrurians (the greater and richer, but lesse warlike Nation) began to stir. So the one and the other of these two Countries, became at length, tributary to Rome. In the continuance of this long war it was, (though in time of truce between the Romans and Samnites) that the Latines began to challenge equal freedomeinthe Corporation of Rome, and right in bearing office, so that they required to have one of the Confuls yearly chosen out of them.

This demand of the Latines was not unreasonable. For the Romans themselves were a Latine Colonie; besides all which, they made offer to change their name, and to beal called Romans. But the Romans were too proud to admit any such capitulation. Soa great battell was fought between them : wherein the fortune of Rome prevailed, by the vertue of the Confuls.

Manlim Torquatm and the elder Decius were then Confuls, whom the Soothfayers advertised, that the fide should be victorious which lost the Generall in fight. Hereupon Decius the Confull exposed his life to the Enemie, and purchased victorie (as was beleeved) by his death. In which kinde of devoting himselfe for his Armie, the sonne of this Decius being after Confull, did imitate his father in the Hetrurian warre. But (as Tully well notes) it was rather the desperate resolution of these Devis, that purchased victorie, by rushing into the midst of the enemies, wherein their Souldiers followed them, than any great commendation of fuch a religion, as required the lives of so worthie Citizens, to be facrificed for their Countrie. The discipline of Manlius was no leffe resolute, than thevalour of Decius. He forbad any one to forfake his place, and fight fingle with an enemie. For breach of which order he caused his own son to be put to death, who had slain a Captain of the Latines, being challenged in fingle fight.

Whenthe Latines, the Aqui, Volsei, Hernici, Campani, Samnites, and Herrurians, with fome other people,, were brought under obedience; it was a vain labour for any people of Italie to contend against the Romans.

Yet the Sabines adventured to trie their fortune, and found it bad. For Curius Dentaus, the Roman Confull, wasting all their Countrie with fire and sword, from the River

Nar and Velia, to the Adriatique Sea, brought them into quiet subjection.

The last of the Italians that made triall of the Roman arms, were the Tarentines and their adherents. These had interposed themselves as mediatours betweene the Romans and Sammites; with a peremptorie denunciation of War, unto that partie which should date to refuse peace by them tendred. These threats which discovered their bad affection unto Rome, ended in words; but when the Samnites were utterly subdued, matter enough of quarrell was found to examine their abilitie of performance. The Romanes complained that certain ships of theirs were robbed, and sent Embassadours unto Tarentum, to require amends. Upon some wrong done to these Embassadours, was laid the foundation of that War, wherein the Lucans, Messapians, Brutians, and Apulians, joyning with the Tarentines, procured the Samnites, and other Subjects of Rome to rebell, and take their part. But some experience of the Roman Grength, taught all these people to know their own weaknesse. Whiere fore they agreed to fend for Pyrthus, by whose aide (being a Grecian, as the Tarentines also were) great hope was conceiwed, that the Dominion of Rome should be confined unto more narrow bounds than all Italy, which alreadie in a manner it did over-fpread.

How Pyrrhus warred upon the Romans, and vanquished them in two battailes.

Prrhus, for saken by the Macedonians, and unable to deale with Lysimachus, was compelled a while to live in rest: which he abhorred no lesse than a wiser Prince would have defired. He had a strong Armie, and a good Fleet, which in that unsettled estate of things, was enough to purchase a kingdom: but the fall of Demetrius had so increased the power of Lysimachus, that it was no point of wisdome to make an offensive war upon him, without far greater forces: Antigonus, the fon of Demetrius, held Corinth atthesame time, and some other Townes, with the remainder of his Fathers Armie and treasures, left in his hand. Upon him it is like that Pyrrhus might have won; but it was better to let him alone, that he might serve to give some hindrance to Lysimachus.

In this want of imployment, and covetous defire of finding it, the Tarentine Embassadours came very fitly to Pyrrhus: and they came with brave offers, as needing no other oadethan his good conduct, which to obtaine, they would caft themselves under his protection. They had in their companie some of the Samnites, Lucanians, Messapians, and others; which promised in behalf of their severall Nations, as much as could be defired. This encouraged Pyrrhus, and filled him with hopes of goodly conquests; that hee might enlarge his Empire to the West, as farre as Alexander had gotten Eastward; and fill by one victorie openthe gate unto another. To which effect it is fayd, that once he answered Cyneas his chiefe Counsellour, asking what hee meant to doe after evere of the victories which he hoped to get: that having wonne Rome, hee would foone bee Master of all Italie; that, after Italie hee would quickly get the Isle of Sicil; that, out of Sicill, he would passe over into Affrick, and winne Carthage, with all the rest of the Country; and being strengthened with the force of all these Provinces, he would be too hard for any of those that were now so proud and troublesome. But Cyneas enquired yet hard for any of those that were now so proud and troublesome. But Cyneas enquired yet further, what they should doe, when they were Lords of all: Whereunto Pyrrhus (sinding his drift) answered pleasantly, that they would live merrily; a thing (as Cyneas then told him) that they presently might doe, without any trouble, if he could be contented with his owne.

Neverthelesse, this Italian expedition seemed unto Pyrrhus a matter of such consequence, as was not to be omitted, in regard of any scholasticall disputation. Wherefore quence, as was not to be omitted, in regard of any scholasticall disputation. Wherefore the prepared his Army, of almost thirty thousand men, well forted, and well trained to soldiers: part of which he sent over before him under Cyneas, with the rest he followed fouldiers: part of which he sent over before him under Cyneas, with the rest he followed fouldiers: part of which he sent over before him under Cyneas, with the rest he followed fouldiers: part of which he fent over before him under Cyneas, with the rest he followed found for the Cyneas of pleasure and resort; enforcing them to take Armes, and making such a strict muster, as was to them very unpleasing, though greatly behoomatic their coars.

Whilest he was occupied with these cares, Lavinus the Roman Consul drew near, and beganto waste Lucania, a Province consederate with the Tarentines in this War.

The Lucanians were not ready to defend their own Country; the Samites were carelessed of the harme; that fell not (as yet) upon themselves; the Tarentines were better presented than they would have beene, but their valour was little: all of these had beene accustomed to shrinke for searce of the Roman sortitude: and therefore it sell out happily, that Pyrrbus relyed more upon his owne sortes, than the issue of their vaunting promises. He was now driven either to set forward with those that himselse had brought into stably, and the assistance of the Tarentines, wherein little was to be reposed; or essential to uphold ken the reputation of his own sufficiency, which by all meanes he was carefull to uphold ken the reputation of his own sufficiency, which by all meanes he was carefull to uphold ken the reputation of his own sufficiency, which by all meanes he was carefull to uphold ken the reputation of his own sufficiency, which by all meanes he was carefull to uphold ken the reputation of his own sufficiency, which by all meanes he was carefull to uphold ken the reputation of his own sufficiency, which by all meanes he was carefull to uphold ken the reputation of his own sufficiency, which be also be found to sufficiency of the Romans, a gainst whom he proudly marched.

Lavinus the Consul was not affinited with the terrible name of a great King; but I came on considering to meet him, and give him battel ere all his adherents should be ready to joyne with him. This boldnesse of the Roman, and the slacknesse of the Messages most concerned, caused Pyrrhus to offer a treaty of peace: requiring to have the quarrell between the Romans and his Italian friends, referred to his arbitrement. Whether he did this to wintime, that the Sammites and their fellowes might arrive at his Camp; or whether, considering better at nearedistance, the weight of the businesse which he had taken in hand, he were desirous to quit it with his honour; the short answer that was returned to his proposition, gave himno means of either the one or the other: for the Romans sent him this word, that they had neither chosen him their Judge, nor feared him their enemy.

Hereupon both Armies hastened their march unto the River of Siris: Levinus intending to fight before the arrivall of the Samnies; Pyrrhus, to hinder him from passing that River, untill his own Army were full. Upon the first view of the Roman Campe, it was readily conceived by Pyrrhus, that he had not now to do with barbarous people, but with men well trained in a brave discipline of War: which caused him to set a strong Corps de garde upon the passage of the river, that he might not be compelled to fight, untill he saw his best advantage. But he quickly found, that this new enemy was not only skilfull in the Art of War, but courageous in execution. For the Roman Army entred the Foord, in sac of his Corps degarde; and their horse, at the same time begant o passe the River, in sundry places: which caused the Greekes to for sake the defence of their bank, and speedily retire their Camp.

This audacity forced Pyrrhus to battell; wherewith hee thought it best to present them, ere the whole Army had recovered firme footing, and were in order. So directing his Captaines how to marshall his battels; himselfe with the horse, charged upon the Romans: who stoutly received him, as men well exercised in sustaining surious impressions. In this fight, neither did his courage transport him beyond the duty of a carefull Generall; nor his providence indirecting others, hinder the manifestation his personall valour. It behooved him indeed to do his best; for he never met with better the personal valour. It behooved him indeed to do his best; for he never met with better the personal valour.

opposers. Once, and shortly after the fight began, his horse was slaine under him: afterwards, he changed armour with a friend; but that friend paid his life for the use of his kings armour, which was torne from his backe. This accident had almost lost him the battell: but he perceiving it, discovered his face, and thereby restored courage to his men, and took from the Romans their vain joy. The fight was obstinate, and with the greater losse (at least of more eminent men) on Pyrrhus his side, as long as onely speare and sword were used. But when the Elephants were brought into the wings, whose unstall form and terrible aspect, the horses of the Romans (unaccustomed to the like) were ceiving their horse put to rout, and driven out of the field; finding also themselves both charged in slanke, and over-borne, by the force and huge bulke of those strange beasts; gave way to necessitie, and saved themselves, as well as they could, by hastie slight: in which constrenation, they were so forgetfull of their discipline, that they tarried not to defend their Campe, but was quite beyond it, leaving both it, and the honour of the day; mirely to *Pyrrhus."

The fame of this victorie was foon spread over Italie; and the reputation was no leffe than the fame. For it was a matter very rare to be heard, that a Roman Conful, with a fled Armie, should lose in plaine battell, not onely the Field, but the Campe it selfe, being so notably fortified as they alwaies were. And this honour was the more bravely wonby Pyrehus, for that he had with him none of his Italian friends, fave the unwarhe Tarentines . Neither could he well diffemble his content that he took, in having the glory of this action peculiarly his own at fuch time as he blamed the Lucans & Sammites, forcomming (as we fay) a day after the Faire. Nevertheleffe he wifely confidered the mength of the Romans, which was fuch, as would better endure many fuch loffes, than brould many fuch victories. Therefore he thought it good to compound with them, whilest with his honour he might; and to that purpose he sent unto them Cyneas his Embilladour, demanding only to have the Tarestines permitted to live at reft, and himfelf accepted as their especiall friend. This did Cyness, with all his cunning, and with libealleifts labour to effect: but neither man nor woman could be found in Rome, that muldtake any bribe of him; neither did their defire of recovering their captives, or their danger, by the rifing of many States in Italy against them, so incline them to peace, athevehement exhortation of Appins Claudins, an old and blinde Senatour, did ftirre hemupto make good their honour by war. So they returned answer, that while Pyr. the abode in Italie, they would come to no agreement with him.

Such was the report that Cyneas made at his return, of the Roman puffance and verue, as kindled in Fyrrhm a great defire of confederacie with that gallant Citie. Hereponmany kinde Offices passed between them: but still when he urged his motion of pace, the answer was ; He must first depart out of Italy, and then treat of peace.

In the meane feafon, each part made provision for war; the Romans levying a more mightie armie than the former; and Pyrrhus being strengthened with accesse unto his forcofall the East parts of Italie. So they came to trial of a second battell, wherein hough after long and cruell fight) the boilterous violence of the Elephants gave to Pyrwa second victorie. But this was not altogether fo joyfull as the former had bin: rahrit gave him cause to say, that such another victorie would be his utter undoing. For thad loft the flower of his Armie in this battell: and though he drave the Romans motheir Campe, yet he could not force them out of it, nor faw any likelihood of preriling against them, that were like to be relieved with daily supplies, whilest he should driven to spend upon his old stock. Neither could he expect that his Elephants should awaies stand him in stead. A little knowledge of their manner in fight would soon teach Romans, that were apt Schollers in such learning, how to make them unserviceable. Wherefore he defired nothing more, than how to carrie his honour fafe out of Ivalie: which to doe (feeing the Romans would not helpe him, by offering or accepting any are conditions of peace, or of truce) he tooke a fleight occasion, presented by fortune, hat followeth to be related.

6. III.

The great troubles in Macedon and Sicill. How Pyrrhus, being invited into Sicill, for fook Italieswan the most of the Hezand lost it in Short space. Pyrrhus returns into Italies, where he is beaten by the Romanes and so goes backe to his own Kingdome.

Hen Ptolomie Ceraumus had traiterously murdered his Benefactor and Patron Seleucus, he presently seized upon all the Dominions of Lysimachwin Europe, as if they had bin the due reward unto him, that had flain the Congueror. The houses of Cassander and Lysimachus were then fallen to the ground : neither was there in Macedon any man of strength and reputation enough to advance himselfagainst Ceraunus. The friends of Lysimachus were rather pleased to have him their King, that had (as he professed) revenged their Lords death; than any way offended with the odiousnesse of his fact, by which they were freed from subjection, to one, against whom they had flood in opposition. Many there were , that upon remembrance of his fathers great vertue, gathered hope of finding the like in Ceraunus: perswading themselves than his reign might provegood, though his entrance had bin wicked. These affections of the Macedonians did serve to defeat Antigonus the son of Demetrius, that made an attempt upon the Kingdome. As for Antigonus the sonne of Seleucus, he was far off, and might be questioned about some part of Asia, ere he should be able to bring an Armie neere unto Europe. Yet he made great shew of meaning to revenge his Fathers death : but being ftronger in money than in armes, he was content, after a while, to take faire words, and make peace with the murtherer. While these three strove about the kingdome, Pyrrhu, who thought his claime as good as any of theirs, made use of their diffention: threaming war, or promifing his affiftance to every one of them. By these meanes he strengthened himselfe, and greatly advantaged his Italian voyage, which he had then in hand requefling money of Antiochus, ships of Antigonus, and souldiers of Prolomie, who gave him his daughter in marriage, and lent him a ftrong power of Macedonian Souldiers, andof Elephants (covenanting to have them reftored at two years end) more for feare than for love : that so he might free himselfe from trouble, and quietly enjoy his kingdome.

Thus Ptolomie grew mightie on the fixeden; and the power that by wicked meanshe had gotten, by meanes as wicked he encreafed.

All Macedon and Thrace being his, the strong Citie of Cassandria was held by Arsinoe his fifter, the widow of Lysimachus, who lay therein with her young children. Her hearcumvented by making love to her, and (according to the fashion of those times, wherein Princes regarded no degree of confanguinitie) taking her to wife, with promife to adopt her children: a promise that he meant not to performe; for it was not long, ere he slew them, and drave her into exile.

In the pride of this good successe, which his villanie found, vengeance came upon him from afarre, by the furie of a Nationthat he never heard of. Belgius a Captaine of the Gaules, having forced his passage through many Countries, unto the confines of Macdon, sent a proud message to Ceraunu, commanding him to buy peace with money, or otherwise, to look for all the miseries of warre. These Gaules were the race of those; that issued out of their Countrie, to seeke new seates in that great expedition, wherein Brennus tooke and burnt the Citie of Rome. They had divided themselves, at their setting forth, into two companies; of which the one fell upon Italie; the other, paffing through the Countries that Iye on the Northerne fide of the Adriaticke Sea, made long abode in Pannonia, & the Regions adjoyning, where they forced all the neighbour Princestoredeeme peace with tribute, as now they would have compelled Ceraunus to does unto whole borders they came about an hundred and eight years after fuch time as their fellowes had taken Rome.

When their Embaffadours came to Ptolomie, asking what he would give: His answer was, That he would be contented to give them peace, but it must be with condition, that they should put into his hands their Princes as hostages, and yeeld up their armes; for otherwise, he would neither pardon their boldnesse, nor give any credit to their words At this answer, when it was returned, the Gaules did laugh; saying, That the would soone confute with deeds, the vanitie of such proud words. It may seeme strange that he, who had given away part of his Army unto Pyrrhus, for very feare; should bee fo confident in undertaking more mighty enemies. The King of the Dardanians offered tolend him twenty thousand men against the Gaules: but he scorned the offer; saying, That he had the children of those, which under the conduct of Alexander had subdued all the East. Thus he issued forth against all the barbarous people, with his famous Macedonians, as if the victory must needs have followed the reputation of a great name. But he soone found his great errour when it was too late. For the Enemies were not onely equall in strength of body, and siercenesse of courage, but so farre superiour to the Macedonians in number, that few or none escaped their furie. Prolome himselfe grievously wounded, fell into their hands, whileft the battell continued; and they prefently strook off his head, which they shewed to his men, on the top of a Lance, to their utter altonish-

The report of this great overthrow filled all Macedon with fuch desperation, that the people fled into walled Townes, and abandoned the whole Country as loft. Only Sothenes, a valiant Captaine, animating as many as he could, gathered a small Army, with which he many times got the upper hand, and hindred Belgius from using the victory at his whole pleasure. In regard of this his vertue, the Souldiers would have made him King; which title he refused, and was contented with the name of a Generall. But (as mischiefes doe feldome come alone) the good fricceffe of Belgius drew into mecedon, Bren-10 nus, another Captain of the Gaules, with an hundred and fifty thousand foot, and fifteen thousand horse; against which mighty Army, when softhenes with his weake troupes made opposition, he was easily beaten, and the Macedonians again compelled to hide themselves within their wals, leaving all their Country to the spoile of the Barbaria s.

Thus were the Macedonians destitute of a king, & trodden down by a Nation that they had not heard of, in leffe than fifty years after the death of Alexander, who fought to difcover and fubdue unknowne Countries, as if all Greece, and the Empire of Persia had been too little for a King of Macedon.

CHAP. 7. S. 3.

Very feasonably had these newes beene carried to Pjerbus in Italie, who sought a faire pretext of relinquishing his Warre with the Romanes; had not other tidings out of Skildiffracted him, and carried him away in purfuit of nearer hopes. For after the death of Agathocles, who reigned over the whole Island, the Carthagensans fent an Armie to conquer Sicil, out of which, by him, they had beene expelled. This Armie did fo ful prevaile, that the Sicilians had no other hope to avoyd flavery, than in submitting themselves to the rule of Pyrrhus; whom, being a Grecian, and anoble Prince, they thought it more for their good to obey, than to live under the well known heavie yoke of Carthage. To him therefore the Syracufans, Leontines, and Agragentines, principall Estates of the Isle, sent Embassadors, earnestly desiring him to take them into his pro-

It grieved Pyrrhus exceedingly, that two fuch notable occasions of enlarging his Dominions, should fall out so unluckily, both at one time. Yet whether he thought the buineffe of Sicil more important, or more full of likelihood; or whether perhaps he beleeved (as came after to paffe) that his advantage upon Macedon would not fo haftily paffe away, but that he might find some occasion to lay hold on it at better leasure; over into Sicilhe transported his army, leaving the Tarentines to shift for themselves; yet not leaving them free as he found them, but with a Garrison in their town, to hold them in subjection.

As his departure out of Italie was rather grounded on head-long passion, than mature advice; so were his actions following, untill his returne unto Epirus, rather many and timultuous, than well ordered or note-worthy. The Army which he carried into that Me, consisted of thirty thousand soote, and two thousand sive hundred horse: with which, foone after his descent into Sicil, he forc't the Carthaginians out of all, in effect, that they had therein. He also won the strong Citie of Eryx, and having beaten the Mamertines in battell; he began to change condition, and turne Tyrant. For he drave Softratw (to whom his cruelty was suspect) out of the Iland, & put Thenen of Syracuse to death, being jealous of his greatnesse; which two persons had faithfully served him, and delivend the great and rich Citie of Syracuse into his hands. After this, his fortunes declined lofalt, as he served himselfe, and salved the dif-reputation of his leaving Sicil, by an Embassage sent him from the Tarentines, and Samnites, imploring his present helpe against the Romans, who since his leaving Italie, had wel-neare disposses them of all that they had.

cy man. Taking this faire occasion, he imbarked for Italie; but was first beaten by the Carthaginian Gallies, in his passage, and secondly assayled in Italie it selfe, by eighteen hundred Mamertines, that attended him in the straits of the Countrie. Lastly, after he had recovered Tarentum, he fought a third battell with the Romans, led by M. Curius, who was victorious over him, and forc't him out of Italie into his owne Epirus.

But he never ftayed upon any enterprise; which was, indeed, the disease he had, whereof not long after he died in Argos.

6.1111.

Hom Antigenus, the fon of Demetrius, delivered Macedon from the Gauls . HomPytrhus men the Kingdome of Matedon from Arrigonus.

He vertue of Softhenes being too weak to defend the kingdome of Macedon; and the fortune which had accompanied him against Belgiza, failing him in his atcompts against Breamus: the Macedonians were no lesse glad to submit themselves unto the government of antigonus, than they had been formerly desirous to free themselves from the impotent rule of his Father Demetrim. His comming into the Countries of the impotent rule of his Father Demetrim. trie withan Armic, Navie, and Treasure beseeming a king, did rather breed good hope in the people, than fill them with much confidence: for he was driven to use against the Barbarians, onely those forces which he brought with him, having none other than good wishes of the Macedons to take his part, Brennu, with the maine strength of his 3 Armie, was gone to spoyle the Temple of Apollo at Delphos, having left no more behind him, than he thought necessarie to guard the horders of Macedon and Pannonia; which were about fifteen thousand foot, and threathousand horse. These could not be idle, but thought to get somewhat for themselves, in the absence of their sellowes: and therefore fent unto Antigonus, offering to fell him peace, if he would pay well for it; which by the example of Ceraunus, he had learnt (as they thought) not to refuse. Ansigonus was unwilling to weaken his reputation by condescending to their proud demands: yet he judged it unfitto exasperate their furious choler, by uncourteous words or usage, as Cerannus had over-fondly done. Wherfore heentertained their Embaffadors in very loving and sumptuous manner, with a royall feast: wherein he exposed to their view such abundance of maffie gold and filver, that they were not fo much delighted with the meat, as with fight of the veffels, wherein it was ferved. He thought hereby to make them understand how great a Prince he was, and how able if need required, to wage a mighty Army.

To which end, he likewise did shew unto them his Camp and Navie, but especially his Elephants. But all this bravery ferved only to kindle their greedy appetites; who feeing his thips heavieloaden, his Camp full of wealth, and ill fortified, himfelf (as it feemed) fecure, and his men, both in strength and courage, inferiour unto the Gaules, thought all time loft, wherein they suffered the present possessor to spend the riches which they accounted affuredly their owne. They returned therefore to their companions with none other newes intheir mouthes, than of spoile and purchase: which tale carried the Ganles head-long to Antigonus his Camp, where they expected a greater booty, than the victoty over Ceraunus had given to Belgius. Their comming was terrible and fudden; yet not fo sudden, but that Antigenes had notice of it, who distrusting the courage of his owne men, diflodged somewhat before their arrivall, and conveighed himselfe, with his whole army and carriage, into certaine woods adjoyning, where he lay close. The Gaules, finding his Campe for laken, were not halty to purfue him, but fell to ransacking the emptie Cabbins of the Souldiers; in hope of finding all that was either loft or hidden. At length, when they had searched every place in vaine, angry at their loft labour, they marched with all fpeed towards the Sea-fide; that they might fall upon him. whileft he was bufie in getting his men and carriages a ship-board. But the successe was no way answerable to their expectation. For being proud of the terrour which they had brought upon Antigones, they were so carelesse of the Sea-men, that without allorder, they fell to the spoyle of what they found on the shore, and in such ships as lay on ground.

Part of the Armie had left Antigonus, where he lay in covert; and had faved it felf by getting aboard the fleet: in which number were some well experienced men of war; who discovering the much advantage offred unto them, by the desperate presumption of their enemies, tooke courage, and encouraged others to lay manly hold upon the opportuniotic. So the whole number, both of Souldiers and Mariners, landing together, with great resolution, gave so brave a charge upon the disordered Gaules, that their contemptuous holdnesse was thereby changed into sudden feare, and they, after a great slaughter, drivento cast themselves into the service of Antigonus.

The fame of this victorie caused all the barbarous Nations in those quarters to re-enretain their ancient beleefe of the Macedonian valour: by which the terrible and refiftleffe oppressors of so many Countries were overthrowne.

To foeake more of the Gaules in this place, and to fhew how, about these times, three Tribes of them passed over into Asia the lesse, with their wars and conquests there: I hold it needlesse: the victorious armies of the Romans taming them hereafter in the Countries which now they wan, shall give better occasion to rehearse these matters briefly.

Howfoever the good fuccesse of Antigonus got him reputation among the barbarous people, yet his owne Souldiers, that without his leading had won this victorie, could not thereupon be perswaded to thinke him a good man of war: knowing that he had no imerest in the honour of the service, wherein his conduct was no better than creeping into a wood.

This (as presently will appeare) was greatly helpfull unto Pyrrhus: though as yet he hewnor fo much. For Pyrrhus, when his affaires in Italie stood upon hard termes, had fentunto Antigonus for helpe: not without threats, in case it were denied. So was he fireto get either a fupply, wherewith to continue his war against the Romans, or some feming honourable pretence, to for fake Italie, under colour of making his word good. inseeking revenge. The threats which he had used in braverie, meer necessitie forced him. athis returne into Epirm, to put in practife.

Hebrought home with him eight thousand foot, and five hundred horse: an armie molittle to be employed, by his restlessenature, in any action of importance; yet greaurthan he had meanes to keepe in pay. Therefore he fell upon Macedon; intending to take what spoile he could get, & make Antigonia compound with him, to be freed from mouble. At his first entrance into this businesse, two thousand of Antigonus his Souldias revolted unto Pyrrhus; and many Cities, either willingly or perforce, received him. Such fair beginnings eafily perswaded the courage of this daring Prince to set upon Antionus himselfe, and to hazzard his fortune, in triall of a battell, for the whole kingdome O Macedon.

Itappeares, that Antigonus had no defire to fight with this hot warriour; but thought ithe wifest way, by protracting of time, to wearie him out of the countrie. For Pyrehus overtooke him in a streight passage, and charged him in the reare; wherein were the Gaules and the Elephants, which were thought the best of his strength: a manifest proofe that he was in retrait. The Gaules very bravely sustained Pyrrhus his impression; yet Were broken at length (when most of them were slaine) after a sharpe fight: wherein it hems that Antigonus keeping his Macedonian Phalan within the streight, & not advaning to their fuccour, tooke away their courage by deceiving their expectation. The Captaines of the Elephants were taken soone after; who finding themselves exposed to the fame violence that had confumed so many of the Gaules, yeelded themselves and the calls. All this was done in full view of Antigonus and his Macedonians, to their great formfort, which emboldned Pyrrhus to charge them where they lay in their strength. Where the Phalanx could be charged only in a front, it was a matter of extreme diffiallie (if not impossible) to force it. But the Macedonians had seene so much, that they had no defire to fight against Pyrshus; who discovered so well their affections, that he adventured to draw neare in person, and exhort them to yeeld. Neither the common Souldier nor any Leader refused to become his follower. All forsooke Antigonus, a few horsemen excepted, that fled along with him to Thessalonica; where he had some small forces left, and money enough to entertaine a greater power, had he known where to levie it. But whilest he was thinking how to allure a sufficient number of the Gaules into his service; whereby he might repaire his losse: Ptolomie, the sonne of Pyrrhus, came upon him, and easily deseating his weake forces, drave him to stye from the parts about Macedon, to those Townes afarre off in Peloponnesus, in which he had formerly lurked, before such time as he looked abroad into the world, and made himselse a King.

This good successe revived the spirits of the Epirot, and caused him to sorget all forrow of his late mis-sortunes in the Roman warre: so that he sent for his sonne Helenum (whom he had left with a Garrison, in the Castle of Tarentum) willing him to come over into Greece, where was more matter of conquest, and let the Italians shift forthem-

6. V.

How Pyrrhus affailed Sparta without successe. His enterprise upon Argos, and his death.

Trrhus had now conceived a great hope that nothing should be able to withstand him; feeing that in open fight he had vanquished the Gaules, beaten Antigonus, and wome the Kingdome of Macedon. There was not in all Greece, nor, indeed, in all the Lands that Alexander had wonne, any Leader of fuch name and worth, as deserved to be set up against him: which filled him with the opinion that he might doe what he pleased. He raised therefore an Armie, consisting of sive and twentie thousand foot, two thousand horse, and source and twentie Elephants; pretending warre against Antigonus, and the giving libertie to those Townes in Peloponnesu. which the same Ansigonus held in subjection; though it was easily discovered, that such s great preparations were made, for accomplishment of some designe more important than warre against a Prince alreadie vanquished, and almost utterly dejected. Especially the Lacedamenians feared this expedition, as made against their State. For Cleonymu, one of their Kings, being expelled out of his Countrie, had betaken himselfe to Pyrhu: who readily entertained him, and promifed to restore him to his kingdome. This promise was made in secret; neither would Pyrrhus make shew of any displeasure that hee bare unto Sparta; but contrariwise professed, that it was his intent, to have two of his owne younger sons trained up in that Citie, as in a place of noble discipline. With such colours he deluded men, even till he entred upon Laconia; where prefently he demeaned himselfe as an open enemie: excusing himselfe and his former dissembling words a with a jest; That hee followed herein the Lacedamonian custome, of concealing what was truely purposed. It had been, indeed, the manner of the Laced emonians, to deale in like fort with others, whom, in the time of their greatnesse, they sought to oppresse but now they complained of that, as falfhood, in Pyrrhus, which they alwaies practifed in wifedome, till it made them distrusted, forsaken, and almost contemptible. Nevertheless, they were not wanting to themselves in this dangerous extremitie. For the old menand women laboured in fortifying the Towne; causing such as could be are armes to releve themselves fresh against the assault: which Pyrrhus had unwisely deferred, upon assurance of prevailing.

Sparta was never fortified, before this time, otherwise than with armed Citizens: soon; after this, (it being built upon uneven ground, and, for the most part, hard to approach) the lower and more accessible places, were fenced with wals; at the present only trenches were cast, and barricadoes made with carts, where the entrance seemed most easie. The days together it was assailed by Pyrrhus exceeding siercely; and no lesse should defended. The desperate courage of the Citizens preserved the Townthe first day; where into the violence of Pyrrhus had forced entrance the second day, but that his wounded horse threw him to the ground, which made his Souldiers more mindfull of saving the person of their King, than of breaking into the Citie, though already they had torne in funder the Barricadoes. Prefently after this, one of Antigonus his Captains got into Sparta with a good strength of men; and Areus the King returned out of Crete (where he had bin helping his friends in war) with two thousand men, little knowing the danger, in which his own Countrie stood, until he was almost at home. These succours didnot more animate the Spartans, than kindle in Pyrrhus a desire to prevaile against all impediments. But the third dayes worke shewed how great his error had beene, in forhesaw no likelihood of getting the place, otherwise than by a long siege: in which tedious course he had no desire to spend his time.

Antigonus had now raised an Armie, though not strong enough to meete the enelo mie in plaine field, yet able to hinder all his purposes. This made Pyrrhus doubtfull what way to take; being diversly affected, by the difficultie of his enterprise in hand, and the shame of taking a repulse in his first attempt. Whilest he was thus perplexed, letters came from Argos, inviting him thither; with promise to deliver that Citie into his hands

CHAP. 7. S.5.

Civill diffention raging then hotly in Argos, caused the heads of several factions to callin Pyrrhus and Antigonus; but the comming of these two Princes taught the Citizens wit, and made them desirous to rid their hands of such powerfull assistants, as each of the two Kings pretended himselfe to be. Antigonus told the Argives, that he came to save them from the tyrannie of Pyrrhus: and that he would be gone if they needed not his help. On the other side, Pyrrhus would needs perswade them, that he had none other errand, than to make them safe from Antigonus; offering in like manner, to depart, if they so desired.

The Argives tooke small pleasure in hearing the Foxe and Kite at strife, which of them should keepe the Chickens from his enemie: and therefore prayed them both to divert their powers some other way. Hereunto Antigonus readily condessended, and gave hostages to assure his word: for he was the weaker, and stood in need of good will. But Pyrihus thought it enough to promise: Hostages he would give none, to be sinferiours: especially, meaning deceipt. This made them suspect his purpose to be such, as indeed it was. Yet he lesse regarded their opinions, than to hold them worthy of assure as you giving such a bond, as he intended to breake ere the next morning.

It was concluded, that a Gate of the Citie should be opened by night unto Pyrrhus, by his Complices within Argos: which was accordingly performed. So his Amie without any tumult, entred the Citie; till the Elephants, with Towers on their backes, cloyed the way, being too high to passe the Cate. The taking off, and setting on against of those Towers, with the trouble thereto belonging, did both give alarmeto the Citie, and some leasure to take order for desence, before so many were entred, as could fully masterit. Argos was full of ditches, which greatly hindred to the Gaules (that had the Vantguard) being grown to f the wayes, in the darke night. The Citizens, on the other side, had much advantage, by their knowledge of every by passes: and setting upon the enemies on all sides, did put them to great losse and more trouble.

Pyrhus therefore, understanding by the confused noyse, and unequall shoutings of his ownemen, that they were in distresse, entred the Citie in person, to take order for their reliefs, and assure of the place. But the darknesse, the throng, and many other impediments, kept him from doing any thing of moment, untill breake of day. Then began heto make his passage by force, and so farre prevailed, that he got into the market place. It is said, that seeing in that place the Image of a Wolfe and a Bull, in such positure as if they had been combatant, he called to minde an Oracle, which threatned him with death, when he should behold a Bull sighting with a Wolse; and that hereupon he made retrait.

Indeed, the comming of Antigonus to the rescue, the disorder and confusion of his ownemen, with diversill accidents, gave him reasonable cause to have retired out of the Citie, though the Wolfe and Bull had been eaway. The tumult was such, that no directions could be heard; but as some gave backe, so did others thrust forward, and the argives pressing hardupon him, forced Pyrrhus to make good his retrait, with his own fword. The tops of the houses were covered with women, that stood looking on the fight. Among these was one, that saw her owne son in dangerous case, fighting with ngnt. Among their was taken a tile-stone, or slate, and threw it so violently down on the head of Pyrrhus, that he fell to ground aftonished with the blow; and lying in that case.

had his head cut off. Thus ended the rest lesse ambition of Pyrrhu, together with his life: and thus returned the Kingdome of Macedon to Antigonus; who forthwith possessed the armie, the bodie, and the children of his enemie. The bodie of Pyrrhus had honourable buriall, and was given by Antigonus unto Helenus his fon; which young Prince he graciously fent home into his fathers Kingdome of Epirus. From this time forwards, the race of Antigonus held the Kingdom of Macedon; the posteritie of Selenew reigned over Afia and Syria; and the house of Prolomie had quiet possession of Egypt: untill such time as the Citie of Romes wallowing all up, digested these, among other Countries, into the bodie of her owne Empire.

CHAP. I. Of the first Punicke Warre.

Adicussion of that probleme of Livie; Whether the Romans could have refisted the great Alexander. That neither the Macedonian nor the Roman Souldier was of equall valour to the English.

CHAP.I. C.I.

Hat question handled by Livie, Whether the great Alexander could have prevailed against the Romans if after his Easterne conquest. he had bent all his forces against them, hath been, and is the subject of much dispute; which (as it seemes tome) the arguments on both fides do not fo well explaine, as doth the experience that Pyrrhus hath given of the Roman power in his daies. For if he, a Commander (in Hannibals judgment) inferior to Alexander, though to none elfe, could with fmall strength of men, and little store of mony, or ofother needfull helps in War, vanquish them in two battels, and endanger their Estate. when it was well fettled, and held the best part of Italie, under a confirmed obedience: what would Alexander have done, that was abundantly provided of all which is needfulto a Conquerour, wanting only matter of employment, comming upon them before their Dominion was halfe fo well fettled! It is easie to say, that Alexander had no more than thirty thousand foot, and foure thousand horse (as indeed, at his first passage into Ahe carried over not many more) and that the rest of his followers were no better than bale effeminate Afiatiques. But he that considers the Armies of Perdiccas, Antipaser, Cratrus, Eumenes, Ptolomie, Antigonus & Lysimachus, with the actions by them performed. every one of which (to omit others) commanded only some fragment of this dead Emperours power, shall easily find, that such a reckoning is far short of the truth.

It were needleffe to speake of Treasure, Horses, Elephants, Engines of battery, and would have proved in fuch fervices. Now for helpers in Warre; I do not fee why all Greece and Macedon, being absolute. ly commanded by Alexander, might not well deferve to be laid in ballance again ft those parts of Italy, which the Romans held in ill-affured subjection. To omit therefore all benefit that the Easterne world, more wealthy, indeed, than valiant, could have affoorded to unto the Macedonian: let us onely conjecture, how the States of Sicill and Carthage, nea. rest neighbours to such a quarrell (had it happened) would have stood affected. The Sici. lians were for the most part Grecians; neither is it to be doubted, that they would readily have submitted themselves unto him, that ruled all Greece besides them. In what termes they commonly flood, and how ill they were able to defend themselves, it shall appeare anon. Sure it is, that Alexanders comming into those parts, would have brought excelfive joy to them that were faine to get the helpe of Pyrrhus, by offering to become his subjects. As for the Carthaginians, if Agathocles the Tyrant of Syracufe, hated of his people, and ill able to defend his owne befieged Citie, could by adventuring to faile into Affrick, put their Dominion, yea, and Carthage it selfe, in extreme hazzard, shall we thinke that they would have been able to withstand Alexander? But why doe I question their ability, feeing that they fent Embassadors, with their submission, as farre as Babylon, ere the Warre drew neare them : Wherefore it is manifest, that the Romans must, without other fuccour, than perhaps of some other few Italian friends (of which yet there were none that for sooke them not, at some time, both before and after this) have opposed their valour and good militarie discipline, against the power of all Countries to them knowne, if they would have made refistance. How they could have sped well, in undertaking fuch amatch; it is uneafie to finde in discourse of humane reason. It is true, that vertue and fortune worke wonders: but it is against cowardly fooles, and the unfortunate: for who foever contends with one too mighty for him; either must excell in these, as much as his enemy goes beyond him in power; or else must looke both to be jovercome, and to becast downe so much the lower, by how much the opinion of his fortune and vertue renders him suspected, as likely to make head another time against the vanquisher. Whether the Roman or the Macedonian were in those dayes the better Souldier, I will not take upon me to determine: though I might, without partiality, deliver mine owne opinion, and preferre that Army, which followed not onely Philip and Alexander, but also Alexanders Princes after him, in the greatest dangers of all forts of Warre; before any, that Rome either had, or in long time after did send forth. Concerning fortune, who can give a rule that shall alwaies hold : Alexander was victorious in every battell that he fought: and the Romans in the issue of every Warre. But forasmuch as Livie hath judged this a matter worthy of consideration; Ithinkita great part of Romes good fortune, that Alexander came not into Italie: where inthree years after his death, the two Roman Confuls, together with all the power of that State, were surprized by the Samnites, and enforced to yeeld up their armes. We may therefore permit Livie to admire his own Romans, and to compare with Alexander those Captains of theirs, which were honoured fufficiently, in being thought equall to his follow ers: that the fame conceipt should blind our judgement, we cannot permit without much

Now in deciding such a controversie, me thinkes it were not amisse, for an Englishman, to give fuch a fentence between the Macedonians and Romans, as the Romans oncedid (being chosen Arbitrators) between the Ardeases and Aricini, that strove about a piece of land; faying, That it belonged unto neither of them, but unto the Romans themselves.

If therefore it be demanded, whether the Macedonian or the Roman were the bell Warriour : I will answer: The Englishmen. For it will soone appeare to any that shall examine the noble acts of our Nation in warre, that they were performed by no advantage of weapon; against no savage or unmanly people; the enemy being farre superiour unto us in number, and all needfull provisions, yea as well trained as we, or commonly better, in the exercise of Warre.

In what fort Philip wan his Dominion in Greece; what manner of men the Persians and Indians were, whom Alexander vanquished; as likewise of what force the Macedoian Phalanx was, and how well appointed against such armes as it commonly encounred; any man, that bath taken paines to reade the foregoing storie of them, doth sufficiently understand. Yet was this Phalanx never, or very seldome, able to stand against the Roman Armies; which were embattailed in fo excellent a forme as I know not whether Nation besides them have used, either before or since. The Roman weapons likewise, both offenfive and defensive, were of greater use than those with which any other Nation hath served, before the fiery instruments of Gun-powder were known. As for the enemies with which Rome had to doe, we finde, that they which did over-match her in numbers, were as far over-matched by her in weapons, and that they of whom the had little advantage in arms, had as little advantage of her in multitude. This alfo(as Plutarch well observeth) was a part of her happinesses that she was never over-laid with two great of the Historie of the World.

Hereby it came to passe, that having at first increased her strength by accession of the spines; having won the State of Alba, against which she adventured her own selfe, as twere in wager, upon the heads of three Champions; and having thereby made her McPrincesse of Latium, she did afterwards, by long war, in many ages, extend her Dominion over all Italie. The Carthaginians had well-neare oppressed her: but her Souldiers were Mercenarie; fo that for want of proper strength, they were easily beaten ather owne doores. The Atolians, and with them all, or the most of Greece, affisted heragainst Philip the Macedonian: he being beaten, did lend her his helpe to beat the me Atolians. The wars against Antiochim, and other Asiatiques, were such as gave to hime finall cause of boast, though much of joy: for those opposites were as base of courige, as the lands which they held were aboundant of riches. Sicil, Spain, and all Greece, Mimo her hands, by using her aide to protect them against the Carthaginians and Macedoni are s-

Ishall not need to speake of her other conquests: it was easie to get more when shee hadgotten all this. It is not my purpose to disgrace the Roman valour (which was very noble) or to blemish the reputation of so many famous victories: I am not so idle. This I hy; That among all their wars, I finde not any, wherein their valour hath appeared comproble to the English. If my judgement seem over-partiall our wars in France may help tomake it good.

First therefore it is well knowne, that Rome (or perhaps all the world besides) had neverany fo brave a Commander in war as Julius Cafar: and that no Roman armie was comparable unto that which served under the same Casar. Likewise, it is apparent, that his gallant Armie, which had given faire proofe of the Roman courage, in good performance of the Helvetian war, when it first entred into Gaule; was neverthelesse utterly Meartned, when Cafar led it against the Germans. So that we may justly impute all thatwas extraordinarie in the valour of Cafars men, to their long exercise, under so good Leader, in forgreat a war. Now let us in generall compare with the deeds done by bele best of Roman Souldiers, in their principall service; the things performed in the fine Countrie, by our common English Souldiers, levied in haste, from following the Cart, or fitting on the shop-stall; so shall we see the difference. Herein will we deale tily, and beleeve Cafar, in relating the acts of the Romans: but will call the French Hibrians to witnesse, what actions were performed by the English. In Casars time France was inhabited by the Gaules, a stout people, but inferiour to the French, by whom they Were fubdued; even when the Romans gave them affiftance. The Countrie of Gaule was Tentin funder (as Cafar witneffeth) into many Lordships: some of which were governed by petty Kings, others by the multitude, none ordered in such fort as might make it applable to the nearest Neighbour. The factions were many, and violent: not onely in generall through the whole Countrie, but between the pettie States, yea in every Citie, and almost in every house. What greater advantage could a Conquerour defire ? Yet there was a greater. Ariovistus, with his Germans, had over-run the Countrie, and held much part of it in subjection, little different from meere slaverie: yea, so often had the Germans prevailed in warre upon the Gaules, that the Gaules, (who had sometimes been the better Souldiers) did hold themselves no way equal to those daily Invaders. Had France bin so prepared unto our English Kings, Rome it selfe by this time, and long ere this time, would have bin ours. But when King Edward the third began his War upon France, he found the whole Countrey settled in obedience to one mighty King; a Kino whose reputation abroad, was no lesse than his puissance at home; under whose Ensigne the King of Bohemia did serve in person; at whose call the Genowayes, and other Neigha The Dolphin bour States, were ready to take armes: finally, a King, unto whom one a Prince gavegof Viennois.

b The King of way his Dominion, for love; banother foldaway a goodly City and Territory for mony. The Country lying fo open to the Romans, and being fo well fenced against the Eng lilb: it is note-worthy, not who prevailed most therein (for it were meer vanity to march the English purchases with the Roman conquest) but whether of the two gave the greater proofe of military vertue. Cafar himselfe doth witnesse, that the Gailes complained of their owne ignorance in the Art of War, and that their owne hardinesse was overmaste. red by the skill of their enemies. Poore men, they admired the Roman Towers, and Engines of battery, raifed and planted against their walles, as more than humane workes. What greater wonder is it, that fuch a people was beaten by the Romans; than that the Caribes, a naked people, but valiant, as any under the skie, are commonly put to the worfe by finall numbers of Spaniards? Besides all this, we are to have regard of the great difficulty that was found, in drawing all the Gaules, or any great part of them, to one head that with joynt forces they might oppose their affailants: as also the much more difficulty of holding them long together. For hereby it came to passe, that they were neverable to make use of opportunity: but sometimes compelled to stay for their fellowes; and fometimes driven to give or take battell upon extreame disadvantages, for feare lest their Companies should fall afunder: as indeed, upon any little disaster, they were ready to break and return every one to the defence of his own. All this, and (which was little lesse than all this) great oddes in weapon gave to the Romans the honour of many gallant victories. What fuch helpe : or what other worldly helpe, than the golden metall of their Souldiers, had our English Kings against the French? Were not the French as well experienced in feats of Warre? Yea, did they not thinke themselves therein our superiours. Were they not in arms, in horse, and in all provision, exceedingly Johnde Series. beyond us? Let us heare what a French writer faith of the inequality that was between the French and English, when their King John was ready to give the on-fet upon the Blacke Prince, at the battell of Poitiers. John had all advantages over Edward, both of tout! avantage number, force, shew, Countrey and conceit, (the which is commonly a consideration of no small varDlenum- importance in worldly affaires) and withall, the choice of all his horse-men (esseemed thathe brestaforce, le lu-best in Europe with the greatest and wisest Captaines of his whole Realme. And what could

I thinke it would trouble a Roman antiquary to finde the like example in their Hiftoconjustration at put d'importance ries; the example I say, of a King, brought prisoner to Rome, by an Army of eight thousand, which he had surrounded with forty thousand, better appointed, and no lesse expert Warriours. This I am fure of, that neither Syphax the Numidian, followed by a vallerie, lorseffi- rabble of halfe Scullions, as Livie rightly termes them, nor those cowardly Kings, Per-Jew and Gentius, are worthy patternes. All that have read of Cress and Agincourt, will beare me witnesse, that I doe not alledge the battell of Poitiers, for lacke of other, as good examples of the English vertue: the proofe whereof bath left many a hundred better markes in all quarters of France, than ever did the valour of the Romans. If any man impute these victories of ours to thelong Bow, as carrying farther, piercing morestrongly, and quicker of discharge than the French Crosse-bow: my answer is ready; That in all these respects, it is also (being drawne with a strong arme) superiour to the Mulket; yet is the Musket a weapon of more use. The Gunne and the Crosse-bow are of like force, when discharged by a Boy or Woman, as when by a strong Man: weaknesse or ficknesse, or a fore finger makes the long Bow unserviceable. More particularly, I fay, that it was the custome of our Ancestors, to shoot, for the most part, point blank and so shall hee perceive, that will note the circumstances of almost any one battell-This takes away all objection: for when two Armies are within the distance of a Butts length, one flight of arrowes, or two at the most can be delivered before they close. Neither is it in generall true, that the long Bow reacheth farther, or that it pier ceth more trongly than the Crosse-bow: But this is the rare effect of an extraordinariearme; whereupon can be grounded no common rule. If any man shall aske, How then came it to passe, that the English wan so many great battels, having no advantage to helpe him? I may, with best commendation of modestie, referre him to the French Historian: who relating the victorie of our men at Crevant, where they passed a bridge, John de Serres inface of the enemie, useth these words: The English comes with a conquering braverie, as hethat was accustomed to gaine every where without any stay: he forceth our guard placed noon the bridge to keepe the passage. Or I may cite another place of the same Author, where he tels, how the Britons, being invaded by Charles the eighth, King of France, thought it good policie, to apparell a thousand and five hundred of their owne men in English Cassocks; hoping that the very fight of the English red crosse, would be enough mterrefie the French. But I will not stand to borrow of the French Historians (all which, excepting De Serres, and Paulus Emylius, report wonders of our Nation:) the proposition which first I undertooke to maintaine; That the militarie vertue of the English, prevailing against all maner of difficulties, ought to be preferred before that of the Romans, which was assisted with all advantages that could be desired. If it be demanded, why then did not our Kings finish the conquest, as Cafar had done my answer may be (I hope without offence) that our Kings were like to the race of the Lacida, of whom the old Poet Ennius gave this note; Bellipotentes sunt mage quam sapienti potentes; They were more war like than politique. Who so notes their proceedings, may find, that none of them went to worke like a Conquerour, fave onely King Henrie the fift; the course of whose victories it pleased God to interrupt by his death. But this question is the more easily answered, if another be first made. Why did not the Romans attempt the conquest of Gaule before the time of Cafar? why not after the Macedonian war? why not after the third Punick, or after the Numantian? At all these times they had good leisure: and then especially had they both leisure and fit opportunitie, when under the conduct of Marina, they had newly vanquished the Cimbri, and Teutones, by whom the country of Gaule had bin piteoufly wasted. Surely the words of Tullie were true; That with other Nations the Romans fought for Dominion, with the Gaules for preservation of their own safety.

Therefore they attempted not the conquest of Gaule, untill they were Lords of all other Countries, to them knowne. We on the other fide held only the one halfe of our owne Iland; the other halfe being inhabited by a Nation (unleffe perhaps in wealth and numbers of men somewhat inferiour) every way equall to our selves; a Nation ancientlyand strongly allied to our enemies the French, and in that regard enemie to us. So that our danger lay both before and behinde us: and the greater danger at our backs; where commonly we felt, alwayes we feared, a stronger invasion by land, than we could make his usuall with men, that have pleased themselves in admiring the matters which they find in ancient Histories; to hold it a great injurie done to their judgment, if any take upon him, by way of comparison, to extoll the things of later ages. But I am well perswaded, that as the divided vertue of this our Iland, hath given more noble proofe of it felfe, than under so worthie a Leader, that Roman Armie could doe, which afterwards could win Rome, and all her Empire, making Cafar a Monarch; fo hereafter, by Gods bleffing, who hath converted our greatest hinderance into our greatest helpe, the enemie that shall dare to trie our forces, will find cause to wish, that avoyding us, he had rather encountred a great a puissance as was that of the Roman Empire. But it is now high time, that, laying aside comparisons, we return to the rehearfall of deeds done: wherein we shall find, how Rome began, after Pyrrhus had left Italie, to strive with Carthage for Dominion, in the first Punick war.

6. I I.

The estate of Carthage before it entredinto war with Rome.

THe Citie of Carthage had flood above fixe hundred yeares, when first it began to contend with Rome for the masterie of Sicil. It forewent Rome one hundred and fiftie yeares in antiquitie of foundation: but in the honour of great atchievements, it excelled farre beyond this advantage of time. For Carthage had extended her Dominion Africa it selfe, from the west part of Cyrene, to the streights of Hercules, about one thousand and five hundred miles in length, wherein stood three hundred Cities. It had subjected all Spaine, even to the Pyrenean Mountaines, together with all Kkkk 3 the Ilands in the Mediterranean Sea, to the west of Sicil; and of Sicil the better part. It flourished about seven hundred and thirtie yeares, before the destruction thereof by Scipio: who besides other spoyles, and all that the Souldiers reserved, carried thence source hundred and seventie thousand weight of filver, which make of our mony (if our pounds differ not) fourteen hundred and ten thousand pound sterling. So as this glorious Cirie ran the fame fortune, which many other great ones have done, both before and fince. The ruine of the goodliest pieces of the world fore-shewes the dissolution of the b The Turkes, at this day, doe whole.

About one hundred yeares after fuch time as it was cast downe, the Senate of Rame one halfe of the caused it to be re-built: and by Gracchus it was called Junonia: it was again and again a- 10 pool entails bandoned and re-peopled, taken and re-taken; by Genfericus the Vandal, by Bellifarius bors theearth: under Justinian by the Persians, by the Egyptians, and by the Mahometans. It is now noyea, they take ribute both of thing. The feat thereof was exceeding strong: and while the Carthaginians commanded the bodies, and the Sea invincible. For the Sea compaffed it about, faving that it was tied to the maine by a necke of land; which passage had two mile and more of breadth (Appian saith, three their Vallet, mile and one furlong) by which we may be induced to beleeve the common report, that the Citie it felfe was above twentie miles in compasse; if not that of Strabo, affirming the

The forme of their Common-weale refembled that of Sparta; for they had titularie our victorious armiesbincom-Kings, and the Ariftocraticall power of Senators. But (as Regims well observeth) the people in later times usurped too great authoritie in their Councels. This confusionin governement together with the trust that they reposed in hired Souldiers, were helping the lave, that hath courage & causes of their destruction in the end. Two other more forcible causes of their ruin, were their avarice and their crueltie. * Their avarice was shewed both in exacting from their Vaffals (befides ordinarie tributes) the one b halfe of the fruits of the earth; and in con-4 ved by cowarferring of great offices, not upon gentle and mercifull persons, but upon those who could Howfreethe best tyrannize over the people, to augment their treasures. Their crueltie appeared, in put-English yeomen ting them to death without mercie, that had offended through ignorance: the one of times, not long these rendred them odious to their vassals, whom it made readie, upon all occasions, toretince path, For-volt from them: the other did breake the spirits of their Generals, by presenting in the heat of their actions abroad, the feare of a cruell death at home. Hereby it came to palle, that many goodCommanders of the Carthaginian forces, after fome great loffereceived, countries laws, have desperatly cast themselvs, with all that remained under their charge, into the throat that they are of destruction; holding it necessary, either to repaire their losses quickly, or to ruineall morefree now together: and few of them have dared to manage their owne best projects, after that our Nobilities good forme, wherein they first conceived them, for feare lest the manner of their pro-Gentric more ceeding should be missinterpreted: It being the Carthaginian rule, to crucific not only the unhappy Captain, but even him, whose bad countell had prosperous event. The Evebraverie & faults, wherewith in generall, they of Carthage are taxed, by Roman Historians, I finde vainexpenceof to be the seilust, crueltie, avarice, crast, unfaithfulnesse, and perjurie. Whether the Romans hath taught them to raise their Rents, since by inclosures, and dismembring of Manors, the Court Baron, and the Court Leet, the Principals ties of the Gentrie of England have beene distolved, the Tenants having payed unto their Lords their racke Rents, owe them now no savice at all, and (perchance) as little love.

themselves were free from the same crimes, let the triall be referred unto their actions. The first league betweene Carthage and Rome, was very ancient: having bin made the veare following the expulsion of Tarquine. In that league the Carthaginians had the superioritie, as imposing upon the Romans the more strict conditions. For it was agreed. that the Romans should not so much as have trade in some part of Africk, nor suffer any this of theirs to passe beyond the headland, or cape, then called the faire Promontorie, unlesse it were by force of tempest: whereas on the other side, no Haven in Italie was forbidden to the Carthaginians. A fecond league was made long after, which (howfoever it hath pleased Livie to say, that the Romans granted it, at the Carthaginians intrea-tivibenties rie)was more strict than the former: prohibiting the Romans to have trade in any part of Africa. or in the Iland of Sardinia.

By these two treaties, it may appeare that the Carthaginians had an intent not only to keepe the Romans (as perhaps they did other people) from getting any knowledg of the flate of Africk; but to countenance and uphold them, in their troubling all Italy, wherby they themselves might have the better meanes to occupie all Sicil, whilest that Hand should be destitute of Italian succours. Hereupon we findegood cause of the joy that was in Carthage, and of the Crowne of gold, weighing twentie and five pound, fent from thence to Rome, when the Samnites were overthrowne. But the little state of Rome prevailed faster in Italie, than the great power of Carthage did in Sicil. For that mightie Ar- Xm. Grechift. micofthree hundred thousand men, which Hannibal conducted out of Africk into Sicil, wan only two Cities therein: many great fleets were devoured by tempefts; and howfoever the Carthaginians prevailed at one time, the Sicilians, either by their own valours or by the affiftance of their good friends out of Greece, did at some other time repaire their own losses, and take revenge upon those Invaders. But never were the people of Carthage in better hope of getting all Sicil, than when the death of Agathocles the Tyrant, had left the whole Iland in combustion; the estate of Greece being such, at the fame time, that it feemed impossible for any succour to be fent from thence. But whilest the Carthaginians were busic in making their advantage of this good opportunitie; Pyrthus, invited by the Tarentines and their fellowes, came into Italie, where he made sharp war upon the Romans. These newes were unpleasing to the Carthag mians, who, being afubtile Nation, easily foresaw, that the same busie disposition which had brought this Prince out of Greece into Italie, would as eafily transport him over into Sicil, as soon as he could finish his Roman war. To prevent this danger, they fent Mago Embassador to Rome; who declared in their name, that they were forry to heare, what misadventure talie; if their helpe were thought needfull, against the Epirots. It was indeed the maine defire of the Carthaginians, to hold Pyrrhus so hardly to his workein Italie, that they might at good leifure, pursue their businesse in Sicil: which actualed them to make fuch a goodly offer. But the Romans were too high-minded and refuled to accept any fuch aide of their friends, lest it should blemish their reputation, and make them seeme unable to stand by their own strength. Yet the message was taken lovingly, as it ought; and the former league betweene Rome and Carthage renued; with tovenants added, concerning the present businesse; That if either of the two Cities made Peace with Pyrrhus, it should be with refervation of libertie, to affift the other, in case that Pyrrbus should invade either of their Dominions. All this notwithstanding, and notwithstanding that the same Mago went and treated with Pyrrhususing all means to sound his intentions (a matter very difficult, where one upon every new occasion, changeth his Ompurposes) yet Ryrrhus found leasure to make a step into Sicil: where, though in fine he was neither getter nor faver, yet hee cleane defeated the purposes of Carthage, leaving them, at his departure from thence, as farre from any end, as when they first be-

ple of Carthage were very willing to affift the state of Rome, by sending an army into 1-

Somany disasters, in an enterprise that from the first undertaking had bin so. strongly Purfued, through the length of many generations, might well have induced the Carthalinians to believe that an higher providence refifted their intendment. But their defire of winning that fruitfull Hand, was so inveterate, that with unwearied patience, they still continued in hope of so much the greater an harvest, by how much their cost and paines therein buried had bin the more. Wherefore they re-continued their former courses, and by force or practice, recovered in few yeares all their old possessions: making peace with Syracuse, the chiefe Citie of the Iland, that so they might the better enable themselves to deale with the rest.

Somewhat before this time, atroupe of Campanian Souldiers, that had ferved under Somewhat before this time, atroupe of Campanian Souldiers, that had ferved under Agathocles, being entertained within Messana as friends, & finding themselves too strong for the Citizens, tooke advantage of the power that they had to doe wrong; and with persidious crueltie, slue those that had trusted them; which done, they occupied the Citie, Lands, Goods, and Wives of those whom they had murdered. These Mercenaries called themselves Mamertines. Good Souldiers they were: and like enough it is, that meere desperation of finding any that would approve their barbarous treacherie, added rage unto their stoutnesses. Having therefore not any other colour of their proceedings, than the law of the stronger, they over-ranne all the Countrie round about

In this course, at first, they sped so well, that they did not only defend Messaa against the Cities of Sicil Confederate; to wit, against the Syracusians, and others, but they rather wan upon them, yea and upon the Carthaginians, exacting tribute from many Neighbour places. But it was not long, ere fortune turning her back to these Mamertines, the Syracusians wan fast upon them, and sinally, consisting them withinthe wals of Messaa, they also with a powerful Armie besieged the Citie. It hapned ill, that about the same time, a contention began, betweene the Syracusian Souldiers, then lying at Messaa, and the contention began, betweene the Syracusian Souldiers, then lying at Messaa, and the contention began, betweene the Syracusian Souldiers, then lying at Messaa, and the contention began, between the Syracusian Souldiers, then lying at Messaa, and the contention began, the syracusian Governors among themselves, to wit, Artemidorus and History, that was afterward King. Hieron, being for his yeares excellently adorned with many vertues, although it was contrary to the policie of that State, to approve any election made by the Souldiers; yet for the great elemencie he used at his first entrance, was by generall consent established and made Governour. This Office, herather used as a Scale, thereby to climb to some higher degree, than rested content with his present preference.

In briefe, there was somewhat wanting, whereby to strengthen himselfe within the Citie; and somewhat without it, that gave impediment to his obtaining, and life, keeping, of the place he fought; to wit, a powerfull partie within the Towne, and crtaine mutinous troups of Souldiers without, often and eafily moved to fedition and tumult. For the first, whereby to strengthen himselfe, he tooke to wife the daughter of Leptines, a man of the greate it estimation and authoritie among the Syracusians. For the fecond, leading out the Armie to befiege Messana, he quartered all those companies, which he held suspected, on the one side of the Citie, and leading the rest of hishorse and foot unto the other fide, as if he would have affaulted it in two severall parts, he marchedaway under the covert of the Towne walls, and left the Mutiners to be cut in pieces by the affieged: So returning home, and levying an Armie of his owne Citizens, well trained and obedient, he hasted again towards Mellana, and was by the Mamerians (growne proud by their former victorie over the Mutiners) incountred in the plaines of Mylaum, where he obtained a most signall victorie, and leading with him their Commander Captive into Syracuse, himselse by common consent was elected and salued King-Hereupon the Mamertines, finding themselves utterly enfeebled, some of them refolved to give themselves to the Carthaginians, others to crave assistance of the Romans: to each of whom the severall factions dispatched Embassadours for the very same purpofe.

The Carthaginians were soone readie to lay hold upon the good offer: so that a Captaine of theirs got into the Castile of Messana, whereof they that had sent for him gave him possession. But within a little while, they that were more inclinable to the Romani had brought their Companions to so good agreement, that this Captaine, either by force, or by cunning, was turned out of doores, and the Towne reserved for other

These newes did much offend the people of Carthage; who crucified their Captains as both a Traitor and Coward; and sent a Fleet and Armie to befiege Mellana, as Townethar rebelled, having once bin theirs. Hieron, the new-made King of Syraul (togratissie his people, incensed with the smart of injuries lately received) added his forces to the Carthaginians, with whom he entred into a league, for exterminating the Mamertines out of Sicil. So the Mamertines on all fides were closed up within Messana: the Carthaginians lying with a Navie at Sea, and with an Army on the one side of the Towne, whilest Hieron with his Syracusians, lay before it on the other side.

In this their great danger came Appins Claudius the Roman Conful, with an Army to the streights of Sicil: which passing by night with notable audacity, he put himselfe into the Towne, and sending Messengers to the Carthaginians, and to Hieron, required them to depart; signifying unto them that the Mamertines were now become confederate with the people of Rome, and that therefore he was come to give them protection, even by force of War, if reason would not prevaile.

This meffage was utterly neglected; And to began the War betweene Rome and Carto thage; wherein it will then be time to shew on which part was the justice of the quarre when some actions of the Romans lately foregoing this, have been first considered.

6. III.

The beginning of the first Punick Warre. That it was unjustly undertaken by the Romans.

Hen Pyrrbus began his wars in Italie, the Citie of Rhegium, being well affected to Rome, and not only fearing to be taken by the Epirot, but much more diffrusting the Carthaginians, as likely to seize upon it in that busie time; sought aide from the Romans, & obtained from them a Legion, confisting of 4. thousand Souldiers, under the conduct of Decius Campanus, a Roman Prefect; by whom they were defended and affured for the present. But after a while, this Roman Garrison, considering at good leasure, the fact of the Mamertines, committed in Messana (a City in Sicil, situate almost opposite to Rhegium, and no otherwise divided than by a narrow Sea, which severeth it from Italie) and rather weighing the greatnesses of the booty, than the odiousnesses of the vicked course. Consederating therefore themselves with the Mamertines, they entertained their Hosts of Rhegium, after the same manner; dividing the spoil, and all which that State had, among themselves.

When complaint was made to the Senate and people of Rome, of this outrage; they finding their honour thereby greatly stained (for no Nation in the world made a more severe profession of justice, than they did during all the time of their growing greatnesses reloved, after a while, to take revenge upon the offenders. And this they performed shortly after, when they had quenched the fires, kindled in Italy by Pyrrhus. For, not with-standing that those Romans in Rhegium (as men for the soulenesse of their fact, hopelesse of pardon) defended themselves with an obstinate resolution: yet in the end, the assailants forced them; and those which escaped the present sury, were brought bound to Rome, where, after the usual torments by whipping inflicted, according to the custome of the Country, they had their heads stricken from their shoulders, and the people of Rhegium were againe restored to their former liberty and estates.

This execution of Justice being newly performed, and the same thereof founding honourably through all quarters of Italy: messengers came to Rome from Messana, desiring help against the Carthaginians, and Syracusians, that were in a readinesse to inslict the like punishment upon the Mamertines, for the like offence. A very impudent request was, which they made: who having both given example of that villany to the homan Souldiers, and holpen them with joynt forces to make it good, do intreat the suggest to give them that assistance, which they were wont to receive from their fellow-theeves.

The Romans could not fuddenly resolve, whether the way of honesty or of profit were to be followed; they evermore pretended the one, but they many times walked in the other. They considered, how contrary the course of succouring the Mamertines was to their former counsels and actions: seeing for the same offences they had lately put to torment, and to the sword, their owne Souldiers, and restored the oppressed to their libertie. Yet when they beheld the description of the Carthaginian Dominion, and that they were alreadie Lords of the best part of Africa, of the Mediterran Ilands, of a great part of Spaine, and some part of Sicil it selse; whilest also they feared, therein therein therein seated (a City in beauty and riches, little at that time inferiour to Carthage, and farre superiour to Rome it selse) might become theirs; the safety of their owne estate spake for these Mamertines: who, if they (driven to despaire by the Romans) should deliver up Message, with those other holds that they had, into the hands of the Carthaginians, then would nothing stand betweene Carthage and the Lordship of Sicil: for Siracufe it felfe could not, for want of fuccour, any long time sublist, if once the Carthagini and, that were Masters of the Sea, did fasten upon that passage from the maine Land. It was further confidered; that the opportunity of Mellana was fuch, as would not onely debarre all succours out of the continent, from arrivall in Sicil; but would serve as a bridge, whereby the Carthaginians might have entrance into Italie, at their owne to pleasure.

These considerations of profit at hand, and of preventing dangers, that threatned from a-farre, did so prevaile above all regard of honesty, that the Mamertines were admitted into Confederacy with the Romans, and Ap. Claudius the Confull, presently difpatcht away for Meffana: into which he entred, and undertooke the protection of it. as is shewed before. The besiegers were little troubled with his arrivall; and lesse moved, with his requiring them to defift from their attempt. For they did farre exceede him innumber of men; The whole Iland was ready to relieve them in their wants: and they were strong enough at Sea, to hinder any supply from getting into the Towne. All this Appine himselfe well understood: and against all this he thought the stiffe metall of 20 his Roman Souldier a sufficient remedy. Therefore he resolved to issue out into the field. and to let the enemies know, that his comming was to fend them away from the Town:

In executing this determination, it was very beneficiall to him, that the enemy lavencamped in fuch fort, as one quarter was not well able to relieve another in diffresse. Hie. ren was now exposed to the same danger, whereinto he had wilfully cast his owne mutinous followers not long before: onely he was strong enough (or thought so) to make good his owne quarter, without helpe of others. Against him Ap. Claudius issued forth, and (not attempting, by unexpected fally, to furprize his trenches) arranged his men in order of battell, wherewith he presented him. The Syracusian wanted not courage to 20 fight; but furely he wanted good advice: else would he not have hazzarded all his power against an enemy of whom he had made no tryall 5 when it had been easie, and as much as was requifite, to defend his owne Campe. It may be, that he thought to get honour, wherewith to adorne the beginning of his reigne. But he was well beaten, and drivento fave himselfe within his Trenches: by which losse, he learned a point of wisdome, that flood him and his Kingdome in good flead all the daies of his life. It was a foolish defire of revenge, that had made the Syracufians fo busie, in helping those of Carthage, against the Mamertines.

Had Messana bin taken by the Carthaginians, Syracuse it selfe must have sought helpe from Rome, against those friends which it now so diligently assisted. Hieron had (in re- 40 fpect of those two mighty Cities) but a small stocke, which it behooved him to governe well: fuch another loffe would have made him almost bankrupt. Therefore he quietly brake up his Campe, andretired home: intending to let them stand to their adventures, that had hope to be gainers by the bargaine. The next day, Claudius perceiving the Sicilian Army gone, did with great courage, & with much alacrity of his fouldiers, give charge upon the Carthaginians: wherein he fped so well, that the enemy for sook both field and camp, leaving all the Country open to the Romans; who having spoiled all round, without resistance, intended to lay siege unto the great City of Syracuse.

These prosperous beginnings, howsoever they animated the Romans, and filled them with hopes of attaining to greater matters, than at the first they had expected: 50 Yet did they not imprint any forme of terrour in the Citie of Carthage, that had well enough repaired greater losses than this; in which no more was lost, than what had been prepared against the Mamertines alone, without any suspicion of Warre from Rome.

Now in this place I hold it feafonable, to confider of those grounds, whereupon the Romans entred into this War; not how profitable they were nor how agreeable to rules of honesty (for questionless the enterprize was much to their benefit, though as much to their shame) but how allowable in strict termes of lawfulnesse; whereupon they built all their allegations in maintenance thereof. That the Mamertines did yeeld themselves, and all that they had, into the Romans hands (as the Campanes, distressed by the Samnises, of one part had already admitted the Carthaginians, could be enabled to make any such surrendry in the publike name of all.

If therefore the Mamertines, by no lawfull furrendry of themselves and their possession ons, were become subject unto Rome, by what better title could the Romans affift the Mamertines, against their most ancient friends the Carthaginians, than they might have ayded the Campanes, against the Samnites, without the same condition: which was (as they themselves confessed) by none at all. But let it be supposed, that some point serving to cleare this doubt, is loft in all Histories. Doubtleffe it is, that no company of Pyrates, Theeves, Out-lawes, Murderers, or fuch other Malefactors, can by any good fucceffe oftheir villanie, obtaine the priviledge of civill societies, to make league or truce; yea, or forequire faire Warre: but are by all meanes, as most pernicious vermine, to be rooted out of the world. I will not take upon me to maintaine that opinion of some Civilians, that a Prince is not bound to hold his faith with one of these; it were a Position of ill consequence: This I hold; that no one Prince or State can give protection to such asthefe, as long as any other is using the sword of vengeance against them, without becomming acceffary to their crimes. Wherefore we may esteeme this action of the Ronums so farre from being justifiable, by any pretence of Confederacie made with them; asthat contrariwife, by admitting this neft of Murderers and Theeves into their protefion, they justly deserved to be warred upon themselves, by the people of Sicil; yea, although Messana had been taken, and the Mamertines all flain, ere any newes of the Confederacy had been brought unto the besiegers. The great Alexander was so farreperwaded herein; that he did put to sword all the Branchiada (a people in Sogdiana) and mized their Citie, notwithstanding that they joyfully entertained him as their Lord and King; because they were descended from a Company of Milesians, who to gratifie King Maxes, had robbed a Temple, and were by him rewarded with the Towne and County, which these of their posterity enjoyed. Neverthelesse, in course of humane justice, long and peaceable possession gives jus acquisitum, a kinde of right by prescription unto that which was first obtained by wicked meanes: and doth free the Descendants from heerime of their Ancestors, whose villanies they doe not exercise. But that the same gerention of Theeves, which by a detestable fact hath purchased a righ Towne, should be athowledged a lawfull company of Citizens, there is no shew of right. For even the Conqueror that by open Warre obtaineth a kingdome, doth not confirme his title, by those victories which gave him first possession: but length of time is requisite to establish im, unlesse by some alliance with the ancient inheritors, he can better the violence of his dame, as did our King Henry the first, by his marriage with Maude, that was daughter Malcolme, King of the Scots, by Margaret, the Neece of Edmund Ironfide. Wherefore lonclude, that the Romans had no better ground (if they had so good) of justice, in this parrell, than had the Gother, Hunnes, Vandalls, and other Nations, of the Wars that bey made upon the Roman Empire, wherein Rome her felfe, in the time of her visitation, was burnt to the ground.

6. IIII. Of the Ilandof Sicil.

The qualitie of the Iland: and the first inhabit ants thereof.

He defence of the Mamertines, or the possession of Messan, being now no longer fince the first victories of Appins Claudius, the objects of the Roman hopes; but the Dominion of all Sicil being the prize, for which Rome and Carthage are about to ontend: it will be agreeable into the order, which in the like cases we have observed; to take a briefe collection of things concerning that noble Iland, which hath bin the stage smany great acts, performed as well before and after, as in this present War.

Plin.1.2.c.91.

That Sicil was fomerimes a Peninfula, or Demie-Ifle, adjoyning to Italie, as a part of Brutium in Calabria, neare unto Rhegium, and afterward by violence of tempest severed from the same: it is a generall opinion of all antiquitie. But at what certaine time this division happened, there is no memoriall remaining, in any ancient writer. Strabo, Plinie, and Diony sins affirme, that it was caused by an earth-quake; Silius and Cassiodorus doe thinke it to have been edone by the rage and violence of the tide, and furges of the Sea. Either of these opinions may be true; for so was Eubæa severed from Bæotia; Atalame and Macris from Eubæa, Silie here in England, from the Cape of Cornwall, and Brittain itselfe (as may seeme by Verstigans arguments) from the opposite continent of Gaule. But for Sicil, they which lend their eares to fables, doe attribute the cause of it to Nep- to tune (as Eustathius witnesseth) who with his three-forked Mace, in favour of Jocastus, the some of Æslus, divided it from the maine land, and so made it an Iland, which before was but a Demie-Ifle; that by that means he might the more fafely inhabite, and poffeste the same. Diedorus siculus, moved by the authority of Hesiodus, ascribeth the labour of fundring it from Italie, to Orion: who, that he might be compared to Hersules (cutting through the rocks and mountains) first opened the Sicilian streights, as Hercales did those of Gibralter.

They which value the Ilands of the mid-land Sea, according to their quantity and content, doe make this the greatest, as Enflathius and Strabe, who affirme this, not only to excell the reft for bignesse, but also for goodnesse of soyle. As concerning the forme to of this Iland, Pompenin Mela faith, it is like that Capitall letter of the Greeke, which they call Delts, namely, that it hath the figure of a triangle; which is generally knowne to be true. That the whole Iland was confecrated to Ceres and Proferpina, all old writers with one conferraffirme. To Geres it was dedicated, because it first taught the rules of setting and fowing of Corne: to Preserpina, not so much for that the was from hence violently taken by Pluto, as because (which Plut archand Diederus do report for truth) that Pluto, as foon as the uncovering her felfe, first the wed her felfe to be feene of him, gave her the

Of the fertility and riches of this Countrie, there is a famous testimonic written by Cicero, in his fecond Oration against Verres, where he faith, that CM arcen Cato did callit ! the Granarie and Store house of the Common-mealth, and the Nurse of the vulgar fort. The fame Cicero doth adde in that place; that it was not onely the Store-house of the people of Rome: but also that it was a well-furnished treasurie. For without any cost or charge of ours (faith he)it hath usually clothed, maintained and furnished our greatest Armies with leather, apparrell, and corne. Strabe reporteth almost the fame thing of it. Whatsoever Sicilie doth yeeld (faith Solinus) whether by the funne, and temperature of the ayre, or by the industry and labour of man, it is accounted next unto those things that are of best estimation: were it not that such things as the earth first putteth forth, are extremely over-growne with faffron. Diodorne Sieulus faith, that in the fields neare unto Leonium, and in divers other places of this Hand, wheate doth grow of it selfe without any labour or looking to of the husbandman. Martianus sheweth, that there were in it fixe Colonies, and fixty Cities: there are that reckon more, whereof the names are found scatteringly in many good Authors.

Now besides many famous acts, done by the people of this Iland, as well in peacess Warre, there be many other things which have made it very renowned, as the birth of Ceres; the ravishing of Proserpina; the Giant Encelladas; the mount Aina, Scylla &Charybdis, with other antiquities and rarities; befides those learned men, the noble Mathematician, Archimedes, the famous Geometrician Euclides, the painfull Historian Diodorus, and Empedecles, the deep Philosopher.

That Scieil was at first possessed and inhabited by Giants, Lastriogones and Cyclopes, barbarous people, and uncivill; all histories and fables do jointly with one consent averre. Yet Thueydides faith, that thefe favage people dwelt onely in one part of the Iland. Afterward the Sicani, a people of Spiine, possessed it. That these Sicani were not bredde in the Isle (although some so thinke) Thueydides and Diederus doesvery constantly?

Of these it was named Sicania. These Sicani were invaded by the Siculis who, inhabiting that part of Latium, wheron Rome was afterward built, were driven by the Pelagi from their owne seates, and finding no place upon the Continent, which they were ableto master and inhabite, passed over into this Iland, three hundred years before the Greekes fent any Colonies thither: & (faith Philistus) eighty years before the fall of Troy. These siculi gave the name of Sicilia, to the Iland; & making warre upon the Sicani, drave them from the East and Northerne part thereof, into the West and South. At their landing, they first built the Citie Zancle, afterward called Messena; and after that, Catana, Leontium, & Syracuse it selfe, beating from thence the Aetolians, who long before had fetupa Towne in that place. As for the name of Syracuse, it was not knowne, till such time as Archias of Corinth (long after) wonne that part of the Iland from the Siculi; Neither did the Siculiat their first arrivall dispossesses the Aetolians thereof, but some hundred years after their descent, and after such time as they had sounded the Cities before named with Nea, Hybla, Trynacia, and divers others.

After these Siculicame another nation out of Italy, called Morgetes; who were thence driven by the Oenotrians. These sat downe in that part of Sicil, where they afterward railed the Cities of Morgentum, & Leontium. For at this time the Siculi were divided, and by a civill war greatly infeebled. Among these ancient stories, we finde the last vovmeand the death of Minos, King of Creet. Theucydides, an Historian of unquestionable fincerity, reports of Minos, that he made conquest of many Ilands: and some such bufinesse, perhaps, drew him into Sicil. But the common report is, that he came thither in pursuit of Dadalus. The tale goes thus: Dadalus fleeing the revenge of Minos, came into Sicil to Cocalus, King of the Sicani, and during his abode there, he built a place of great strength, neere unto Megara, for Cocalus to lay up his treasure in; together with many notable works, for which he was greatly admired and honoured.

Among the rest, he cast a Ramme in gold, that was set up in the Temple of Venus Eryuna; which he did with so great Art, as thosethat beheld it, thought it rather to be Ii-ving than counterfeit.

CHAP. 1, S. 4. + . 1.

Now Minos, hearing that Cocalus had entertained Dadalus, prepares to invade the Territory of Cocalus; but when he was arrived, Cocalus doubting his own ftrength, promilethto deliver Dadalus. This he performes not, but in the meane while, kils Minos by majon, and perswades the Cretans, Minos his followers, to inhabite a part of Sicil; the better (as it feems) to strengthen himselfe against the Siculi. Hereunto the Cretans (their King being dead) gave their consent, and builded for themselves the Citie of Minoa, afterthename of their King Minos. After, they likewise built the Towne of Engium, now alled Gange: and these were the first Cities, built by the Greekes in Sicil, about two westefore the warre of Troy; for the grand-children of Minos ferved with the Greeks at the fiege thereof.

But after fuch time as the Cretans understood, that their King had by treason beene made away; they gathered together a great Armie, to invade Cocalus . and landing neere mo Camicus, they befreged the fame five yeers, but invaine. In the end (being forced to returne, without any revenge taken) they were wrackt on the coast of Italy, and having no meanes to repaire their ships, nor the honour they had lost, they made good the place whereon they fell, and built Hyria, or Hyrium, between the two famous Ports of Brundusium and Tarentum. Of these Cretans came those Nations, afterward called 7a-Mes and Messapii.

After the taking of Troy, Aegestus and Elymus, brought with them certaine troups inb Sicil, & feated themselves among the Sicani; where they built the Cities of Aegesta and Elyma.

Itis faid, that Aeneas visited these places in his passage into Italie: and that some of the Trojans, his followers, were left behinde him, in these Townes of Sicil: whereof there want not good Authors, that make Aeneas himselfe the founder.

About the same time, the Phanicians seized upon the Promontories of Pachinus, & Libbeum, & upon certaine small Isles adjoyning to the maine Iland: which they fortihtd, to secure the trades that they had with the Sicilians; like as the Portugals have done in the East India, at Goa, Ormus, Mosambique, & other places. But the Fhanicians staied nothere; for after they had once affured their descents, they built the goodly Citie of anormus, now called Palerma.

These we finde, were the Nations that inhabited the Isle of Sicil, before the watre Of Troy, and ere the Greekes in any numbers began to straggle in those parts.

It may perchance feeme strange to the Reader, that in all ancient storie, he findes one
